Mr. Davies, who was welcomed very cordially, declaimed the recitative, "Deeper and Deeper Still," with fine and just dramatic feeling, and with an enunciation that was faultless. The air was rendered with a keenly sympathetic sense of its meaning and possibilities of graceful expression. His sweet, smooth and perfectly trained voice, musicianly phrasing and purity of taste, as well as the flexible ease of his singing, were a constant pleasure, and had it not been for overmuch of aspirating in the more flowing figures of the second part of the air, the effort would have been without a flaw. He fully merited the enthusiastic recognition and the three vigorous recalls that rewarded him.

The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Ruy Blas," Mendelssohn; aria from "The Taming of the Shrew," Goetz; concerto for violin, Gernsheim, and symphony No. 3, Schumann. The soloists are to be Miss Lena Little and Mr. Isidor Schnitzler.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.

MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 5, 1897.

The Symphony Concert—A Brilliant Performance.

It was high-water mark with the symphony orchestra Saturday night; if ever the organization won a triumph it was at this concert, and the audience was not slow in perceiving that there was a musical electricity in the air and the applause was continuous.

Weber's "Oberon" overture began the programme, and although there was a bit of false intonation in the opening horn phrase, the performance was as brilliant as any we have ever heard. That fearfully loud chord (Weber always wanted it so) was given with an explosion strong enough to shock the Boston Gas Co. within its walls, and the clarinette solo which followed was excellently played. Weber loved horns and clarinettes and constantly brought these instruments to the front. Both instruments deserve praise for their work in this overture. The applause at the end of the number was absolutely enthusiastic, and it was deserved.

Now followed that sterling artist, Mr. Leo Schulz, in two interesting violoncello numbers. Bargiel's Adagio gave good chances for breadth of tone and sympathetic quality, and Mr. Schulz was easily adequate in these directions.

The Dvorak Rondo, which received its first performance in Boston on this occasion, makes heavier demands upon the performer; it is a composition half-virtuosity, half-expression, calling upon two diverse schools of work in its chief theme and its two counterthemes. It is a clear enough example of second-rondo form, with excellent contrasts between its divisions.

The chief theme brought in a copious display of harmonics and high position work. The work is thoroughly in the folk-music style, its first theme sounding as if an American negro had been shipwrecked on a seacoast in Bohemia. Its countertheme was the most expressive part of the composition, and Mr. Schulz played it with much feeling. The second countertheme was not far removed from an Irish jig, leading to still more varied contrasts. Clear in form and very melodic, the work will become a favorite with all violoncellists. Mr. Schulz was recalled over and over again at its end.

There probably is not an orchestra in the world that could perform Tschailowsky's "Pathetic Symphony" as well as it was given at this concert; it is difficult for the reviewer to hold the reins over his enthusiasm for the work and its noble interpretation. Mr. Paur is right to give the symphony many times, as he has done, for in this case familiarity only breeds greater respect for the composition.

It may not be the greatest "Symphony" of our generation, measured by the classical yardstick (this achievement belong to the man who died in Vienna on the very day of the concert), but it is certainly the most passionate, the most moving orchestral work of this half of the century. By frequent performance our symphony men have grown into its spirit, the great technical difficulties are relegated to the background, and the result is something memorable. The audience, too, seemed to have become inducted into its subtleties, and grew very demonstrative after each movement. It is something something that seems to have been written in the shadow of death (although there is not the slightest truth in the rumors of the composer's subsequent suicide) as Mozart's "Requiem" was, and that has moved the composer mightily, and therefore has mighty power upon the auditor.

> "More than light airs and recollected terms
> Of these most brisk and giddy-paced times,"

The first movement, with its turbulence and struggle, the second (the longest instance of 5-4 rhythm that we know of) with its strange pedal point of kettle-drum notes, the third taking the place of a Scherzo but by no means a playful movement, telling its tale of War and Glory ("The paths of Glory lead but to the Grave" would certainly be its fitting motto) and the final Threnody, with its muted horn tones telling of evil, disaster and death, its solemn gong stroke, and its throbbing heart gradually numbed to rest, all these points were brought out as never before—an indescribably great performance.

One would have thought that anything after this triumph would be in the nature of an anti-climax, but Mr. Ben Davies, who followed, for it was a concert with two soloists, managed to keep matters at a white heat by a very artistic interpretation of "Deeper and Deeper Still" and "Waft Her, Angels," from Handel's "Jephtha."

He overshaded a little, some of his pianissimo effects being almost inaudible, but his expression was well-fitted to his theme, the recitative being very dramatic, and he was clear in enunciation and sure in intonation, even in the highest register, his tone never appearing forced or unmusical even in the most trying passages, wherefore the recalls at the close of the aria were numerous and hearty, and the exceptional character of the concert was sustained.

It is not so long ago that we stated that no American orchestra could play the "Tannhaeuser" overture as our band plays it; the confirmation of this statement came at the close of this remarkable concert. The work was interpreted magnificently; the combat between the solemn religious theme of the pilgrims, and the exciting, almost frenzied Venus music, was finely drawn; it was a reduction into musical tones of Swinburne's "Lilies and Languors of Virtue, and Roses and Raptures of Vice," with the odds in favor of the lilies.

Of course the chief praise belongs to the violins who did splendid work in both camps, giving the high positions of the Venus music and the trying scales of the culmination of the Pilgrim's chorus with clearness and surety, but the horns and trombones also deserves much praise. The concert should be marked with a white stone, even among the many excellent concerts we have had from our Symphony Orchestra. Louis C. Elson.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, APRIL 4, 1897.

SYMPHONY NIGHT.

Tschaikowsky's Marvelous Death-Chant the Feature of the Concert—Messrs. Ben Davies and Leo Schulz the Soloists.

The program of the 20th Symphony concert given last evening in Music Hall, Mr. Paur conductor, was as follows:

Overture to "Oberon"	Weber
Adagio for Violoncello, op. 38	Bargiel
Rondo for Violoncello, op. 94 (first time in Boston)	Dvorák
Symphony No. 6, in B minor "Pathétique," op. 74	Tschaikowsky
Recitative, "Deeper and Deeper Still," and Aria, "Waft Her, Angels," from "Jephtha"	Handel
Overture to "Tannhäuser"	Wagner

There are moments, yea, hours in this too daily life when existence seems really worth while, and man appears a superb animal even in his death struggle. Such was the time spent in listening again to Tschaikowsky's Pathetic Symphony.

I am aware that there are estimable persons—excellent musicians, some of them, with many curious facts about the Sonata form—who insist that this work is a suite rather than a symphony. It makes little difference whether you call the marvelous masterpiece a symphony or a suite; the music is the same, the emotions are aroused in either case, the effect is as overwhelming.

I am also aware that there are persons restlessly critical, who complain of the "cheapness" of the second theme of the first movement. It is true that Tschaikowsky remembered well the long, flowing cantilena dear to Italian opera makers. Never mind in what country he found his tunes; the question is, "What did he do with them after he had found them?"

No, this symphony is not easily sniffed away. Each hearing enlarges the admiration excited by its first performance, and now admiration is akin to awe.

The work now seems firmly knit together, each part indispensable to the effect of the whole, whereas at first the relation of the third movement was not wholly clear. This strange, battle-drunk, delirious march must precede the wild lamentation of the finale. James Shirley long ago wrote the motto that might well stand between the triumph and the mourning.

> The glories of our blood and state
> Are shadows, not substantial things;
> There is no armour against fate;
> Death lays his icy hands on Kings.

And at each hearing new harmonic beauties appear, as well as hitherto unnoticed passages of most ingenious orchestration. The very tune that some call "cheap" or "common" is the one necessary, inevitable tune in its place; any other tune would be incongruous, impertinent. It is the one sensuous streak in the powerful, sombre work. It is the voice of the young man, recalled by the man of experience who is about to die. It breathes the foolishness of youth that is often more than the wisdom of maturity. And he who cannot recall such foolishness is indeed unhappy, for he has not known the fullness of life.

I have spoken of this symphony at length and in rhapsodic speech before this in the Journal. Nor have I now the wish or the disposition to speak analytically or even coolly of such music. Here is a work that, without a hint or a suggestion of program, sums up in the most imaginative language the life of man, with his illusions, desires, loves, struggles, victories, unavoidable end. Tschaikowsky may have written this Requiem for himself (for they who were nearest to him do not deny that, wearied and disgusted, he took poison); but he also wrote it for the race itself.

The performance was one never to be forgotten. Conductor and players were as inspired men. No doubt the news of Brahm's death was not without influence in the impassioned result, for such a lamentation as the finale is an honor to any composer, poet, or potentate.

* * *

Mr. Schulz played uncommonly well. The adagio by Bargiel was given with unusual tenderness and depth, and the Rondo by Dvorak was played with keen appreciation of rhythm and nuances. Mr. Schulz has never been heard in Music Hall to such advantage, admirable as his playing has been in the past. Last night he showed a refinement and an emotional nature that were hitherto kept in the background by envious technical accuracy.

* * *

Mr. Davies sang the recitative and air from "Jephthah" just about a year ago at one of these concerts. He declaimed last night the recitative with breadth and intelligence. The air was sung with much taste and with unexaggerated expression. The voice itself did not seem to be in best condition. Certain tones were veiled, and there was occasionally an exhibition of effort.

* * *

There was a very large and unusually applausive audience.

Philip Hale.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 4, 1897.
(Copyright, 1897. Post Publishing Company.)

SONG AND CELLO.

Davies and Schultz Divide Solo Honors at the Symphony Concert.

Oberon's magic horn sounded the opening of last night's Symphony concert, the twentieth of the current season, and a beauty. First, the Oberon overture, dainty, weird, melodious and startling; for is it not here, as the programme tells us, that we get the "loudest chord in all orchestration," a "surprise" like the one that gives the name to Haydn's sixth symphony?

To be sure, the programme forgot to say that a louder and much more startling chord was to come in the first movement of the Tschaikowsky symphony, which the audience could not be expected to know much about, since it is not yet two years old. It is a trick of these concert programmes to give much more accurate descriptions of the familiar compositions than of the newer ones.

The second number of the programme was a couple of cello solos; those who remembered the unrivalled Schroeder's rendering of Dvorak's violoncello concerto earlier in the season, with nimble passage-work like the tricks of a kittenish elephant, must have felt all the more the slow and tender beauty of Woldemar Bargiel's Adagio (Opus 38); and still more the graceful scherzo-like Rondo by Dvorak, too (Op. 94), which was the second solo. The soloist's execution was faultless, but a trifle lacking in power.

The Tschaikowsky symphony (No. 6, in B minor), "Pathetique," is a considerable innovation as to structure. The first part of the first movement dies away with a melodious theme in the clarinets, and after a hush that seems full of music comes the startling chord spoken of before, the whole strength of everything in the orchestra going off like a cannon shot. It is followed by the vigorous scoring of the working out, and the first movement closes with but little formal repetition of the opening themes.

The second movement, instead of being slow and romantic as usual, is again an allegro, this time in the remarkable rhythm of five-fourths; the third movement is also an allegro. This succession of movements in a symphony is unprecedented.

The fourth movement, Adajio lamentoso, is very mournful—almost a dirge. Coming, as it did, the last of the composer's writings, it is looked upon as his expression of foreboding—like Mozart's requiem.

Davies's singing of the two arias from Haendel's Jephthah was the best vocal performance heard this season at these concerts. Other great soloists have seemed not to be in accord with the place and the vast melodies of the orchestra, but there was no one who did not feel last night's pathos and beauty to the bottom of his soul.

And the applause was uncontrolled until Mr. Paur, seeing that Davies's conclusive acknowledgments did not serve to conclude the recalls, stepped to his stand, rapped for attention, and began at once on the Tannhauser overture without waiting for the score to be brought to him. But it was wonderfully played just the same.

The programme for the next concert is: Mendelssohn, Overture, "Ruy Blas"; Goetz, Aria from "Taming of the Shrew"; Gernsheim, Concerto for violin, D major; and Schumann, Symphony No. 3, E flat major, "Rhenish." Miss Lena Little will sing, and Schnitzler is the violinist.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 4, 1897.

The twentieth Symphony programme was enriched beyond previous promise by the addition of that beautiful old favorite oratorio air from Handel's "Jeptha," beginning "Angels ever bright and fair," which was perfectly sung and delicately informed with true feeling by Mr. Ben Davies. Mr. Schulz also appeared as a soloist according to announcement and rendered two morceaus for violoncello—Bargiel's adagio, opus 38, and a rondo, opus 94, by Dvorak, which was new to Boston hearers. Mr. Schulz is an artist who grows in all good qualities, and is not content to develop his technique merely, but enlarge his scope ef sympathy, his breadth of fulness and power and his nicety of taste from year to year. His playing demonstrated his many excellencies clearly both in the smooth, quiet legato and the lively, agile rondo, and he was heartily applauded and recalled. The orchestra began its work with Weber's "Oberon" overture, and ended it with the Tannhauser, each delivered in masterly fashion with appropriate regard for its character and style. The symphony was Tschaikowsky's sixth—the "Pathetic"—which has taken so firm a hold upon the affections of the whole musical world and which seemed more inspirational and poetic than before in the magnificent representation which Mr. Paur gave it. The enthusiasm manifested after the second and third movements was remarkable.

The next programme has been appointed thus: Mendelssohn, Overture, "Ruy Blas;" Goetz, Aria from Act III. ot the Opera "Taming of the Shrew;" Gernsheim, Concerto for violin, in D major; Schumann, Symphony No. 3, in E-flat major, "Rhenish." Soloists, Miss Lena Little and Mr. Isidor Schnitzler.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CL, NO. 94.

SUNDAY, APRIL 4, 1897.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Tschaikowsky's "Pathetique" Is Surpassingly Rendered.

Mr. Paur Gives a Magnificent Interpretation of the Noble Symphony, Which Is Lavishly Prolific in Musical Beauties—Ben Davies and Leo Schulz the Soloists.

The 20th concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall, last night, presented the following programme:

Overture, "Oberon"	Weber
Adagio for 'cello, op. 38	Bargiel
Rondo for 'cello, op. 94	Dvorak
Symphony No. 6, "Pathetique"	Tschaikowsky
Aria, "Waft Her, Angels"	Handel
Overture, "Tannhauser"	Wagner

The soloists were Mr. Ben Davies and Mr. Leo Schulz.

The noble symphony grows with every successive hearing. It is beyond all cavil the largest and greatest of modern works in its kind, an epic masterpiece of the first order, from whatever standpoint it may be viewed; lavishly prolific in musical beauties of every description, wonderful in its richness and variety of effect and sounding almost the whole gamut of lofty emotion, the finale being one of the most eloquent and searching expressions of majestic pathos that ever composer conceived. Mr. Paur's interpretation of it last night was magnificent, often thrilling, in its broad and spirited sweep, and its passionateness, and the performance by the orchestra was surpassing in its fire, its brilliant virtuosity and splendor and wealth of tone color.

Bargiel's beautiful and chaste adagio was played by Mr. Schulz with delighting tenderness and refinement, and artistic purity of taste, especially in its quieter phases, which were exquisitely rendered in an absolutely perfect cantabile style.

The Dvorak rondo, which is new here, is a pleasing work, graceful and flowing in its themes, and free from the eccentricities of rhythm and that monotonous excess of national character in which the composer so persistently indulges. Now and then it barely escapes lapsing into conventional commonplace, but that danger is skilfully avoided. This selection, also, was beautifully read and played by Mr. Schulz, who was applauded with great acclaim and recalled several times.

Mr. Davies, who was welcomed very cordially, declaimed the recitative, "Deeper and Deeper Still," with fine and just dramatic feeling, and with an enunciation that was faultless. The air was rendered with a keenly sympathetic sense of its meaning and possibilities of graceful expression. His sweet, smooth and perfectly trained voice, musicianly phrasing and purity of taste, as well as the flexible ease of his singing, were a constant pleasure, and had it not been for overmuch of aspirating in the more flowing figures of the second part of the air, the effort would have been without a flaw. He fully merited the enthusiastic recognition and the three vigorous recalls that rewarded him.

The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Ruy Blas," Mendelssohn; aria from "The Taming of the Shrew," Goetz; concerto for violin, Gernsheim, and symphony No. 3, Schumann. The soloists are to be Miss Lena Little and Mr. Isidor Schnitzler.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, APRIL 4, 1897.

Twentieth Symphony Concert.

Two soloists assisted at the 20th symphony concert. Mr Leo Schulz, cellist, played an adagio by Woldemar Bargiel and a rondo by Dvorak, and Mr Ben Davies, the English tenor, sang a recitative and the aria "Waft her, angels," from Handel's oratorio "Jephtha." The orchestral pieces were the overture to Weber's "Oberon," Tschaikowsky's sixth symphony and Wagner's "Tannhauser" overture. Mr Davies' oratorio work scarcely needs more than a general commendation at this time, for the fame of the singer is familiar to concert patrons on both sides of the Atlantic. In the combination of the dramatic recitative and the joyous aria the extremes of musical expression are shown, and Mr Davies gave to each the proper shadings and degrees of intensity. Beautifully phrased, sweetly voiced and enunciated with notable distinctness every sentiment was artistically presented, the recitative being specially effective as an example of what might be called musical elocution. In the air the runs were given with flexibility and smoothness, the tonality was pure, even in the sustained high fortissimo notes. The singer was showered with applause at the close of the numbers, and returned several times to bow acknowledgments.

In Mr Schulz' selections the cello was almost continually in evidence, neither Bargiel nor Dvorak giving the soloist much orchestral relief. The adagio was played with an admirable breadth of tone. The chord passages were finely harmonized and the fingering in the rapid movements was true and incisive. In the Dvorak rondo the embellishments of the themes were dexterous and melodic and the upper chords and phrases over the body of the cello were given with violin effects, very sweet and clear. The performances elicited hearty applause.

Weber's delightful "Oberon" overture was played in a sympathetic manner by Mr Paur's men, the beautiful dance figures and melodious transition passages being given with all the grace and delicacy requisite for a proper interpretation of the work. The brilliant conclusion theme was notably effective. The "Tannhauser" overture was rendered with the necessary sonority. The recurring violin figures in the third part were magnificently played.

Tschaikowsky's sixth symphony was performed with great impressiveness. The tone colors were well preserved, and the passion and pathos of the great modern work were clearly illustrated and duly emphasized. The slow tempo of the finale remained unbroken, and the team work of the orchestra was never better shown than in the difficult united tones of the horns, which were kept to exact pitch against the somber musical background furnished by the other contingents. The wonderfully pictorial composition was splendidly interpreted throughout.

At this week's concerts Miss Lena Little and Mr Isidor Schnitzler will be the soloists. The program will be as follows: Overture, "Ruy Blas," Mendelssohn; aria from act three, "Taming of the Shrew," Goetz; concerto for violin, in D major, Gernsheim; symphony No. 3, in E flat major, Schumann.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 7, 1897.

* *

The program of the twentieth Symphony concert (April 3) was as follows:

Overture to Oberon	Weber
Adagio for violoncello, op. 38	Bargiel
Rondo for violoncello, op. 94 (First time in Boston.)	Dvorák
Symphony No. 6, in B minor, Pathétique, op. 74	Tschaikowsky
Recitative, Deeper and Deeper Still, and air, Waft Her, Angels, from Jephthah	Händel
Overture to Tannhäuser	Wagner

Mr. Apthorp analyzed the Oberon overture con amore for four pages. He calls the attention of the audience to "the tremendous crash of the full orchestra on the dominant chord of A. The unexpected suddenness of this orchestral thunderbolt has quite as much to do with the effect it produces as the way in which it is scored; but the effect is unquestionable. Familiar as the overture is, it is hardly ever played anywhere, even to-day, without this chord's startling at least somebody in the audience, and the comic results of which this sudden shock has been productive on more than one occasion have given rise to many an anecdote. It is unquestionably one of the most tremendous surprises in all orchestral music."

These program books are educational. You will be pleased to learn that in consequence of Mr. Apthorp's efforts not a person jumped last night when the crash came; not a person shrieked or required the sustaining arm of an usher. Analytical program books, then, are not without excuse for their existence.

* * *

Mr. Paur and his men gave a wonderfully effective performance of Tschaikowsky's great work; a performance overwhelming, long, long to be remembered.

Bülow appreciated Tschaikowsky when to many he was only "that Russian." In 1874, at Milan, the pianist conductor praised the originality and flow of melody in the Romeo and Juliet fantaisie. In 1878, at London, he proclaimed Tschaikowsky to be an "Echter Tonpoet, sit venia verbo." And he explained a tone-poet as first of all a romantic, who when he develops himself to genius becomes also a classic.

* * *

Mr. Ben Davies declaimed the recitative of Händel with breadth, intelligence and passion. He sang the air with taste; but certain tones were veiled, and at times there was an exhibition of effort.

Mr. Schulz played with unusual beauty of tone and genuine feeling. The rondo by Dvorák is not without the Dvorákian-Congo-Krehbilian touch that is a sorry substitute for the romantic Bohemianism of his earlier works. It is a pleasing piece, however, and its rhythmic changes and capricious spirit were caught effectively by Mr. Schulz.

PHILIP HALE.

Boston [illegible]

MONDAY, APRIL 5, [illegible]

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the twentieth Symphony concert, given in Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Weber: Overture to Oberon.
Bargiel: Adagio for violoncello, op. 38.
Dvorak: Rondo for violoncello, op. 94.
(First time in Boston.)
Tschaikowsky: Symphony No. 6 in B minor, Pathetique, op. 74.
Handel: Recitative, "Deeper and Deeper Still," and air, "Waft Her, Angels," from "Jephthah."
Wagner: Overture to Tannhäusser.

Mr. Leo Schulz and Mr. Ben Davies were the soloists.

The narrow limits of the conventional concert repertory were but slightly widened by the first performance here of Dvorak's rondo for violoncello, which by constant, unexpected avoiding of the extravagant, sinks not infrequently into the commonplace. The composition is fluent and at times charming in the ease and grace of its rhythm, but we hardly think it worth the attention of Mr. Schulz, who played with perfect care and an emotional suggestion which fortunately was not covered up by his perfect technique. His rendering of the Bargiel adagio showed a much more fitting blending of the artist and his theme. Mr. Schulz would far better have left us a final impression from his playing of the latter work, which was exquisite in its quietly sensuous feeling and absence of all obvious technical pretence.

The great Tschaikowsky symphony grows greater with every performance, and not a little of this growth is due to the magnificent interpretation by Mr. Paur, who read the work last Saturday evening with astonishing breadth and emotional force. Virtually the last composition prior to its composer's death on Nov. 7, 1893, the symphony reflects the highest range of his genius, and contains, if it be not over-sentimental to imagine so much, in the dark shadow and tremendous sweep of its melancholy harmonies a portentous premonition of his impending death. At least it does no harm for the imagination to play around such a thought, for the temperamental effect of the symphony creates it, whether there originally or not. Impressive to the core, no auditor could fail to be moved in his inmost heart of heart by the solemn majesty of the requiem which serves so well for Tschaikowsky's own. The playing of this grand symphony will remain one of the grandest memories of the work of our Symphony Orchestra. Certainly it has never previously been given here in so great perfection, nor with such wonderful inspirational purpose and effect.

Mr. Davies's singing of the selection from Handel was well-nigh flawless, both in vocalization and in dramatic suggestion. His sympathetic voice, with plenty of reserve force behind it, gave in purity of expression an ideal rendering of both the recitative and aria.

And what a pleasure to hear the Tannhäuser overture even once more! It never becomes hackneyed, and in its original form is an ideal concert piece. The ordinary overture suffers when deprived of the atmosphere of the theatre; the curtain, the footlights, the performance for which it prepares the way are all necessary factors in its completeness, but the Tannhäuser overture may stand alone and be understood and appreciated without the opera, which is now linked solely to the revised Paris version. And for this reason we are unable to confess any very strong liking for the Oberon overture, with which the programme opened, even though it be a standard orchestral piece. The playing of each was excellent, although many of the audience evidently thought the Tannhäuser overture not worth waiting for, probably because of its pervasive old age! Yet there were some who did not regret that they sat through until the end.

The programme for the twenty-first rehearsal and concert is: Mendelssohn, "Overture to Ruy Blas"; Goetz, aria from third act of "Taming of the Shrew"; Gernsheim, concerto for violin, in D-major; Schumann, symphony No. 3, in E-flat major, Rhenish.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 11, 1897.

(Copyright, 1897. Post Publishing Company.)

TWENTY-FIRST SYMPHONY.

It was a "Brahms night" at the Symphony last evening, as a sort of memorial service to the composer, who died April 3 last, and as if to accentuate the occasion the index page of the programme bore a mourning emblem and the members of the orchestra wore black ties.

Barring the composer's No. 4 symphony, which has many bright and enlivening spots, the programme befitted the occasion, for a general sombreness and gloom seemed to permeate every member. Even Mr. Max Heinrich, with his rich, mellow voice and exquisite interpretation of the group of songs allotted to him, failed to infuse much enthusiasm into the audience, many of whom left by the time the programme was half over.

The concert opened with Brahms's tragic overture, which is a long number of frequent and quaint developments and abounding in melodic figures. Mr. Heinrich followed with four songs, or rather oratorical selections, the words of which were scriptural. They were admirably sung, although, as already stated, were heavy and monotonous.

The A minor concerto for violin and cello, which followed, was played in its solo parts by Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Schroeder.

The programme was brought to a close with the E minor symphony, which was beautifully played under the very careful conductorship of Mr. Paur.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CI., NO. 101.

SUNDAY, APRIL 11, 1897.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Programme in Memoriam of Johannes Brahms.

Made up of the Late Composer's Compositions—The Selections Gloomy and Almost Without Relief—Max Heinrich, Franz Kneisel and Alwin Schroeder the Soloists.

The concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall last evening was in memory of Johannes Brahms, and the programme was made up wholly of the late composer's compositions, as follows:

Tragic overture, op. 81.
Four Serious Songs, op. 121.
Concerto for violin and 'cello, op. 102.
Symphony in E minor, op. 98.

Mr. Max Heinrich, Mr. Franz Kneisel and Mr. Alvin Schroeder were the soloists.

The selections were gloomy almost without relief, but the occasion was a melancholy one, and it may have been considered felicitously appropriate to restrict the music as far as possible to that of a funereal cast. The success in this direction was as complete as it was depressing and slumber-wooing.

The "serious songs" proved to be the most effective opiate. The words of three of them are selected from "Ecclesiastes," and of the fourth from "Corinthians." They may possibly be set to very fine music, and in perfect sympathy with the text, but they are, nevertheless, exceedingly dull and dreary, not to say irritatingly uninteresting. Of beauty they are wholly barren, and it is difficult to understand their musical meaning. If there is anything of form in them it is not discoverable on a first hearing, nor did Mr. Heinrich's method of singing them render them any more attractive, while his enunciation of the noble text provided no special delight to an ear sensitive to a pure and refined delivery of English. These songs are not well suited to display him in his more agreeable mood, for they demand a large legato style which is not among his most characteristic artistic gifts. However, the songs and the singer were vigorously applauded, which potently verifies the fact that tastes differ, and the other fact that what is most incomprehensible in music is certain of winning at least an outward manifestation of approval from a Symphony concert audience on the ground that it is always safe to applaud that to which the name of a great composer is affixed.

The "Tragic" overture, one of Brahms' most perfect and most masterly works in its class, was splendidly read and played; in truth, the interpretation and performance brought out the beauties of the overture as they were never brought out before. The solo parts of the concert were rendered by Mons. Kneisel and Schroeder with rare elegance of technique, grace of style and warmth of sentiment, and the plaudits it commanded were fully merited. The orchestra seemed to do its work throughout con amore. The concert, however, as a whole, was not inspiriting. Perhaps it was not intended that it should be, and that it was meant to partake of the qualities of a funeral service, in which case it may have been somewhat indiscreet, not to say untimely, to have dwelt critically on either the programme or its performance.

A passing word of notice must be given to Mr. Paur's effective playing of the difficult accompaniments to the songs.

The programme for the next concert is: Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade," N. Rimsky Korsakow, first time; concerto for pianoforte, Schumann, "Rhenish" symphony, Schumann. Mr. Rafael Joseffy is to be the soloist.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 11, 1897.

The twenty-first Symphony programme was protracted and, if the truth must be told, somewhat fatiguing in performance. It had apparently been thought best that the orchestra and the audience should unite in performing some obsequies in memory of Brahms, who had given them both so much hard work in the past few years—the one in playing and the other in following his music. No other compositions were offered, and the instrumental selections were the "Tragic" overture, the A-minor concerto for violin and violoncello, opus 102, and the E-minor (fourth) symphony. The playing was all earnest, firm, appreciative and worthy of the mental and moral fibre of the music, recognizing its intellectuality, respecting its sincerity, bearing up its power and expressing its dignity. Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Schroeder led the concerto finely, maintaining the vigor of the complex first movement and delivering delicately the more gracious messages of the other two. Early in the programme Mr. Max Heinrich sang four biblical airs—set for two texts from Ecclesiastes, one from Ecclesiasticus and one from the first Corinthians—the verses upon charity. Not all equally interesting, and sometimes rugged and abstruse in form, there is a stately, forceful spirit in them all, which Mr. Heinrich rendered with broad nobility, calm gravity and deep meaning, as well as with unusual profundity and suavity of tone.

The next programme is announced thus: N. Rimsky Korsakow, Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade" (first time); Schumann, Concerto for Pianoforte; Schumann, Symphony No. 3, in E-flat major, "Rhenish." Soloist, Mr. Rafael Joseffy.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, APRIL 11, 1897.

Symphony Concert.

On account of the recent death of the eminent composer, Johannes Brahms, the symphony selections originally announced for last week were changed and in place thereof Mr Paur's program was made up entirely from works of the dead composer. The numbers included the "Tragic" overture, a group of arias from "Vier Ernste Gesange," concerto in A minor for violin and cello and the fourth symphony. The soloists were Messrs Max Heinrich baritone, Franz Kneisel violin and Alwin Schroeder alto. It was specially appropriate to the occasion that Mr Kneisel was chosen to interpret the violin part in the concerto, as the symphony concert master enjoyed the friendship of Brahms and had been musically associated with him in Germany. The concerto was played by Messrs Kneisel and Schroeder at the symphony concert in November, 1893.

Mr Paur's program last week was of unusual length and of a somber nature befitting the event, "In memory of Johannes Brahms." The concerto was magnificently interpreted by the soloists whose artistic association for many years has developed a unity in sentiment and expression rarely attained by artists of their rank. The ensemble playing was all that could be desired, for with a sympathetic reading of the work was combined the perfect execution of the due and every phrase was given in the spirit of the composer, and not as individualized contributions to the different parts of the selection. The brilliant passages in unison were flawless in tone and where the so-called "dialogues" occurred the instruments harmonized perfectly. The finale was given with a vigorous tonality, and the orchestral assistance throughout was admirable in every particular. The soloists were many times recalled.

Mr Heinrich sang the group from "Vier Ernste Gesange," in his usual artistic and expressive manner. Few singers have the art of indicating the sentiments of songs more skilfully than Boston's popular baritone and the religious spirit of these selections were presented with great effect. Mr Paur assisted at the piano as accompanist and his work was admirable and in perfect harmony with the moods of the composer and interpretation of the singer. Mr Heinrich received many tributes of applause at the close of his singing.

The "Tragic" overture is a sonorous composition, bristling with orchestral difficulties in nature of rythmic progressions and contrasted themes pitted against each other. It appeals more to the musical expert and student than to the average auditor for the massiveness of the work, grand though it be, is at times so complex as to be almost chaotic to the general ear. The proper classic spirit of the work was well maintained by the orchestra.

The fourth symphony was sympathetically treated. Notably good was the performance of the martial theme by the wind instruments in the first part, the subsequent curios arpeggi effects by the strings and the working out of the coda. The variations of the second movement were strongly and smoothly presented by the different contingents, as also were the conflicting melody and harmony preceding the close of this part. The third movement was interpreted commendably. The wind instruments gave out the themes alloted them with an admirable tone and the complicated finale ran smoothly along to the end.

Mr Rafael Joseffy will be the soloist at this week's concerts. The program will comprise Korsakow's symphonic suite "Scheherazade," first time here, a Schumann pianoforte concerto and Schumann's "Rhenish" symphony.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, APRIL 4, 1897.

Twentieth Symphony Concert.

Two soloists assisted at the 20th symphony concert. Mr Leo Schulz, cellist, played an adagio by Woldemar Bargiel and a rondo by Dvorak, and Mr Ben Davies, the English tenor, sang a recitative and the aria "Waft her, angels," from Handel's oratorio "Jephtha." The orchestral pieces were the overture to Weber's "Oberon," Tschaikowsky's sixth symphony and Wagner's "Tannhauser" overture. Mr Davies' oratorio work scarcely needs more than a general commendation at this time, for the fame of the singer is familiar to concert patrons on both sides of the Atlantic. In the combination of the dramatic recitative and the joyous aria the extremes of musical expression are shown, and Mr Davies gave to each the proper shadings and degrees of intensity. Beautifully phrased, sweetly voiced and enunciated with notable distinctness every sentiment was artistically presented, the recitative being specially effective as an example of what might be called musical elocution. In the air the runs were given with flexibility and smoothness, the tonality was pure, even in the sustained high fortissimo notes. The singer was showered with applause at the close of the numbers, and returned several times to bow acknowledgments.

In Mr Schulz' selections the cello was almost continually in evidence, neither Bargiel nor Dvorak giving the soloist much orchestral relief. The adagio was played with an admirable breadth of tone. The chord passages were finely harmonized and the fingering in the rapid movements was true and incisive. In the Dvorak rondo the embellishments of the themes were dexterous and melodic and the upper chords and phrases over the body of the cello were given with violin effects, very sweet and clear. The performances elicited hearty applause.

Weber's delightful "Oberon" overture was played in a sympathetic manner by Mr Paur's men, the beautiful dance figures and melodious transition passages being given with all the grace and delicacy requisite for a proper interpretation of the work. The brilliant conclusion theme was notably effective. The "Tannhauser" overture was rendered with the necessary sonority. The recurring violin figures in the third part were magnificently played.

Tschaikowsky's sixth symphony was performed with great impressiveness. The tone colors were well preserved, and the passion and pathos of the great modern work were clearly illustrated and duly emphasized. The slow tempo of the finale remained unbroken, and the team work of the orchestra was never better shown than in the difficult united tones of the horns, which were kept to exact pitch against the somber musical background furnished by the other contingents. The wonderfully pictorial composition was splendidly interpreted throughout.

At this week's concerts Miss Lena Little and Mr Isidor Schnitzler will be the soloists. The program will be as follows: Overture, "Ruy Blas," Mendelssohn; aria from act three, "Taming of the Shrew," Goetz; concerto for violin, in D major, Gernsheim; symphony No. 3, in E flat major, Schumann.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 7, 1897.

* *

The program of the twentieth Symphony concert (April 3) was as follows:

Overture to Oberon	Weber
Adagio for violoncello, op. 38	Bargiel
Rondo for violoncello, op. 94 (First time in Boston.)	Dvorák
Symphony No. 6, in B minor, Pathétique, op. 74	Tschaikowsky
Recitative, Deeper and Deeper Still, and air, Waft Her, Angels, from Jephthah	Händel
Overture to Tannhäuser	Wagner

Mr. Apthorp analyzed the Oberon overture con amore for four pages. He calls the attention of the audience to "the tremendous crash of the full orchestra on the dominant chord of A. The unexpected suddenness of this orchestral thunderbolt has quite as much to do with the effect it produces as the way in which it is scored; but the effect is unquestionable. Familiar as the overture is, it is hardly ever played anywhere, even to-day, without this chord's startling at least somebody in the audience, and the comic results of which this sudden shock has been productive on more than one occasion have given rise to many an anecdote. It is unquestionably one of the most tremendous surprises in all orchestral music."

These program books are educational. You will be pleased to learn that in consequence of Mr. Apthorp's efforts not a person jumped last night when the crash came; not a person shrieked or required the sustaining arm of an usher. Analytical program books, then, are not without excuse for their existence.

* * *

Mr. Paur and his men gave a wonderfully effective performance of Tschaikowsky's great work; a performance overwhelming, long, long to be remembered.

Bülow appreciated Tschaikowsky when to many he was only "that Russian." In 1874, at Milan, the pianist conductor praised the originality and flow of melody in the Romeo and Juliet fantaisie. In 1878, at London, he proclaimed Tschaikowsky to be an "Echter Tonpoet, sit venia verbo." And he explained a tone-poet as first of all a romantic, who when he develops himself to genius becomes also a classic.

* * *

Mr. Ben Davies declaimed the recitative of Händel with breadth, intelligence and passion. He sang the air with taste; but certain tones were veiled, and at times there was an exhibition of effort.

Mr. Schulz played with unusual beauty of tone and genuine feeling. The rondo by Dvorák is not without the Dvorákian-Congo-Krehbilian touch that is a sorry substitute for the romantic Bohemianism of his earlier works. It is a pleasing piece, however, and its rhythmic changes and capricious spirit were caught effectively by Mr. Schulz.

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, APRIL 5, 1897.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the twentieth Symphony concert, given in Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Weber: Overture to Oberon.
Bargiel: Adagio for violoncello, op. 38.
Dvorak: Rondo for violoncello, op. 94.
(First time in Boston.)
Tschaikowsky: Symphony No. 6 in B minor, Pathétique, op. 74.
Handel: Recitative, "Deeper and Deeper Still," and air, "Waft Her, Angels," from "Jephthah."
Wagner: Overture to Tannhäusser.

Mr. Leo Schulz and Mr. Ben Davies were the soloists.

The narrow limits of the conventional concert repertory were but slightly widened by the first performance here of Dvorak's rondo for violoncello, which by constant, unexpected avoiding of the extravagant, sinks not infrequently into the commonplace. The composition is fluent and at times charming in the ease and grace of its rhythm, but we hardly think it worth the attention of Mr. Schulz, who played with perfect care and an emotional suggestion which fortunately was not covered up by his perfect technique. His rendering of the Bargiel adagio showed a much more fitting blending of the artist and his theme. Mr. Schulz would far better have left us a final impression from his playing of the latter work, which was exquisite in its quietly sensuous feeling and absence of all obvious technical pretence.

The great Tschaikowsky symphony grows greater with every performance, and not a little of this growth is due to the magnificent interpretation by Mr. Paur, who read the work last Saturday evening with astonishing breadth and emotional force. Virtually the last composition prior to its composer's death on Nov. 7, 1893, the symphony reflects the highest range of his genius, and contains, if it be not over-sentimental to imagine so much, in the dark shadow and tremendous sweep of its melancholy harmonies a portentous premonition of his impending death. At least it does no harm for the imagination to play around such a thought, for the temperamental effect of the symphony creates it, whether there originally or not. Impressive to the core, no auditor could fail to be moved in his inmost heart of heart by the solemn majesty of the requiem which serves so well for Tschaikowsky's own. The playing of this grand symphony will remain one of the grandest memories of the work of our Symphony Orchestra. Certainly it has never previously been given here in so great perfection, nor with such wonderful inspirational purpose and effect.

Mr. Davies's singing of the selection from Handel was well-nigh flawless, both in vocalization and in dramatic suggestion. His sympathetic voice, with plenty of reserve force behind it, gave in purity of expression an ideal rendering of both the recitative and aria.

And what a pleasure to hear the Tannhäuser overture even once more! It never becomes hackneyed, and in its original form is an ideal concert piece. The ordinary overture suffers when deprived of the atmosphere of the theatre; the curtain, the footlights, the performance for which it prepares the way are all necessary factors in its completeness, but the Tannhäuser overture may stand alone and be understood and appreciated without the opera, which is now linked solely to the revised Paris version. And for this reason we are unable to confess any very strong liking for the Oberon overture, with which the programme opened, even though it be a standard orchestral piece. The playing of each was excellent, although many of the audience evidently thought the Tannhäuser overture not worth waiting for, probably because of its pervasive old age! Yet there were some who did not regret that they sat through until the end.

The programme for the twenty-first rehearsal and concert is: Mendelssohn, "Overture to Ruy Blas"; Goetz, aria from third act of "Taming of the Shrew"; Gernsheim, concerto for violin, in D-major; Schumann, symphony No. 8, in E-flat major, Rhenish.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 11, 1897.

(Copyright, 1897. Post Publishing Company.)

TWENTY-FIRST SYMPHONY.

It was a "Brahms night" at the Symphony last evening, as a sort of memorial service to the composer, who died April 3 last, and as if to accentuate the occasion the index page of the programme bore a mourning emblem and the members of the orchestra wore black ties.

Barring the composer's No. 4 symphony, which has many bright and enlivening spots, the programme befitted the occasion, for a general sombreness and gloom seemed to permeate every member. Even Mr. Max Heinrich, with his rich, mellow voice and exquisite interpretation of the group of songs allotted to him, failed to infuse much enthusiasm into the audience, many of whom left by the time the programme was half over.

The concert opened with Brahms's tragic overture, which is a long number of frequent and quaint developments and abounding in melodic figures. Mr. Heinrich followed with four songs, or rather oratorical selections, the words of which were scriptural. They were admirably sung, although, as already stated, were heavy and monotonous.

The A minor concerto for violin and cello, which followed, was played in its solo parts by Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Schroeder.

The programme was brought to a close with the E minor symphony, which was beautifully played under the very careful conductorship of Mr. Paur.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CI., NO. 101.

SUNDAY, APRIL 11, 1897.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Programme in Memoriam of Johannes Brahms.

Made up of the Late Composer's Compositions — The Selections Gloomy and Almost Without Relief — Max Heinrich, Franz Kneisel and Alwin Schroeder the Soloists.

The concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall last evening was in memory of Johannes Brahms, and the programme was made up wholly of the late composer's compositions, as follows:

Tragic overture, op. 81.
Four Serious Songs, op. 121.
Concerto for violin and 'cello, op. 102.
Symphony in E minor, op. 98.

Mr. Max Heinrich, Mr. Franz Kneisel and Mr. Alvin Schroeder were the soloists.

The selections were gloomy almost without relief, but the occasion was a melancholy one, and it may have been considered felicitously appropriate to restrict the music as far as possible to that of a funereal cast. The success in this direction was as complete as it was depressing and slumber-wooing.

The "serious songs" proved to be the most effective opiate. The words of three of them are selected from "Ecclesiastes," and of the fourth from "Corinthians." They may possibly be set to very fine music, and in perfect sympathy with the text, but they are, nevertheless, exceedingly dull and dreary, not to say irritatingly uninteresting. Of beauty they are wholly barren, and it is difficult to understand their musical meaning. If there is anything of form in them it is not discoverable on a first hearing, nor did Mr. Heinrich's method of singing them render them any more attractive, while his enunciation of the noble text provided no special delight to an ear sensitive to a pure and refined delivery of English. These songs are not well suited to display him in his more agreeable mood, for they demand a large legato style which is not among his most characteristic artistic gifts. However, the songs and the singer were vigorously applauded, which potently verifies the fact that tastes differ, and the other fact that what is most incomprehensible in music is certain of winning at least an outward manifestation of approval from a Symphony concert audience on the ground that it is always safe to applaud that to which the name of a great composer is affixed.

The "Tragic" overture, one of Brahms' most perfect and most masterly works in its class, was splendidly read and played; in truth, the interpretation and performance brought out the beauties of the overture as they were never brought out before. The solo parts of the concert were rendered by Mons. Kneisel and Schroeder with rare elegance of technique, grace of style and warmth of sentiment, and the plaudits it commanded were fully merited. The orchestra seemed to do its work throughout con amore. The concert, however, as a whole, was not inspiriting. Perhaps it was not intended that it should be, and that it was meant to partake of the qualities of a funeral service, in which case it may have been somewhat indiscreet, not to say untimely, to have dwelt critically on either the programme or its performance.

A passing word of notice must be given to Mr. Paur's effective playing of the difficult accompaniments to the songs.

The programme for the next concert is: Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade," N. Rimsky Korsakow, first time; concerto for pianoforte, Schumann, "Rhenish" symphony, Schumann. Mr. Rafael Joseffy is to be the soloist.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 11, 1897.

The twenty-first Symphony programme was protracted and, if the truth must be told, somewhat fatiguing in performance. It had apparently been thought best that the orchestra and the audience should unite in performing some obsequies in memory of Brahms, who had given them both so much hard work in the past few years—the one in playing and the other in following his music. No other compositions were offered, and the instrumental selections were the "Tragic" overture, the A-minor concerto for violin and violoncello, opus 102, and the E-minor (fourth) symphony. The playing was all earnest, firm, appreciative and worthy of the mental and moral fibre of the music, recognizing its intellectuality, respecting its sincerity, bearing up its power and expressing its dignity. Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Schroeder led the concerto finely, maintaining the vigor of the complex first movement and delivering delicately the more gracious messages of the other two. Early in the programme Mr. Max Heinrich sang four biblical airs—set for two texts from Ecclesiastes, one from Ecclesiasticus and one from the first Corinthians—the verses upon charity. Not all equally interesting, and sometimes rugged and abstruse in form, there is a stately, forceful spirit in them all, which Mr. Heinrich rendered with broad nobility, calm gravity and deep meaning, as well as with unusual profundity and suavity of tone.

The next programme is announced thus: N. Rimsky Korsakow, Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade" (first time); Schumann, Concerto for Pianoforte; Schumann, Symphony No. 3, in E-flat major, "Rhenish." Soloist, Mr. Rafael Joseffy.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, APRIL 11, 1897.

Symphony Concert.

On account of the recent death of the eminent composer, Johannes Brahms, the symphony selections originally announced for last week were changed and in place thereof Mr Paur's program was made up entirely from works of the dead composer. The numbers included the "Tragic" overture, a group of arias from "Vier Ernste Gesange," concerts in A minor for violin and cello and the fourth symphony. The soloists were Messrs Max Heinrich baritone, Franz Kneisel violin and Alwin Schroeder alto. It was specially appropriate to the occasion that Mr Kneisel was chosen to interpret the violin part in the concerto, as the symphony concert master enjoyed the friendship of Brahms and had been musically associated with him in Germany. The concerto was played by Messrs Kneisel and Schroeder at the symphony concert in November, 1893.

Mr Paur's program last week was of unusual length and of a somber nature befitting the event, "In memory of Johannes Brahms." The concerto was magnificently interpreted by the soloists whose artistic association for many years has developed a unity in sentiment and expression rarely attained by artists of their rank. The ensemble playing was all that could be desired, for with a sympathetic reading of the work was combined the perfect execution of the due and every phrase was given in the spirit of the composer, and not as individualized contributions to the different parts of the selection. The brilliant passages in unison were flawless in tone and where the so-called "dialogues" occurred the instruments harmonized perfectly. The finale was given with a vigorous tonality, and the orchestral assistance throughout was admirable in every particular. The soloists were many times recalled.

Mr Heinrich sang the group from "Vier Ernste Gesange," in his usual artistic and expressive manner. Few singers have the art of indicating the sentiments of songs more skilfully than Boston's popular baritone and the religious spirit of these selections were presented with great effect. Mr Paur assisted at the piano as accompanist and his work was admirable and in perfect harmony with the moods of the composer and interpretation of the singer. Mr Heinrich received many tributes of applause at the close of his singing.

The "Tragic" overture is a sonorous composition, bristling with orchestral difficulties in nature of rythmic progressions and contrasted themes pitted against each other. It appeals more to the musical expert and student than to the average auditor for the massiveness of the work, grand though it be, is at times so complex as to be almost chaotic to the general ear. The proper classic spirit of the work was well maintained by the orchestra.

The fourth symphony was sympathetically treated. Notably good was the performance of the martial theme by the wind instruments in the first part, the subsequent curios arpeggi effects by the strings and the working out of the coda. The variations of the second movement were strongly and smoothly presented by the different contingents, as also were the conflicting melody and harmony preceding the close of this part. The third movement was interpreted commendably. The wind instruments gave out the themes alloted them with an admirable tone and the complicated finale ran smoothly along to the end.

Mr Rafael Joseffy will be the soloist at this week's concerts. The program will comprise Korsakow's symphonic suite "Scheherazade," first time here, a Schumann pianoforte concerto and Schumann's "Rhenish" symphony.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 12, 1897.

The Symphony Concert Saturday —A Brahms Memorial.

It was eminently fitting that the concert of Saturday should be devoted to the memory of the great composer who died a week ago, yet we may question whether such a concert can, under the best of circumstances, be anything more than an official homage to the composer. No single programme could give any idea of the scope of Brahms' work, no single concert could do even the scantiest justice to the evolution of his genius.

The concert of the week before was a more spontaneous offering to the composer's memory; in the morning there had come the news of the death of the musical giant, and the wonderful performance of Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic Symphony" was an unaffected tribute to the memory of Brahms that was more moving than the deliberately arranged programme which was his memorial service on this occasion. The thrilling performance of that threnody of Tschaikowsky was but a result of the fact that every man, from the conductor to the kettle-drummer, was mentally laying this musical tribute on the bier of Brahms.

Probably the truest tribute to be given in the composer's own music, would be the "German Requiem," that wonderful funeral song which Brahms composed on the death of his mother. As it was, the present programme gave the "Tragic Overture," which was a little too gruesome for the event, a set of Brahms' songs, two of which had little to do with the matter, the concerto for violin and violoncello, which is not the best specimen of Brahms' muse, and the fourth symphony, which, great as it is, is not nearly so typical as the first symphony in C minor. Nevertheless, one may not quarrel with the conventional manner of paying tribute to the memory of a great man.

Brahms will be better understood, now that he is dead, than he ever was, by the world at large, while he was alive. He is the legitimate successor of Beethoven, the one man of our time who could present logic in music, a lofty development of themes as Beethoven could.

In the present days of formlessness in music, of excess of passion and exploitation of theories, this most learned orchestral mind (for composers think piano, as Schumann, voice, as Schubert, or orchestra, as Beethoven) of this generation, he never felt the need of defending his work by any pamphlets or other explanations. His music was its own apologia, and it was to stand or fall by its own merits.

Naturally there was a hue and cry by those who craved emotion merely, and it is singular how closely the animadversions upon Brahms resemble the early criticisms upon Beethoven. "Too learned," cried the reviewers in 1800, "Not a bit of melody, not a bit of song!" "Crude and undigested learning," wrote a Leipsic critic in 1799, "Difficulty merely for the sake of difficulty," said another four years later; and just such outcries have been made against the great symphonist of our own time.

A great pianist who studied for months at the second concerto, once told the present writer that when he began his labor of love, he too, thought that there was much of mere technical difficulty interwoven in the work, but week by week the matter clarified, and long before he gave his public performance he saw plainly that all the technical difficulties were but the means to an end, that there was not a single technical point present for the mere sake of difficulty.

The world will now gradually swing into this way of thinking. The truest music is ever that in which intellectuality and emotion are blended, and this union of forces Brahms, as Beethoven, has effected. Brahms' triumphs have been won, as is the case with all of the great tone-masters except Chopin, in every field of musical expression.

His symphonies have been the greatest since Beethoven, because he was a master of figure development, and each great orchestral movement grew from some simple germ, as an oak can grow from an acorn; coherency was in them and homogeneity; his finale in the great C minor symphony was, like the first part of the finale of Beethoven's ninth, an epitome of all that had gone before, and even in the finale of the fourth symphony, played on this occasion, the kinship to Beethoven is apparent, for the grand variations of a simple theme are as true a counterpoise to the strength of the sonata-allegro form used in the first movement as the finale of the Heroic Symphony is a balance against the majesty of its own first movement.

In the domain of chamber music, Brahms was ever the best modern exponent of the application of sonata work to this chastest of instrumental forms. In songs he was prone to develop his accompaniments too greatly, but he always recognized the power of the folksong, and in this became a devout follower of Schubert, Schumann and Franz.

In the concerto he had evidently imbibed the spirit of Beethoven as displayed in his two last piano concertos; his concertos were not to be mere displays of the soloist, they were to be symphonies with a solothread interwoven through the fabric; the soloist was to abnegate himself, and the impression of the whole was to be given to the auditor, not the mere effect of a single part; therefore, one could apply to his concertos the description given by Hauptmann of Beethoven's Emperor Concerto—they are symphonies with an obbligato solo part running through them.

But the loftiest expression of Brahms' muse was wrung from him by sorrow. It may be regarded as an axiom that agony is an excellent music teacher; Shelley has said that

> "Most wretched men
> Are cradled into Poetry by wrong;
> They learn in suffering what they teach in > song."

In Brahms' case also, the anguish of the singer made the beauty of the strain, for his German Requiem is the loftiest expression of Sorrow, in its particular form, that has been produced in modern times.

Almost its equal may be ranked the "Song of Destiny," a composition which has something of the grandeur of the Hellenic tragedies, and in speaking of this one may bear witness to the fact that Brahms in his ruling of emotions with a mighty intellect, bears a certain affinity to the oldest Greek poets.

That Brahms will always demand something of the auditor may be freely conceded; he studied so deeply himself, all through his long life, that he could not deliver sugar-coated emotion to superficial audiences. It is as well that it is so; that which is bought with effort is always valued the most, and the appreciation of [illegible], won by a little striving on the part of the auditor, will be a delight for [illegible]

The concert was as usual, a flawless [illegible] Mr. Paur, the friend of Brahms, is on[illegible] his most authoritative interpreters. [illegible] tragic overture was given with [illegible] breadth and earnestness. This work [illegible] not connected with any especial tragedy or drama, and it is peculiar in the fact that the heroic element is strangely lacking. In that other orchestral song of fate which we heard in the preceding concert (Tschaikowsky's "Symphonie Pathetique") there were moments of military ardor, of mighty combat, but here all seemed enshrouded in a fog of hopelessness.

Just as Beethoven brought forth his lightest-hearted symphonies, the sixth and eighth simultaneously with his most earnest, the fifth and seventh, so we find Brahms bringing forth this most earnest work together with his most jovial composition, the Academic overture. The overture was received by the large audience with evident appreciation.

Now followed "Four Solemn Songs" (Op. 121), Mr. Max Heinrich being the vocalist and Mr. Paur giving the important and difficult piano accompaniment. The earnest and grave character of these vocal selections suited Mr. Heinrich's dark voice very well and the applause was very hearty at the end of each song and at the conclusion of the set. The intense gloom of these numbers fitted them well to impress the character of a memorial service upon the public, but two of them would have been quite enough to have done this effectively, and the first two were the only ones that were applicable to the death of the great musician.

The figure treatment in the accompaniment of the first song was very well brought out by Mr. Paur, and the dirge-like, chanting, recitative of this and the second number was nobly emphasized by Mr. Heinrich.

It was not the best tribute to the memory of the dead composer to extend this sombre series of songs to their full length and then to follow them with the lengthy and not over-interesting concerto for violin and violoncello (op. 102). Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Schroeder were the soloists, and were, of course, received with a cordial welcome. Mr. Kneisel had arisen from a sick bed (he is suffering from an attack of tonsilitis) to render his homage to Brahms, with whom he has been especially intimate.

The second and third movements were the best parts of this rather prolix work, the dash and brilliancy of the finale going far to relieve its preceding tedium. There were hearty recalls at the end, but almost every one felt that the edge had been taken off the symphony that was still to follow. It was not surprising therefore to find a large exodus at the close of the concerto. An entire evening of the most earnest side of Brahms is apt to be an overdose for the average auditor.

But the Brahmsites remained, and were rewarded by an especially fine reading of the Fourth symphony. Had it only come half an hour earlier!

The Fourth Symphony is likely to be, next to the second, Brahms' most popular symphony. It is not so complex as the first, nor so compact as the third, but its first movement is a good example of that superb development of which Brahms was such a master. The simple theme at the beginning might seem to indicate simplicity, but it soon begins to expand and grow, leading to constantly new presentations of the chief thoughts, so that the different facets of the diamond finally send out a prismatic glow.

The slow movement begins with a peculiar phrase that introduces a scale-formation that is not known to many composers, one of the old mediaeval constructions in which forms some of the folk-songs of central Europe are presented. Its intrinsic beauty can be appreciated by the romanticist and classicist alike. Thus, also, the Rondo, which here stands for the Scherzo, is not too intricate for general comprehension.

In fact the symphony presents the two sides of Brahms nature clearly enough, the first and last movements being full of the learning which can make ingenious combinations at will, and the two interior movements being popular in the best sense, intelligible to anyone who has not been steeped in the idea that Brahms was not made to be understood.

The Brusquerie, the vigor and virility of the third movement have never been better brought out in any of the performances here, and this movement grows upon better acquaintance.

The hearing of this striking work leads one to hope that there may yet be a posthumous symphony found among the manuscripts which Brahms has left behind him.

Louis C. Elson.

[illegible]
SUNDAY, APRIL 1[illegible]

SYMPHONY NIGHT

In Memory of Johannes Brahms—A Program Devoted to Works of the Late Composer.

The program of the 21st Symphony concert given last evening in Music Hall was made up of these works by Brahms, who died in Vienna, April 3:

Tragic overture, op. 81....................
Four Serious Songs, op. 121..................
Max Heinrich.
Concerto for violin and 'cello in A minor, op. 102.
Messrs. Kneisel and Schroeder.
Symphony No. 4, in E minor, op. 98.....

The "Serious Songs" by Brahms were written in 1896 when the composer was far from well. They are dedicated to Max Klinger. They were first sung in Berlin by Mr. Sistermans at a concert of the Philharmonic Chorus, Nov. 16, 1896; they were first sung in London by Mr. Bispham at his farewell concert, Oct. 31, 1896; they were first sung in the United States by Mr. Bispham in New York, Jan. 12, 1897.

The text of the first song is taken from the third chapter of Ecclesiastes, beginning with "For that which befalleth the sons of men befalleth beasts," and ending with "For who shall bring him to see what shall be after him?"

The text of the second is from the fourth chapter of Ecclesiastes, beginning with "So I returned, and considered all the oppressions that are done under the sun," and ending with "Wherefore I praised the dead which are already dead, more than the living which are yet alive."

The text of the third is the marvelous apostrophe to death found in the 41st chapter of The Wisdom of Jesus the Son of Sirach, or Ecclesiasticus.

The text of the fourth is from the 13th chapter of 1st Corinthians, "Though I speak with the tongues of men and of angels," etc.

It was sadly mistaken reverence to introduce these songs in a memorial program, for they are insufferably dull. The music is almost an impertinence to the nobly poetic words. Arid recitative by the yard, with little that is suggestive, beautiful, dignified or grand in the piano part! Mr. Heinrich displayed all of his most disagreeable mannerisms and vocal offences. The accompaniments by Mr. Paur were dry, harsh, unsympathetic.

⁂

The other numbers of the program are familiar. It is enough to say that they were played in appreciative and reverent spirit by soloists and orchestra.

⁂

It is indeed meet and fitting that the memory of celebrated musicians should thus be honored. This reminds me that the death of Tschaikowsky, who in high imagination, melodic feeling, sense of color, and splendor of expression was superior to Brahms, passed unnoticed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Mr. Emil Paur.

Philip Hale.

[illegible]

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme for the twenty-first concert of this season, given at Music Hall, Saturday evening, was made up entirely from the works of Brahms, and was as follows:

Tragic Overture, op. 81.
Vier Ernste Gesänge, op. 121.
  a. Ecclesiastes iii.
  b. Ecclesiastes iv.
  c. Ecclesiasticus, 41.
  d. 1 Corinthians xiii.
Concerto for Violin and Violoncello, A minor, op. 102.
Symphony No. 4, in E minor, op. 98.

The soloists were Mr. Max Heinrich, Mr. Franz Kneisel and Mr. Alwin Schroeder.

The concert was described on the programme as "In memory of Johannes Brahms," but the preponderence of gloom given it by the introduction of the four songs, three of which were musical settings of the most melancholy texts in scripture which bewail the lot of men on earth, made the concert more like a funeral service than one designed as a memorial. Even the robust vivacity of certain of the movements of the Fourth Symphony could not take from the performance its suggestion of the pall and bier. We can conceive of a memorial concert which within the space allotted a symphony concert should give a musical synopsis of Brahms's works, touching on all the moods that are essentially characteristic of the man; but the programme of Saturday night placed to the front the prolixity of the composer, and if there were among the audience some who came to study Brahms as beginners it would not be wonderful if they went away with the impression that his great purpose was to lose himself in a wilderness of sound.

The four songs which were written, we believe, in the last year of Brahms's life, when he was between death and the doctor, are with the exception of the last, little more than the jotting down of temperamental commentary on gloomy texts that will come into the mind of a man who is ill and approaching old age, which sort with his mingled present sadness and apprehension. In the composition of three of these songs Brahms appears to have rejected beauty as if it were the crucial temptation of the musical flesh and he were St. Anthony in his most ascetic mood. The fourth and last has, however, in it much beauty. It is a song. Mr. Heinrich sang all of them well, and his treatment of the fourth was nobly sympathetic. The task set before him was no light one, and he received little aid from the composer. The applause received was his due, but we doubt, if he had sung them in German, whether the audience would have been so promptly appreciative, for the clearness of his English enunciation gave many of his hearers at least an explanation of the lugubrious strains and cleared him from any responsibility for their apparent formlessness.

We suppose that when people mourn they are to be left to judge of the manifestations they may choose to make as solely their own concern, but we must confess that these songs, in the programme, brought to our mind the story of the man who when he went into mourning painted his house black. Mr. Paur played the accompaniments for Mr. Heinrich. The work of the soloists and orchestra we admirable, and while exceptions might well be taken to the programme, none could be to the manner of the performance, which throughout was broadly sympathetic.

The programme for the rehearsal and concert this week will be: N. Rimsky Korsakow, Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazada" (first time); Schumann, Concerto for pianoforte; Schumann, Symphony No. 3, in E-flat major, "Rhenish." The soloist will be Mr. Rafael Joseffy.

American Art Journal.
The Oldest Musical Weekly Published in America.
FOUNDED IN 1863 BY HENRY C. WATSON.
WM. M. THOMS, EDITOR.

☞ The first and most important object the journalist should have in mind is to criticise productive and reproductive art with such discriminating care and honesty of purpose as to offer a safe guide to popular judgment, rather than act as its echo, thus creating a demand for higher culture in artists.

OFFICES, 23 UNION SQUARE, NEW YORK
NEW YORK, SATURDAY, APRIL 10, 1897.

An awfully enjoyable concert was the Symphony Twentieth. Magnificently enough to win a quadruple recall did Ben Davies sing Handel's great Jephthah number, Waft Her, Angels. There were two overtures, both splendidly played, Oberon and Tannhauser. The Symphony was Tschaikowsky's Pathetic, with its noble lament and march, published so near his death as to be his requiem. Leo Schulz was the soloist in two cello pieces: Adagio op. 38, by Waldemar Bargiel; and Dvorak's Rondo, op. 94, heard in Boston for the first time, Mr. Schulz fully meriting the glow of his greeting.

American Art Journal.
NEW YORK, SATURDAY, APRIL 17, 1897.

Brahms Memorials.

In the closing concert of the season the Kneisel Quartet was assisted by Joseffy and M. L. Pourtan; and the program already arranged was set aside, so that this should be a memorial concert to Brahms, with the A-minor Quartet, op. 51, No. 2; the Adagio, from Quintet op. 115, for Strings and Clarinet; the F-minor Quintet, op. 34, for Piano and Strings. This is an age of electricity. Brahms died in Europe on April 3; and two days later this concert was given here.

Four days later the symphony concert was changed to mark the same event, and the program duly placed in mourning. It fitly opened with Tragic Overture, op. 81. Four Scripture selections, op. 121, from Ecclesiastes, Ecclesiasticus, and Paul's Charity Chapter, were sung by Max Heinrich superbly. Kneisel and Schroeder played the Concerto in A minor, op. 102, for Violin and Cello. The Symphony was the Fourth, op. 98, E minor, its Andante breathing the very spirit of the occasion.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 12, 1897.

The Symphony Concert Saturday —A Brahms Memorial.

It was eminently fitting that the concert of Saturday should be devoted to the memory of the great composer who died a week ago, yet we may question whether such a concert can, under the best of circumstances, be anything more than an official homage to the composer. No single programme could give any idea of the scope of Brahms' work, no single concert could do even the scantiest justice to the evolution of his genius.

The concert of the week before was a more spontaneous offering to the composer's memory; in the morning there had come the news of the death of the musical giant, and the wonderful performance of Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic Symphony" was an unaffected tribute to the memory of Brahms that was more moving than the deliberately arranged programme which was his memorial service on this occasion. The thrilling performance of that threnody of Tschaikowsky was but a result of the fact that every man, from the conductor to the kettle-drummer, was mentally laying this musical tribute on the bier of Brahms.

Probably the truest tribute to be given in the composer's own music, would be the "German Requiem," that wonderful funeral song which Brahms composed on the death of his mother. As it was, the present programme gave the "Tragic Overture," which was a little too gruesome for the event, a set of Brahms' songs, two of which had little to do with the matter, the concerto for violin and violoncello, which is not the best specimen of Brahms' muse, and the fourth symphony, which, great as it is, is not nearly so typical as the first symphony in C minor. Nevertheless, one may not quarrel with the conventional manner of paying tribute to the memory of a great man.

Brahms will be better understood, now that he is dead, than he ever was, by the world at large, while he was alive. He is the legitimate successor of Beethoven, the one man of our time who could present logic in music, a lofty development of themes as Beethoven could.

In the present days of formlessness in music, of excess of passion and exploitation of theories, this most learned orchestral mind (for composers think piano, as Schumann, voice, as Schubert, or orchestra, as Beethoven) of this generation, he never felt the need of defending his work by any pamphlets or other explanations. His music was its own apologia, and it was to stand or fall by its own merits.

Naturally there was a hue and cry by those who craved emotion merely, and it is singular how closely the animadversions upon Brahms resemble the early criticisms upon Beethoven. "Too learned," cried the reviewers in 1800, "Not a bit of melody, not a bit of song!" "Crude and undigested learning," wrote a Leipsic critic in 1799, "Difficulty merely for the sake of difficulty," said another four years later; and just such outcries have been made against the great symphonist of our own time.

A great pianist who studied for months at the second concerto, once told the present writer that when he began his labor of love, he too, thought that there was much of mere technical difficulty interwoven in the work, but week by week the matter clarified, and long before he gave his public performance he saw plainly that all the technical difficulties were but the means to an end, that there was not a single technical point present for the mere sake of difficulty.

The world will now gradually swing into this way of thinking. The truest music is ever that in which intellectuality and emotion are blended, and this union of forces Brahms, as Beethoven, has effected. Brahms' triumphs have been won, as is the case with all of the great tone-masters except Chopin, in every field of musical expression.

His symphonies have been the greatest since Beethoven, because he was a master of figure development, and each great orchestral movement grew from some simple germ, as an oak can grow from an acorn; coherency was in them and homogeneity; his finale in the great C minor symphony was, like the first part of the finale of Beethoven's ninth, an epitome of all that had gone before, and even in the finale of the fourth symphony, played on this occasion, the kinship to Beethoven is apparent, for the grand variations of a simple theme are as true a counterpoise to the strength of the sonata-allegro form used in the first movement as the finale of the Heroic Symphony is a balance against the majesty of its own first movement.

In the domain of chamber music, Brahms was ever the best modern exponent of the application of sonata work to this chastest of instrumental forms. In songs he was prone to develop his accompaniments too greatly, but he always recognized the power of the folk-song, and in this became a devout follower of Schubert, Schumann and Franz.

In the concerto he had evidently imbibed the spirit of Beethoven as displayed in his two last piano concertos; his concertos were not to be mere displays of the soloist, they were to be symphonies with a solothread interwoven through the fabric; the soloist was to abnegate himself, and the impression of the whole was to be given to the auditor, not the mere effect of a single part; therefore, one could apply to his concertos the description given by Hauptmann of Beethoven's Emperor Concerto—they are symphonies with an obbligato solo part running through them.

But the loftiest expression of Brahms' muse was wrung from him by sorrow. It may be regarded as an axiom that agony is an excellent music teacher; Shelley has said that

"Most wretched men
Are cradled into Poetry by wrong;
They learn in suffering what they teach in
song."

In Brahms' case also, the anguish of the singer made the beauty of the strain, for his German Requiem is the loftiest expression of Sorrow, in its particular form, that has been produced in modern times.

Almost its equal may be ranked the "Song of Destiny," a composition which has something of the grandeur of the Hellenic tragedies, and in speaking of this one may bear witness to the fact that Brahms in his ruling of emotions with a mighty intellect, bears a certain affinity to the oldest Greek poets.

That Brahms will always demand something of the auditor may be freely conceded; he studied so deeply himself, all through his long life, that he could not deliver sugar-coated emotion to superficial audiences. It is as well that it is so; that which is bought with effort is always valued the most, and the appreciation of Brahms, won by a little striving on the part of the auditor, will be a delight for

The concert was as usual, a flawless one. Mr. Paur, the friend of Brahms, is one of his most authoritative interpreters. The tragic overture was given with great breadth and earnestness. This work was not connected with any especial tragedy or drama, and it is peculiar in the fact that the heroic element is strangely lacking. In that other orchestral song of fate which we heard in the preceding concert (Tschaikowsky's "Symphonie Pathetique") there were moments of military ardor, of mighty combat, but here all seemed enshrouded in a fog of hopelessness.

Just as Beethoven brought forth his lightest-hearted symphonies, the sixth and eighth simultaneously with his most earnest, the fifth and seventh, so we find Brahms bringing forth this most earnest work together with his most jovial composition, the Academic overture. The overture was received by the large audience with evident appreciation.

Now followed "Four Solemn Songs" (Op. 121), Mr. Max Heinrich being the vocalist and Mr. Paur giving the important and difficult piano accompaniment. The earnest and grave character of these vocal selections suited Mr. Heinrich's dark voice very well and the applause was very hearty at the end of each song and at the conclusion of the set. The intense gloom of these numbers fitted them well to impress the character of a memorial service upon the public, but two of them would have been quite enough to have done this effectively, and the first two were the only ones that were applicable to the death of the great musician.

The figure treatment in the accompaniment of the first song was very well brought out by Mr. Paur, and the dirge-like, chanting, recitative of this and the second number was nobly emphasized by Mr. Heinrich.

It was not the best tribute to the memory of the dead composer to extend this sombre series of songs to their full length and then to follow them with the lengthy and not over-interesting concerto for violin and violoncello (op. 102). Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Schroeder were the soloists, and were, of course, received with a cordial welcome. Mr. Kneisel had arisen from a sick bed (he is suffering from an attack of tonsilitis) to render his homage to Brahms, with whom he has been especially intimate.

The second and third movements were the best parts of this rather prolix work, the dash and brilliancy of the finale going far to relieve its preceding tedium. There were hearty recalls at the end, but almost every one felt that the edge had been taken off the symphony that was still to follow. It was not surprising therefore to find a large exodus at the close of the concerto. An entire evening of the most earnest side of Brahms is apt to be an overdose for the average auditor.

But the Brahmsites remained, and were rewarded by an especially fine reading of the Fourth symphony. Had it only come half an hour earlier!

The Fourth Symphony is likely to be, next to the second, Brahms' most popular symphony. It is not so complex as the first, nor so compact as the third, but its first movement is a good example of that superb development of which Brahms was such a master. The simple theme at the beginning might seem to indicate simplicity, but it soon begins to expand and grow, leading to constantly new presentations of the chief thoughts, so that the different facets of the diamond finally send out a prismatic glow.

The slow movement begins with a peculiar phrase that introduces a scale-formation that is not known to many composers, one of the old mediaeval constructions in which forms some of the folk-songs of central Europe are presented. Its intrinsic beauty can be appreciated by the romanticist and classicist alike. Thus, also, the Rondo, which here stands for the Scherzo, is not too intricate for general comprehension.

In fact the symphony presents the two sides of Brahms nature clearly enough, the first and last movements being full of the learning which can make ingenious combinations at will, and the two interior movements being popular in the best sense, intelligible to anyone who has not been steeped in the idea that Brahms was not made to be understood.

The Brusquerie, the vigor and virility of the third movement have never been better brought out in any of the performances here, and this movement grows upon better acquaintance.

The hearing of this striking work leads one to hope that there may yet be a posthumous symphony found among the manuscripts which Brahms has left behind him.

Louis C. Elson.

Boston Journal.
SUNDAY, APRIL 11, 1897.

SYMPHONY NIGHT

In Memory of Johannes Brahms—A Program Devoted to Works of the Late Composer.

The program of the 21st Symphony concert given last evening in Music Hall was made up of these works by Brahms, who died in Vienna, April 3:

Tragic overture, op. 81..................
Four Serious Songs, op. 121..................
Max Heinrich.
Concerto for violin and 'cello in A minor, op. 102.
Messrs. Kneisel and Schroeder.
Symphony No. 4, in E minor, op. 98.....

The "Serious Songs" by Brahms were written in 1896 when the composer was far from well. They are dedicated to Max Klinger. They were first sung in Berlin by Mr. Sistermans at a concert of the Philharmonic Chorus, Nov. 16, 1896; they were first sung in London by Mr. Bispham at his farewell concert, Oct. 31, 1896; they were first sung in the United States by Mr. Bispham in New York, Jan. 12, 1897.

The text of the first song is taken from the third chapter of Ecclesiastes, beginning with "For that which befalleth the sons of men befalleth beasts," and ending with "For who shall bring him to see what shall be after him?"

The text of the second is from the fourth chapter of Ecclesiastes, beginning with "So I returned, and considered all the oppressions that are done under the sun," and ending with "Wherefore I praised the dead which are already dead, more than the living which are yet alive."

The text of the third is the marvelous apostrophe to death found in the 41st chapter of The Wisdom of Jesus the Son of Sirach, or Ecclesiasticus.

The text of the fourth is from the 13th chapter of 1st Corinthians, "Though I speak with the tongues of men and of angels," etc.

It was sadly mistaken reverence to introduce these songs in a memorial program, for they are insufferably dull. The music is almost an impertinence to the nobly poetic words. Arid recitative by the yard, with little that is suggestive, beautiful, dignified or grand in the piano part! Mr. Heinrich displayed all of his most disagreeable mannerisms and vocal offences. The accompaniments by Mr. Paur were dry, harsh, unsympathetic.

⁂

The other numbers of the program are familiar. It is enough to say that they were played in appreciative and reverent spirit by soloists and orchestra.

⁂

It is indeed meet and fitting that the memory of celebrated musicians should thus be honored. This reminds me that the death of Tschaikowsky, who in high imagination, melodic feeling, sense of color, and splendor of expression was superior to Brahms, passed unnoticed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Mr. Emil Paur.

Philip Hale.

---

on Transcript
MONDAY, APRIL 12, 1897.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme for the twenty-first concert of this season, given at Music Hall, Saturday evening, was made up entirely from the works of Brahms, and was as follows:

Tragic Overture, op. 81.
Vier Ernste Gesänge, op. 121.
  a. Ecclesiastes iii.
  b. Ecclesiastes iv.
  c. Ecclesiasticus, 41.
  d. I Corinthians xiii.
Concerto for Violin and Violoncello, A minor, op. 102.
Symphony No. 4, in E minor, op. 98.

The soloists were Mr. Max Heinrich, Mr. Franz Kneisel and Mr. Alwin Schroeder.

The concert was described on the programme as "In memory of Johannes Brahms," but the preponderence of gloom given it by the introduction of the four songs, three of which were musical settings of the most melancholy texts in scripture which bewail the lot of men on earth, made the concert more like a funeral service than one designed as a memorial. Even the robust vivacity of certain of the movements of the Fourth Symphony could not take from the performance its suggestion of the pall and bier. We can conceive of a memorial concert which within the space allotted a symphony concert should give a musical synopsis of Brahms's works, touching on all the moods that are essentially characteristic of the man; but the programme of Saturday night placed to the front the prolixity of the composer, and if there were among the audience some who came to study Brahms as beginners it would not be wonderful if they went away with the impression that his great purpose was to lose himself in a wilderness of sound.

The four songs which were written, we believe, in the last year of Brahms's life, when he was between death and the doctor, are with the exception of the last, little more than the jotting down of temperamental commentary on gloomy texts that will come into the mind of a man who is ill and approaching old age, which sort with his mingled present sadness and apprehension. In the composition of three of these songs Brahms appears to have rejected beauty as if it were the crucial temptation of the musical flesh and he were St. Anthony in his most ascetic mood. The fourth and last has, however, in it much beauty. It is a song. Mr. Heinrich sang all of them well, and his treatment of the fourth was nobly sympathetic. The task set before him was no light one, and he received little aid from the composer. The applause received was his due, but we doubt, if he had sung them in German, whether the audience would have been so promptly appreciative, for the clearness of his English enunciation gave many of his hearers at least an explanation of the lugubrious strains and cleared him from any responsibility for their apparent formlessness.

We suppose that when people mourn they are to be left to judge of the manifestations they may choose to make as solely their own concern, but we must confess that these songs, in the programme, brought to our mind the story of the man who when he went into mourning painted his house black. Mr. Paur played the accompaniments for Mr. Heinrich. The work of the soloists and orchestra were admirable, and while exceptions might well be taken to the programme, none could be to the manner of the performance, which throughout was broadly sympathetic.

The programme for the rehearsal and concert this week will be: N. Rimsky Korsakow, Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazada" (first time); Schumann, Concerto for pianoforte; Schumann, Symphony No. 3, in E-flat major, "Rhenish." The soloist will be Mr. Rafael Joseffy.

American Art Journal.
The Oldest Musical Weekly Published in America.
FOUNDED IN 1863 BY HENRY C. WATSON.
WM. M. THOMS, EDITOR.
☞ The first and most important object the journalist should have in mind is to criticise productive and reproductive art with such discriminating care and honesty of purpose as to offer a safe guide to popular judgment, rather than act as its echo, thus creating a demand for higher culture in artists.
OFFICES, 23 UNION SQUARE, NEW YORK
NEW YORK, SATURDAY, APRIL 10, 1897.

An awfully enjoyable concert was the Symphony Twentieth. Magnificently enough to win a quadruple recall did Ben Davies sing Handel's great Jephthah number, Waft Her, Angels. There were two overtures, both splendidly played, Oberon and Tannhauser. The Symphony was Tschaikowsky's Pathetic, with its noble lament and march, published so near his death as to be his requiem. Leo Schulz was the soloist in two cello pieces: Adagio op. 38, by Waldemar Bargiel; and Dvorak's Rondo, op. 94, heard in Boston for the first time, Mr. Schulz fully meriting the glow of his greeting.

American Art Journal.
NEW YORK, SATURDAY, APRIL 17, 1897.

Brahms Memorials.

In the closing concert of the season the Kneisel Quartet was assisted by Joseffy and M. L. Pourtan; and the program already arranged was set aside, so that this should be a memorial concert to Brahms, with the A-minor Quartet, op. 51, No. 2; the Adagio, from Quintet op. 115, for Strings and Clarinet; the F-minor Quintet, op. 34, for Piano and Strings. This is an age of electricity. Brahms died in Europe on April 3; and two days later this concert was given here.

Four days later the symphony concert was changed to mark the same event, and the program duly placed in mourning. It fitly opened with Tragic Overture, op. 81. Four Scripture selections, op. 121, from Ecclesiastes, Ecclesiasticus, and Paul's Charity Chapter, were sung by Max Heinrich superbly. Kneisel and Schroeder played the Concerto in A minor, op. 102, for Violin and Cello. The Symphony was the Fourth, op. 98, E minor, its Andante breathing the very spirit of the occasion.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 19, 1897.

The Rimsky-Korsokoff Suite at the Symphony Concert.

Long deferred because of its many difficulties, the Rimsky-Korsokoff Suite was performed on Saturday to the amazement of every concert-goer who had been brought up in the paths of Bach and righteousness; yet no one dare say that the mountain brought forth a mouse; it was rather a white elephant that emerged.

The Suite entitled "Scheherazade," introduced us to a new Berlioz, a Russian Berlioz who had been nurtured on augmented seconds, cradled in triplets, and had imbibed chromatics from his boyhood; a man who can dazzle with a display of tone-color that fairly throws the "Symphonie Fantastique" in the shade.

The work is in Music very much like a Turner painting of the last period is in its own domain of Art, it presents few ideas, but an overwhelming glow of color; as a lesson in tone-coloring of the most modern sort it is very interesting and should be given again soon, for no one can digest its strange effects on a first hearing. Both violins and violoncellos give weird passages on the bridge ("sull' ponticello"), and the muted effects on some of the brasses are most novel in their tone-color.

Thers is a free, improvisational character about the movements that suits well to the subject, and the frequent introduction of the Scheherazade figure, while leading to a little monotony, gives a poetical idea of the story-teller of the "Arabian Nights."

The work is the thorniest possible path for the performers; we cannot recall a composition of its length which presents as many technical difficulties as this Suite. That it was played with such elasticity and surety reflects the greatest possible credit on Mr. Paur and on our orchestra.

The first movement pictured "Sindbad and his Ship," but was scarcely a very graphic sketch; it presented a few guiding motives of which the "sea motive" with its sudden shocks and jolts was the most graphic. The Scheherazade motive was not only present in many parts of this movement but bubbled up in each of the succeeding movements and its omnipresence lent a coherency and continuity to the work even while inducing a certain sameness. This figure was chiefly given to the solo violin (another appropriate touch) and was very expressively played by Mr. Kneisel.

The second movement dealt with the subject of "The Calender Prince," (which one was not stated) and was made up of pepper and paprika; it was so highly spiced that we may suppose that Rimsky-Korsakoff took his theme from Burton's edition and was inspired by the foot-notes of that spiciest of translators. The Bassoon (possibly this was the young Porter of the story) had some very difficult work to do and did it very well.

The third movement, "The Story of the young Prince and Princess," was the most popular part of the work, a very effective march theme appearing here with all the effects of the "Turkish Music." It was vigorously applauded.

The last movement gave a picture of a Bagdad festival. Naturally it tended frankly in the direction of Oriental dances and it must have recalled the Midway Plaisance to more than one auditor. It had some moments of great strength and its tone-coloring was the most brilliant in this kaleidoscopic suite.

Of course the question arises, after the severe study necessary to master this composition, "Was the game worth the candle?" We hold emphatically that it was, for this is a new musical voice out of the East.

The recently-given work by Richard Strauss and this Oriental Suite, widely apart as the poles, represent the full technique of the most modern orchestra; passages are played and effects achieved that would have filled a Beethoven with wonder, that a Mendelssohn would have held to be impossible. The old Alchemists in the pursuit of a barren and fruitless science brought forth the most useful of sciences,—Chemistry; the modern tone-colorists, even when barren of truly musical ideas, are forging a weapon which the true composer of the future will wield with greater effect than its makers. And the musical genius of the future may come from Russia too!

The land that can give such passionate fervor as glows in the works of Tschaikowsky and such orchestral technique as is present in such a suite as this, is the land of the rising sun in Musical Art.

But how barren of actual beauty the Suite was became plainly apparent when it was followed by two great Schumann compositions; here there was no grotesqueness masquerading as genius, no melodic weakness hiding behind bizarrerrie. One somehow seemed to be in a purer, sweeter atmosphere, an entirely greater field of art.

Schumann's Concerto for piano (A minor) with Joseffy at the instrument was something not soon to be forgotten. We are glad to lay another tribute of praise at the feet of this great pianist, who began as a mere virtuoso and has since grown into a musical genius. It was Schumann constantly in the foreground and never a suspicion of the artist's personality at the front.

A grand work grandly performed from first to last (save a slight lagging in the first movement), and both its intrinsic beauties and its worthy interpretation fully appreciated by the audience, for prolonged applause and many recalls followed its conclusion. This work, the Brahms second, and Beethoven's fourth and fifth concertos, are the masterpieces of their particular field; begun as a phantasie in 1841, the Schumann work was fortunate in not finding a publisher, for in 1845 it became something much better than a phantasie, being elaborated into its present shape.

It was abused by all the martinets of music on its appearance, for the sticklers for form could not reconcile themselves to its free shape, the immediate entrance of the piano, the bold theme of the "Tutti" following, which dominates everything thereafter, the introduction of a new motive after the subordinate theme (probably because the latter was not suited for development) and the cadenza interwoven into the end of the first movement, all these were radical touches at the time of the production of the concerto, although Beethoven had partially anticipated some of them. The Intermezzo, a new style of [illegible] because the "Andante Espressivo" episode in the first movement had anticipated the effect of a regular slow movement, also provoked comment. This movement was splendidly given on this occasion, the charming conversation between the piano and the orchestra being especially effective because of the perfect balance and ensemble attained.

If ever Schumann showed himself a master of syncopation, (and he is the greatest syncopater of them all) it is in the finale of this concerto, where one is constantly mystified and held on tenderhooks between 3-4 and 4-4 rhythm, a difficult affair to phrase well, a work that is never heard with perfect ensemble unless there is a great pianist at the instrument and a great conductor on the stand; both conditions were fulfilled on this occasion, and therefore the concerto was played in a memorable manner.

The Schumann Symphony which followed is not the greatest of the five, (counting the "Overture, Scherzo and Finale" as a symphony without a slow movement), but it comes close after the glorious one in B flat. Its first movement was given with just the right abandon and power. Its Scherzo is a good example of those serious Scherzos (a seeming anomaly) which Schumann often wrote, and it received a reading which did not distort its character.

In the Cathedral scene, that extra movement (for it is more than an introduction to the finale) the added trombones, spite of a single slip, gave just the effect of long-drawn-out organ chords, and the majestic result was indescribable. Altogether a very good performance such as we are beginning to expect from our orchestra and one which can only be chronicled with praise that is becoming very oft-repeated in these days of our orchestral supremacy.

Louis C. Elson.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, APRIL 18, 1897.

Symphony Orchestra Concert.

The program for the 22d symphony concert comprised a symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," by Korsakoff, first time here, Schumann's A minor concerto for the piano and the "Reinish" symphony. Mr Rafael Joseffy was the soloist. The Korsakoff suite is an Oriental tone picture after "Arabian Nights," and the four movements illustrate stories told to the sultan by his sultana, closing with a festival at Bagdad and a shipwreck. The author is known as one of the foremost of the young Russian school of writers, and in this work he evidences his right to the position. The suite is as full of brilliant coloring and contrasts as the multi-hued garb of an eastern potentate, and the musical surprises are numerous and at times almost startling. The subject requires broad treatment, and Korsakoff has used the latitude, seemingly, to the utmost.

The musical divisions are so complex that one hearing of the piece is insufficient for the proper analysis of the suite. The tempo is constantly changing, and only an organization skilled in team work could hope to give more than a creditable performance of the piece. The promptness with which the baton beat was followed speaks volumes for the efficiency of our symphony players, for throughout their playing the cues were taken up as if by one man. Mr Kneisel played the narration motifs exquisitely, and high praise is also due to the harp, flute, oboe, clarinet, horn and other players for their pure tonality and admirable shading in solo phrases.

A very melodic theme runs through the four movements, occurring in many different ways; first as a solo for the violin, and afterwards juggled about by the various instruments, either in brief solos, in unison or accompanied by the other contingents. This is the Scheherazade motif, or narration. In the first part the story is of Sinbad's voyage, several motifs being used to indicate the sea, the wave, the ship, etc. Here the harp part is very prominent, and the alternate phrases given to the different parts of the band are extremely difficult and, as played by Mr Paur's men, show a masterly skill in orchestration. Each body of instruments appear to indulge in so-called conversations with each other until they become general, forming an ensemble beautifully effective and in a great measure original.

A peculiar effect in the second movement was the bassoon solo against the throbbing double-basses, leading up to a brilliant march, punctured by responses on the strings played in unison. Here again is the narration theme tossed about until its brilliant and jovial nature developes into a finale of a comical character. This movement was delightfully interpreted, the breaks being given with a wonderful unanimity by the separate contingents.

The songs in the third movement, at times piquant and at times delicate and tender, were sympathetically played, and the furious, fortissimo concert of percussion and other instruments at the close were but slightly less deafening than in the shipwrecking episode in the last movement, which was ultra-fortissimo. As this part represented a fete scene, followed by an orgy and a disaster at sea, the tone picture can better be imagined than described.

Mr Joseffy played the Schumann concerto in a thoughtful and sympathetic manner, giving to the piano part its proper value, but never forcing it into undue prominence. He preserved the course evidently intended by the composer, who has made the orchestral part more brilliant than that of the solo instrument. His technique is wonderful, and tone as pure as ever, and if his fortissimo passages are lacking somewhat in power, there is no lack of expression and beautiful phrasing. In the first movement the trills were slightly lacking in smoothness, but this defect very quickly disappeared, and in the cadenza, the arpeggios in the second movement and the florid passages in the last part, his execution was notably effective. The orchestra was inclined to hasten the tempo in some places, but otherwise the assistance was up to the usual standard. Mr Joseffy was recalled many times at the close of his performance.

The Schumann "Rhenish" symphony was well played as a whole. The "ponderous jollity" of the second movement is to be specially commended for its suggestive treatment, and the orchestral work in the powerful climax to the first movement was stirringly vigorous. Miss Lena Little will be this week's soloist. The program will comprise the Grieg suite, "Peer Gynt," aria from "Taming of the Shrew," three movements from Beethoven's ninth symphony and the "Lenore" overture.

SUNDAY [illegible]
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CI., NO. 108.
SUNDAY, APRIL 18, 1897.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

First Time in Boston of the New Suite "Scheherazade."

Work Not Over Deep in Finer Essentials of Musicianship—Brilliantly and Perfectly Played—Schumann Concerto Gloriously Rendered by Mr. Joseffy.

The programme of the 22d of this season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, in Music Hall, last evening, was:

Symphonic suite, "Scheherazade"......... Nicolai Rimsky-Korasoff
(First time in Boston.)
Concerto for pianoforte..............Schumann
Symphony, "Rhenish"..............Schumann

Mr. Raphael Joseffy was the soloist.

On the flyleaf of the orchestral score of the new suite is the following: "The Sultan Schahriar, persuaded of the falseness and faithlessness of women, had sworn to put every one of his wives to death after the first night. But the Sultana Scheherazade saved her life by interesting him in the stories she told him during 1001 nights." If the fair and ingenious Sultana related her stories as confusedly and unmeaningly, not to say cacophonously, as the composer has related them musically, he would have ordered her to be bowstrung or to have her head lopped off after the second or third night; unless he excusably imagined her to be a lunatic; in which case, with that consideration which Mussulmans show toward creatures thus afflicted, he would have looked upon her as one under the special care of God, and let her go on her way unharmed. That he would have permitted her to gabble away, Korasoffwise, for two years, eight months and odd days, is wholly improbable. Hence, it is only reasonable to conjecture that the Russian composer has made some radical mistake regarding the spirit in which Scheherazade directed the pessimistic Schahriar from his bloodthirsty purpose.

The work is divided into four parts, the first entitled "The Sea and Sinbad's Ship"; the second, "The Story of the Calender Prince," whether he who had only one eye or one of the others is not said; the third, "The Story of the Young Prince and the Young Princess," and the fourth, "Festival at Bagdad; the Sinking of Sinbad's Ship."

These titles have no significance, for they mean nothing as far as the music has any coherent connection with them. It is programme music of the extremest order; but such explanation as is afforded of it does nothing toward making its meaning clear. The score is rich and varied in tone color, and is suggestive of the orient. The instrumentation is ingenious and sensational. There is much of gorgeous hue, of sensuous expression; there is also much of sound and fury, signifying nothing, and much of pompous vulgarity.

The themes are very brief, and there is no attempt to develop them. They are passed from instrument to instrument without change, and reiterated again and again, and still again. In fact, as far as this work may be taken as an indication of the composer's skill in his art, he seems to be weak in invention and not over deep in the finer essentials of musicianship, for his counterpoint is of the simplest, his accompaniments to his themes except in their color almost primitively artless in character, and of polyphonic writing there is scarcely a trace. He worries a theme as a cat worries a mouse, slowly and deliberately, until he deprives it of life. The most striking feature of the suite is the imposing manner in which it deals with nothing in particular. It resembles those nonsense verses in which lofty words and swelling phrases have all the appearance of serious poetic utterance until they are examined, when the clever trick is seen through.

The third movement has the longest theme, and it is a gracefully pretty one of its kind; but it at last becomes wearisome by reason of the persistent and unnecessary frequency with which it is repeated with bold literalness. Of clever, piquant and effective instrumentation there is enough and to spare, but it all tends to disguise mere commonplaces and to impress upon them an aspect of dignity, of originality and of profundity which are not theirs intrinsically.

If the comparison may be allowed, the music suggested a parvenu making an ostentatious display of his newly-acquired wealth by surrounding himself with gorgeously inharmonious furniture and wearing an excess of diamonds, in the belief that they will obliterate all indications of his innate vulgarity.

The work is of huge difficulty to the performers, making the most exacting demands on their technique. It was, nevertheless, brilliantly and perfectly played, even to the turkey-gobble phrase gven to the bassoon in the story of the Calender.

Mr. Joseffy, who was received with exceptional cordiality, played the Schumann concerto gloriously. It is somewhat late in the day to discuss his merits as a pianist, and it will be taken for granted that whatever he does will be done in the highest artistic spirit and with the most masterly skill. His performances on this occasion were no exception to the rule. The work was read and rendered by him, especially in the finale, which was given with stirring emphasis, dash and largeness of style, in a manner that brought forth a tremendous outburst of applause that was continued until he came forward and bowed his acknowledgements again and again.

The assistance afforded him by Mr. Paur in his spirited, sympathetic and effective treatment of the orchestral part of the work had its due share in aiding the pianist to achieve his notable triumph. In fact, the orchestra was at its best through the whole concert, and the interpretation as well as the performance of the symphony may be ranked among the great successes of the season.

The selections for the next concert are: Suite, "Peer Gynt," Grieg; aria from "Taming of the Shrew," Goetz; first three movements of the ninth symphony, Beethoven; overture, "Lenore," No. 3, Beethoven. Miss Lena Little is to be the soloist.

BOSTON [illegible]
The Representative [illegible] Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.
[illegible] MORNING, APRIL 18, 1897.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The announcement that Mr. Rafael Joseffy was to be the soloist at the twenty-second concert in Music Hall Saturday evening was the cause of the especially large audience. The programme consisted of three numbers, the first a symphonic suite, by Rimsky-Korsakoff, entitled "Scheherazade," op. 35; then followed the pianoforte concerto in A minor, op. 54, of Schumann, and that composer's symphony No. 3 in E flat, op. 97, known as the "Rhenish."

The symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," is a work of decided novelty, and was performed for the first time in this city. The composer is a Russian, living at St. Petersburg. He is considered to be one of the leaders of the so-called "young Russian" school of composition; that is, he stands in Russia as a thorough representative of the extreme national tendency in music, unlike that of Rubinstein and Tschaikowsky, who were looked upon as too much influenced by German example.

Of Mr. Joseffy and his playing of the Schumann concerto, it is difficult to speak in a few words. The concerto requires for its proper interpretation a master of subjective playing, one who can bring with the highest artistic understanding of Schumann all the possibilities of a modern technique and use both these acquirements as a means to portray the whole meaning of such a work. That Mr. Joseffy does this is easily apparent; it is just these above-mentioned qualities that make him the greatest living interpreter of Brahms's pianoforte works, and Brahms and Schumann are much alike in their ideas. It is doubtful if the Schumann concerto has ever been played here in Boston with more authority and surety and high devotion to the spirit of the composer than was the case at this concert. That this was apparent to the audience was evident, for Mr. Joseffy received an ovation at the close of the number rivalling the one he received last season after playing Brahms. It was a worthy tribute to a unique performance.

This memorable concert was brought to a close by a fine rendering of Schumann's "Rhenish" symphony, one of the most interesting of anything that this master has written, illustrating many of his finest as well as most peculiar ideas. The programme for the twenty-third concert includes the "Peer Gynt" suite of Grieg, three movements of Beethoven's ninth symphony, also his overture to Leonore, No. 3. Miss Lena Little will sing an air from Goetz's "Taming of the Shrew."

THE BOSTON
SATURDAY EVENING
Gazette
BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 18.

Symphony Concert

Last night, in Music Hall, the Symphony Orchestra gave its twenty-second concert. The programme was:

Symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," op. 35.... Nicolai Rinisky-Korsakoff
Concerto for pianoforte, A minor, op. 54.... Schumann
Symphony No. 3, E flat major, op. 17........ Schumann
Soloist, Mr. Rafael Joseffy.

The Symphonic Suite was played for the first time in Boston on this occasion, and wisely played, for it is as necessary to hear new music as old, but it is a work that does not call for impassioned enthusiasm. The composer does not indulge in occultism; it is easy to follow the narrow train of his thoughts, and in developing them he is less erudite than he wishes to be. He thinks in a spasmodic way, in little gushes, and the wide intervals between the thoughts he fills in with patching in the modern method, but not always with the modern art. When he gets a little bit of melody, which is occasionally vulgar, he does not know what to do with it, and so in his desperation he cuts it off short, and uses patching again.

If one listens to the music and reads the programme at the same time, one will discover that the composer is telling an Arabian Nights' story about the sea and Sinbad's ship, about the Calender-Prince, about the young Prince and the young Princess, and about a festival at Bagdad, that ends in a shipwreck against "a rock surmounted by a bronze warrior." The bronze warrior does not come out very plain in the music; but there is a vivid suggestion of the noise that accompanies a tempest or of a dynamite explosion. The disconnected story is held together by motives; there are the Scheherazade motive, the sea motive, and the wave motive; but it is the Scheherazade motive that the composer chiefly depends on in moments of difficulty, and the careless will accept for profundity that which is characteristic of the absence of thought. At first hearing the work seems superficial and trivial, but as long friendship would make one enjoy even the company of Mr. Hyde, repeated hearings of this symphonic poem might make it not only endurable but even delightful. The work was played with admirable vigor and brilliancy.

Mr. Rafael Joseffy once again demonstrated that he is an interpretative artist of the finest calibre, as well as a master of technique. He was faithful to his composer in making no attempt to force the pianoforte into undue prominence, but the self-reserve was characeristic of the true artist and all of Mr. Joseffy's work belongs to this character. He very naturally and most deservedly won a triumph by his brilliant and most artistic interpretation. Throughout the concert the work of the orchestra was of the highest quality, which is another way of saying that it was done by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 19, 1897.

The Rimsky-Korsokoff Suite at the Symphony Concert.

Long deferred because of its many difficulties, the Rimsky-Korsokoff Suite was performed on Saturday to the amazement of every concert-goer who had been brought up in the paths of Bach and righteousness; yet no one dare say that the mountain brought forth a mouse; it was rather a white elephant that emerged.

The Suite entitled "Scheherazade," introduced us to a new Berlioz, a Russian Berlioz who had been nurtured on augmented seconds, cradled in triplets, and had imbibed chromatics from his boyhood; a man who can dazzle with a display of tone-color that fairly throws the "Symphonie Fantastique" in the shade.

The work is in Music very much like a Turner painting of the last period is in its own domain of Art, it presents few ideas, but an overwhelming glow of color; as a lesson in tone-coloring of the most modern sort it is very interesting and should be given again soon, for no one can digest its strange effects on a first hearing. Both violins and violoncellos give weird passages on the bridge ("sull' ponticello"), and the muted effects on some of the brasses are most novel in their tone-color.

Thers is a free, improvisational character about the movements that suits well to the subject, and the frequent introduction of the Scheherazade figure, while leading to a little monotony, gives a poetical idea of the story-teller of the "Arabian Nights."

The work is the thorniest possible path for the performers; we cannot recall a composition of its length which presents as many technical difficulties as this Suite. That it was played with such elasticity and surety reflects the greatest possible credit on Mr. Paur and on our orchestra.

The first movement pictured "Sindbad and his Ship," but was scarcely a very graphic sketch; it presented a few guiding motives of which the "sea motive" with its sudden shocks and jolts was the most graphic. The Scheherazade motive was not only present in many parts of this movement but bubbled up in each of the succeeding movements and its omnipresence lent a coherency and continuity to the work even while inducing a certain sameness. This figure was chiefly given to the solo violin (another appropriate touch) and was very expressively played by Mr. Kneisel.

The second movement dealt with the subject of "The Calender Prince," (which one was not stated) and was made up of pepper and paprika; it was so highly spiced that we may suppose that Rimsky-Korsakoff took his theme from Burton's edition and was inspired by the foot-notes of that spiciest of translators. The Bassoon (possibly this was the young Porter of the story) had some very difficult work to do and did it very well.

The third movement, "The Story of the young Prince and Princess," was the most popular part of the work, a very effective march theme appearing here with all the effects of the "Turkish Music." It was vigorously applauded.

The last movement gave a picture of a Bagdad festival. Naturally it tended frankly in the direction of Oriental dances and it must have recalled the Midway Plaisance to more than one auditor. It had some moments of great strength and its tone-coloring was the most brilliant in this kaleidoscopic suite.

Of course the question arises, after the severe study necessary to master this composition, "Was the game worth the candle?" We hold emphatically that it was, for this is a new musical voice out of the East.

The recently-given work by Richard Strauss and this Oriental Suite, widely apart as the poles, represent the full technique of the most modern orchestra; passages are played and effects achieved that would have filled a Beethoven with wonder, that a Mendelssohn would have held to be impossible. The old Alchemists in the pursuit of a barren and fruitless science brought forth the most useful of sciences,—Chemistry; the modern tone-colorists, even when barren of truly musical ideas, are forging a weapon which the true composer of the future will wield with greater effect than its makers. And the musical genius of the future may come from Russia too!

The land that can give such passionate fervor as glows in the works of Tschaikowsky and such orchestral technique as is present in such a suite as this, is the land of the rising sun in Musical Art.

But how barren of actual beauty the Suite was became plainly apparent when it was followed by two great Schumann compositions; here there was no grotesqueness masquerading as genius, no melodic weakness hiding behind bizarrerrie. One somehow seemed to be in a purer, sweeter atmosphere, an entirely greater field of art.

Schumann's Concerto for piano (A minor) with Joseffy at the instrument was something not soon to be forgotten. We are glad to lay another tribute of praise at the feet of this great pianist, who began as a mere virtuoso and has since grown into a musical genius. It was Schumann constantly in the foreground and never a suspicion of the artist's personality at the front.

A grand work grandly performed from first to last (save a slight lagging in the first movement), and both its intrinsic beauties and its worthy interpretation fully appreciated by the audience, for prolonged applause and many recalls followed its conclusion. This work, the Brahms second, and Beethoven's fourth and fifth concertos, are the masterpieces of their particular field; begun as a phantasie in 1841, the Schumann work was fortunate in not finding a publisher, for in 1845 it became something much better than a phantasie, being elaborated into its present shape.

It was abused by all the martinets of music on its appearance, for the sticklers for form could not reconcile themselves to its free shape, the immediate entrance of the piano, the bold theme of the "Tutti" following, which dominates everything thereafter, the introduction of a new motive after the subordinate theme (probably because the latter was not suited for development) and the cadenza interwoven into the end of the first movement, all these were radical touches at the time of the production of the concerto, although Beethoven had partially anticipated some of them. The Intermezzo, a new style of [illegible] probably introduced because the "Andante espressivo" episode in the first movement had anticipated the effect of a regular slow movement, also provoked comment. This movement was splendidly given on this occasion, the charming conversation between the piano and the orchestra being especially effective because of the perfect balance and ensemble attained.

If ever Schumann showed himself a master of syncopation, (and he is the greatest syncopater of them all) it is in the finale of this concerto, where one is constantly mystified and held on tenderhooks between 3-4 and 4-4 rhythm, a difficult affair to phrase well, a work that is never heard with perfect ensemble unless there is a great pianist at the instrument and a great conductor on the stand; both conditions were fulfilled on this occasion, and therefore the concerto was played in a memorable manner.

The Schumann Symphony which followed is not the greatest of the five, (counting the "Overture, Scherzo and Finale" as a symphony without a slow movement), but it comes close after the glorious one in B flat. Its first movement was given with just the right abandon and power. Its Scherzo is a good example of those serious Scherzos (a seeming anomaly) which Schumann often wrote, and it received a reading which did not distort its character.

In the Cathedral scene, that extra movement (for it is more than an introduction to the finale) the added trombones, spite of a single slip, gave just the effect of long-drawn-out organ chords, and the majestic result was indescribable. Altogether a very good performance such as we are beginning to expect from our orchestra and one which can only be chronicled with praise that is becoming very oft-repeated in these days of our orchestral supremacy. Louis C. Elson.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, APRIL 18, 1897.

Symphony Orchestra Concert.

The program for the 22d symphony concert comprised a symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," by Korsakoff, first time here. Schumann's A minor concerto for the piano and the "Reinish" symphony. Mr Rafael Joseffy was the soloist. The Korsakoff suite is an Oriental tone picture after "Arabian Nights," and the four movements illustrate stories told to the sultan by his sultana, closing with a festival at Bagdad and a shipwreck. The author is known as one of the foremost of the young Russian school of writers, and in this work he evidences his right to the position. The suite is as full of brilliant coloring and contrasts as the multi-hued garb of an eastern potentate, and the musical surprises are numerous and at times almost startling. The subject requires broad treatment, and Korsakoff has used the latitude, seemingly, to the utmost.

The musical divisions are so complex that one hearing of the piece is insufficient for the proper analysis of the suite. The tempo is constantly changing, and only an organization skilled in team work could hope to give more than a creditable performance of the piece. The promptness with which the baton beat was followed speaks volumes for the efficiency of our symphony players, for throughout their playing the cues were taken up as if by one man. Mr Kneisel played the narration motifs exquisitely, and high praise is also due to the harp, flute, oboe, clarinet, horn and other players for their pure tonality and admirable shading in solo phrases.

A very melodic theme runs through the four movements, occurring in many different ways; first as a solo for the violin, and afterwards juggled about by the various instruments, either in brief solos, in unison or accompanied by the other contingents. This is the Scheherazade motif, or narration. In the first part the story is of Sinbad's voyage, several motifs being used to indicate the sea, the wave, the ship, etc. Here the harp part is very prominent, and the alternate phrases given to the different parts of the band are extremely difficult and, as played by Mr Paur's men, show a masterly skill in orchestration. Each body of instruments appear to indulge in so-called conversations with each other until they become general, forming an ensemble beautifully effective and in a great measure original.

A peculiar effect in the second movement was the bassoon solo against the throbbing double-basses, leading up to a brilliant march, punctured by responses on the strings played in unison. Here again is the narration theme tossed about until its brilliant and jovial nature developes into a finale of a comical character. This movement was delightfully interpreted, the breaks being given with a wonderful unanimity by the separate contingents.

The songs in the third movement, at times piquant and at times delicate and tender, were sympathetically played, and the furious, fortissimo concert of percussion and other instruments at the close were but slightly less deafening than in the shipwrecking episode in the last movement, which was ultra-fortissimo. As this part represented a fete scene, followed by an orgy and a disaster at sea, the tone picture can better be imagined than described.

Mr Joseffy played the Schumann concerto in a thoughtful and sympathetic manner, giving to the piano part its proper value, but never forcing it into undue prominence. He preserved the course evidently intended by the composer, who has made the orchestral part more brilliant than that of the solo instrument. His technique is wonderful, and tone as pure as ever, and if his fortissimo passages are lacking somewhat in power, there is no lack of expression and beautiful phrasing. In the first movement the trills were slightly lacking in smoothness, but this defect very quickly disappeared, and in the cadenza, the arpeggios in the second movement and the florid passages in the last part, his execution was notably effective. The orchestra was inclined to hasten the tempo in some places, but otherwise the assistance was up to the usual standard. Mr Joseffy was recalled many times at the close of his performance.

The Schumann "Rhenish" symphony was well played as a whole. The "ponderous jollity" of the second movement is to be specially commended for its suggestive treatment, and the orchestral work in the powerful climax to the first movement was stirringly vigorous. Miss Lena Little will be this week's soloist. The program will comprise the Grieg suite, "Peer Gynt," aria from "Taming of the Shrew," three movements from Beethoven's ninth symphony and the "Lenore" overture.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CI., NO. 108.
SUNDAY, APRIL 18, 1897.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

First Time in Boston of the New Suite "Scheherazade."

Work Not Over Deep in Finer Essentials of Musicianship—Brilliantly and Perfectly Played—Schumann Concerto Gloriously Rendered by Mr. Joseffy.

The programme of the 22d of this season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, in Music Hall, last evening, was:

Symphonic suite, "Scheherazade"......... Nicolai Rimsky-Korasoff
(First time in Boston.)
Concerto for pianoforte..............Schumann
Symphony, "Rhenish"..............Schumann

Mr. Raphael Joseffy was the soloist.

On the flyleaf of the orchestral score of the new suite is the following: "The Sultan Schahriar, persuaded of the falseness and faithlessness of women, had sworn to put every one of his wives to death after the first night. But the Sultana Scheherazade saved her life by interesting him in the stories she told him during 1001 nights." If the fair and ingenious Sultana related her stories as confusedly and unmeaningly, not to say cacophonously, as the composer has related them musically, he would have ordered her to be bowstrung or to have her head lopped off after the second or third night; unless he excusably imagined her to be a lunatic; in which case, with that consideration which Mussulmans show toward creatures thus afflicted, he would have looked upon her as one under the special care of God, and let her go on her way unharmed. That he would have permitted her to gabble away, Korasoffwise, for two years, eight months and odd days, is wholly improbable. Hence, it is only reasonable to conjecture that the Russian composer has made some radical mistake regarding the spirit in which Scheherazade directed the pessimistic Schahriar from his bloodthirsty purpose.

The work is divided into four parts, the first entitled "The Sea and Sinbad's Ship"; the second, "The Story of the Calender Prince," whether he who had only one eye or one of the others is not said; the third, "The Story of the Young Prince and the Young Princess," and the fourth, "Festival at Bagdad; the Sinking of Sinbad's Ship."

These titles have no significance, for they mean nothing as far as the music has any coherent connection with them. It is programme music of the extremest order; but such explanation as is afforded of it does nothing toward making its meaning clear. The score is rich and varied in tone color, and is suggestive of the orient. The instrumentation is ingenious and sensational. There is much of gorgeous hue, of sensuous expression; there is also much of sound and fury, signifying nothing, and much of pompous vulgarity.

The themes are very brief, and there is no attempt to develop them. They are passed from instrument to instrument without change, and reiterated again and again, and still again. In fact, as far as this work may be taken as an indication of the composer's skill in his art, he seems to be weak in invention and not over deep in the finer essentials of musicianship, for his counterpoint is of the simplest, his accompaniments to his themes except in their color almost primitively artless in character, and of polyphonic writing there is scarcely a trace. He worries a theme as a cat worries a mouse, slowly and deliberately, until he deprives it of life. The most striking feature of the suite is the imposing manner in which it deals with nothing in particular. It resembles those nonsense verses in which lofty words and swelling phrases have all the appearance of serious poetic utterance until they are examined, when the clever trick is seen through.

The third movement has the longest theme, and it is a gracefully pretty one of its kind; but it at last becomes wearisome by reason of the persistent and unnecessary frequency with which it is repeated with bold literalness. Of clever, piquant and effective instrumentation there is enough and to spare, but it all tends to disguise mere commonplaces and to impress upon them an aspect of dignity, of originality and of profundity which are not theirs intrinsically.

If the comparison may be allowed, the music suggested a parvenu making an ostentatious display of his newly-acquired wealth by surrounding himself with gorgeously inharmonious furniture and wearing an excess of diamonds, in the belief that they will obliterate all indications of his innate vulgarity.

The work is of huge difficulty to the performers, making the most exacting demands on their technique. It was, nevertheless, brilliantly and perfectly played, even to the turkey-gobble phrase gven to the bassoon in the story of the Calender.

Mr. Joseffy, who was received with exceptional cordiality, played the Schumann concerto gloriously. It is somewhat late in the day to discuss his merits as a pianist, and it will be taken for granted that whatever he does will be done in the highest artistic spirit and with the most masterly skill. His performances on this occasion were no exception to the rule. The work was read and rendered by him, especially in the finale, which was given with stirring emphasis, dash and largeness of style, in a manner that brought forth a tremendous outburst of applause that was continued until he came forward and bowed his acknowledgements again and again.

The assistance afforded him by Mr. Paur in his spirited, sympathetic and effective treatment of the orchestral part of the work had its due share in aiding the pianist to achieve his notable triumph. In fact, the orchestra was at its best through the whole concert, and the interpretation as well as the performance of the symphony may be ranked among the great successes of the season.

The selections for the next concert are: Suite, "Peer Gynt," Grieg; aria from "Taming of the Shrew," Goetz; first three movements of the ninth symphony, Beethoven; overture, "Lenore," No. 3, Beethoven. Miss Lena Little is to be the soloist.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.
SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 18, 1897.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The announcement that Mr. Rafael Joseffy was to be the soloist at the twenty-second concert in Music Hall Saturday evening was the cause of the especially large audience. The programme consisted of three numbers. the first a symphonic suite, by Rimsky-Korsakoff, entitled "Scheherazade," op. 35; then followed the pianoforte concerto in A minor, op. 54, of Schumann, and that composer's symphony No. 3 in E flat, op. 97, known as the "Rhenish."

The symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," is a work of decided novelty, and was performed for the first time in this city. The composer is a Russian, living at St. Petersburg. He is considered to be one of the leaders of the so-called "young Russian" school of composition; that is, he stands in Russia as a thorough representative of the extreme national tendency in music, unlike that of Rubinstein and Tschaikowsky, who were looked upon as too much influenced by German example.

Of Mr. Joseffy and his playing of the Schumann concerto, it is difficult to speak in a few words. The concerto requires for its proper interpretation a master of subjective playing, one who can bring with the highest artistic understanding of Schumann all the possibilities of a modern technique and use both these acquirements as a means to portray the whole meaning of such a work. That Mr. Joseffy does this is easily apparent; it is just these above-mentioned qualities that make him the greatest living interpreter of Brahms's pianoforte works, and Brahms and Schumann are much alike in their ideas. It is doubtful if the Schumann concerto has ever been played here in Boston with more authority and surety and high devotion to the spirit of the composer than was the case at this concert. That this was apparent to the audience was evident, for Mr. Joseffy received an ovation at the close of the number rivalling the one he received last season after playing Brahms. It was a worthy tribute to a unique performance.

This memorable concert was brought to a close by a fine rendering of Schumann's "Rhenish" symphony, one of the most interesting of anything that this master has written, illustrating many of his finest as well as most peculiar ideas. The programme for the twenty-third concert includes the "Peer Gynt" suite of Grieg, three movements of Beethoven's ninth symphony, also his overture to Leonore, No. 3. Miss Lena Little will sing an air from Goetz's "Taming of the Shrew."

THE BOSTON
SATURDAY EVENING
Gazette
BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 18.

Symphony Concert

Last night, in Music Hall, the Symphony Orchestra gave its twenty-second concert. The programme was:

Symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," op. 35.... Nicolai Rinisky-Korsakoff
Concerto for pianoforte, A minor, op. 54.... Schumann
Symphony No. 3, E flat major, op. 17........ Schumann
Soloist, Mr. Rafael Joseffy.

The Symphonic Suite was played for the first time in Boston on this occasion, and wisely played, for it is as necessary to hear new music as old, but it is a work that does not call for impassioned enthusiasm. The composer does not indulge in occultism; it is easy to follow the narrow train of his thoughts, and in developing them he is less erudite than he wishes to be. He thinks in a spasmodic way, in little gushes, and the wide intervals between the thoughts he fills in with patching in the modern method, but not always with the modern art. When he gets a little bit of melody, which is occasionally vulgar, he does not know what to do with it, and so in his desperation he cuts it off short, and uses patching again.

If one listens to the music and reads the programme at the same time, one will discover that the composer is telling an Arabian Nights' story about the sea and Sinbad's ship, about the Calender-Prince, about the young Prince and the young Princess, and about a festival at Bagdad, that ends in a shipwreck against "a rock surmounted by a bronze warrior." The bronze warrior does not come out very plain in the music; but there is a vivid suggestion of the noise that accompanies a tempest or of a dynamite explosion. The disconnected story is held together by motives; there are the Scheherazade motive, the sea motive, and the wave motive; but it is the Scheherazade motive that the composer chiefly depends on in moments of difficulty, and the careless will accept for profundity that which is characteristic of the absence of thought. At first hearing the work seems superficial and trivial, but as long friendship would make one enjoy even the company of Mr. Hyde, repeated hearings of this symphonic poem might make it not only endurable but even delightful. The work was played with admirable vigor and brilliancy.

Mr. Rafael Joseffy once again demonstrated that he is an interpretative artist of the finest calibre, as well as a master of technique. He was faithful to his composer in making no attempt to force the pianoforte into undue prominence, but the self-reserve was characeristic of the true artist and all of Mr. Joseffy's work belongs to this character. He very naturally and most deservedly won a triumph by his brilliant and most artistic interpretation. Throughout the concert the work of the orchestra was of the highest quality, which is another way of saying that it was done by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Boston Journal.

APRIL 18, 1897.

SYMPHONY NIGHT.

First Performance in Boston of Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade"—Mr. Joseffy Plays the Schumann Piano Concerto.

The program of the 22d Symphony concert in Music Hall last night (Mr. Paur, conductor) was as follows:

Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade," op. 35 ... Rimsky-Korsakoff
(First time in Boston.)
- I. The Sea and Sindbad's Ship:
  - Largo e maestoso (E minor).
  - Allegro non troppo (E major).
- II. The Story of the Calender-Prince:
  - Andantino (B minor).
- III. The Story of the Young Prince and the Young Princess:
  - Andantino quasi Allegretto (G major).
- IV. Festival at Bagdad; the Sinking of Sindbad's Ship:
  - Allegro molto e frenetico (E minor).
  - Vivo (E minor).
  - Allegro (C major, E major).

Concerto for Pianoforte, in A minor, op. 54....................Schumann
Symphony No. 3, in E-flat major, "Rhenish," op. 97....................Schumann

The performance of Rimsky-Korsakoff's Suite was the event of the orchestral season. For here was something new and fresh and original. At times the language was foreign, but never was there any doubt of the man's power, knowledge, imagination, sincerity.

Our acquaintance with Russian music in Boston is confined chiefly to various works by Rubinstein and Tschaikowsky, who are not regarded by the ultra-Russians, or the "Nationals," as true Russian composers, but rather as eclectics. It is true that in 1869 Theodore Thomas led here Dargomyzski's "Kozaczek," and pieces by Glinka and Borodine have been performed at the Symphony concerts. Borodine and Cui have also appeared on the programs of chamber concerts in this city, and orchestral music by Cui was performed by the Philharmonic under Mr. Listemann. But the chief works of Dargomyzski, Balakireff, Rimsky-Korsakoff and Glazounoff are unknown in this city. Symphonies by the latter have awakened much discussion, and one of them was played lately in London.

⁂

I do not know the date of the first performance of "Scheherazade." It was first played in Berlin at a Russian concert, conducted by Safonoff, the director of the Moscow Conservatory, Jan. 23, 1896. It was played at the 32d Tonkünstler-Versammlung of German Societies at Leipsic, May 30, 1896, under the leadership of Nikisch. It was played in Berlin Oct. 2, 1896, under the leadership of Weingartner. It was first played in London, Dec. 5, 1896, under the leadership of Henry J. Wood. It was performed in Dresden, Oct. 9, 1896; in Liége, Feb. 28, 1897.

⁂

This music is as fantastic as an Arabian Night's tale itself, with most astounding notes by Captain Richard Burton. It is program music, but, mark you, without any attempt at panoramic effect, without silly endeavor to follow a long-winded text literatim et verbatim. Scheherazade, the wily, sensuous story-teller, has her motiv, as vaporous and fugitive as a dream. The music that follows each repetition of this motiv—and how ingeniously the motiv is introduced or suggested!—is as a sleep-chasing. She tells of Sinbad—the sailor who is nearer to us than the explorer Nansen—of Sinbad and his ship; of the Calender Prince who found himself in the company of the Porter and Zobeide; of the Young Prince and the Young Princess; of a festival at Bagdad, when in the midst of a riotous dream, crash! Sinbad's ship strikes the magnetic rock. And Scheherazade has at last turned the Sultan from his fell purpose: she, too, is now a figure in a dream; she fades away; her soul dies in that high E on the wondering violin.

Now would you analyze this music? How can you discuss a dream, complain of the looseness in sequence of ideas, speak sorrowfully of the absence of "meaning"?

But if you do insist on analyzing it, you will be surprised to find that the composer knows perfectly well what he is about. He, too, can talk about form, but he is not the slave of form. He has his own melody, wild, fantastic, swooningly sensuous, or droning such as falls from the lips of a white-bearded turbaned old man, garrulous in the sun. You are not used to the melody. But did you not find it refreshing? Did you not, mastered by strange tonalities, forget for almost an hour, Boston, the Public Library, and the East Wind?

Or were you not dazzled by the coloring of this spectacled Oriental, who served once in the Russian Navy? When you looked at the peculiar orchestra of this man, as published in the program-book, had you any idea that such instruments could possibly be grouped so that the effects in Scheherazade would o'ermaster you?

No more interesting, fascinating orchestral work than this has been heard in Boston for several years. Absolute novelty is not in itself the greatest of virtues when it is not accompanied by science or sanity. But here is a brilliant combination of rare musical qualities. Read what I quote in "About Music" this morning, read Mr. Huneker's warning cry, and 'ware the Cossack and his music; for the day will surely come when these wild scales and exotic harmonies, and daring flights of imagination in color, and frank brutalities of expression will be heard and applauded in concert halls wherever there is genuine love of music that soothes and thrills and masters the souls of men and women.

Mr. Paur is to be thanked most heartily for this great pleasure. The music was played with amazing maestria by the superb orchestra, and it was relished keenly by an audience that persisted for a long time in hearty and spontaneous applause. Let us hope that from time to time Mr. Paur will produce other works by the Russian "Nationalists" in music. For Music Hall should welcome music of any nationality that has any reasonable claim for a hearing. And you can no more reckon without Russia in music than you can in literature or politics.

Mr. Joseffy gave a marvelous performance of the Schumann concerto. To make any effect whatever after the tremendous—I use this word advisedly—music of Rimsky-Korsakoff was no light task. Mr. Joseffy, nothing daunted, rose to a great height. It is true he occasionally took liberties with Schumann, but he has the right, and Schumann did not suffer. Always was there the unsurpassable, magical beauty of tone that is peculiar to Mr. Joseffy. And then the ease, the grace, the clarity, the musical feeling, the individuality that spoke with Schumann's voice! Would that Mr. Joseffy visited us frequently. We might then hold the piano in higher esteem.

Philip Hale.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 18, 1897.

The promised symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," by Nicolai Rimsky-Korsakoff, was at last brought forward at the twenty-second Symphony concert. It is indeed a composition of which to say in the favorite phrase of an esteemed contemporary, that one does not know exactly what to write after just a single hearing. It is the work of a man of power, who commands ideality as well as form, sensibility no less than vehemence. It is original beyond all question in its thoughts, its fashions and its independence. But there is so much detail in it, its weaving is so complicated, and it is so often most energetic when one really needs to follow its flying figures most carefully, that, while the general effect is easily and instantly felt as exhilarating and delightful, one still recognizes the need of a further acquaintance. Its four parts deal with the sea and Sinbad's ship; with the Calender-Prince;—with the young Prince and Princess; and with a festival at Bagdad, which mutates to the wreck of the ship upon the magnetic island. The first and last stand for the allegros, the second for the scherzo, and the third for the slow movement. As in the "Harold" symphony of Berlioz, there is a light, pleasant persuasive figure, susceptible to various modulations and moods, and intended as representative of the story-teller, which a solo first violin introduces opportunely into the different movements, and there are other phrases which signify the sea, the wave-motion and the ship. Beauty abounds in delicate and fanciful forms, quaintness is not rare, and there are throughout elements of energy, passion and even grandeur, while in the second movement it would not be difficult to detect a vein of humor. It must be an immensely difficult work to learn and to play; for not only does it contain a great many obligato passages which require unusual execution from such instruments as the horn, the bassoon and the trombone, but the irregularities of entrance, of rhythm and of tempo, must keep the entire orchestra on the qui vive, especially in the lighter movements when the pace is pressed constantly. There are tremendous fulness and sonority in some of the more energetic passages, and the gradual, fateful compulsion of the sea and the mysterious island upon the doomed ship is stately and noble. The orchestra played with wonderful virtuosity, and others beside Mr. Kneisel (who well deserved) might fairly have shared in the praise bestowed upon the solo lines.

The suite was the first number, after which Mr. Joseffy played Schumann's pianoforte concerto quite to perfection. Now that his once superficial elegance of technique has become as the polish upon more solid accomplishment, and that dignity and gravity of expression accompany his graceful, limpid and ever fair-toned execution, it is a pleasure indeed to hear him read from the classic literature of his instrument.

The programme ended with a noble rendering of Schumann's "Rhenish" symphony.

The next programme will be this: Grieg, Suite, "Peer Gynt;" Goetz, Aria from "Taming of the Shrew;" Beethoven, First Three Movements of the Ninth (Choral) Symphony;" Beethoven, Overture, Lenore No. 3. Miss Lena Little will be the soloist.

SATURDAY EVENING

Gazette

ESTABLISHED 1813.

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 25.

The Symphony Concert.

The twenty-third concert of the Symphony Orchestra was given in Music Hall last evening. The programme was:

Suite, "Peer Gynt"....................Grieg
Aria from "Taming of the Shrew"..Grieg
First three movements of 9th Symphony ... Beethoven
Overture, Lenore, No. 3........Beethoven
Soloist, Miss Lena Little.

The programme presents little in the way of novelty, but it was admirably interpreted, the Beethoven works being given with faultless breadth and dignity of style and charming finish. The Grieg suite does not gain any fresh beauties by repetition, and probably the explanation of the phenomenon is not far to see. Miss Lena Little surprised even her friends by the satisfactory, intelligent and artistic manner in which she sang the difficult Goetz aria. A better piece of work has not been heard on our concert stage. The singing was as good on its technical as on its interpretative side, and Miss Little won a most deserved success.

The next and last concert of the season will be devoted to Wagner.

EVENING AND SUNDAY.

THURSDAY, APRIL 22, 1897.

Although music-lovers had been treated to one evening of Wagner through the medium of the Arion club concert on Tuesday evening, they came together in still larger numbers last evening for the last of the Boston Symphony orchestra programs, one which was devoted entirely to Wagner's works. It was the finest offering of the season, discounting even that of the third concert which it seemed at the time it would be hard to surpass. The program was as follows: "Parsifal," prelude; "Tannhauser," overture; "Lohengrin," a, prelude to act I. b. prelude to act III; A "Siegfried" Idyl; "Rienzi," overture; "Siegfried," act II., "Forest Sounds;" "Die Walkure," "Ride of the Walkyries."

Of course it goes without saying that Conductor Paur was seen at his best. He is a devotee of the great German composer, has made a long study of his work and has derived some ideas from this close intimacy. That was seen last evening, when in a very varied program, one that gave as adequate a conception of Wagnerian music as could possibly be had from two hours with as grand an organization as the Boston Symphony orchestra.

It wa sthe largest assemblage of players that there has been here this season, the full strength of the orchestra with the exception of the harp being required in the two overtures. The Tannhauser was read in a masterly way and equally so was the overture to Rienzi, several effects being brought out in the latter that were quite out of the ordinary. But as powerful as were the two overtures and the prelude to the third act of Lohengrin, evidence was given that there was greater depth to the orchestra than were shown in those compositions and the "Siegfried" idyl and the "Forest Sounds" were played with such delicacy that it was hard to understand that this was still Wagnerian or that it was the same orchestra.

With a wildly wonderful rendition of the "Ride of the Walkyries," the program was brought to an end and with it the season which has been as enjoyable as any that has preceded it, not only by reason of the programs but on account of the soloists who have been uniformly good. Conductor Paur was given a flattering reception when he came out first last evening and after the Tannhauser overture, there was a burst of applause that almost surpassed anything previously heard this season. Providence certainly has reason to be proud of its musical season so far as the Boston Symphony orchestra is concerned.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 25, 1897.

(Copyright, 1897, Post Publishing Company.)

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The twenty-third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given in Music Hall last evening. Miss Lena Little was the soloist. The programme consisted of the "Peer Gynt" Suite No. 1, Op. 46, of Edward Grieg, three movements of the ninth symphony and the Leonore, No. 3, overture of Beethoven; also the scena, "My Strength Is Spent," from the "Taming of the Shrew," of Herman Goetz.

The "Peer Gynt" suite is incidental music, written by Grieg to the play of that name of Henrik Ibsen, and the first of two settings to the play. The one played at this concert is the best of the two, is perfectly free as to form, and difficult of analysis. This suite is quite popular through arrangements for the piano and other instruments.

The ninth symphony of Beethoven was played at this concert without the choral movement, probably in this manner for the first time. It does not suffer at these concerts by the omission of the choral movement, which is, so far as the voice treatment is concerned, a monstrosity like the Missa Solemnis, recently given in this city. Of the three movements played, those which are generally the most enjoyed are the second and third, especially the second, which is doubtless one of the best examples of a scherzo ever written. It was an excellent idea to give the ninth symphony in this way; there is then a chance of hearing it more frequently performed if this idea should be adopted in the future.

The third overture to "Leonore" is the best known and the most masterly of the four overtures to "Fidelio." It is generally regarded as the greatest of any of Beethoven's overtures, though many regard the "Coriolanus" equally so. The orchestra played throughout the evening with that wonderful precision and finish that nowadays is always noticeable, and that is the reason why the playing of this orchestra is a revelation and a "thing of joy." Miss Little sang the selection from Goetz's "Taming of the Shrew" very acceptably, and was much applauded. The twenty-fourth concert and last of the season is a Wagner programme (by request), and it includes the prelude to "Parsifal," the "Faust" overture, prelude to Acts 1 and 2 of "Lohengrin," the "Siegfried Idyl," the overture to "Rienzi," the "ride of the Walkyries" and the "Waldweben," from Siegfried. No soloist is announced.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 25, 1897.

The twenty third Symphony programme was simple enough, so far as the orchestra was concerned. It consisted of the usual suite from Grieg's "Peer Gynt" music, the first three movements of Beethoven's choral symphony and his third "Lenore" overture. The performance was remarkable for its accuracy and its perfected elegance; for its extremely sensitive delicacy and for its honest energy and fervor. There were deliciously refined and poetic details in the Grieg, while in the Beethoven both virtuosity and [illegible] rose to the highest pitch. The second number was that scene from Goetz's "Taming of the Shrew" in which Katherine at last acknowledges the futility of contending against Petruchio, and recognizes the upspringing within her of those new and tender sentiments which will lead her to love and obedience soon. The singer was Miss Lena Little, whom we have rarely heard to such excellent advantage. In the recitative that tremolo which has been the constant associate of her vocalization ever since she first came to Boston, exerted its baneful influence, making her tones unstable and her phrasing doubtful. But as she continued on towards the air and entered upon it, her voice, particularly in the upper register, gained warmth and steadiness, insuring definiteness of form and finish of style. And certainly the whole scene bore handsome testimony to her musicianly understanding and artistic appreciation. To her credit be it said that she sang without book, while with mild regret it may be wished that she had used the very acceptable English text instead of the German.

The laet programme is to be taken entirely—by request it is stated—from Wagner. It will stand thus: The "Parsifal" prelude; the "Faust" overture; the preludes to acts I. and III. of "Lohengrin; the "Siegfried Idyl"; the "Rienzi" overture; the "Wood Music" from act II. of "Siegfried," and the "Ride of the Walkyries." That is miscellaneous enough, and there is reason for thankfulness in that it ignores the compeser s marches.

Since Mr. Apthorp has chosen to come out in the programme book in defense of his method of constructing his analysis, a few sentences in reply seem justifiable. Remembering the sound old proverb about self-excuse being equivalent to self-accusation, one has only to turn to Mr. Apthorp's own words to find a perfect arraignment of his system. If an analysis of any kind of work is to be serviceable, it should accompany "pari passu" the demonstration. What good would there be even in a cooking-school, if the recipes were read at one time and the dishes made at another—especially if those recipes were couched in severely technical terms? Yet Mr. Apthorp says that "he has done his best to make his analyses unreadable during the performance of the works so analysed." He has builded wiser than he knew. For he has made a set of analyses which are unreadable—with profit—at any time. To the unskilled in the science of music they are about as comprehensible as Sanscrit, while to the musician they are useless, because he could do at least as well for himself. As a result, Boston has had, we do not hesitate to say, the dryest, most pedantic, least intelligible and least helpful programme-guides that the world sees. Mr. Apthorp has the courage of his convictions, as he needs should have whose convictions are as much in the minority as those of the historic juryman whose eleven obstinate companions would hold out against him. His books have followed a system which would issue a physical geography without maps; would send an army on a campaign without topographical plans; would build a ship by directions and without model or measurement; and would send a captain to sea upon a theoretical dissertation about tides, temperatures and currents, but without charts, compass or table of soundings and bearings. To depend upon it would be like reading a guide-book in Boston, and expecting to find one's way afterwards through the by-ways of Rome or the passes of Switzerland. A hand-book to music should be like any other—capable of giving clear, strong, definite help at the instant when it is needed, and that is when one is face to face with the matter to be observed and understood. There is no occasion to fly off at a tangent and become romantic, visionary, fantastic, which Mr. Apthorp seems to think is the only alternative to his technical formality. His talk about subsequently tracing out in the score the elements which he may have indicated in his merely mechanical and arbitrary way, is sheer folly, because not one in hundreds of Symphony hearers has access to a score—or could decipher it if he had. It is all very pretty to talk about reading scores; but this is almost the last accomplishment of musicians themselves, and we believe that there are very many learned and cultivated men in the profession in this very town who could no more really read the whole extent of a score than they could toss an elephant over a house. The programme-books themselves have been known to describe as from some score features which did not not appear in the study of performance. People talk and puzzle over these books because they are all that can be had; but they lament their density, their uselessness and their texturicality, and compare them, infinitely, to their disadvantage, with the books which are found abroad, in other American cities, at times in the columns of enterprising and intelligent newspapers, and latterly in that little magazine, "The Looker-On." In brief, the books are unbecoming to the concerts, and we hope that another season will see a radical change made from their present false principles.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, APRIL 18, 1897.

SYMPHONY NIGHT.

First Performance in Boston of Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade"—Mr. Joseffy Plays the Schumann Piano Concerto.

The program of the 22d Symphony concert in Music Hall last night (Mr. Paur, conductor) was as follows:

Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade," op. 35 Rimsky-Korsakoff
(First time in Boston.)
I. The Sea and Sindbad's Ship:
  Largo e maestoso (E minor).
  Allegro non troppo (E major).
II. The Story of the Calender-Prince:
  Andantino (B minor).
III. The Story of the Young Prince and the Young Princess:
  Andantino quasi Allegretto (G major).
IV. Festival at Bagdad; the Sinking of Sindbad's Ship:
  Allegro molto e frenetico (E minor).
  Vivo (E minor).
  Allegro (C major, E major).
Concerto for Pianoforte, in A minor, op. 54........Schumann
Symphony No. 3, in E-flat major, "Rhenish," op. 97........Schumann

The performance of Rimsky-Korsakoff's Suite was the event of the orchestral season. For here was something new and fresh and original. At times the language was foreign, but never was there any doubt of the man's power, knowledge, imagination, sincerity.

Our acquaintance with Russian music in Boston is confined chiefly to various works by Rubinstein and Tschaikowsky, who are not regarded by the ultra-Russians, or the "Nationals," as true Russian composers, but rather as eclectics. It is true that in 1869 Theodore Thomas led here Dargomyzski's "Kozaczek," and pieces by Glinka and Borodine have been performed at the Symphony concerts. Borodine and Cui have also appeared on the programs of chamber concerts in this city, and orchestral music by Cui was performed by the Philharmonic under Mr. Listemann. But the chief works of Dargomyzski, Balakireff, Rimsky-Korsakoff and Glazounoff are unknown in this city. Symphonies by the latter have awakened much discussion, and one of them was played lately in London.

⁂

I do not know the date of the first performance of "Scheherazade." It was first played in Berlin at a Russian concert; conducted by Safonoff, the director of the Moscow Conservatory, Jan. 23, 1896. It was played at the 32d Tonkünstler-Versammlung of German Societies at Leipsic, May 30, 1896, under the leadership of Nikisch. It was played in Berlin Oct. 2, 1896, under the leadership of Weingartner. It was first played in London, Dec. 5, 1896, under the leadership of Henry J. Wood. It was performed in Dresden, Oct. 9, 1896; in Liége, Feb. 28, 1897.

⁂

This music is as fantastic as an Arabian Night's tale itself, with most astounding notes by Captain Richard Burten. It is program music, but, mark you, without any attempt at panoramic effect, without silly endeavor to follow a long-winded text literatim et verbatim. Scheherazade, the wily, sensuous story-teller, has her motiv, as vaporous and fugitive as a dream. The music that follows each repetition of this motiv—and how ingeniously the motiv is introduced or suggested!—is as a sleep-chasing. She tells of Sinbad—the sailor who is nearer to us than the explorer Nansen—of Sinbad and his ship; of the Calender Prince who found himself in the company of the Porter and Zobeide; of the Young Prince and the Young Princess; of a festival at Bagdad, when in the midst of a riotous dream, crash! Sinbad's ship strikes the magnetic rock. And Scheherazade has at last turned the Sultan from his fell purpose: she, too, is now a figure in a dream; she fades away; her soul dies in that high E on the wondering violin.

Now would you analyze this music? How can you discuss a dream, complain of the looseness in sequence of ideas, speak sorrowfully of the absence of "meaning"?

But if you do insist on analyzing it, you will be surprised to find that the composer knows perfectly well what he is about. He, too, can talk about form, but he is not the slave of form. He has his own melody, wild, fantastic, swooningly sensuous, or droning such as falls from the lips of a white-bearded turbaned old man, garrulous in the sun. You are not used to the melody. But did you not find it refreshing? Did you not, mastered by strange tonalities, forget for almost an hour, Boston, the Public Library, and the East Wind?

Or were you not dazzled by the coloring of this spectacled Oriental, who served once in the Russian Navy? When you looked at the peculiar orchestra of this man, as published in the program-book, had you any idea that such instruments could possibly be grouped so that the effects in Scheherazade would o'ermaster you?

No more interesting, fascinating orchestral work than this has been heard in Boston for several years. Absolute novelty is not in itself the greatest of virtues when it is not accompanied by science or sanity. But here is a brilliant combination of rare musical qualities. Read what I quote in "About Music" this morning, read Mr. Huneker's warning cry, and 'ware the Cossack and his music; for the day will surely come when these wild scales and exotic harmonies, and daring flights of imagination in color, and frank brutalities of expression will be heard and applauded in concert halls wherever there is genuine love of music that soothes and thrills and masters the souls of men and women.

Mr. Paur is to be thanked most heartily for this great pleasure. The music was played with amazing maestria by the superb orchestra, and it was relished keenly by an audience that persisted for a long time in hearty and spontaneous applause. Let us hope that from time to time Mr. Paur will produce other works by the Russian "Nationalists" in music. For Music Hall should welcome music of any nationality that has any reasonable claim for a hearing. And you can no more reckon without Russia in music than you can in literature or politics.

Mr. Joseffy gave a marvelous performance of the Schumann concerto. To make any effect whatever after the tremendous—I use this word advisedly—music of Rimsky-Korsakoff was no light task. Mr. Joseffy, nothing daunted, rose to a great height. It is true he occasionally took liberties with Schumann, but he has the right, and Schumann did not suffer. Always was there the unsurpassable, magical beauty of tone that is peculiar to Mr. Joseffy. And then the ease, the grace, the clarity, the musical feeling, the individuality that spoke with Schumann's voice! Would that Mr. Joseffy visited us frequently. We might then hold the piano in higher esteem.

Philip Hale.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 18, 1897.

The promised symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," by Nicolai Rimsky-Korsakoff, was at last brought forward at the twenty-second Symphony concert. It is indeed a composition of which to say in the favorite phrase of an esteemed contemporary, that one does not know exactly what to write after just a single hearing. It is the work of a man of power, who commands ideality as well as form, sensibility no less than vehemence. It is original beyond all question in its thoughts, its fashions and its independence. But there is so much detail in it, its weaving is so complicated, and it is so often most energetic when one really needs to follow its flying figures most carefully, that, while the general effect is easily and instantly felt as exhilarating and delightful, one still recognizes the need of a further acquaintance. Its four parts deal with the sea and Sinbad's ship; with the Calender-Prince;—with the young Prince and Princess; and with a festival at Bagdad, which mutates to the wreck of the ship upon the magnetic island. The first and last stand for the allegros, the second for the scherzo, and the third for the slow movement. As in the "Harold" symphony of Berlioz, there is a light, pleasant persuasive figure, susceptible to various modulations and moods, and intended as representative of the story-teller, which a solo first violin introduces opportunely into the different movements, and there are other phrases which signify the sea, the wave-motion and the ship. Beauty abounds in delicate and fanciful forms, quaintness is not rare, and there are throughout elements of energy, passion and even grandeur, while in the second movement it would not be difficult to detect a vein of humor. It must be an immensely difficult work to learn and to play; for not only does it contain a great many obligato passages which require unusual execution from such instruments as the horn, the bassoon and the trombone, but the irregularities of entrance, of rhythm and of tempo, must keep the entire orchestra on the qui vive, especially in the lighter movements when the pace is pressed constantly. There are tremendous fulness and sonority in some of the more energetic passages, and the gradual, fateful compulsion of the sea and the mysterious island upon the doomed ship is stately and noble. The orchestra played with wonderful virtuosity, and others beside Mr. Kneisel (who well deserved) might fairly have shared in the praise bestowed upon the solo lines.

The suite was the first number, after which Mr. Joseffy played Schumann's pianoforte concerto quite to perfection. Now that his once superficial elegance of technique has become as the polish upon more solid accomplishment, and that dignity and gravity of expression accompany his graceful, limpid and ever fair-toned execution, it is a pleasure indeed to hear him read from the classic literature of his instrument.

The programme ended witn a noble rendering of Schumann's "Rhenish" symphony.

The next programme will be this: Grieg, Suite, "Peer Gynt;" Goetz, Aria from "Taming of the Shrew;" Beethoven, First Three Movements of the Ninth (Choral) Symphony;" Beethoven, Overture, Lenore No. 3. Miss Lena Little will be the soloist.

SATURDAY EVENING Gazette

ESTABLISHED 1813.

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 25.

The Symphony Concert.

The twenty-third concert of the Symphony Orchestra was given in Music Hall last evening. The programme was:

Suite, "Peer Gynt"........Grieg
Aria from "Taming of the Shrew"..Grieg
First three movements of 9th Symphony Beethoven
Overture, Lenore, No. 3........Beethoven
Soloist, Miss Lena Little.

The programme presents little in the way of novelty, but it was admirably interpreted, the Beethoven works being given with faultless breadth and dignity of style and charming finish. The Grieg suite does not gain any fresh beauties by repetition, and probably the explanation of the phenomenon is not far to see. Miss Lena Little surprised even her friends by the satisfactory, intelligent and artistic manner in which she sang the difficult Goetz aria, A better piece of work has not been heard on our concert stage. The singing was as good on its technical as on its interpretative side, and Miss Little won a most deserved success.

The next and last concert of the season will be devoted to Wagner.

The Telegram

EVENING AND SUNDAY.

THURSDAY, APRIL 22, 1897.

Although music-lovers had been treated to one evening of Wagner through the medium of the Arion club concert on Tuesday evening, they came together in still larger numbers last evening for the last of the Boston Symphony orchestra programs, one which was devoted entirely to Wagner's works. It was the finest offering of the season, discounting even that of the third concert which it seemed at the time it would be hard to surpass. The program was as follows: "Parsifal," prelude; "Tannhauser," overture; "Lohengrin," a, prelude to act I. b. prelude to act III; A "Siegfried" Idyl; "Rienzi," overture; "Siegfried," act II., "Forest Sounds;" "Die Walkure," "Ride of the Walkyries."

Of course it goes without saying that Conductor Paur was seen at his best. He is a devotee of the great German composer, has made a long study of his work and has derived some ideas from this close intimacy. That was seen last evening, when in a very varied program, one that gave as adequate a conception of Wagnerian music as could possibly be had from two hours with as grand an organization as the Boston Symphony orchestra.

It wa sthe largest assemblage of players that there has been here this season, the full strength of the orchestra with the exception of the harp being required in the two overtures. The Tannhauser was read in a masterly way and equally so was the overture to Rienzi, several effects being brought out in the latter that were quite out of the ordinary. But as powerful as were the two overtures and the prelude to the third act of Lohengrin, evidence was given that there was greater depth to the orchestra than were shown in those compositions and the "Siegfried" idyl and the "Forest Sounds" were played with such delicacy that it was hard to understand that this was still Wagnerian or that it was the same orchestra.

With a wildly wonderful rendition of the "Ride of the Walkyries," the program was brought to an end and with it the season which has been as enjoyable as any that has preceded it, not only by reason of the programs but on account of the soloists who have been uniformly good. Conductor Paur was given a flattering reception when he came out first last evening and after the Tannhauser overture, there was a burst of applause that almost surpassed anything previously heard this season. Providence certainly has reason to be proud of its musical season so far as the Boston Symphony orchestra is concerned.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 25, 1897.
(Copyright, 1897. Post Publishing Company.)

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The twenty-third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given in Music Hall last evening. Miss Lena Little was the soloist. The programme consisted of the "Peer Gynt" Suite No. 1, Op. 46, of Edward Grieg, three movements of the ninth symphony and the Leonore, No. 3, overture of Beethoven; also the scena, "My Strength Is Spent," from the "Taming of the Shrew," of Herman Goetz.

The "Peer Gynt" suite is incidental music, written by Grieg to the play of that name of Henrik Ibsen, and the first of two settings to the play. The one played at this concert is the best of the two, is perfectly free as to form, and difficult of analysis. This suite is quite popular through arrangements for the piano and other instruments.

The ninth symphony of Beethoven was played at this concert without the choral movement, probably in this manner for the first time. It does not suffer at these concerts by the omission of the choral movement, which is, so far as the voice treatment is concerned, a monstrosity like the Missa Solemnis, recently given in this city. Of the three movements played, those which are generally the most enjoyed are the second and third, especially the second, which is doubtless one of the best examples of a scherzo ever written. It was an excellent idea to give the ninth symphony in this way; there is then a chance of hearing it more frequently performed if this idea should be adopted in the future.

The third overture to "Leonore" is the best known and the most masterly of the four overtures to "Fidelio." It is generally regarded as the greatest of any of Beethoven's overtures, though many regard the "Coriolanus" equally so. The orchestra played throughout the evening with that wonderful precision and finish that nowadays is always noticeable, and that is the reason why the playing of this orchestra is a revelation and a "thing of joy." Miss Little sang the selection from Goetz's "Taming of the Shrew" very acceptably, and was much applauded. The twenty-fourth concert and last of the season is a Wagner programme (by request), and it includes the prelude to "Parsifal," the "Faust" overture, prelude to Acts 1 and 2 of "Lohengrin," the "Siegfried Idyl," the overture to "Rienzi," the "ride of the Walkyries" and the "Waldweben," from Siegfried. No soloist is announced.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 25, 1897.

The twenty third Symphony programme was simple enough, so far as the orchestra was concerned. It consisted of the usual suite from Grieg's "Peer Gynt" music, the first three movements of Beethoven's choral symphony and his third "Lenore" overture. The performance was remarkable for its accuracy and its perfected elegance; for its extremely sensitive delicacy and for its honest energy and fervor. There were deliciously refined and poetic details in the Grieg, while in the Beethoven both virtuosity and impetuosity rose to the highest pitch. The second number was that scene from Goetz's "Taming of the Shrew" in which Katherine at last acknowledges the futility of contending against Petruchio, and recognizes the upspringing within her of those new and tender sentiments which will lead her to love and obedience soon. The singer was Miss Lena Little, whom we have rarely heard to such excellent advantage. In the recitative that tremolo which has been the constant associate of her vocalization ever since she first came to Boston, exerted its baneful influence, making her tones unstable and her phrasing doubtful. But as she continued on towards the air and entered upon it, her voice, particularly in the upper register, gained warmth and steadiness, insuring definiteness of form and finish of style. And certainly the whole scene bore handsome testimony to her musicianly understanding and artistic appreciation. To her credit be it said that she sang without book, while with mild regret it may be wished that she had used the very acceptable English text instead of the German.

The laet programme is to be taken entirely—by request it is stated—from Wagner. It will stand thus: The "Parsifal" prelude; the "Faust" overture; the preludes to acts I. and III. of "Lohengrin; the "Siegfried Idyl"; the "Rienzi" overture; the "Wood Music" from act II. of "Siegfried," and the "Ride of the Walkyries." That is miscellaneous enough, and there is reason for thankfulness in that it ignores the compeser s marches.

Since Mr. Apthorp has chosen to come out in the programme book in defense of his method of constructing his analysis, a few sentences in reply seem justifiable. Remembering the sound old proverb about self-excuse being equivalent to self-accusation, one has only to turn to Mr. Apthorp's own words to find a perfect arraignment of his system. If an analysis of any kind of work is to be serviceable, it should accompany "pari passu" the demonstration. What good would there be even in a cooking-school, if the recipes were read at one time and the dishes made at another—especially if those recipes were couched in severely technical terms? Yet Mr. Apthorp says that "he has done his best to make his analyses unreadable during the performance of the works so analysed." He has builded wiser than he knew. For he has made a set of analyses which are unreadable—with profit—at any time. To the unskilled in the science of music they are about as comprehensible as Sanscrit, while to the musician they are useless, because he could do at least as well for himself. As a result, Boston has had, we do not hesitate to say, the dryest, most pedantic, least intelligible and least helpful programme-guides that the world sees. Mr. Apthorp has the courage of his convictions, as he needs should have whose convictions are as much in the minority as those of the historic juryman whose eleven obstinate companions would hold out against him. His books have followed a system which would issue a physical geography without maps; would send an army on a campaign without topographical plans; would build a ship by directions and without model or measurement; and would send a captain to sea upon a theoretical dissertation about tides, temperatures and currents, but without charts, compass or table of soundings and bearings. To depend upon it would be like reading a guide-book in Boston, and expecting to find one's way afterwards through the by-ways of Rome or the passes of Switzerland. A hand-book to music should be like any other—capable of giving clear, strong, definite help at the instant when it is needed, and that is when one is face to face with the matter to be observed and understood. There is no occasion to fly off at a tangent and become romantic, visionary, fantastic, which Mr. Apthorp seems to think is the only alternative to his technical formality. His talk about subsequently tracing out in the score the elements which he may have indicated in his merely mechanical and arbitrary way, is sheer folly, because not one in hundreds of Symphony hearers has access to a score—or could decipher it if he had. It is all very pretty to talk about reading scores; but this is almost the last accomplishment of musicians themselves, and we believe that there are very many learned and cultivated men in the profession in this very town who could no more really read the whole extent of a score than they could toss an elephant over a house. The programme-books themselves have been known to describe as from some score features which did not not appear in the study of performance. People talk and puzzle over these books because they are all that can be had; but they lament their density, their uselessness and their texturicality, and compare them, infinitely, to their disadvantage, with the books which are found abroad, in other American cities, at times in the columns of enterprising and intelligent newspapers, and latterly in that little magazine, "The Looker-On." In brief, the books are unbecoming to the concerts, and we hope that another season will see a radical change made from their present false principles.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 14, 1897.

The program of the twenty-first Symphony concert, given in Music Hall April 10, was as follows:

Tragic Overture, op.81.................................
Four Serious Songs, op. 121...........................
Max Heinrich.
Concerto for violin and 'cello in A minor, op 102..........
Messrs. Kneisel and Schroeder.
Symphony No. 4, E minor, op. 98..........................
....Brahms

The program was printed with heavy mourning lines, cross and perpendicular. There was an unusual luxury of woe. For when Bülow was remembered April 7, 1894, only the line "In memoriam Hans Guido von Bülow," with date of birth and of death, was framed in black. The program was Bülow's Funerale, Beethoven's Heroic Symphony, Molique's Fifth Violin Concerto (second and first movements), and Brahms' Tragic Overture. When the death of Rubinstein was recognized officially in Music Hall—December 15, 1894—the program bore no mourning lines, and the program consisted of the Funeral March from the Heroic Symphony, Rubinstein's Fourth Piano Concerto and Rubinstein's Ocean Symphony in seven movements.

No attention was paid by the Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Paur to the death of either Tschaikowsky or Gounod. Mr. Paur may say, "Gounod was a maker of operas and church music. How could we have honored his memory in a Symphony concert?"

But at the Gewandhaus concert of November 2, 1893, one number of the program was dedicated to Gounod's memory. A march, described as Feierlicher March, by Charles Gounod, was played. This march may or may not have been the Marche Romaine; the point is immaterial; the fact remains that the death of the Frenchman was noticed fitly in Leipsic, in the very temple devoted to the worship of "classical" composers. And even Mr. Bernsdorf, who is generally seized with severe cramps when he is obliged to hear modern music or write about it, paid Gounod a handsome tribute in his review of that concert. Gounod, by the way, wrote two symphonies, and either one might have been a pleasant novelty in Boston.

There was absolutely no excuse for the neglect of decent attention toward Tschaikowsky, who in high imagination, melodic feeling, sense of color and splendor of expression is to my mind superior to Brahms.

Remember I believe that honor should have been paid Brahms, a great composer, whether you regard him with intimate affection or wonder coolly at the solidity of his architecture. I believe that such honor should be awarded any celebrated composer who joins the majority. I do not believe, however, in distinctions that are invidious.

There is in Boston a Brahms cult. This cult is largely a fashionable religion. For some reason or other "leaders in society" affect Brahms and burn incense before his shrine. They chatter about the three B's. They find special delight in hearing his most austere works. I do not believe in the honesty of nine-tenths of these worshipers. They are not musical; they are not equipped for the enjoyment. An ignorant person as well as a musician can find great pleasure in the operas of Wagner. It is not possible for man or woman, ignorant of music, to be addicted passionately to the hearing of Brahms. It has been said—possibly proclaimed at an afternoon tea—that enjoyment of Brahms is a test of intellectuality. It is therefore easy to see why there are so many frenzied worshipers.

On the other hand, Joséphin Péladan—our old friend the Sar—has given a possible explanation. It is not wise to take the Sar too seriously, and yet his strange novels are full of ingenious speculation and acute observations. In Istar he writes thus of Brahms: "His music is the very soul of the Latinized Sclavonian, the gypsy girl who is conscious of herself within the dress of the fashionable woman. Unrestraint that keeps on her corset, felinity which risks only half way the touch of sin, the woman's paw skimming the cream of sensations, the giving of an outline to adultery, the reserves of an unrestraint which reflection cuts short, hesitation in enthusiasm, the lyricism of timorous desire—such is Brahms. Other composers express the woman who defends herself against love. He tells of the woman at the same time pusillanimous and spirited. Whatever the opus may be you recognize the heart which consented, the mind which alone recoiled; and singular to relate, this musician, who has taken themes of love, free, mad, made with the song of the wind in the hair of a savage woman who combs herself with a nail, has expressed incomparably that which gives the whole of worldliness to love—the fear of being compromised or deceived. Schumann unrolls loves of complete evolutions. Chopin, after torpidity, sets regrets vibrating to the accent of remorse, or you hear the gnashings of furious, unsatisfied desires. Brahms by his profound skill infuses into the rubric of the contrapunist the animal spasm; the hoarseness of longing feigns finical affectation; he has complicated the naturalness of the gypsy and corseted the distinction of her arched loins, and these crackings of the corset and the play of a quivering torso make this master one of the great perverts in music."

He then adds a paragraph which, alas, I must not translate literally. Let me paraphrase it: "The man and woman who play four-hand pieces of Brahms for an hour fall into a state of unconsciousness and irresponsibility which embarrases the casuist. For the end of such music would be only the uncheckable desire of a last vibration, a rinforzando of expansion."

* * *

The concert to me seemed interminable and dull. The Serious songs—is not the title tautological?— were sung here for the first time. You have heard them in New York, sung by Mr. Bispham, who produced them in London October 31, 1896, at his farewell concert. It was a mistake to introduce them on this occasion, for they are a proof of Brahms' failing powers during the last year or two years of his life.

Perhaps the nobility of the words defies musical setting. Take for instance the text of the third song: "O Death, how bitter is the remembrance of thee to a man that liveth at rest in his possessions, unto the man that hath nothing to vex him, and that hath prosperity in all things; yea, unto him

---

Boston Transcript

TUESDAY, APRIL 20, 1897.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Concert

The programme of the twenty-second Symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Rimsky-Korsakoff: Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade," opus 35.
(First time in Boston.)
Schumann: Concerto for pianoforte, in A minor, opus 54.
Schumann: Symphony No. 3, in E-flat major, opus 97, "Rhenish."
Mr. Rafael Joseffy was the pianist.

It was plainly worth while to postpone giving the Rimsky-Korsakoff suite until last Saturday; the work is essentially more of an orchestral virtuoso-piece than anything we have yet heard in this city, and Mr. Paur was quite right in saying, two or three weeks ago: "If we cannot give a virtuoso performance of it, we will not give it at all." As we have hinted, such a performance as was given last Saturday was well worth waiting for; it was superb at every point, just the sort of performance the work itself demands. As for the composition, we hardly think that any of us Occidentals can quite fully appreciate it. In listening to it we were more than ever impressed with the fallacy of the old saying that music is a universal language. The Russian has, in any case, strong Asiatic—that is, Oriental—affiliations; and, when a Russian extremist, like Rimsky-Korsakoff, sets out to treat so intrinsically Oriental a subject as anything from the "Arabian Nights," something very Eastern indeed may be expected. And Rimsky-Korsakoff certainly wears his Orientalism very easily, gracefully, and as to the manner born. Unlike the musically Orientalizing Frenchman or German, he has little to do with the now tolerably familiar "Oriental chromatic mode"—that so-to-speak "double-minor" scale, so full of augmented intervals—which most of us have learnt to associate with the East; he writes, in general, in quite other Eastern modes, the difference between which and our ordinary major and minor scales is far more subtile, but which have nevertheless a very marked individuality of their own. Only these modes are unfamiliar to our Western ears—quite as much so as those of the Gregorian Chaunt—and it is exceedingly difficult for us to feel at home in them; what strikes us first in the music written in them is a certain exotic quaintness, which is probably far enough from the composer's intention, he being so used to them that he sees no quaintness in them at all. Another marked and inveterate characteristic of this music, to our ears, is its dismal melancholy; no doubt this side of it does not strike the Oriental in the least, but, no matter how nimble the tempo nor how lively the rhythm, every phrase seems to us to speak of naught but Cimmerian gloom and black despair. In listening to it, we feel like Mr. Lillyvick, who could not be persuaded that French was not a very doleful language. We have to listen to this "Scheherazade" like strangers, not well up in the dialect; we have to make all sorts of allowances for its exotic quality. Making such allowances, however, we should say that this "Scheherazade" of Rimsky-Korsakoff's was one of the most genial, picturesque and truly poetic new compositions that we have heard for a good while. It is all perfectly free in form; but it all seems musically coherent, stoutly knit, and well balanced; each one of the four movements is a vivid picture. It all seems quite naturally written, with nothing far-fetched or painfully sought after. The instrumentation is absolutely original, and as beautiful as it is new. Upon the whole, we hail "Scheherazade" as a really valuable addition to our repertory, as a work which will be heard again with delight.

Schumann's great "Cologne" symphony might have been better played. Indeed it has been better played by our orchestra before. For one thing, we do not think some of the changes introduced by Br. Paur—substituting staccato bowing in the violins for Schumann's characteristic tremolo—were felicitous. Then there was too much toying with the rhythm.

Of Mr. Joseffy's playing of the Schumann concerto—not heard at the symphony concerts for over four years—it may be said that it was an astoundingly beautiful piece of pianoforte playing. His exquisite beauty of touch, the perfect clearness of his technique and phrasing, were nothing but delightful. His conception of the work is another matter, and one concerning which we do not care to say very much, for the style in which he was accompanied by the orchestra did not help him to realize it. He is the first pianist we can remember who has taken Schumann's "Allegro affettuoso" in the first movement au pied de la lettre; perhaps pianists in general err in putting somewhat too much of passion into this movement; still we think Mr. Joseffy goes too far in the other direction, and lets the "affectionateness" of the music degenerate at times into absolute "coochy-cum-coochy." And, in the finale, if Mr. Joseffy calls his tempo "Allegro vivace," we should like to know what he calls "Allegro moderato"? He does many exceedingly strong and graceful things in this movement, but plays it without any brilliancy. He was, however, rapturously applauded and recalled at the end.

The next programme is: Grieg, suite from "Peer Gynt"; Goetz, aria from "Taming of the Shrew"; Beethoven, three orchestral movements from symphony No. 9, in D minor, opus 125; Beethoven, overture to "Leonore," No. 3, opus 72. Miss Lena Little will be the singer.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 14, 1897.

The program of the twenty-first Symphony concert, given in Music Hall April 10, was as follows:

Tragic Overture, op. 81 ....Brahms
Four Serious Songs, op. 121
Max Heinrich.
Concerto for violin and 'cello in A minor, op 102
Messrs. Kneisel and Schroeder.
Symphony No. 4, E minor, op. 98

The program was printed with heavy mourning lines, cross and perpendicular. There was an unusual luxury of woe. For when Bülow was remembered April 7, 1894, only the line "In memoriam Hans Guido von Bülow," with date of birth and of death, was framed in black. The program was Bülow's Funerale, Beethoven's Heroic Symphony, Molique's Fifth Violin Concerto (second and first movements), and Brahms' Tragic Overture. When the death of Rubinstein was recognized officially in Music Hall—December 15, 1894—the program bore no mourning lines, and the program consisted of the Funeral March from the Heroic Symphony, Rubinstein's Fourth Piano Concerto and Rubinstein's Ocean Symphony in seven movements.

No attention was paid by the Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Paur to the death of either Tschaikowsky or Gounod. Mr. Paur may say, "Gounod was a maker of operas and church music. How could we have honored his memory in a Symphony concert?"

But at the Gewandhaus concert of November 2, 1893, one number of the program was dedicated to Gounod's memory. A march, described as Feierlicher March, by Charles Gounod, was played. This march may or may not have been the Marche Romaine; the point is immaterial; the fact remains that the death of the Frenchman was noticed fitly in Leipsic, in the very temple devoted to the worship of "classical" composers. And even Mr. Bernsdorf, who is generally seized with severe cramps when he is obliged to hear modern music or write about it, paid Gounod a handsome tribute in his review of that concert. Gounod, by the way, wrote two symphonies, and either one might have been a pleasant novelty in Boston.

There was absolutely no excuse for the neglect of decent attention toward Tschaikowsky, who in high imagination, melodic feeling, sense of color and splendor of expression is to my mind superior to Brahms.

Remember I believe that honor should have been paid Brahms, a great composer, whether you regard him with intimate affection or wonder coolly at the solidity of his architecture. I believe that such honor should be awarded any celebrated composer who joins the majority. I do not believe, however, in distinctions that are invidious.

There is in Boston a Brahms cult. This cult is largely a fashionable religion. For some reason or other "leaders in society" affect Brahms and burn incense before his shrine. They chatter about the three B's. They find special delight in hearing his most austere works. I do not believe in the honesty of nine-tenths of these worshipers. They are not musical; they are not equipped for the enjoyment. An ignorant person as well as a musician can find great pleasure in the operas of Wagner. It is not possible for man or woman, ignorant of music, to be addicted passionately to the hearing of Brahms. It has been said—possibly proclaimed at an afternoon tea—that enjoyment of Brahms is a test of intellectuality. It is therefore easy to see why there are so many frenzied worshipers.

On the other hand, Joséphin Péladan—our old friend the Sar—has given a possible explanation. It is not wise to take the Sar too seriously, and yet his strange novels are full of ingenious speculation and acute observations. In Istar he writes thus of Brahms: "His music is the very soul of the Latinized Sclavonian, the gypsy girl who is conscious of herself within the dress of the fashionable woman. Unrestraint that keeps on her corset, felinity which risks only half way the touch of sin, the woman's paw skimming the cream of sensations, the giving of an outline to adultery, the reserves of an unrestraint which reflection cuts short, hesitation in enthusiasm, the lyricism of timorous desire—such is Brahms. Other composers express the woman who defends herself against love. He tells of the woman at the same time pusillanimous and spirited. Whatever the opus may be you recognize the heart which consented, the mind which alone recoiled; and singular to relate, this musician, who has taken themes of love, free, mad, made with the song of the wind in the hair of a savage woman who combs herself with a nail, has expressed incomparably that which gives the whole of worldliness to love—the fear of being compromised or deceived. Schumann unrolls loves of complete evolutions. Chopin, after torpidity, sets regrets vibrating to the accent of remorse, or you hear the gnashings of furious, unsatisfied desires. Brahms by his profound skill infuses into the rubric of the contrapunist the animal spasm; the hoarseness of longing feigns finical affectation; he has complicated the naturalness of the gypsy and corseted the distinction of her arched loins, and these crackings of the corset and the play ot a quivering torso make this master one of the great perverts in music."

He then adds a paragraph which, alas, I must not translate literally. Let me paraphrase it: "The man and woman who play four-hand pieces of Brahms for an hour fall into a state of unconsciousness and irresponsibility which embarrases the casuist. For the end of such music would be only the uncheckable desire of a last vibration, a rinforzando of expansion."

* * *

The concert to me seemed interminable and dull. The Serious songs—is not the title tautological?— were sung here for the first time. You have heard them in New York, sung by Mr. Bispham, who produced them in London October 31, 1896, at his farewell concert. It was a mistake to introduce them on this occasion, for they are a proof of Brahms' failing powers during the last year or two years of his life.

Perhaps the nobility of the words defies musical setting. Take for instance the text of the third song: "O Death, how bitter is the remembrance of thee to a man that liveth at rest in his possessions, unto the man that hath nothing to vex him, and that hath prosperity in all things; yea, unto him

---

Boston Transcript

TUESDAY, APRIL 20, 1897.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Concert

The programme of the twenty-second Symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Rimsky-Korsakoff: Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade," opus 35.
(First time in Boston.)
Schumann: Concerto for pianoforte, in A minor, opus 54.
Schumann: Symphony No. 3, in E-flat major, opus 97, "Rhenish."
Mr. Rafael Joseffy was the pianist.

It was plainly worth while to postpone giving the Rimsky-Korsakoff suite until last Saturday; the work is essentially more of an orchestral virtuoso-piece than anything we have yet heard in this city, and Mr. Paur was quite right in saying, two or three weeks ago: "If we cannot give a virtuoso performance of it, we will not give it at all." As we have hinted, such a performance as was given last Saturday was well worth waiting for; it was superb at every point, just the sort of performance the work itself demands. As for the composition, we hardly think that any of us Occidentals can quite fully appreciate it. In listening to it we were more than ever impressed with the fallacy of the old saying that music is a universal language. The Russian has, in any case, strong Asiatic—that is, Oriental—affiliations; and, when a Russian extremist, like Rimsky-Korsakoff, sets out to treat so intrinsically Oriental a subject as anything from the "Arabian Nights," something very Eastern indeed may be expected. And Rimsky-Korsakoff certainly wears his Orientalism very easily, gracefully, and as to the manner born. Unlike the musically Orientalizing Frenchman or German, he has little to do with the now tolerably familiar "Oriental chromatic mode"—that so-to-speak "double-minor" scale, so full of augmented intervals—which most of us have learnt to associate with the East; he writes, in general, in quite other Eastern modes, the difference between which and our ordinary major and minor scales is far more subtile, but which have nevertheless a very marked individuality of their own. Only these modes are unfamiliar to our Western ears—quite as much so as those of the Gregorian Chaunt—and it is exceedingly difficult for us to feel at home in them; what strikes us first in the music written in them is a certain exotic quaintness, which is probably far enough from the composer's intention, he being so used to them that he sees no quaintness in them at all. Another marked and inveterate characteristic of this music, to our ears, is its dismal melancholy; no doubt this side of it does not strike the Oriental in the least; but, no matter how nimble the tempo nor how lively the rhythm, every phrase seems to us to speak of naught but Cimmerian gloom and black despair. In listening to it, we feel like Mr. Lillyvick, who could not be persuaded that French was not a very doleful language. We have to listen to this "Scheherazade" like strangers, not well up in the dialect; we have to make all sorts of allowances for its exotic quality. Making such allowances, however, we should say that this "Schehenazade" of Rimsky-Korsakoff's was one of the most genial, picturesque and truly poetic new compositions that we have heard for a good while. It is all perfectly free in form; but it all seems musically coherent, stoutly knit, and well balanced; each one of the four movements is a vivid picture. It all seems quite naturally written, with nothing farfetched or painfully sought after. The instrumentation is absolutely original, and as beautiful as it is new. Upon the whole, we hail "Scheherazade" as a really valuable addition to our repertory, as a work which will be heard again with delight.

Schumann's great "Cologne" symphony might have been better played. Indeed it has been better played by our orchestra before. For one thing, we do not think some of the changes introduced by Br. Paur—substituting staccato bowing in the violins for Schumann's characteristic tremolo—were felicitous. Then there was too much toying with the rhythm.

Of Mr. Joseffy's playing of the Schumann concerto—not heard at the symphony concerts for over four years—it may be said that it was an astoundingly beautiful piece of pianoforte playing. His exquisite beauty of touch, the perfect clearness of his technique and phrasing, were nothing but delightful. His conception of the work is another matter, and one concerning which we do not care to say very much, for the style in which he was accompanied by the orchestra did not help him to realize it. He is the first pianist we can remember who has taken Schumann's "Allegro affettuoso" in the first movement au pied de la lettre; perhaps pianists in general err in putting somewhat too much of passion into this movement; still we think Mr. Joseffy goes too far in the other direction, and lets the "affectionateness" of the music degenerate at times into absolute "coochy-cum-coochy." And, in the finale, if Mr. Joseffy calls his tempo "Allegro vivace," we should like to know what he calls "Allegro moderato"? He does many exceedingly strong and graceful things in this movement, but plays it without any brilliancy. He was, however, rapturously applauded and recalled at the end.

The next programme is: Grieg, suite from "Peer Gynt"; Goetz, aria from "Taming of the Shrew"; Beethoven, three orchestral movements from symphony No. 9, in D minor, opus 125; Beethoven, overture to "Leonore," No. 3, opus 72. Miss Lena Little will be the singer.

hat is yet able to receive meat! O Death, acceptable is hy sentence unto the needy, and unto him whose strength aileth, that is now in the last age, and is vexed with all hings, and to him that despaireth, and hath lost patience!
Fear not the sentence of death, remember them that have een before thee, and that come after; for this is the sen-ence of the Lord over all flesh." Oh, the aimlessness, the agueness, the inability to find the fitting phrase in these ongs! Nor is there a mood created. Nor is there the suggestion of that which is tragic, or mournfully beautiful, or gloomily pessimistic, or at the last (in the song set to verses rom the famous chapter in First Corinthians) hopeful or resolute in the piano part. Serious is here synonymous with tedious. These songs were like unto a rambling, ill considered, perfunctory prayer at a funeral—a prayer that enlarges the grief of the mourners. Mr. Heinrich declaimed hem with an evident sense of responsibility, but his most disagreeable mannerisms were displayed in full, and his vocal deficiencies were exposed as in a shop window. The piano accompaniment of Mr. Paur was dry, harsh, rigid.
It is only just to add that these songs were applauded heartily, and the singer was recalled. If these songs had been written by the talented young organist, Mr. Thomas Bourdon, of Sandown, N. H., would Mr. Paur have allowed hem to be sung on another occasion, or would Mr. Heinrich have deigned to declaim them? Mighty is the fetich of a name!

Messrs. Kneisel and Schroeder played most admirably, and the second movement of the concerto gave true pleasure.

* * *

The Abbey, Schoeffel & Grau Company was at Mechanics' Building Auditorium last week. The performances were Siegfried, April 5 (Jean de Reszké, Ed. de Reszké, Mrs.
Litvinne, Miss Olitzka, Miss Traubmann, Hubbenet, Bispham, Viviani); Faust, April 6 (Calvé, Mrs. Mantelli, Cre-monini, Plançon, Ancona); Lohengrin, April 7 (Jean de Reszké, Ed. de Reszké, Mrs. Litvinne, Miss Olitzka, Bispham, De Vries); Carmen, April 8 (Calvé, Mrs. de Vere, Salignac, Lassalle); Martha, April 9 (Marie Engle, Mrs.
Mantelli, Cremonini, Ed. de Reszké); Faust, the afternoon f April 10 (Calvé, Mrs. Mantelli, Jean de Reszké, Ed. de Reszké and Campanari.

The largest audience was at the matinée yesterday afternoon. It was enormous. Siegfried and Martha drew the smallest houses. Although Calvé sang Marguerite Tuesday night for the first time in Boston, the audience was nly of fair size, as audiences are reckoned in the home of ertilizers and steam ploughs. The house was fair the ight of Lohengrin. Carmen drew a larger audience.

To me the two features of the performance of Siegfried were the orchestra led by Mr. Seidl and the Wotan of Edouard de Reszké. I have not heard of late years such a satisfactory—that's a cold word—such a superb orchestral performance in Siegfried as that inspired by Mr. Seidl's art nd blood. Ed. de Reszké almost made me doubt whether Wotan after all is the supreme bore in opera. Miss Olitzka has gained mightily in tone, control of tone, breadth of style.
Her Erda was very impressive. Jean de Reszké sang the music of Siegfried extremely well. His dramatic imperonation was neither sympathetic nor interesting. It was oo genteel. His Siegfried surely dressed for dinner. I hould not have been surprised if he had thrown off his isguise at any moment and appeared as a real prince. He as a talent for love-making, and he was most effective in he last act. As Siegfried with the bear, the companion of Mime, the unsophisticated, brusque, elemental youth, his abor, preparation, endeavor were too apparent. The im-ersonation lacked freshness, spontaneity, authority. Mrs.
Litvinne is a singer of experience and an actress versed in outine work. She is not a sympathetic person.

* * *

The event of the week was Calvé's appearance as Maruerite. Her success was overwhelming. For the first me since Pauline Lucca visited us have we seen a Maruerite of flesh and blood and passion. Her singing of the

Mr. Harvey Worthington Loomis. Like t tertainments by these clever people, the fash was highly entertained, and among the list

Mr. and Mrs. D. P. W. McMullen, Mrs. Frank
Wheeler, Maurice Arnold, Mrs. Dimock, Miss
Wright Gregory, Mrs. William R. Bunker, Miss I quests. Madame Carreño graciously conser performed several selections by Chopin an all before her Marguerite a still greater work of art.

* * *

"Marta, Marta!" It was a pleasure, how Marie Engle, who sang throughout delightfully of tone, with vocal skill. Her singing of The Summer was refreshingly free from sentim seems a pity that this capable American artist cross the Atlantic to obtain full recognition
Mr. Bispham's Tristan was evidently a first a

PH

◆

Boston Music Notes.

A

There will be a recital by the piano pupils of Buckingham and the vocal pupils of Mr. Fra in Association Hall this afternoon at half p
Emma Mathies, Miss Bessie Alden, Miss Pa
rive, Miss Ethelberta Hasbrook, Miss Loui
Miss Alice V. Burns, Mrs. Amy Bagg, Mr.
Wilson will take part.

Mrs. I. P. Morrill's next reception will be on afternoon, April 14, from 4 to 6. Mr. Charles F will be the guest of honor, and will recite sever humorous pieces. Mr. Adams' daughter is Morrill's pupils, and is a very talented girl.

Jesse Woodberry & Co. exhibited the two organs they have recently finished on the a Thursday and Friday at their factory in Al
Several of the well-known organists of the city to test the instruments.

Mrs. Francis A. M. Bird's pupil, Miss Sara M an interesting program in Chickering Hall on evening. Miss Anna Miller Wood sang two songs.

Mr. Edward Rosé will sail from New York o
the North German Lloyd steamer Frederick th
Bremen, to be at Bayreuth in time for the firs rehearsal on June 15. Returning he will arrive

Music Hall: Boston Sym

The programme of the tw phony concert, given in th
Saturday evening, was as fol
Rimsky-Korsakoff: Symphonic Su
opus 35.
(First time in Bos
Schumann: Concerto for piano
opus 54.
Schumann: Symphony No. 3, in "Rhenish."
Mr. Rafael Joseffy was

It was plainly worth w giving the Rimsky-Korsako
Saturday; the work is ess an orchestral virtuoso-piec we have yet heard in this c was quite right in sayin weeks ago: "If we canno performance of it, we will n
As we have hinted, such a was given last Saturday waiting for; it was superb just the sort of performanc demands. As for the comp think that any of us Occ fully appreciate it. In were more than ever impr lacy of the old saying tha versal language. The Ru case, strong Asiatic—that isations; and, when a Russ Rimsky-Korsakoff, sets c trinsically Oriental a su from the "Arabian Night
Eastern indeed may be ex sky-Korsakoff certainly v ism very easily, graceful manner born. Unlike the alizing Frenchman or Ge to do with the now toler ental chromatic mode"
"double-minor" scale, so intervals—which most of associate with the East;
eral, in quite other East
ference between which major and minor scales i but which have neverthe individuality of their modes are unfamiliar to quite as much so as thos
Chaunt—and it is excee us to feel at home in the first in the music writte tain exotic quaintness, far enough from the co
he being so used to the quaintness in them at all and inveterate character to our ears, is its dism doubt this side of it does ental in the least; but, n the tempo nor how lively phrase seems to us to s Cimmerian gloom and listening to it, we feel who could not be pers was not a very doleful to listen to this " strangers, not well up have to make all sorts o exotic quality. Makin however, we should say nazade" of Rimsky-Ko the most genial, pictures new compositions that good while. It is all pe but it all seems musica knit, and well balanced; movements is a vivid p quite naturally written fetched or painfully so strumentation is absolu beautiful as it is new. hail "Scheherazade" a addition to our reperto will be heard again wit

Schumann's great " might have been bette has been better played fore. For one thing, w of the changes introduc stituting staccato bowi
Schumann's characte felicitous. Then there ing with the rhythm.

Of Mr. Joseffy's play concerto—not heard a certs for over four y that it was an astoun of pianoforte playing.
of touch, the perfect c nique and phrasing, v lightful. His concep another matter, and we do not care to sa style in which he was orchestra did not help is the first pianist we has taken Schumann's in the first movement perhaps pianists in g somewhat too much movement; still we th too far in the other c
"affectionateness" of at times into absolute
And, in the finale, if tempo "Allegro vivac know what he calls
He does many exceedi ful things in this m without any brillianc rapturously applaude end.

The next programm
"Peer Gynt"; Goetz of the Shrew"; Beet movements from sy minor, opus 125; B
"Leonore," No. 3, op will be the singer.

Symphony Concert.

The closing concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last evening at Infantry Hall before the largest audience of the season, if not, indeed, the largest that the orchestra has ever played to in this city. The fact is a significant one, as there was no soloist, and the programme was made up entirely of excerpts and arrangements from the works of Richard Wagner. The numbers were as follows: "Parsifal," prelude; "Tannhauser," overture; "Lohengrin," (a) prelude to Act I., (b) prelude to Act III.; a "Siegfried" Idyl; "Rienzi," overture; "Siegfried," Act II., "Forest Sounds," "Die Walkure," "Ride of the Walkyries."

It may as well be said at once that, in all the years of the Symphony Orchestra's visits here, and by no means forgetting the many brilliant performances with which it has delighted us, we have never listened to such superb playing as that of last night. Every man seemed fairly inspired, and the result was such a revelation of sustained energy, wonderful shades of nuance and virtuosity in ensemble playing as even this remarkable band has never before revealed. Whether this was due to the inspiration of the great audience, or to love and reverence for the music of the mighty master, or to both or neither, the fact remains that the season was wound up in a veritable blaze of glory, and that demonstrations of applause could but faintly represent the impression produced upon the fortunate listeners.

No attempt was made to present a chronological make-up to the programme, which began with Wagner's latest work and presented near the end the overture to his earliest opera. While this might constitute a grievance to those who set great store by the orderly and consistent arrangement of programmes, the element of contrast was well served by the procedure. The beautiful number which opened the concert would not have delighted the audience if strict attention were paid to Wagner's desire that his music should not be presented in any fragmentary form; for the right of stage performance of "Parsifal" belongs exclusively to the festival theatre in Bayreuth, and the drama is not produced elsewhere. Its dreamy and beautiful character was wonderfully brought out by conductor Paur and his players. The brilliant and familiar "Tannhauser" overture received a remarkable rendition, and aroused the most enthusiastic and prolonged applause. So, too, with the following numbers, the fiery prelude to the third act of "Lohengrin" being played with the most astounding fire and brilliancy. And so the whole programme might be recounted if the critic's stock of appropriate adjectives would hold out. The wonderful ride of the Valkyries made a fitting close to the concert. Shorn though it is, merely as an orchestral number, of the vocal element and scenic accessories which lend vividness to its meaning in the drama, it remains a remarkable and impressive piece of music. No diminution was apparent, in its playing, of the superb vigor and energy which characterized the rest of the performance. Mr. Paur conducted the whole programme with evident relish and the greatest sympathy and skill.

Coming upon the heels of the Wagner performance of the evening before, the concert proved conclusively by the unusual attendance that the music of the greatest of modern masters is both appreciated and liked by our concertgoers. The increase in attendance in this and the past season, and the evident interest taken here in these grand concerts, warrants the suggestion that the management of the orchestra favor us with an increase in the number given yearly. We do not doubt that a scheme of eight or even ten concerts would find a liberal patronage as the half-dozen we now have, certainly the indications are all that way, and the matter is worth considering by those in charge of the orchestra.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 21, 1897.

[illegible] by Schopenhauer), Massimilla Doni, Sarrasine—that most horrible of studies.

But Mr. Robert, confining himself to Gambara, discovers again that Balzac in 1837 foresaw Wagner. And this preface is of real interest.

He finds him discussing Beethoven in almost the very language of Wagner. He finds this phrase, "the sphere where plastic works beget themselves by processes of imitation," essentially Wagnerian. So is this phrase: "There where other arts hoop our thoughts by fixing them on a determined subject, music unchains them on the entire nature for it is able to express it to us." Passages about Meyerbeer might have been written by Wagner. And here is a great thought of Gambara concerning the music drama: "My music has for its end a depicturing of national life in its highest condition. The composer who sings for the sake of singing is an artisan, not an artist."

* * *

The program of the twenty-second Symphony concert, given last night in Music Hall, was as follows:

Symphonic suite, Scheherazade, op. 35.....Nicolai Rimsky-Korsakoff
(First time in Boston.)
The Sea and Sindbad's ship:
Largo e maestoso (E minor), 2-2, 4-4.
Allegro non troppo (E major), 6-4.
The Story of the Calender-Prince: Andantino (B minor), 3-8.
The Story of the Young Prince and the Young Princess:
Andantino quasi allegretto (G major), 6-8.
Festival at Bagdad; the Sinking of Sindbad's Ship:
Allegro molto e frenetico (E minor), 6-8.
Vivo (E minor), 2-8, (6-16, 3-8).
Allegro (C major, E major), 6-4.
Concerto for piano in A minor..............................Schumann
Mr. Joseffy.
Symphony No. 3 in E flat, Rhenish.........................Schumann

The program book says Rimsky-Korsakoff was born May 9–21, 1844, and I suppose Mr. Apthorp followed Riemann. Belaieff's catalogue says the composer was born March 6–18, 1844, and the probability is that the catalogue is correct.

In 1869 Theodore Thomas led here Dargomyzski's Kozaczek. Pieces by Glinka and Borodine have been played at Symphony concerts. Pieces by Cui have also been played here, but with the exception of Balakireff's Slamey, the Oriental fantasia for piano, we know as little of his works as of those by Rimsky-Korsakoff and Glazounoff, and other Nationalists, who look upon Tschaikowsky as an eclectic and not a truly national composer. You have been more fortunate in New York. You have heard Rimsky-Korsakoff's Antar, and, I believe, his Capriccio Espagnol.

* * *

It was a rare and great pleasure to listen to this suite, which was played superbly by the orchestra and led by Mr. Paur with keen appreciation of its wealth of exotic beauty and wild strength. To praise the performance of any one man in the orchestra seems invidious, for each member was a virtuoso. This suite, abounding in uncommon difficulties in rhythm and in special difficulties for certain instruments, was played with an abandon and gorgeous tonal brilliancy that I have never heard equaled in any concert room or opera house.

* * *

Nor can I speak in terms of moderate rapture concerning the music itself. Its effect was overwhelming.

Scheherazade has suggested music before this. I remember a sparkling overture thus named written by Heinrich Urban, of Berlin. But never, I am sure, did the fantastic spirit of the Arabian Nights enter so fully into the soul of a composer and take hold of his imagination as in the case of Nicolaus Andrejewitsch Rimsky-Korsakoff.

This suite defies, yet courts analysis. The leading motiv—the Scheherazade theme—keeps appearing in the four movements; and how ingeniously it is treated! The other themes are striking, and when they are used it is not merely for contrapuntal display, for there is dramatic intensity. And do not be deceived by the thought of Wild Russia and suspect absence of form. This spectacled officer of marines has written treatises as well as music. He knows his grammar so well that he can disregard it when he plots some gigantic stroke.

Program music of the true kind. No fatuous attempt to follow literatim et verbatim a long winded text. Scheherazada tells of Sinbad and his Ship; Sinbad, who set sail

---

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, APRIL 25, 1897.

Miss Lena Little Soloist at the Symphony Concert.

Mr Paur's program for last week's Symphony concert was of a conservative character containing no musical novelties. Miss Lena Little alto, sang an aria from "Taming of the Shrew," by Goetz, and the orchestral selections were the Grieg suite No. 1 from "Peer Gynt," three movements from Beethoven's ninth symphony, and his "Leonore" No. 3 overture. Miss Little interpreted the Katherine soliloquy very acceptably, although she was not quite equal to the passionate exclamations beginning "Are women's weapons only made of straw?" The introduction was sung with excellent expression, and the tender emotions of the closing verses were skilfully phrased and given with good effect. Her voice was true to pitch, and she used it without exaggerating the fortissimo passages of the aria. Miss Little was presented with some handsome floral tributes after she had been recalled to the platform.

It is not necessary to mention in detail the orchestra's performance of the Beethoven and Grieg numbers. They are familiar works to symphony patrons, and the past enconiums given to the players need only to be repeated now, for the interpretations were up to the standard of former years. Notably good was the flute playing in the first movement and the entrancing second, for muted strings, was as fine an example of the proficiency of this department of the band as has been heard this season. In fact it nearly received an encore, the audience only being appeased when Mr Paur had bowed half a dozen acknowledgments for the enthusiastic and applausive marks of commendation.

The three movements from Beethoven's ninth symphony were grandly performed, the manifold characteristics in melody and intricate elaborations being smoothly and sympathetically presented. The long coda of the first part was a brilliant example of sustained ensemble work and the eight themes were beautifully interwoven, undue prominence not being given to any of the phrases by the instruments for which the melody is scored. The curious "tune" of the second movement was capitally played. Sir Arthur Sullivan has used this as a basis for the lord chancellor's song in the last act of "Iolanthe." The wood winds and horns did specially good work in the third part of the symphony.

The Leonore overture received admirable treatment. Another good word is due the flutist for his solo bits and the invisible trumpet calls were introduced in perfect tempo. The jubilant finale went with splendid vigor and resonance.

The closing program of the season will be given this week and will consist of selections from Wagner's compositions, "Parsefal," "Lohengrin," "Siegfried," "Rienzi" and "Die Walkure."

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CI., NO. 115.

SUNDAY, APRIL 25, 1897.

CLOSE OF MUSICAL SEASON.

Will End with Symphony Concert Next Saturday.

With the symphony concert of next Saturday evening the musical season will come to an end. It has been an exceedingly busy one, and music lovers who have felt it incumbent upon them to attend all the more important concerts of the season may enter on a period of rest, during which they will doubtless recover from the tone dyspepsia that must necessarily have afflicted the more enthusiastic of them. It would be interesting to know how many of the musical entertainments of the season have resulted in pecuniary profit to their projectors. The probabilities are that very few paid except in an artistic sense, for the labor and care bestowed on them. Judging by the number of concerts that are given here every season, Boston would appear to be a city exceptionally enamored of music; but judging by the scant patronage extended to the majority of this species of entertainment, it would seem that such love was more in a sympathetic than in a practical direction. Is it unreasonable to believe that, despite the axiomatic impossibility of having too much of a good thing, Boston is more than surfeited with music? Be that as it may, concert after concert has been attended by strikingly small audiences, even when artists of eminence have been the central figures in them. On not a few occasions it has been found necessary to distribute free tickets by the handful at a time in order that the concert-giver might be spared the mortification of singing or of playing before the depressing and discouraging sight of row after row of empty seats. The season has not been singular in this regard, for the same results have ensued year after year; and yet, the concert givers, undaunted, continue to come hopefully to the fore. A large proportion of them are not justified by their limited talents and the unfamiliarity of the public with them, or even with their names, in looking forward to pecuniary success, but there are, on the other hand, artists whose worth and whose reputations are beyond question who meet with no better fortune, even at the hands of those who are supposed to be the ardent and unfailing patrons of gifted art, well directed and faithfully followed. The fact is that the business is overdone; that there is not here a public large enough to meet the musical demand made upon it; that those who can afford to pay for concert after concert are very few in comparison with those who cannot; that even the former at length recoil before the flood of music rolls toward them and terrifies them with its roar. Pleasure forced upon one may become a penance; flower gatherers come to loathe the scent of the rose; the stomach-pampered epicure finds in a crust of bread and a bit of cheese a delight for his jaded palate. The enough that is as good as a feast is better than the too much which carries with it the uncomfortable feeling that ensues upon gorging. This moralizing, however, brings no consolation to the artist who has burdened himself or herself with traveling expenses, advertising and hall rent to no other end than attracting a handful of listeners. The bane is clearly in view. What is the antidote? Who shall say? The truth seems to be that the world is overpeopled with artists, and that more of them appeal to Boston patronage than it is willing or able to pay for.

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL.
THURSDAY, APRIL 22, 1897.

Symphony Concert.

The closing concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last evening at Infantry Hall before the largest audience of the season, if not, indeed, the largest that the orchestra has ever played to in this city. The fact is a significant one, as there was no soloist, and the programme was made up entirely of excerpts and arrangements from the works of Richard Wagner. The numbers were as follows: "Parsifal," prelude; "Tannhauser," overture; "Lohengrin," (a) prelude to Act I., (b) prelude to Act III.; a "Siegfried" Idyl; "Rienzi," overture; "Siegfried," Act II., "Forest Sounds," "Die Walkure," "Ride of the Walkyries."

It may as well be said at once that, in all the years of the Symphony Orchestra's visits here, and by no means forgetting the many brilliant performances with which it has delighted us, we have never listened to such superb playing as that of last night. Every man seemed fairly inspired, and the result was such a revelation of sustained energy, wonderful shades of nuance and virtuosity in ensemble playing as even this remarkable band has never before revealed. Whether this was due to the inspiration of the great audience, or to love and reverence for the music of the mighty master, or to both or neither, the fact remains that the season was wound up in a veritable blaze of glory, and that demonstrations of applause could but faintly represent the impression produced upon the fortunate listeners.

No attempt was made to present a chronological make-up to the programme, which began with Wagner's latest work and presented near the end the overture to his earliest opera. While this might constitute a grievance to those who set great store by the orderly and consistent arrangement of programmes, the element of contrast was well served by the procedure. The beautiful number which opened the concert would not have delighted the audience if strict attention were paid to Wagner's desire that his music should not be presented in any fragmentary form; for the right of stage performance of "Parsifal" belongs exclusively to the festival theatre in Bayreuth, and the drama is not produced elsewhere. Its dreamy and beautiful character was wonderfully brought out by conductor Paur and his players. The brilliant and familiar "Tannhauser" overture received a remarkable rendition, and aroused the most enthusiastic and prolonged applause. So, too, with the following numbers, the fiery prelude to the third act of "Lohengrin" being played with the most astounding fire and brilliancy. And so the whole programme might be recounted if the critic's stock of appropriate adjectives would hold out. The wonderful ride of the Valkyries made a fitting close to the concert. Shorn though it is, merely as an orchestral number, of the vocal element and scenic accessories which lend vividness to its meaning in the drama, it remains a remarkable and impressive piece of music. No diminution was apparent, in its playing, of the superb vigor and energy which characterized the rest of the performance. Mr. Paur conducted the whole programme with evident relish and the greatest sympathy and skill.

Coming upon the heels of the Wagner performance of the evening before, the concert proved conclusively by the unusual attendance that the music of the greatest of modern masters is both appreciated and liked by our concertgoers. The increase in attendance in this and the past season, and the evident interest taken here in these grand concerts, warrants the suggestion that the management of the orchestra favor us with an increase in the number given yearly. We do not doubt that a scheme of eight or even ten concerts would find a liberal patronage as the half-dozen we now have, certainly the indications are all that way, and the matter is worth considering by those in charge of the orchestra.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.
NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 21, 1897.

sine—that most horrible of studies.

But Mr. Robert, confining himself to Gambara, discovers again that Balzac in 1837 foresaw Wagner. And this preface is of real interest.

He finds him discussing Beethoven in almost the very language of Wagner. He finds this phrase, "the sphere where plastic works beget themselves by processes of imitation," essentially Wagnerian. So is this phrase: "There where other arts hoop our thoughts by fixing them on a determined subject, music unchains them on the entire nature for it is able to express it to us." Passages about Meyerbeer might have been written by Wagner. And here is a great thought of Gambara concerning the music drama: "My music has for its end a depicturing of national life in its highest condition. The composer who sings for the sake of singing is an artisan, not an artist."

* * *

The program of the twenty-second Symphony concert, given last night in Music Hall, was as follows:

Symphonic suite, Scheherazade, op. 35.....Nicolai Rimsky-Korsakoff
(First time in Boston.)
The Sea and Sindbad's ship:
Largo e maestoso (E minor), 2-2, 4-4.
Allegro non troppo (E major), 6-4.
The Story of the Calender-Prince: Andantino (B minor), 3-8.
The Story of the Young Prince and the Young Princess:
Andantino quasi allegretto (G major), 6-8.
Festival at Bagdad; the Sinking of Sindbad's Ship:
Allegro molto e frenetico (E minor), 6-8.
Vivo (E minor), 2-8, (6-16, 3-8).
Allegro (C major, E major), 6-4.
Concerto for piano in A minor..............................Schumann
Mr. Joseffy.
Symphony No. 3 in E flat, Rhenish..........................Schumann

The program book says Rimsky-Korsakoff was born May 9–21, 1844, and I suppose Mr. Apthorp followed Riemann. Belaieff's catalogue says the composer was born March 6–18, 1844, and the probability is that the catalogue is correct.

In 1869 Theodore Thomas led here Dargomyzski's Kozaczek. Pieces by Glinka and Borodine have been played at Symphony concerts. Pieces by Cui have also been played here, but with the exception of Balakireff's Slamey, the Oriental fantasia for piano, we know as little of his works as of those by Rimsky-Korsakoff and Glazounoff, and other Nationalists, who look upon Tschaikowsky as an eclectic and not a truly national composer. You have been more fortunate in New York. You have heard Rimsky-Korsakoff's Antar, and, I believe, his Capriccio Espagnol.

* * *

It was a rare and great pleasure to listen to this suite, which was played superbly by the orchestra and led by Mr. Paur with keen appreciation of its wealth of exotic beauty and wild strength. To praise the performance of any one man in the orchestra seems invidious, for each member was a virtuoso. This suite, abounding in uncommon difficulties in rhythm and in special difficulties for certain instruments, was played with an abandon and gorgeous tonal brilliancy that I have never heard equaled in any concert room or opera house.

* * *

Nor can I speak in terms of moderate rapture concerning the music itself. Its effect was overwhelming.

Scheherazade has suggested music before this. I remember a sparkling overture thus named written by Heinrich Urban, of Berlin. But never, I am sure, did the fantastic spirit of the Arabian Nights enter so fully into the soul of a composer and take hold of his imagination as in the case of Nicolaus Andrejewitsch Rimsky-Korsakoff.

This suite defies, yet courts analysis. The leading motiv—the Scheherazade theme—keeps appearing in the four movements; and how ingeniously it is treated! The other themes are striking, and when they are used it is not merely for contrapuntal display, for there is dramatic intensity. And do not be deceived by the thought of Wild Russia and suspect absence of form. This spectacled officer of marines has written treatises as well as music. He knows his grammar so well that he can disregard it when he plots some gigantic stroke.

Program music of the true kind. No fatuous attempt to follow literatim et verbatim a long winded text. Scheherazada tells of Sinbad and his Ship; Sinbad, who set sail

---

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, APRIL 25, 1897.

Miss Lena Little Soloist at the Symphony Concert.

Mr Paur's program for last week's Symphony concert was of a conservative character containing no musical novelties. Miss Lena Little alto, sang an aria from "Taming of the Shrew," by Goetz, and the orchestral selections were the Grieg suite No. 1 from "Peer Gynt," three movements from Beethoven's ninth symphony, and his "Leonore" No. 3 overture. Miss Little interpreted the Katherine soliloquy very acceptably, although she was not quite equal to the passionate exclamations beginning "Are women's weapons only made of straw?" The introduction was sung with excellent expression, and the tender emotions of the closing verses were skilfully phrased and given with good effect. Her voice was true to pitch, and she used it without exaggerating the fortissimo passages of the aria. Miss Little was presented with some handsome floral tributes after she had been recalled to the platform.

It is not necessary to mention in detail the orchestra's performance of the Beethoven and Grieg numbers. They are familiar works to symphony patrons, and the past enconiums given to the players need only to be repeated now, for the interpretations were up to the standard of former years. Notably good was the flute playing in the first movement and the entrancing second, for muted strings, was as fine an example of the proficiency of this department of the band as has been heard this season. In fact it nearly received an encore, the audience only being appeased when Mr Paur had bowed half a dozen acknowledgments for the enthusiastic and applausive marks of commendation.

The three movements from Beethoven's ninth symphony were grandly performed, the manifold characteristics in melody and intricate elaborations being smoothly and sympathetically presented. The long coda of the first part was a brilliant example of sustained ensemble work and the eight themes were beautifully interwoven, undue prominence not being given to any of the phrases by the instruments for which the melody is scored. The curious "tune" of the second movement was capitally played. Sir Arthur Sullivan has used this as a basis for the lord chancellor's song in the last act of "Iolanthe." The wood winds and horns did specially good work in the third part of the symphony.

The Leonore overture received admirable treatment. Another good word is due the flutist for his solo bits and the invisible trumpet calls were introduced in perfect tempo. The jubilant finale went with splendid vigor and resonance.

The closing program of the season will be given this week and will consist of selections from Wagner's compositions, "Parsefal," "Lohengrin," "Siegfried," "Rienzi" and "Die Walkure."

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CI., NO. 115.
SUNDAY, APRIL 25, 1897.

CLOSE OF MUSICAL SEASON.

Will End with Symphony Concert Next Saturday.

With the symphony concert of next Saturday evening the musical season will come to an end. It has been an exceedingly busy one, and music lovers who have felt it incumbent upon them to attend all the more important concerts of the season may enter on a period of rest, during which they will doubtless recover from the tone dyspepsia that must necessarily have afflicted the more enthusiastic of them. It would be interesting to know how many of the musical entertainments of the season have resulted in pecuniary profit to their projectors. The probabilities are that very few paid except in an artistic sense, for the labor and care bestowed on them. Judging by the number of concerts that are given here every season, Boston would appear to be a city exceptionally enamored of music; but judging by the scant patronage extended to the majority of this species of entertainment, it would seem that such love was more in a sympathetic than in a practical direction. Is it unreasonable to believe that, despite the axiomatic impossibility of having too much of a good thing, Boston is more than surfeited with music? Be that as it may, concert after concert has been attended by strikingly small audiences, even when artists of eminence have been the central figures in them. On not a few occasions it has been found necessary to distribute free tickets by the handful at a time in order that the concert-giver might be spared the mortification of singing or of playing before the depressing and discouraging sight of row after row of empty seats. The season has not been singular in this regard, for the same results have ensued year after year; and yet, the concert givers, undaunted, continue to come hopefully to the fore. A large proportion of them are not justified by their limited talents and the unfamiliarity of the public with them, or even with their names, in looking forward to pecuniary success, but there are, on the other hand, artists whose worth and whose reputations are beyond question who meet with no better fortune, even at the hands of those who are supposed to be the ardent and unfailing patrons of gifted art, well directed and faithfully followed. The fact is that the business is overdone; that there is not here a public large enough to meet the musical demand made upon it; that those who can afford to pay for concert after concert are very few in comparison with those who cannot; that even the former at length recoil before the flood of music rolls toward them and terrifies them with its roar. Pleasure forced upon one may become a penance; flower gatherers come to loathe the scent of the rose; the stomach-pampered epicure finds in a crust of bread and a bit of cheese a delight for his jaded palate. The enough that is as good as a feast is better than the too much which carries with it the uncomfortable feeling that ensues upon gorging. This moralizing, however, brings no consolation to the artist who has burdened himself or herself with travelling expenses, advertising and hall rent to no other end than attracting a handful of listeners. The bane is clearly in view. What is the antidote? Who shall say? The truth seems to be that the world is overpeopled with artists, and that more of them appeal to Boston patronage than it is willing or able to pay for.

hony ncert.

sing concert by the Boston ony Orchestra was given las g at Infantry Hall before the t audience of the season, if not, d, the largest that the orchestra ever played to in this city. The is a significant one, as there no soloist, and the programme was e up entirely of excerpts and ar gements from the works of Richard gner. The numbers were as follows; rsifal," prelude; "Tannhauser," rture; "Lohengrin," (a) prelude to I., (b) prelude to Act III.; a "Sieg d" Idyl; "Rienzi," overture; "Sieg ," Act II., "Forest Sounds," "Die küre," "Ride of the Walkyries." may as well be said at once that, all the years of the Symphony Or stra's visits here, and by no means etting the many brilliant perform es with which it has delighted us, have never listened to such superb ing as that of last night. Every seemed fairly inspired, and the re was such a revelation of sustained gy, wonderful shades of nuance virtuosity in ensemble playing as n this remarkable band has never re revealed. Whether this was due the inspiration of the great audi e, or to love and reverence for the sic of the mighty master, or to both neither, the fact remains that the son was wound up in a veritable e of glory, and that demonstrations applause could but faintly represent impression produced upon the for ate listeners.

o attempt was made to present a onological make-up to the pro mme, which began with Wagner's st work and presented near the end overture to his earliest opera. While might constitute a grievance to se who set great store by the or y and consistent arrangement of grammes, the element of contrast well served by the procedure. The utiful number which opened the con would not have delighted the audi e if strict attention were paid to gner's desire that his music uld not be presented in any gmentary form; for the right stage performance of "Parsifal" ongs exclusively to the festival thea in Bayreuth, and the drama is not duced elsewhere. Its dreamy and utiful character was wonderfully ught out by conductor Paur and his yers. The brilliant and familiar nnhauser" overture received a re rkable rendition, and aroused the st enthusiastic and prolonged ap use. So, too, with the following nbers, the fiery prelude to the third of "Lohengrin" being played with most astounding fire and brillianey. so the whole programme might be ounted if the critic's stock of appro te adjectives would hold out. The derful ride of the Valkyries made a ng close to the concert. Short ugh it is, merely as an orchestral ber, of the vocal element and scenic ssories which lend vividness to its ning in the drama, it remains a re kable and impressive piece of music. diminution was apparent, in its ing, of the superb vigor and energy h characterized the rest of the mance. Mr. Paur conducted the programme with evident relish he greatest sympathy and skill.

ing upon the heels of the Wag performance of the evening be the concert proved conclusively unusual attendance that the music greatest of modern masters is appreciated and liked by our con ers. The increase in attendance and the past season, and the interest taken here in these concerts, warrants the sugges that the management of the or favor us with an increase in mber given yearly. We do not that a scheme of eight or even ncerts would find a liberal pat as the half-dozen we now have. ly the indications are all that nd the matter is worth con by those in charge of the or-

---

~~and Miss Grace Gregory, soprano. Assisting artists will be Miss Mabel Phipps, pianist; Mr. Tom Karl, tenor; Mr. Heinrich Meyn, baritone; Mr. Franz R. Kaltenborn, violinist; Mr. Hermann Beyer-Hané, violoncellist; Mr. Edwin Star Belknap, reader. With such an array of well-known and approved artists this concert will undoubtedly~~ from Balsora, saw the roc, escaped the ogre, and carried the Old Man on his shoulders; Sinbad, who is nearer to us than Captain Cook or Anson, or even Nansen of to-day. She tells of the Calender Prince. Is he the one who knew the incestuous secret of his cousin; the one who in bravado broke the talisman in pieces; or he who opened the one hundredth door and lost the forty damsels? She tells of the Young Prince and the Young Princess. Is it the story of Camaralzaman and Badoura? And then she tells of the feast at Bagdad and the sinking of Sinbad's ship. "The ship goes to pieces against a rock surmounted by a bronze warrior." But was the ship Sinbad's? Was it not the vessel in which Agib, the third royal calender, the son of Cassib, was a passenger, and which was drawn toward the mountain of loadstone? And then Scheherazade herself is as a figure in a dream; she fades away, this vaporous fugitive figure; she is lost in the high E of the violin that wonders and regrets.

~~Address W. M. T., care THE MUSICAL COURIER, New York.~~

---

Here are strange tonalities, strange melodies, strange harmonic progressions, incredible imaginative flights of orchestration. Rimsky-Korsakoff has his own melody, perfumed with Eastern drugs, swooningly sensuous, frenetically Dervishian, or droning, and such as falls from the lips of a white bearded, turbaned old man, garrulous in the sun. And for an hour the hearer forgot Boston and its chief institutions, the Public Library, the East Wind and the Supreme Patroness of musical mediocrity.

To tell of the results of seemingly impossible combinations of instruments is beyond the power of words. What would you do, for instance, with a clarinet and a snare drum, or a bassoon with four muted double basses in empty fifths? And this composer uses string pizzicati, so that the effect is that of many kettledrums in full chords. Constant were the surprises in orchestration. Berlioz himself would have been puzzled, delighted, dithyrambic in his joy.

Mr. Huneker in M'lle New York a year and a half ago wrote of the Tsar and the Chromatic Scale. "But what prose master may describe the horrible beauties of modern Russian music? 'Going to the people' is the phrase affected by the Slavophile for twenty-two years. It is in the music, it has Tolstoyed the literature. From the great White Tsar to the most brutal peasant besotting his brains with vodka the cry rings ominously clear, 'We are going to the people.' It is the cry of the Cossack, and it echoes in Western ears with an uncanny sound. 'Ware the Muscovite, 'ware his Tsar, and 'ware his Chromatic Scale. It is Slav against Celt, Slav against Teuton, and may hell take the hindmost."

⁂

I hope earnestly that Mr. Paur will produce other works by the Russian Nationalists. For you can no more reckon without Russia in music than you can in literature or politics.

⁂

After the tremendous music of Rimsky-Korsakoff the admired concerto of Schumann seemed at first meagre and pale. The charm of Mr. Joseffy's playing soon asserted itself, and again we recognized the pronounced individuality of this great draughtsman, who at times seems to regard color as vulgar. Who was it that first said Joseffy is the first of artists in musical black and white? I heard this eulogy last night, but it sounded familiar. Ah, the unsurpassable crystalline beauty of this great pianist's tone! And then the ease, the elasticity, the clarity, the perfect lines! Would that Mr. Joseffy visited us frequently. I might then hold the piano in higher esteem.

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Music Notes.

17 BEACON STREET, April 17, 1897.

Bach's Passion Music was given on Good Friday evening at the church on Copley Square, Mr. H. G. Tucker being the organist. The church was crowded with invited guests, admittance being by card only, and the music was delightfully prevented. It is so seldom that Mr. Tucker is heard in public that the occasion was particularly enjoyable, so artistic a musician being a delight.

One of the most brilliant concerts ever given in Lowell took place last Tuesday evening in that city under the auspices of the Musical Association of Lowell. The soloists were Miss Caroline Gardner Clarke, Mrs. Homer A. Sawyer, Mr. Tom Johnson, all of Boston, and Mr. Kennedy, of New York, with an orchestra of about fifty of the Boston

---

LISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CL, NO. 115.

SUNDAY, APRIL 25, 1897.

LOSE OF MUSICAL SEAS

Will End with Symphony Concert Next Saturday.

With the symphony concert of next aturday evening the musical season will come to an end. It has been an exceedingly busy one, and music lovers who have felt it incumbent upon them to attend all the more important concerts of the season may enter on a period of rest, during which they will doubtless recover from the tone dyspepsia that must necessarily have afflicted the more enthusiastic of them. It would be interesting to know how many of the musical entertainments of the season have resulted in pecuniary profit to their projectors. The probabilities are that very few paid except in an artistic sense, for the labor and care bestowed on them. Judging by the number of concerts that are given here every season, Boston would appear to be a city exceptionally enamored of music; but judging by the scant patronage extended to the majority of this species of entertainment, it would seem that such love was more in a sympathetic than in a practical direction. Is it unreasonable to believe that, despite the axiomatic impossibility of having too much of a good thing, Boston is more than surfeited with music? Be that as it may, concert after concert has been attended by strikingly small audiences, even when artists of eminence have been the central figures in them. On not a few occasions it has been found necessary to distribute free tickets by the handful at a time in order that the concert-giver might be spared the mortification of singing or of playing before the depressing and discouraging sight of row after row of empty seats. The season has not been singular in this regard, for the same results have ensued year after year; and yet, the concert givers, undaunted, continue to come hopefully to the fore. A large proportion of them are not justified by their limited talents and the unfamiliarity of the public with them, or even with their names, in looking forward to pecuniary success, but there are, on the other hand, artists whose worth and whose reputations are beyond question who meet with no better fortune, even at the hands of those who are supposed to be the ardent and unfailing patrons of gifted art, well directed and faithfully followed. The fact is that the business is overdone; that there is not here a public large enough to meet the musical demand made upon it; that those who can afford to pay for concert after concert are very few in comparison with those who cannot; that even the former at length recoil before the flood of music rolls toward them and terrifies them with its roar. Pleasure forced upon one may become a penance; flower gatherers come to loathe the scent of the rose; the stomach-pampered epicure finds in a crust of bread and a bit of cheese a delight for his jaded palate. The enough that is as good as a feast is better than the too much which carries with it the uncomfortable feeling that ensues upon gorging. This moralizing, however, brings no consolation to the artist who has burdened himself or herself with travelling expenses, advertising and hall rent to no other end than attracting a handful of listeners. The bane is clearly in view. What is the antidote? Who shall say? The truth seems to be that the world is overpeopled with artists, and that more of them appeal to Boston patronage than it is willing or able to pay for.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTIS
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 26, 1897.

Ninth Symphony Chief Part of Saturday's Concert.

Better three-quarters of a loaf than no bread, particularly if the quarter withheld is the poorest part of the loaf! The chief part of Saturday's concert was Beethoven's Ninth symphony, even with its finale omitted.

Undoubtedly this finale contains the grandest thoughts of the symphony, but it is equally undoubted that they are thoroughly impracticable in the performance, and that the movement is the most unvocal vocal composition in the catalogue. The musician therefore is not especially distressed at its omission, since he can imagine its glories much better in a reading of the score than he will ever actually hear them in a screaming and straining performance.

In the three instrumental movements one has the true Beethoven, the prince of orchestral composers, while in the last movement one has the instrumental writer using (and abusing) a band of voices as if it were an orchestra.

The first movement was grandly given, especially the vague introduction, one of the quaintest touches in Beethoven. Starting with only the notes A and E, the composer keeps the auditor in doubt as to the real key, for measure after measure; he establishes a rhythm without in any way defining a key.—for one night be in A major, in A minor, in E major or minor, or in D major, quite as readily as in D minor, which key reveals itself, as in a lightning flash, when the chief theme thunders in.

It is one of the simplest of figures, yet wonderfully effective, and it is a strange coincidence that Wagner has used precisely the same figure, inverted, as the guiding motive of his Flying Dutchman,—a fourth and a fifth.

After all is said and done, the first movement is not far from the strictest form of sonata allegro as used by Beethoven; the subordinate and closing themes are in an unexpected key in their exposition, and there is no repeat before the development, but beyond this the regular form is adhered to.

The contrast of themes was very clearly drawn, and the virility of the movement was thoroughly preserved (it is the most masculine of all Beethoven's symphonic movements) but the climax was reached in the magnificent coda, with its great chromatic sweeps and surges; an ending which stands pre-eminent even among Beethoven's greatest codas.

The Scherzo is grotesque rather than playful, with its quaint development of a simple octave figure, and its odd juggleries of rhythms. The kettle-drummer deserves a word of commendation for the effective character of his prominent figures (a figure which Dvorak borrowed in his "New World" symphony) and the bassoon, oboe and horn also did excellent work in difficult passages in this movement. The brusque and vigorous ending was admirably interpreted, and the whole movement had a splendid dash.

But the finest part of the instrumental work of this symphony is in the slow movement; a wonderful pair of themes for a deaf man to ev[illegible], for it must be remembered that when Beethoven wrote this symphony he was stone deaf! It was something to be grateful for that Mr. Paur did not sentimentalize here, as some conductors are in the habit of doing, in fact the manly force of the entire work was never asserted with greater integrity than in this performance.

It was fitting to follow the three movements with the "Leonora" overture, No. 3, which, although not in the key of the symphony, yet formed a fitting finale to it in lieu of its own ending. It is said that Beethoven intended to write a new finale to the ninth symphony, had he lived; if he had done so it would possibly have been something in the nature of the "Leonora, No. 3," an apotheosis of joy and happiness after struggle and sorrow.

The overture was read with an abandon that suited it well, its ending being a veritable whirlwind of power. The trumpet calls were clearly played by Mr. Mueller. Although they are very dramatic they are not very difficult, and it may be recalled that in all the works of Mozart, Weber and Beethoven, there are no difficult trumpet passages, for the classical period of composition was the period of trumpet decadence, the barren epoch (in this particular field) between the zenith of natural-trumpet playing, as found in the scores of Bach and Handel, and the invention of the keyed trumpet which made the florid effects of the modern school possible. The flute playing calls for an especial word of praise.

Miss Lena Little was the soloist of the concert and gave, with much expression and taste, the song of Katherine in Goetz's "Taming of the Shrew." It is a dramatic number, not especially melodic, but presenting some fine effects of orchestration in the accompaniment, and demanding a singer of considerable musicianship to do it justice.

Miss Little was adequate to the task, although not very broad in the climaxes, and won considerable applause for the number, but such a selection demands more than a single hearing to be entirely appreciated; some of its touches are rather too subtle for immediate comprehension.

The concert opened with a popular selection, Grieg's first suite to "Peer Gynt" being played. This, of course, was enjoyed heartily, for it has nothing of that uncomfortable greatnesss that permeates the ninth symphony; yet it is popular without becoming cheap or tawdry, its sentiment never descends to sentimentality, its pathos does not become bathos in any degree.

It is the old thought—"On revient toujours a ses premiers amours"—strained through a Norwegian mind. It takes to the muted strings as a duck to water, but as this touch was admirably played at each appearance, in "Ase's Death," and in "Anitra's Dance," the effect was not monotonous.

The last movement,—"In the hall of the Gnome-king"—was especially well played and its spice was bound to arouse the audience. In this the bassoons did some exquisite work. The mysterious touch of the bass-drum, played very softly, was very striking; Wagner and Gounod were among the first to discover this tone-color and use this tawdry instrument in a different manner from the circus bands.

This movement won a great deal more applause than the ninth symphony,—an object lesson to those who make public applause their guide in judging of musical works,—and at one time it seemed as if the audience would force an encore.

Louis C. Elson.

Boston Journal.
SUNDAY, APRIL 25, 1897.

SYMPHONY NIGHT.

Three Movements From Beethoven's 9th Symphony at the Twenty-third Concert—Miss Lena Little Was the Soloist.

The program of the 23d Symphony concert in Music Hall last night, Emil Paur conductor, was as follows:

Suite No. 1 from music to "Peer Gynt"	Grieg
Scena, "My Strength Is Spent," from "Taming of the Shrew"	Goetz
The first three Orchestral Movements from Symphony No. 9	Beethoven
Overture to "Leonore," No. 3	Beethoven

Some may complain because the great symphony of Beethoven was played in what they are pleased to call "a mutilated form." But how often is the gigantic choral finale sung with satisfactory effect? Surely it is not right to transpose the movement a whole tone below, as is the habit of one celebrated conductor, so as to accommodate human voices; and yet what voices can endure the strain? It seems to me that Mr. Paur was eminently judicious in allowing us to hear the superb orchestra in the mighty symphony without the anti-climax of an almost necessarily imperfect performance.

When you hear the music of these three movements, you realize the folly of calling Brahms's C minor symphony the 10th, as though it were the final symphony according to Beethoven's ideas. No symphony, pure and simple, approaches this colossal work in its unearthly grandeur, the fierceness of its joy, the heavenly beauty of its melody (as in the divine second theme of the Adagio, when it is first sung by the second violins and violas). There is something intensely human even in the mysticism of Beethoven, and this human touch is seldom found in the more abstruse music of Brahms. It is not that I do not esteem Brahms and recognize his greatness when he is truly great; it is that I find the limitations of Brahms far exceed the limitations of Beethoven; and when Beethoven is at his height, no one in purely instrumental music approaches him. But that Beethoven is always at this dizzy height is an absurd statement, which comes only from the mouth of a fetishist.

If there is any music that can follow justly the sublime adagio and serve as a finale, it must be by Beethoven, and it is without doubt the Lenore No. III.

Mr. Paur read the Symphony admirably, and the orchestra played with its usual beauty of tone, intelligence and spirit in spite of the unfavorable atmosphere.

⁂

It might be a pleasure to hear the music of "Peer Gynt" in its original form, as incidental music to Ibsen's play; but so long as there are many estimable persons in Boston who are persuaded that Ibsen is an "immoral" playwright, there is little or no chance of the experiment. In suite form the music still gives delight, still is full of suggestion even to those who do not know the story of the Norwegian Faust; and the vulgarity of the fourth movement that startles in the concert hall may by its coarse vigor and grotesqueness be the very musical expression, or rather accentuation of expression, of the dramatic scene. It is the duty of the historian to state the fact that this vulgar fourth movement received the heartiest and most persistent applause received by any purely orchestral piece this season.

⁂

Miss Little sang the aria from "The Taming of the Shrew" in a painstaking manner. Her performance was not of such distinction that it caused you to forget that the music is not well suited to her voice, or that her upper tones are thin and hollow.

Philip Hale.

Boston Transcript
MONDAY, APRIL 26, 1897

Music Hall; Boston Symphony Orchestra

The programme of the twenty-third symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Grieg: Suite No. 1, from the Music to "Peer Gynt," opus 46.
Goetz: Scena, "Die Kraft versagt," from "Der Widerspenstigen Zähmung."
Beethoven: Three orchestral movements from Symphony No. 9 in D minor, opus 125.
Beethoven: Overture to "Leonore," No. 3, opus 72.
Miss Lena Little was the singer

There is a good deal of genial dramatic gift shown in Grieg's music to Ibsen's "Peer Gynt;" one can easily imagine how enormously effective it must be, as an accompaniment to a stage performance of the play. Perhaps it is only by keeping the dramatic situation steadily before one's mind that one can appreciate its finest essence in the concert-room; and this is not hard to do, for the music really invites you to it. The performance last Saturday evening was excellent almost throughout. In Anitra's Dance one felt that a little more of sensuous swaying, a little less of angularity, in the phrasing might have suggested more vividly the voluptuous sinuosity of Oriental dancing; the thing sounded at moments rather pert and chic than dreamily seductive. But the other movements were admirably given, the grim humor of the scene in the Hall of the Mountain King being brought out to perfection. As usual, this last movement escaped an encore only through the conductor's firmness.

We were heartily glad to see the three orchestral movements from the ninth symphony on the programme. In general, we have no very keen sympathy with some of our colleagues today, who advocate giving parts of symphonies instead of the whole. Indeed, there are but few symphonies which we should care to see dismembered in this way. But in some cases there are excellent reasons for not giving such works entire. Take, for instance, Rubinstein's "Ocean;" the first movement is so head-and-shoulders above the rest of the work, it is so strong and inspiring compared with the dulness of the others, that we should well like to hear it played separately—like a sort of concert overture. It is eminently worth hearing; but wading through the dreary remainder of the symphony is paying somewhat too high a price for the privilege. The three orchestral movements in the ninth symphony, too, seem to us well worth giving without the choral finale—if for quite other reasons. In the first place, it is not easy to bring about frequent performances of the whole of Beethoven's great opus 125; there are practical difficulties in the way. And one would like to hear any part of the great work oftener than once in a dog's age. Again, it is well worth while to give the purely orchestral portions of the symphony now and then under conditions which will insure their producing their fullest possible effect. Now, when the whole symphony is given, a more or less numerous chorus is grouped around the orchestra, thus damping the tone of the latter to a very appreciable degree. It may be said in general that the purely orchestral numbers in choral compositions are heard at a certain disadvantage; the very presence of the chorus on the platform is an untoward acoustical condition. Give the orchestral movements in the ninth symphony without the choral finale, and you at once insure their being heard under as favorable conditions as the composer's other symphonies. This, as we have said, is eminently worth while; it compensates one in considerable measure for the loss of the finale.

And just here we are reminded of something that strikes us as rather curious. The Boston Symphony Orchestra has now been giving its symphony concerts for sixteen seasons; in all this time it seems never to have occurred to any of its four conductors to give the three symphonic movements from Mendelssohn's Hymn of Praise! They are in precisely the same case as the three orchestral movements from the ninth symphony. Our Boston public has, we believe, never heard them, save under the poor acoustical conditions we have mentioned above, that is, with the orchestra surrounded and damped by a large mass of chorus-singers. One would like, for once in a way, to hear these movements played by our matchless orchestra, and in the best conditions for sonority and brilliancy. Besides, this would make some welcome variety in the eternal alternation of "Scotch" and "Italian;" it is hardly worth while to give the "Reformation" oftener than once in a great while; it may even be doubted whether giving it at all be not an injustice to the composer, who was much dissatisfied with this posthumous symphony of his, and would doubtless have remodelled it, had he not died before his time. But the three orchestral movements from the Hymn of Praise would be a boon to Mendelssohn-lovers. For matter of that, why not give the Scherzo from the "Reformation" symphony oftener by itself?

As for last Saturday's performance of the ree movements from Beethoven's ninth, may be said heartily that the orchestra wed itself at its very best, showed itself it generally does when it has to do with a task that thoroughly interests it, when it has to play something that is at once fine and difficult. For nothing bores a fine orchestra more in the long run than having to do easy work. But, apart from the technical excellence of the performance, there were some distasteful points in it. The tempo of the first movement was simply inconceivable. Had the men not played so admirably, the performance of this movement might have been taken for a seriocomic imitation of a country orchestra's trying over a difficult piece for the first time—at the timid, "safe" tempo usual in such cases. People whose avocations lead them to frequent the purlieus of the Ruth Burrage Room have heard this tempo from young ladies reading eight-hand arrangements at sight. The result last Saturday evening was instructive; for the first time in our experience, the first movement of the ninth symphony hardly got a hand! The audience hardly noticed it! The Scherzo, on the other hand, went admirably. It was hard put to it, to be sure, to rouse the audience from the atrophy into which the maltreatment of the first movement had thrown it; it could not at once disperse the clouds of discontent that hovered over the [illegible] for after a while they somewhat relaxed that fine vigor of accent that gave such a lilt to the first few pages of the movement. But, on the whole, the Scherzo went mightily well. The performance of the great Adagio was a dream of beauty; perhaps a little over-sophisticated at times, but wonderfully carried out. This slow movement was the high water mark of the concert.

The "Leonore" overture was played with immense brilliancy and effect. One regretted that vulgar trick of beginning the Allegro slow—in pianissimo—and then whipping up the tempo with the gradual crescendo; that little hiccough, too, in the second theme—as if the phrase had suddenly stubbed its toe—might have been spared us. Oh! if conductors would only not try always to do "something new" with Beethoven! If they would only be content to cut their initials on the covers of his works, not on the music itself! His symphonies and overtures have by this time got to be like the eternal rocks in popular summer resorts; covered with advertisements of "infallible tonics" and "pick-me-ups."

Miss Little sang the scena from Goetz's "Taming of the Shrew" with much intelligence and great beauty of feeling. We think, however, that her choice was a mistake. In the first place, her contralto voice has not the tessitura for the music; she may rise fairly and squarely, and without too much effort, to its highest phrases; but the part was written for a mezzo-soprano, and its greatest stress lies just where Miss Little's voice has the least mordancy of timbre. But then, this is still not the most important point. We have so often—and, as we think, with justice—spoken disparagingly of the sad failures most great opera-singers make when they attempt to sing vocal chamber-music—such as Schubert, Schumann, or Franz songs—that we cannot help laying some stress upon this example of the converse proposition. Miss Little is an excellent song-singer; she has been brought up in that school and is at home in that field. She must often have felt, while hearing this or that famous operatic diva sing chamber-songs, how far the artist was from doing them true justice. The opera-singer lacked something that was indispensable to good song-singing, and at the same time had something that was irreconcilable with it. Did it never occur to Miss Little that this might be precisely her own case in relation to opera-music and other essentially dramatic writing? The "universal" singer, who can sing anything and everything about equally well, is all but unheard-of; especially is there a certain inherent antagonism between the two domains of dramatic and chamber singing that almost forbids of one and the same singer well mastering both styles. To sing a Schumann song "dramatically" is one thing—and some of Schumann's songs call for dramatic singing, of a sort;—but to sing an opera-scena dramatically is quite another thing. That broad dramatic sweep, that quasi-excessiveness of style, that belong to the lyric stage, that laying on the colors with a trowel, of which great opera-singers have the secret,—these things, this peculiar and specific power, are out of the song-singer's ken; if she had this power, she would be no song-singer. Miss Little sang Goetz's scena creditably, but without effect.

The next, and last, programme is made up wholly of works by Richard Wagner, and is as follows: Prelude to "Parsifal"; Eine Faust-Ouvertüre; prelude to Act I., and introduction to Act III., of "Lohengrin"; Siegfried-Idyl; overture to "Rienzi"; "Waldweben," from "Siegfried"; the Ride of the Valkyrior, from "Die Walküre."

THE MUSICAL COURIER.
NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 28, 1897.

The program of the twenty-third Symphony concert (April 24) was as follows:

Suite No. 1, from music to Peer Gynt	Grieg
Scena, Die Kraft Versagt, from Der Widerspentigen Zähmung	Goetz
First three orchestral movements from Symphony No. 9, in D minor	Beethoven
Overture to Leonore, No. 3	Beethoven

The air in the hall was thick, hot, foul. Yet in in spite of this the orchestra played with its customary brilliancy and wealth of tonal color. The air from The Taming of the Shrew is hardly suited to Miss Lena Little, a contralto, who sang in painstaking fashion and without any marked distinction.

Of the pieces themselves there is nothing to be said at this late day. I am not arrogant enough to discover new beauties in the Ninth Symphony, and I still find the fourth movement of the Peer Gynt suite brutal and vulgar in the concert room; in the theatre, no doubt, it accentuates the scene. This same movement was applauded frenetically and persistently. No work by Beethoven, Brahms, Tschaikowsky or any other composer of reputation received such boisterous honor this season.

⁂

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 26, 1897.

Ninth Symphony Chief Part of Saturday's Concert.

Better three-quarters of a loaf than no bread, particularly if the quarter withheld is the poorest part of the loaf! The chief part of Saturday's concert was Beethoven's Ninth symphony, even with its finale omitted.

Undoubtedly this finale contains the grandest thoughts of the symphony, but it is equally undoubted that they are thoroughly impracticable in the performance, and that the movement is the most unvocal vocal composition in the catalogue. The musician therefore is not especially distressed at its omission, since he can imagine its glories much better in a reading of the score than he will ever actually hear them in a screaming and straining performance.

In the three instrumental movements one has the true Beethoven, the prince of orchestral composers, while in the last movement one has the instrumental writer using (and abusing) a band of voices as if it were an orchestra.

The first movement was grandly given, especially the vague introduction, one of the quaintest touches in Beethoven. Starting with only the notes A and E, the composer keeps the auditor in doubt as to the real key, for measure after measure; he establishes a rhythm without in any way defining a key.—for one night be in A major, in A minor, in E major or minor, or in D major, quite as readily as in D minor, which key reveals itself, as in a lightning flash, when the chief theme thunders in.

It is one of the simplest of figures, yet wonderfully effective, and it is a strange coincidence that Wagner has used precisely the same figure, inverted, as the guiding motive of his Flying Dutchman,—a fourth and a fifth.

After all is said and done, the first movement is not far from the strictest form of sonata allegro as used by Beethoven; the subordinate and closing themes are in an unexpected key in their exposition, and there is no repeat before the development, but beyond this the regular form is adhered to.

The contrast of themes was very clearly drawn, and the virility of the movement was thoroughly preserved (it is the most masculine of all Beethoven's symphonic movements) but the climax was reached in the magnificent coda, with its great chromatic sweeps and surges; an ending which stands pre-eminent even among Beethoven's greatest codas.

The Scherzo is grotesque rather than playful, with its quaint development of a simple octave figure, and its odd juggleries of rhythms. The kettle-drummer deserves a word of commendation for the effective character of his prominent figures (a figure which Dvorak borrowed in his "New World" symphony) and the bassoon, oboe and horn also did excellent work in difficult passages in this movement. The brusque and vigorous ending was admirably interpreted, and the whole movement had a splendid dash.

But the finest part of the instrumental work of this symphony is in the slow movement; a wonderful pair of themes for a deaf man to evolve, for it must be remembered that when Beethoven wrote this symphony he was stone deaf! It was something to be grateful for that Mr. Paur did not sentimentalize here, as some conductors are in the habit of doing, in fact the manly force of the entire work was never asserted with greater integrity than in this performance.

It was fitting to follow the three movements with the "Leonora" overture, No. 3, which, although not in the key of the symphony, yet formed a fitting finale to it in lieu of its own ending. It is said that Beethoven intended to write a new finale to the ninth symphony, had he lived; if he had done so it would possibly have been something in the nature of the "Leonora, No. 3," an apotheosis of joy and happiness after struggle and sorrow.

The overture was read with an abandon that suited it well, its ending being a veritable whirlwind of power. The trumpet calls were clearly played by Mr. Mueller. Although they are very dramatic they are not very difficult, and it may be recalled that in all the works of Mozart, Weber and Beethoven, there are no difficult trumpet passages, for the classical period of composition was the period of trumpet decadence, the barren epoch (in this particular field) between the zenith of natural-trumpet playing, as found in the scores of Bach and Handel, and the invention of the keyed trumpet which made the florid effects of the modern school possible. The flute playing calls for an especial word of praise.

Miss Lena Little was the soloist of the concert and gave, with much expression and taste, the song of Katherine in Goetz's "Taming of the Shrew." It is a dramatic number, not especially melodic, but presenting some fine effects of orchestration in the accompaniment, and demanding a singer of considerable musicianship to do it justice.

Miss Little was adequate to the task, although not very broad in the climaxes, and won considerable applause for the number, but such a selection demands more than a single hearing to be entirely appreciated; some of its touches are rather too subtle for immediate comprehension. Miss Little was recalled twice.

The concert opened with a popular selection, Grieg's first suite to "Peer Gynt" being played. This, of course, was enjoyed heartily, for it has nothing of that uncomfortable greatnesss that permeates the ninth symphony; yet it is popular without becoming cheap or tawdry, its sentiment never descends to sentimentality, its pathos does not become bathos in any degree.

It is the old thought—"On revient toujours a ses premiers amours"—strained through a Norwegian mind. It takes to the muted strings as a duck to water, but as this touch was admirably played at each appearance, in "Ase's Death," and in "Anitra's Dance," the effect was not monotonous.

The last movement,—"In the hall of the Gnome-king"—was especially well played and its spice was bound to arouse the audience. In this the bassoons did some exquisite work. The mysterious touch of the bass-drum, played very softly, was very striking; Wagner and Gounod were among the first to discover this tone-color and use this tawdry instrument in a different manner from the circus bands.

This movement won a great deal more applause than the ninth symphony,—an object lesson to those who make public applause their guide in judging of musical works,—and at one time it seemed as if the audience would force an encore.

Louis C. Elson.

Boston Journal.
SUNDAY, APRIL 25, 1897.

SYMPHONY NIGHT.

Three Movements From Beethoven's 9th Symphony at the Twenty-third Concert—Miss Lena Little Was the Soloist.

The program of the 23d Symphony concert in Music Hall last night, Emil Paur conductor, was as follows:

Suite No. 1 from music to "Peer Gynt"..Grieg
Scena, "My Strength Is Spent," from "Taming of the Shrew"...............Goetz
The first three Orchestral Movements from Symphony No. 9..............Beethoven
Overture to "Leonore," No. 3......Beethoven

Some may complain because the great symphony of Beethoven was played in what they are pleased to call "a mutilated form." But how often is the gigantic choral finale sung with satisfactory effect? Surely it is not right to transpose the movement a whole tone below, as is the habit of one celebrated conductor, so as to accommodate human voices; and yet what voices can endure the strain? It seems to me that Mr. Paur was eminently judicious in allowing us to hear the superb orchestra in the mighty symphony without the anti-climax of an almost necessarily imperfect performance.

When you hear the music of these three movements, you realize the folly of calling Brahms's C minor symphony the 10th, as though it were the final symphony according to Beethoven's ideas. No symphony, pure and simple, approaches this colossal work in its unearthly grandeur, the fierceness of its joy, the heavenly beauty of its melody (as in the divine second theme of the Adagio, when it is first sung by the second violins and violas). There is something intensely human even in the mysticism of Beethoven, and this human touch is seldom found in the more abstruse music of Brahms. It is not that I do not esteem Brahms and recognize his greatness when he is truly great; it is that I find the limitations of Brahms far exceed the limitations of Beethoven; and when Beethoven is at his height, no one in purely instrumental music approaches him. But that Beethoven is always at this dizzy height is an absurd statement, which comes only from the mouth of a fetishist.

If there is any music that can follow justly the sublime adagio and serve as a finale, it must be by Beethoven, and it is without doubt the Lenore No. III.

Mr. Paur read the Symphony admirably, and the orchestra played with its usual beauty of tone, intelligence and spirit in spite of the unfavorable atmosphere.

⁂

It might be a pleasure to hear the music of "Peer Gynt" in its original form, as incidental music to Ibsen's play; but so long as there are many estimable persons in Boston who are persuaded that Ibsen is an "immoral" playwright, there is little or no chance of the experiment. In suite-form the music still gives delight, still is full of suggestion even to those who do not know the story of the Norwegian Faust; and the vulgarity of the fourth movement that startles in the concert hall may by its coarse vigor and grotesqueness be the very musical expression, or rather accentuation of expression, of the dramatic scene. It is the duty of the historian to state the fact that this vulgar fourth movement received the heartiest and most persistent applause received by any purely orchestral piece this season.

⁂

Miss Little sang the aria from "The Taming of the Shrew" in a painstaking manner. Her performance was not of such distinction that it caused you to forget that the music is not well suited to her voice, or that her upper tones are thin and hollow.

Philip Hale.

Boston Transcript
MONDAY, APRIL 26, 1897.

Music Hall; Boston Symphony Orchestra

The programme of the twenty-third symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Grieg: Suite No. 1 from the Music to "Peer Gynt," opus 46.
Goetz: Scena, "Die Kraft versagt," from "Der Widerspenstigen Zähmung."
Beethoven: Three orchestral movements from Symphony No. 9 in D minor, opus 125.
Beethoven: Overture to "Leonore," No. 3, opus 72.
Miss Lena Little was the singer

There is a good deal of genial dramatic gift shown in Grieg's music to Ibsen's "Peer Gynt;" one can easily imagine how enormously effective it must be, as an accompaniment to a stage performance of the play. Perhaps it is only by keeping the dramatic situation steadily before one's mind that one can appreciate its finest essence in the concert-room; and this is not hard to do, for the music really invites you to it. The performance last Saturday evening was excellent almost throughout. In Anitra's Dance one felt that a little more of sensuous swaying, a little less of angularity, in the phrasing might have suggested more vividly the voluptuous sinuosity of Oriental dancing; the thing sounded at moments rather pert and chic than dreamily seductive. But the other movements were admirably given, the grim humor of the scene in the Hall of the Mountain King being brought out to perfection. As usual, this last movement escaped an encore only through the conductor's firmness.

We were heartily glad to see the three orchestral movements from the ninth symphony on the programme. In general, we have no very keen sympathy with some of our colleagues today, who advocate giving parts of symphonies instead of the whole. Indeed, there are but few symphonies which we should care to see dismembered in this way. But in some cases there are excellent reasons for not giving such works entire. Take, for instance, Rubinstein's "Océan;" the first movement is so head-and-shoulders above the rest of the work, it is so strong and inspiring compared with the dulness of the others, that we should well like to hear it played separately—like a sort of concert overture. It is eminently worth hearing; but wading through the dreary remainder of the symphony is paying somewhat too high a price for the privilege. The three orchestral movements in the ninth symphony, too, seem to us well worth giving without the choral finale—if for quite other reasons. In the first place, it is not easy to bring about frequent performances of the whole of Beethoven's great opus 125; there are practical difficulties in the way. And one would like to hear any part of the great work oftener than once in a dog's age. Again, it is well worth while to give the purely orchestral portions of the symphony now and then under conditions which will insure their producing their fullest possible effect. Now, when the whole symphony is given, a more or less numerous chorus is grouped around the orchestra, thus damping the tone of the latter to a very appreciable degree. It may be said in general that the purely orchestral numbers in choral compositions are heard at a certain disadvantage; the very presence of the chorus on the platform is an untoward acoustical condition. Give the orchestral movements in the ninth symphony without the choral finale, and you at once insure their being heard under as favorable conditions as the composer's other symphonies. This, as we have said, is eminently worth while; it compensates one in considerable measure for the loss of the finale.

And just here we are reminded of something that strikes us as rather curious. The Boston Symphony Orchestra has now been giving its symphony concerts for sixteen seasons; in all this time it seems never to have occurred to any of its four conductors to give the three symphonic movements from Mendelssohn's Hymn of Praise! They are in precisely the same case as the three orchestral movements from the ninth symphony. Our Boston public has, we believe, never heard them, save under the poor acoustical conditions we have mentioned above, that is, with the orchestra surrounded and damped by a large mass of chorus-singers. One would like, for once in a way, to hear these movements played by our matchless orchestra, and in the best conditions for sonority and brilliancy. Besides, this would make some welcome variety in the eternal alternation of "Scotch" and "Italian;" it is hardly worth while to give the "Reformation" oftener than once in a great while; it may even be doubted whether giving it at all be not an injustice to the composer, who was much dissatisfied with this posthumous symphony of his, and would doubtless have remodelled it, had he not died before his time. But the three orchestral movements from the Hymn of Praise would be a boon to Mendelssohn-lovers. For matter of that, why not give the Scherzo from the "Reformation" symphony oftener by itself?

As for last Saturday's performance of the three movements from Beethoven's ninth, it may be said heartily that the orchestra showed itself at its very best, showed itself as it generally does when it has to do with a task that thoroughly interests it, when it has to play something that is at once fine and difficult. For nothing bores a fine orchestra more in the long run than having to do easy work. But, apart from the technical excellence of the performance, there were some distasteful points in it. The tempo of the first movement was simply inconceivable. Had the men not played so admirably, the performance of this movement might have been taken for a serio-comic imitation of a country orchestra's trying over a difficult piece for the first time—at the timid, "safe" tempo usual in such cases. People whose avocations lead them to frequent the purlieus of the Ruth Burrage Room have heard this tempo from young ladies reading eight-hand arrangements at sight. The result last Saturday evening was instructive; for the first time in our experience, the first movement of the ninth symphony hardly got a hand! The audience hardly noticed it! The Scherzo, on the other hand, went admirably. It was hard put to it, to be sure, to rouse the audience from the atrophy into which the maltreatment of the first movement had thrown it; it could not at once disperse the clouds of discontent that hovered over the hall; even the players [illegible] that there was a lack of immediate response, for after a while they somewhat relaxed that fine vigor of accent that gave such a lilt to the first few pages of the movement. But, on the whole, the Scherzo went mightily well. The performance of the great Adagio was a dream of beauty; perhaps a little over-sophisticated at times, but wonderfully carried out. This slow movement was the high water mark of the concert.

The "Leonore" overture was played with immense brilliancy and effect. One regretted that vulgar trick of beginning the Allegro slow—in pianissimo—and then whipping up the tempo with the gradual crescendo; that little hiccough, too, in the second theme—as if the phrase had suddenly stubbed its toe—might have been spared us. Oh! if conductors would only not try always to do "something new" with Beethoven! If they would only be content to cut their initials on the covers of his works, not on the music itself! His symphonies and overtures have by this time got to be like the eternal rocks in popular summer resorts; covered with advertisements of "infallible tonics" and "pick-me-ups."

Miss Little sang the scena from Goetz's "Taming of the Shrew" with much intelligence and great beauty of feeling. We think, however, that her choice was a mistake. In the first place, her contralto voice has not the tessitura for the music; she may rise fairly and squarely, and without too much effort, to its highest phrases; but the part was written for a mezzo-soprano, and its greatest stress lies just where Miss Little's voice has the least mordancy of timbre. But then, this is still not the most important point. We have so often—and, as we think, with justice—spoken disparagingly of the sad failures most great opera-singers make when they attempt to sing vocal chamber-music—such as Schubert, Schumann, or Franz songs—that we cannot help laying some stress upon this example of the converse proposition. Miss Little is an excellent song-singer; she has been brought up in that school and is at home in that field. She must often have felt, while hearing this or that famous operatic diva sing chamber-songs, how far the artist was from doing them true justice. The opera-singer lacked something that was indispensable to good song-singing, and at the same time had something that was irreconcilable with it. Did it never occur to Miss Little that this might be precisely her own case in relation to opera-music and other essentially dramatic writing? The "universal" singer, who can sing anything and everything about equally well, is all but unheard-of; especially is there a certain inherent antagonism between the two domains of dramatic and chamber singing that almost forbids of one and the same singer well mastering both styles. To sing a Schumann song "dramatically" is one thing—and some of Schumann's songs call for dramatic singing, of a sort;—but to sing an opera-scena dramatically is quite another thing. That broad dramatic sweep, that quasi-excessiveness of style, that belong to the lyric stage, that laying on the colors with a trowel, of which great opera-singers have the secret,—these things, this peculiar and specific power, are out of the song-singer's ken; if she had this power, she would be no song-singer. Miss Little sang Goetz's scena creditably, but without effect.

The next, and last, programme is made up wholly of works by Richard Wagner, and is as follows: Prelude to "Parsifal"; Eine Faust-Ouvertüre; prelude to Act I., and introduction to Act III., of "Lohengrin"; Siegfried-Idyl; overture to "Rienzi"; "Waldweben," from "Siegfried"; the Ride of the Valkyrior, from "Die Walküre."

THE MUSICAL COURIER.
NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 28, 1897.

The program of the twenty-third Symphony conce (April 24) was as follows:

Suite No. 1, from music to Peer Gynt..............................Grieg
Scena, Die Kraft Versagt, from Der Widerspentigen Zähmung..........Goetz
First three orchestral movements from Symphony No. 9, in D minor..........Beethoven
Overture to Leonore, No. 3..............................Beethov

The air in the hall was thick, hot, foul. Yet in in spi of this the orchestra played with its customary brillianc and wealth of tonal color. The air from The Taming of the Shrew is hardly suited to Miss Lena Little, a contralto, who sang in painstaking fashion and without any marke distinction.

Of the pieces themselves there is nothing to be said a this late day. I am not arrogant enough to discover new beauties in the Ninth Symphony, and I still find the fourth movement of the Peer Gynt suite brutal and vulgar in the concert room; in the theatre, no doubt, it accentuates the scene. This same movement was applauded frenetically and persistently. No work by Beethoven, Brahms, Tschaikowsky or any other composer of reputation received suc boisterous honor this season.

⁂

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, MAY 2, 1897.

The program of the 24th and final concert of the 16th season of the Symphony concert, Emil Paur, conductor, was made up exclusively of pieces by Wagner: Prelude, "Parsifal," Faust overture, Preludes to Acts I. and III. of "Lohengrin," A Siegfried Idyl, Overture to "Rienzi," Forest sounds from "Siegfried," The Ride of the Valkyres.

This program showed in clear light the genius of Wagner—the genius of mysticism as in Parsifal, the genius of Nature as in Siegfried, and the genius of Vulgarity as in the obscene "Rienzi" overture. The genius of dullness was not forgotten—witness the dreary Faust overture.

Mr. Paur was most heartily applauded at this last concert of the season by a very large audience. This tribute was undoubtedly paid the orchestra as well as Mr. Paur. The brilliancy of the orchestra is as pronounced as are the honesty and the faithfulness of the leader, who may well be proud to be at the head of such a band of musicians as well as virtuosos.

I give a statistical review of the season in another column of the Journal. It will there be seen that the programs as a whole have been diversified, and that a reasonable number of new works have been played. I hope the time will come when it will not be regarded as absolutely necessary to perform yearly the three stock overtures of Weber and the three stock symphonies of Mozart. Such familiarity—but the proverb is musty. American composers were not well treated last season. There is no reason why a composer should meet with recognition simply because he is an American; but when Mr. MacDowell, one of the few great composers now living, happens to be an American, neglect of him is unpardonable. There was talk of producing new orchestral works by Prof. Paine and Mr. Chadwick; but the talk came to nothing. Then there is a symphony by Mr. Templeton Strong that deserves at least a hearing. Nor is Mr. Paur ignorant of the fact that such a work exists.

Philip Hale.

I propose to give a statistical review of the concerts of the late season. I have verified the list with care; but I do not flatter myself with the belief that the list is wholly without error.

No mention is made here of concerts of a quasi-private nature. There are concerts that are simply for the "Society editor," concerts that are not unlike afternoon teas with music, where a patroness pours the strong fluid of flattery to the real and abiding injury of the supposed beneficiary.

The following pieces were heard for the first time in Boston at concerts of the 16th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, led by Mr. Emil Paur:

Symphonies—E minor "Gaelic" op. 32 (MS), Mrs. Beach, Oct. 31; C major, Dittersdorf (tinkered by Hermann Kretzschmar), Jan. 16; F minor No. 4, Tschaikowsky, entire (two movements were played Oct. 18, 1890). The program book stated Feb. 13, 1897, that Tschaikowsky's 2d symphony was played that night for the first time; but the symphony was played here by Damrosch's orchestra Dec. 9, 1891.

Symphonic Poems—"Lenore," Duparc, Dec. 5; "Wallensteins Lager," Smetana, Jan. 2; "Death and Transfiguration," Richard Strauss, Feb. 6.

Suites—"Jeux d'Enfants," Bizet, Dec. 26; "Scheherazade," Rimsky-Korsakoff, April 17.

Overtures, Preludes, etc.—Overture "Gwendoline," Chabrier, Oct. 24; Overture in D major, Handel, Dec. 25; overture "Othello," Dvorak, Feb. 6; prelude to Act II. "Ingwelde," Schillings, Nov. 7; Preludes to Act II. and Act III. of "Konigskinder," Humperdinck, Dec. 26; Intermezzo from "Cricket on the Hearth," Goldmark, Nov. 21.

Miscellaneous—"Burial of Ophelia," Bourgault-Ducondray, Oct. 17; Slavonic Rhapsody, No. 3, Dvorak, Oct. 24; "Invitation to the Dance," Weingartner, March 13; Ballet Music from "Don Juan," Gluck, Dec. 26.

Concertos, etc.—'Cello Concerto, Dvorak (Mr. Schroeder), Dec. 19; piano concerto, No. 2, Schuett (Mr. Proctor), Jan. 2; fantasia for piano and orchestra, Arthur Whiting, March 6 (Mr. Whiting); Rondo for 'cello, op. 94, Dvorak, April 3 (Mr. Schulz); Sevillana from Don Cesar de Bazan," Massenet, Nov. 7 (Melba); four "Serious" songs by Brahms, April 10 (Max Heinrich).

Of these new pieces two were by Americans—Mrs. Beach and Mr. Whiting. Two were by Russians—Tschaikowsky and Rimsky-Korsakoff.

Five were by Frenchmen—Duparc, Bizet, Chabrier, Massenet and Bourgault-Ducondray.

Twelve Germans, reckoning Handel and the Bohemians as German, were represented by hitherto unknown works: Dittersdorf, Handel, Gluck, Richard Strauss, Schillings, Humperdinck, Goldmark, Weingartner, Schütt, Smetana, Dvorak (3), Brahms.

The program book of Feb. 20 says that Liszt's "Carnival at Pesth" (arranged for orchestra) was played for the first time in Boston at that concert. I do not believe the statement.

* * *

The following were the soloists of the 16th season:

Six singers—Melba, Nov. 7; Lena Little, April 24; Campanari, Oct. 31; Plancon, Dec. 6; Max Heinrich, Jan. 30, April 10; Ben Davies, April 3.

Seven pianists—Adele Aus der Ohe, Jan. 16; Teresa Carreno, Feb. 20; Sieveking, Oct. 24; Proctor, Jan. 2; Whiting, March 6; Burmeister, March 20; Joseffy, April 17.

Four violinists; Carl Halir, Nov. 28; Loeffler, Jan. 9; Kneisel, Feb. 13, April 10; Adamowski, March 13.

Two 'cellists: Schroeder, Dec. 19, April 10; Schulz, April 3.

Four women and fifteen men.

Of these soloists Messrs. Campanari, Plancon, Halir and Proctor made their first appearance at a symphony concert.

The number of performances by the others, ending May 1, 1897, are as follows: Kneisel, 17; Loeffler, 14; Adamowski, 11; Schroeder, 7; Schulz, 6; Max Heinrich, 6; Joseffy, 5; Ausder Ohe, 5; Melba, 3; Burmeister, 2; Sieveking, 2; Carreno, 2; Whiting, 2; Davies, 2; Lena Little, 2.

* * *

And now I give the list of all the pieces played and sung at the Symphony Concerts during the season of '96-97:

Bargiel—Adagio for 'cello and orchestra.

Beach, Mrs.—Gaelic Symphony.

Beethoven—Symphonies Nos. 1, 4, 8 and 9 (three movements); Violin concerto; Overtures, "Coriolanus," "Prometheus," "Fidelio," "Leonore No. 3."

Berlioz—Overtures, "Benvenuto Cellini," "Roman Carnival."

Bizet—"Jeux d'Enfants;" entr'actes and ballet music from "Carmen."

Bourgault-Ducondray—"Burial of Ophelia."

Brahms—Symphonies Nos. 3, 4; violin concerto; concerto for violin and 'cello; Tragic overture; Academic overture; St. Anthony variations; four serious songs (Mr. Heinrich).

Chabrier—Overture "Gwendoline" (twice).

Cherubini—Overture "Anacreon."

Chopin—Piano concerto in F minor (Mr. Burmeister.)

Cornelius—Overture "Barber of Bagdad."

Cowen—"Scandinavian Symphony."

Dittersdorf—Symphony in C major.

Duparc—Symphonic poem "Lenore."

Dvorak—Symphony No. 5; Overture "Othello;" Concerto for 'cello; Rondo for 'cello; Slavonic Rhapsody No. 3.

Gluck—Overture "Iphigenia in Aulis;" Ballet music from "Don Juan."

Goetz—Aria from "Taming of the Shrew" (Miss Little).

Goldmark—Overture "Sakuntala;" Intermezzo from "Cricket on the Hearth."

Grieg—Suite, "Peer Gynt" No. 1.

Handel—Overture in D major; "Deeper and Deeper" and "Waft Her, Angels" (Mr. Ben Davies).

Haydn—Symphonies No. 2 in D major and No. 9 in C minor; Air "Behold Along the Dewy Grass" (Mr. Plancon).

Humperdinck—Preludes from "Konigskinder."

Lalo—Symphonie Espagnole for violin and orchestra (Mr. Adamowski).

Leoncavello—Prologue "Pagliacci" (Mr. Campanari).

Liszt—"Carnival in Pesth;" Scene in Tavern (Mephisto Waltz); piano concerto in E flat (Miss Aus der Ohe).

Loeffler—Divertimento for violin and orchestra (Mr. Loeffler).

Massenet—Sevillana from "Don Caesar" (Mrs. Melba); "Vision Fugitive" from "Herodiade."

Mendelssohn — Symphonies "Italian," "Scotch;" Overture, Scherzo, Nocturne, wedding march from "Midsummer Night's Dream."

Mozart—Symphonies, E flat major, G minor, Jupiter; Overture "Don Giovanni;" Aria "L'Amero" from "Il Re pastore" (Mrs. Melba).

Rimsky-Korsakoff—Suite, "Scheherazade."

Rubinstein—Ocean Symphony; piano concerto in D minor No. 4 (Mrs. Carreno); Ballet music "Feramors."

Saint-Saens—Suite in D major.

Shillings—Prelude to Act II. "Ingwelde."

Schubert—Symphonies "Unfinished," C major No. 9; Overture "Rosamunde;" songs, Greisengesang, Gruppe aus dem Tartarus, An Schwager Kronos (Mr. Heinrich).

Schuett—Piano concerto No. 2 (Mr. Proctor).

Schumann—Symphonies, Nos. 2, 3, 4; Overture "Manfred;" piano concerto (Mr. Joseffy).

Smetana—Symphonic Poem "Wallenstein's Camp."

Strauss, Richard—Symphonic poem "Death and Transfiguration."

Tschaikowsky—Symphonies Nos. 2, 4, 6; piano concerto No. 1 (Mr. Sieveking).

Volkmann—Overture "Richard III."

Wagner—Overture "Tannhauser;" prelude "Parsifal;" a Faust overture; "Lohengrin" prelude to Act I. and prelude to Act III.; a Siegfried idyl; overture, "Rienzi;" "Forest Sounds" from "Siegfried;" "Ride of the Walkyries," from "Die Walkure;" Poyner's address (Mr. Plancon).

Weber—Overtures "Euryanthe," "Freischutz," "Oberon." See Weingartner.

Weingartner—Arrangement of Weber's "Invitation to Dance."

Whiting, Arthur—Fantasia for piano and orchestra (Mr. Whiting).

The nationality of the composers is as follows: 25 are German, reckoning among them Dvorak, Smetana and Liszt; 8 are French; 3 are Russian; 2 are Italian; 2 are American; 1 is Polish; 1 is Scandinavian; 1 is English; and I confess I do not know to what nation Mr. Loeffler wishes to be assigned; he would honor America by calling himself an American.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CI., NO. 122.

SUNDAY, MAY 2, 1897.

CLOSE OF SYMPHONY SEASON.

Concert Enjoyed by Largo and Enthusiastic Audience.

A Wagner Programme Splendidly Interpreted—An Ovation for Mr. Paur at End of the Concert—Both the Orchestra and Conductor at Their Very Best.

The last concert of this season's series by the Boston Symphony orchestra took place in Music Hall last evening. The programme was devoted wholly to Wagner, and was:

Prelude to "Parsifal."
A "Faust" overture.
Prelude to act 1 of "Lohengrin."
Introduction to act 3 of "Lohengrin."
A "Siegfried" idyl.
Overture to "Rienzi."
"Forest Sounds," from "Siegfried," act 2.
"The Ride of the Valkyrior," from "The "Valkyr," act 3.

The audience was a very large one, and its enthusiasm was exceeding, as is always the case with a Wagner programme for a Symphony concert attraction. The selections were skilfully made and contrasted, and presented the composer in his most lucid and pleasing vein. The noble "Parsifal" prelude stands apart as one of the loftiest of Wagner's inspirations. After this the range was all the way from the Faust overture, with its symphonic proportions, down to the vulgar, but inspiriting and always exciting, circus overture to "Rienzi."

The orchestra has been heard in all these works again and again, and there is nothing new to be said of them, and little more of the manner in which they were read and performed, except that they were never so completely well rendered before. The "Faust" overture was interpreted with perfect clearness and with powerful effect. The really wonderful beauty of tone of the string orchestra has rarely been made so convincingly apparent as it was in the "Parsifal" prelude, nor its splendid virtuosity more brilliantly exemplified than in the "Ride of the Valkyries." In fact, the 16th season closed, as was fitting it should, with a display of the powers of the orchestra at their very best. The achievements of conductor and players reflected the highest honor on both, and that the audience felt this was shown in the exceptionally hearty applause it bestowed on the performances through the whole concert.

Mr. Paur, who was welcomed with an unusually cordial and prolonged reception on his first appearance, because at the close of the concert the central point in a demonstration which brought him forward some half dozen or more times amid furious hand-clapping and cries of "bravo" and "auf wiedersehen." There was a hearty spontaneity in it that left no doubt regarding its sincerity, and he could not but have felt gratified by this testimony of the esteem in which he personally and the manner in which he has acquitted himself of his task at the head of the orchestra are held by the patrons of these concerts.

And speaking of the orchestra, the Symphony rehearsal season ended Friday afternoon in a blaze of glory with the Wagner programme. The hall was jammed. When the "Lohengrin" wedding prelude was reached, people beamed with delight. It was not only superbly played, but it seemed so in touch with the Easter atmosphere.

A Review of the Symphony Season—Calve's Great Success in Yesterday's Concert—Sousa Concert Tonight—"The Walking Delegate" and "Valhalla"—Musical Notes.

The 16th season of the Boston Symphony orchestra, just ended, and the fourth season of Mr. Paur's control of the orchestra, calls for a brief review. Of the orchestra it may justly be said that it has never been on a higher and more brilliant plane of efficiency than the close of last night's performance left it. Mr. Paur has steadily grown in favor as the conductor of this splendid organization, and the results show that, all things considered, he is the best equipped conductor that has as yet directed the orchestra. Mr. Gericke had many admirable qualifications for the position, and by his skill in disciplining it, and the constant care he exercised in bringing it to a state of technical perfection, first made it notable among the great orchestras of the world, but something of fire and largeness was sacrificed to his fondness for extreme finish in execution, and to his singular prejudice against letting the brass assert itself even when such assertion was a crucial element in a performance. Mr. Nikisch was not without merit of a certain kind, and was abundant enough in artistic spirit, but he had little sympathy with the classic composers, whom he modernized remorselessly, and into whose music he injected overmuch of his own supersentimental individuality. In addition, he was a very poor disciplinarian, and the orchestra degenerated under his lead until it had lost nearly all of the finer qualities that had been imparted to it by Mr. Gericke. Mr. Paur, on the other hand, is broader and more eclectic in style, is a thorough disciplinarian, and it was not long after he took control that the orchestra began to recover rapidly what it had lost under his predecessor, and it now stands recognized beyond cavil as an organization unsurpassed in its kind.

The programmes of the season presented a larger proportion of works not heard here before than has been usual. Among them were Bourgault-Ducoudray's "Burial of Ophelia," Bizet's "Jeux d'Enfants," Chabrier's overture to "Gwendoline," Dittersdorf's Symphony [illegible] Duparc's symphonic poem, "Lenore," Dvorak's Slavonic Rhapsody, No. 3, the same composer's overture to "Othello," and rondo for 'cello and orchestra, op. 94; selections from theb allet of Gluck's "Don Juan," Goldmarck's prelude to part 3 of "The Cricket on the Hearth," Handel's overture No. 1, in D major; Schutt's concerto for piano, No. 2, in F minor; selections from Humperdinck's "Koenigskinder," Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scherazade," Saint-Saens' suite for orchestra in D major, Schillings' prelude to act 3 of "Ingwelde," Smetana's symphonic poem, "Valdstynur tabor"; Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Death and Redemption"; Tschaikowsky's symphony No. 4, in F minor; Weingartner's arrangement of Weber's "Invitation to Dance," Mrs. Beach's "Gaelic" symphony, which had its first performance anywhere, and Mr. Arthur B. Whiting's fantasia for pianoforte and orchestra, in B-flat minor. Twenty-three works in all, or a trifle over one-fifth of all the works presented.

Of the composers represented in the season's programmes Wagner heads the list with 10 works; Beethoven follows with nine, Brahms with eeven, Mozart, Schumann and Dvorak with five each; Weber with four, Haydn, Schubert, Mendelssohn and Liszt with three each; Berlioz, Bizet, Gluck, Goldmark, Handel and Massenet, with two each; and Bargiel, Mrs. Beach, Ducoudray, Chabrier, Cherubini, Chopin, Cornelius, Cowen, Dittersdorf, Duparc, Getz, Grieg, Humperdinck, Lalo, Leoncavallo, Loeffler, Korsakoff, Saint-Saens, Schillings, Schutt, Smetana, Richard Strauss, Volkman and A. B. Whiting with one each. As will be seen, the selections were fairly distributed among composers of different nationalities. One hundred compositions were performed.

The soloists were Messrs. T. Adamowski, Richard Burmeister, G. Campanari, Ben Davies, Carl Halir, Max Heinrich, Rafael Joseffy, Franz Kneisel, C. M. Loeffler, Pol Plancon, G. W. Proctor, Alwin Schroeder, Leo Schulz, Martinus Sieveking, A. B. Whiting, Mme. Teresa Carreno, Mme. Melba, Miss Lena Little, Miss Adele Aus der Ohe. There were seven piano soloists, four violin soloists, five vocalists and two 'cello soloists.

The first concert of the 17th season will take place Saturday evening, Oct. 16.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, MAY 2, 1897.

LAST SYMPHONY.

Close of the Sixteenth Season—Large Audience—Year's Review.

With the concert of last night the sixteenth Symphony season was brought to a brilliant close. Whether it was due to the fact that it was the final chance to hear Mr. Paur's band for the present, or to the programme, entirely made up of Wagner music, there was nevertheless almost the largest audience of the season present, and both conductor and musicians were in just such accord with the occasion as to give an altogether delightful interpretation of the long programme. Indeed, from the enthusiastic manner with which the orchestra always enters into a Wagnerian composition, it would seem that the players fairly revelled in the music of this composer, and certain it is that such a programme as that of last night never lacks an appreciative audience here in Boston.

There were six numbers on the programme—the prelude to "Parsifal," a "Faust" overture, the prelude to Act I. and the introduction to Act III. of "Lohengrin," a "Siegfried" idyl, the overture to "Rienzi," a concert arrangement of the music of Act II. of "Siegfried," and the "Ride of the Walkures" from "Die Walkure." The music of "Parsifal" is as little heard here as any of Wagner's music, and played as it was last night its many beauties were splendidly brought out. The two "Siegfried" numbers furnished the tender, poetic portion of the programme and came in just their proper places between the more stirring and dramatic compositions with their rich and effective orchestration and bizarre effects.

Each number was enthusiastically encored, and at the close of the concert Mr. Paur was obliged to appear several times on the platform and bow his acknowledgments for the long continued demonstration. The opening concert of the seventeenth season will be held on Oct. 16 next.

The programmes throughout the season have been well arranged and have included exactly 100 different compositions by forty-three composers, representing various nationalities. Wagner has had a place on the programmes oftener than any other composer, ten selections of his works having been played. Nine compositions of Beethoven and seven by Brahms are the next highest. Dvorak, Mozart and Schumann each were represented five times, and several writers had two or three numbers performed. Twenty-four composers had a place in the concert programmes only once each during the season. Some of the more notable soloists who have appeared are Mme. Melba, Giuseppi Campanari, Pol Plancon and Ben Davies, for singers; Mme. Teresa Carreno, Adele aus der Ohe, Rafael Joseffy and Martinus Sieveking, pianists; Carl Halir, violinist; besides which other soloists have been drawn from the Symphony ranks as follows: Timothee Adamowski, Franz Kneisel, C. M. Loeffler, violinists, and Alwin Schroeder and Leo Schulz, violoncellists. There have been few disappointments or changes in the matter of soloists, and in such cases it has been known by the patrons of these concerts that under such conditions possibly arising the management has not been at fault at all. Illness or some unforeseen cause has prevented the soloists from appearing where such a misfortune has happened.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, MAY 3, 1897.

Symphonic Season Came to an End With a Wagner Programme.

The symphonic season came to an end in a blaze of glory on Saturday, with a Wagner programme. It was a magnificent climax, and although it was entirely orchestral, the absence of solo numbers did not seem to diminish the ardor of the public, for a very large audience was present, and the applause was constant and unstinted. Mr. Paur received a very marked welcome as he took the stand.

It was a catholic programme, not bounding itself by Wagner's later hobbies, but presenting all phases of the music of this genius; the list ranged from "Rienzi" to "Parsifal." The prelude to the latter opera began the concert, and received a commendable reading. We have heard Mottl sentimentalize the beginning of this Vorspiel, even in the sacred precincts of Bayreuth; but there was no mawkishness in the interpretation of this occasion.

Those who imagine that Wagner is always restless in modulation should study the treatment of the Communion theme in this prelude; it is as diatonic and almost as fixed in tonality as if it were written by one of the old Flemish masters.

Now followed the "Faust" overture. It is a Faust almost without a Marguerite, the opposite of Gounod's conception, which gave to us a Marguerite with a very slight dash of Faust. It is a sorrowful, pessimistic Faust who carries on his struggle through this number, and the sombre subject produces rather indigestible music, yet Wagner loved the work for he rewrote it long after he had made his first draft of the composition. The performance was a superb one, and the work seemed to have more meaning than ever before, because of the beauty of the interpretation.

But with the two "Lohengrin" preludes the more comprehensible Wagner appeared upon the programme. Here one finds theories rather than hobby-horses; there is judicious proportion, and Melos does not yet thrust out Melody. The violins have plenty of difficult work in the treatment of the Holy Grail motive, which forms almost every part of the first prelude. Musicians made a furious protest when Beethoven, in his "Egmont" overture, sent his violins up to C, but here we have Wagner using still higher passages for the violins in harmonics, and also upsetting the old fashioned notion that heaven and celestial ecstasy must needs be represented by harp, and harp alone. Our first violins are so well equipped that they could have furnished 14 solo violins instead of the four demanded at the end, and the shading of the delicate passages was all that a Wagner would have desired.

The prelude to the third act of "Lohengrin" also gives opportunities to the violins as well as to the trombones, and both instruments were most effective in the popular climax. This number was the first part of the opera to become popular, and long before the whole work had attained to regular representation, this prelude was a standard work in the concert repertoire.

The "Siegfried Idyll," which followed, was a comparatively easy work for our orchestra. The work proves (if such proof were at all necessary) the absolute sincerity of Wagner's latest theories. Here is a composition which was not intended to go beyond his own family circle, yet in it the composer uses every device displayed in his public works; leitmotiven, continuity of melody, freedom of modulation, all are there in full measure, and the reiteration of guiding-figures is as conspicuous as in any of his latest operas.

There are two principal figures in this work, the "Melody of Peace" and the "Siegfried, the world's Treasure" motive, and these are repeated and repeated in a manner that, were anybody else the composer, would have led to great monotony, but here seems never to pall. These two themes are interwoven in a manner that breaks the contrapuntal slate, yet is undeniably beautiful in spite of its transgressions. The final interweaving in augmentation is ineffably tender, and was charmingly shaded.

And now came the "Crime of his Youth," as Wagner used to call it, the overture to "Rienzi." We cannot ride this hobby-horse with Wagner; the overture has some noble points that ought to keep it from any chance of that oblivion to which its composer wished to consign it. The Prayer is as lofty as the prayer in Dvorak's "Spectre's Bride," to which it has some affinity, and the short development is dramatic and fitting, but the closing theme is undeniably vulgar, more vulgar than anything in "The Huguenots." The trumpet calls were finely shaded, and deserve especial mention, as by the way, does the horn playing in the "Idyll."

"Waldweben," from "Siegfried," was again a great triumph for the violins, which are divided into myrial-voiced harmony in this number. When one compares the puny effect of this number as recently given in Mechanics' Hall, with its ineffable beauty on this occasion, comment is unnecessary, yet we must add that the weakness of the former performance was by no means the fault of the conductor.

The "Ride of the Valkyries" made a fine ending to a memorable concert. This is one of the finest horse-shows in all music; beside these tonal Bronchos, Berlioz's trotters on the road to Hades, Raff's "Lenore" team, St. Saens' "Phaeton" span, all seem like horse-car animals. What a whinneying and rearing! What wild animal spirits! One such number might be a man's passport to the company of the great masters. And it lost nothing in the performance. The musicians seemed all aglow with enthusiasm, and it was natural that this excitement should extend to the audience. Great applause followed the number, but this applause meant something more than an appreciation of the "Walkyren-ritt,"—it finally culminated (after the conductor had been recalled four times) in enthusiastic cheering, and it meant that Boston is sensible of what Mr. Paur and the men have done this season.

They have brought the orchestra far beyond any organization that America has [illegible] possessed, they have made our band [illegible] of the greatest European orchestras. [illegible] has been no previous season [illegible] of the orchestra has [illegible] musician must needs acknowledge this truth, without in the least endeavoring to detract from the merit of those who have gone before; we have had an enterprising conductor, and a most refined conductor (who weeded our orchestral garden for us and planted the seeds of our present harvest), and a poetic conductor, too, but the results of the present are beyond anything that has been in America's music before.

Louis C. Elson.

Boston Courier.
SUNDAY MORNING, MAY 2, 1897.

THE LAST SYMPHONY CONCERT OF THE SEASON, CALVE, ETC.

Since the Symphony patrons desired a full Wagner programme as a kind of pousse-cafe to top off the season's banquet with, Mr. Paur gratified them with that series of selections—all orchestral—which we specified last week and which could not have been bettered for such a purpose. The "Parsifal" prelude made a grave, broad, deep, rich and calm beginning, and the "Faust" overture opened the way to the grimmer, more turbulent and perturbed moods of gloom that struggles toward light and of brightness that is overwhelmed in darkness. The "Lohengrin" preludes, which contrast so vividly the airy flights of fancy and aspiration with the nervous, intense vitality of accomplishment and possession came next, followed by the "Siegfried Idyl," which somehow seemed a little tame, thin and inefficient after the gleaming strength of the resounding epithalamium. Then, just as the modern Wagner's systems of work and development began to betray their formalities and mannerisms, there was a sudden and complete return to Wagner in his youth, before he had begun to theorize and sophisticate, but not before he had touched upon the secrets of power, thrill and domination. Browning's Queen in his "In a Balcony" had longed all her life for some honest, full burst of common, plain humanity; that even a sentinel, as she said,

> "Lowering his halbert to salute the queen,
> Had flung it brutally and clasped my knees."

So the outpouring of common excitement, demagogue speech and popular shout of festival acclaim, in the old-fashioned "Rienzi" overture woke up the audience to much enthusiasm and applause. The sweet, soft "Wood Music" from "Siegfried" brought ten minutes of coolness and peacefulness, and then the concert ended with the irrepressible, furious speeding of the Valkyries on their glorious errands. The playing of the orchestra was constantly splendid and skilful, and Mr. Paur conducted with immense spirit, yet with all needed control and consideration.

The usual digest of the season's programmes was contained in the book of the evening, whence it appeared that just a hundred works had been played or sung, and that twenty-two of these were novelties to Boston, one of them—Mrs. Beach's "Gaelic" symphony—receiving its first performance. Three home composers were heard, and of the forty others a very respectable proportion were French and Slavonic.

The next season will begin on October 16, when Mr. Paur will enter upon his fifth year of service.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, MAY 2, 1897.

Close of the Symphony Season.

Mr Paur closed the 16th season of the Boston Symphony concerts with a program of Wagner music, a stately finale to a series which will rank favorably with any of its predecessors. It was purely orchestral music of the higher class, substantial and classic and without any special attraction in the form of soloists. The selections were the prelude to "Parsifal," a "Faust" overture, a prelude and introduction to "Lohengrin," a "Siegfried" idyl, the "Rienzi" overture, "Forest Sounds" from "Siegfried" and the ride of the Valkyrior, from "Die Walkure."

The orchestra was augmented for the occasion, to give certain effects designated in the composer's score. Of the general result of the performance there is little else but praise to be awarded the players, as the interpretation of a Wagner program to many auditors is satisfactory, if at times rather vague, when played by an organization like the symphony men.

The "Lohengrin" numbers were beautifully given, and the same may be said of the "Forest Sounds," from "Siegfried." The "Lohengrin" wedding music illustrated the notable ability of the band in presenting march like themes, fortissimo, with smoothness and resonance, and without a blatant character. In the "Forest Sounds" the tone pictures of woodland life were charmingly delicate, each motif being perfect in its quality and interpretation.

The rushing, reiterated phrases of the violins in the Valkyrior ride were splendidly played throughout, and the effects by the percussion instruments, the fortissimo passages and wild finale were given with thrilling and proper vigor. The other numbers call for no special mention aside from the fact that they were up to the usual standard of the orchestra. This concert closed the 16th season, and Mr Paur will begin the next series in Music hall, Oct 16.

In the summary for the season it is found that 100 works have been performed, Wagner leading with 10, Beethoven 9, Brahms 7 and Dvorak, Mozart and Schumann 5 each. Nineteen numbers new to Boston were performed, and Mrs H. H. A. Beach's "Gaelic" symphony was first given in public by this orchestra. The symphonies number 26; suites and serenades 4, overtures, preludes and symphonic poems 33, concerts and instrumental solos 15, scenas, etc, 8, and miscellaneous numbers 14.

The soloists of the season, as alphabetically arranged, were: Mr Thomas Adamowski, Mr Richard Burmeister, Mr Giuseppe Campanari, Mme Teresa Carreno, Mr Ben Davies, Mr Carl Halir, Mr Max Heinrich, Mr Rafael Joseffy, Mr Franz Kneisel, Miss Lena Little, Mr C. M. Loeffler, Mme Melba, Miss Adele aus der Ohe, Mr Pol Plancon, Mr George W. Proctor, Mr Alwin Schroeder, Mr Leo Schulz, Mr Martinus Sieveking, Mr Arthur B. Whiting.

[111]

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, MAY 3, 1897.

Symphonic Season Came to an End With a Wagner Programme.

The symphonic season came to an end in a blaze of glory on Saturday, with a Wagner programme. It was a magnificent climax, and although it was entirely orchestral, the absence of solo numbers did not seem to diminish the ardor of the public, for a very large audience was present, and the applause was constant and unstinted. Mr. Paur received a very marked welcome as he took the stand.

It was a catholic programme, not bounding itself by Wagner's later hobbies, but presenting all phases of the music of this genius; the list ranged from "Rienzi" to "Parsifal." The prelude to the latter opera began the concert, and received a commendable reading. We have heard Mottl sentimentalize the beginning of this Vorspiel, even in the sacred precincts of Bayreuth; but there was no mawkishness in the interpretation of this occasion.

Those who imagine that Wagner is always restless in modulation should study the treatment of the Communion theme in this prelude; it is as diatonic and almost as fixed in tonality as if it were written by one of the old Flemish masters.

Now followed the "Faust" overture. It is a Faust almost without a Marguerite, the opposite of Gounod's conception, which gave to us a Marguerite with a very slight dash of Faust. It is a sorrowful, pessimistic Faust who carries on his struggle through this number, and the sombre subject produces rather indigestible music, yet Wagner loved the work for he rewrote it long after he had made his first draft of the composition. The performance was a superb one, and the work seemed to have more meaning than ever before, because of the beauty of the interpretation.

But with the two "Lohengrin" preludes the more comprehensible Wagner appeared upon the programme. Here one finds theories rather than hobby-horses; there is judicious proportion, and Melos does not yet thrust out Melody. The violins have plenty of difficult work in the treatment of the Holy Grail motive, which forms almost every part of the first prelude. Musicians made a furious protest when Beethoven, in his "Egmont" overture, sent his violins up to C, but here we have Wagner using still higher passages for the violins in harmonics, and also upsetting the old fashioned notion that heaven and celestial ecstasy must needs be represented by harp, and harp alone. Our first violins are so well equipped that they could have furnished 14 solo violins instead of the four demanded at the end, and the shading of the delicate passages was all that a Wagner would have desired.

The prelude to the third act of "Lohengrin" also gives opportunities to the violins as well as to the trombones, and both instruments were most effective in the popular climax. This number was the first part of the opera to become popular, and long before the whole work had attained to regular representation, this prelude was a standard work in the concert repertoire.

The "Siegfried Idyll," which followed, was a comparatively easy work for our orchestra. The work proves (if such proof were at all necessary) the absolute sincerity of Wagner's latest theories. Here is a composition which was not intended to go beyond his own family circle, yet in it the composer uses every device displayed in his public works; leitmotiven, continuity of melody, freedom of modulation, all are there in full measure, and the reiteration of guiding-figures is as conspicuous as in any of his latest operas.

There are two principal figures in this work, the "Melody of Peace" and the "Siegfried, the world's Treasure" motive, and these are repeated and repeated in a manner that, were anybody else the composer, would have led to great monotony, but here seems never to pall. These two themes are interwoven in a manner that breaks the contrapuntal slate, yet is undeniably beautiful in spite of its transgressions. The final interweaving in augmentation is ineffably tender, and was charmingly shaded.

And now came the "Crime of his Youth," as Wagner used to call it, the overture to "Rienzi." We cannot ride this hobby-horse with Wagner; the overture has some noble points that ought to keep it from any chance of that oblivion to which its composer wished to consign it. The Prayer is as lofty as the prayer in Dvorak's "Spectre's Bride," to which it has some affinity, and the short development is dramatic and fitting, but the closing theme is undeniably vulgar, more vulgar than anything in "The Huguenots." The trumpet calls were finely shaded, and deserve especial mention, as by the way, does the horn playing in the "Idyll."

"Waldweben," from "Siegfried," was again a great triumph for the violins, which are divided into myrial-voiced harmony in this number. When one compares the puny effect of this number as recently given in Mechanics' Hall, with its ineffable beauty on this occasion, comment is unnecessary, yet we must add that the weakness of the former performance was by no means the fault of the conductor.

The "Ride of the Valkyries" made a fine ending to a memorable concert. This is one of the finest horse-shows in all music; beside these tonal Bronchos, Berlioz's trotters on the road to Hades, Raff's "Lenore" team, St. Saens' "Phaeton" span, all seem like horse-car animals. What a whinneying and rearing! What wild animal spirits! One such number might be a man's passport to the company of the great masters. And it lost nothing in the performance. The musicians seemed all aglow with enthusiasm, and it was natural that this excitement should extend to the audience. Great applause followed the number, but this applause meant something more than an appreciation of the "Walkyren-ritt,"—it finally culminated (after the conductor had been recalled four times) in enthusiastic cheering, and it meant that Boston is sensible of what Mr. Paur and the men have done this season.

They have brought the orchestra far beyond any organization that America has ever possessed, they have made our band the peer of the greatest European orchestras. There has been no previous season when the technique of the orchestra has Every musician must needs acknowledge this truth, without in the least endeavoring to detract from the merit of those who have gone before; we have had an enterprising conductor, and a most refined conductor (who weeded our orchestral garden for us and planted the seeds of our present harvest), and a poetic conductor, too, but the results of the present are beyond anything that has been in America's music before. Louis C. Elson.

Boston Courier.
SUNDAY MORNING, MAY 2, 1897.

THE LAST SYMPHONY CONCERT OF THE SEASON, CALVE, ETC.

Since the Symphony patrons desired a full Wagner programme as a kind of pousse-cafe to top off the season's banquet with, Mr. Paur gratified them with that series of selections—all orchestral—which we specified last week and which could not have been bettered for such a purpose. The "Parsifal" prelude made a grave, broad, deep, rich and calm beginning, and the "Faust" overture opened the way to the grimmer, more turbulent and perturbed moods of gloom that struggles toward light and of brightness that is overwhelmed in darkness. The "Lohengrin" preludes, which contrast so vividly the airy flights of fancy and aspiration with the nervous, intense vitality of accomplishment and possession came next, followed by the "Siegfried Idyl," which somehow seemed a little tame, thin and inefficient after the gleaming strength of the resounding epithalamium. Then, just as the modern Wagner's systems of work and development began to betray their formalities and mannerisms, there was a sudden and complete return to Wagner in his youth, before he had begun to theorize and sophisticate, but not before he had touched upon the secrets of power, thrill and domination. Browning's Queen in his "In a Balcony" had longed all her life for some honest, full burst of common, plain humanity; that even a sentinel, as she said,

> "Lowering his halbert to salute the queen,
> Had flung it brutally and clasped my knees."

So the outpouring of common excitement, demagogue speech and popular shout of festival acclaim, in the old-fashioned "Rienzi" overture woke up the audience to much enthusiasm and applause. The sweet, soft "Wood Music" from "Siegfried" brought ten minutes of coolness and peacefulness, and then the concert ended with the irrepressible, furious speeding of the Valkyries on their glorious errands. The playing of the orchestra was constantly splendid and skilful, and Mr. Paur conducted with immense spirit, yet with all needed control and consideration.

The usual digest of the season's programmes was contained in the book of the evening, whence it appeared that just a hundred works had been played or sung, and that twenty-two of these were novelties to Boston, one of them—Mrs. Beach's "Gaelic" symphony—receiving its first performance. Three home composers were heard, and of the forty others a very respectable proportion were French and Slavonic.

The next season will begin on October 16, when Mr. Paur will enter upon his fifth year of service.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, MAY 2, 1897.

Close of the Symphony Season.

Mr Paur closed the 16th season of the Boston Symphony concerts with a program of Wagner music, a stately finale to a series which will rank favorably with any of its predecessors. It was purely orchestral music of the higher class, substantial and classic and without any special attraction in the form of soloists. The selections were the prelude to "Parsifal," a "Faust" overture, a prelude and introduction to "Lohengrin," a "Siegfried" idyl, the "Rienzi" overture, "Forest Sounds" from "Siegfried" and the ride of the Valkyrior, from "Die Walkure."

The orchestra was augmented for the occasion, to give certain effects designated in the composer's score. Of the general result of the performance there is little else but praise to be awarded the players, as the interpretation of a Wagner program to many auditors is satisfactory, if at times rather vague, when played by an organization like the symphony men.

The "Lohengrin" numbers were beautifully given, and the same may be said of the "Forest Sounds," from "Siegfried." The "Lohengrin" wedding music illustrated the notable ability of the band in presenting march like themes, fortissimo, with smoothness and resonance, and without a blatant character. In the "Forest Sounds" the tone pictures of woodland life were charmingly delicate, each motif being perfect in its quality and interpretation.

The rushing, reiterated phrases of the violins in the Valkyrior ride were splendidly played throughout, and the effects by the percussion instruments, the fortissimo passages and wild finale were given with thrilling and proper vigor. The other numbers call for no special mention aside from the fact that they were up to the usual standard of the orchestra. This concert closed the 16th season, and Mr Paur will begin the next series in Music hall, Oct 16.

In the summary for the season it is found that 100 works have been performed, Wagner leading with 10, Beethoven 9, Brahms 7 and Dvorak, Mozart and Schumann 5 each. Nineteen numbers new to Boston were performed, and Mrs H. H. A. Beach's "Gaelic" symphony was first given in public by this orchestra. The symphonies number 26; suites and serenades 4, overtures, preludes and symphonic poems 33, concerts and instrumental solos 15, scenas, etc, 8, and miscellaneous numbers 14.

The soloists of the season, as alphabetically arranged, were: Mr Thomas Adamowski, Mr Richard Burmeister, Mr Giuseppe Campanari, Mme Teresa Carreno, Mr Ben Davies, Mr Carl Halir, Mr Max Heinrich, Mr Rafael Joseffy, Mr Franz Kneisel, Miss Lena Little, Mr C. M. Loeffler, Mme Melba, Miss Adele aus der Ohe, Mr Pol Plancon, Mr George W. Proctor, Mr Alwin Schroeder, Mr Leo Schulz, Mr Martinus Sieveking, Mr Arthur B. Whiting.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MAY 5, 1897.

The twenty-fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra closed last night the sixteenth season of the organization and the fourth year of Mr. Paur's conductorship. The program was exclusively Wagnerian. These were the pieces: Prelude to Parsifal; a Faust overture; Preludes to Act I. and Act III. of Lohengrin; a Siegfried Idyl; overture to Rienzi; Forest Sounds from Siegfried; Ride of the Valkyries. There was a very large audience and there was much enthusiasm. That vile and obscene thing, the Rienzi overture, was applauded frenetically. Mr. Paur and the orchestra received what is known in newspaper land as an ovation

* * *

The following pieces were played by the Symphony Orchestra for the first time in Boston:

Symphonies—E minor, Gaelic, op. 32 (MS.), Mrs. Beach, October 31; C major. Dittersdorf (tinkered by Hermann Kretszchmar), January 16; F minor, No. 4, Tschaikowsky, entire, November 28 (two movements were played October 18, 1890). The program book stated February 13, 1897, that Tschaikowsky's Second Symphony was played that night for the first time; but the symphony was played here by Damrosch's orchestra December 9, 1891.

Symphonic Poems—Lenore, Duparc, December 5; Wallensteins Lager, Smetana, January 2; Death and Transfiguration, Richard Strauss, February 6.

Suites—Jeux d'Enfants, Bizet, December 26; Scheherazade, Rimsky-Korsakoff, April 17.

Overtures, Preludes, &c.—Overture Gwendoline, Chabrier, October 24; overture in D major, Händel, December 25; overture Othello, Dvorák, February 6; prelude to Act II. Ingwelde, Schillings, November 7; preludes to Act II. and Act III. of Königskinder, Humperdinck, December 26; intermezzo from Cricket on the Hearth, Goldmark, November 21.

Miscellaneous—Burial of Ophelia, Bourgault-Ducoudray, October 17; Slavonic Rhapsody, No. 3, Dvorák, October 24; Invitation to the Dance, Weingartner, March 13; ballet music from Don Juan, Gluck, December 26.

Concertos, &c.—'Cello concerto, Dvorák (Mr. Schroeder), December 19; piano concerto, No. 2, Schuett (Mr. Proctor), January 2; fantasia for piano and orchestra, Arthur Whiting, March 6 (Mr. Whiting); rondo for 'cello, op. 94, Dvorák, April 3 (Mr. Schulz); Seviliana from Don Cesar de Bazan, Massenet, November 7 (Melba); four Serious Songs by Brahms, April 10 (Max Heinrich).

The composers of these previously unknown pieces are Mrs. Beach, Bizet, Bourgault-Ducoudray, Brahms, Chabrier, Dittersdorf, Duparc, Dvorák (three), Gluck, Goldmark, Händel, Humperdinck, Massenet, Rimsky-Korsakoff, Schillings, Schütt, Smetana, Richard Strauss, Tschaikowsky.

Twelve are Germans, reckoning Händel and the Bohemians as German; five are French, two are Russian and two are Americian.

The program book of May 1 states in the summing up of the season's work that Saint-Saëns' suite in D major, op. 49, was played October 17 for the first time in Boston. This statement is not true. The suite was played here first by Thomas' Orchestra, December 15, 1877.

Here is a list of all the works performed at the Symphony concerts during the season of 1896–7:

Bargiel—Adagio for violoncello and orchestra, op. 28 (Leo Schulz).
Beach, Mrs. H. H. A.—Symphony in E minor, Gaelic, op. 32.
Beethoven—
  Symphony No. 8, in F major, op. 93.
  Concerto for violin, in D major, op. 61 (Halir).
  Overture to Coriolan, op. 62.
  Overture to Fidelio, in E major, op. 72.
  Symphony No. 4, in B flat major, op. 60.
  Overture to Die Geschöpfe des Prometheus, op. 43.
  Symphony No. 1, in C major, op. 21.
  Three orchestral movements from Symphony No. 9, in D minor, op. 125.
  Overture to Leonore, No. 3, op. 72.
Berlioz—
  Overture to Benvenuto Cellini, op. 23.
  Overture to Le Carnaval Romain, op. 9.
Bizet—Suite, Jeux d'Enfants, op. 22.
  Entr'actes and ballet music from Carmen.
Bourgault-Ducoudray—L'Enterrement d'Ophélie.
Brahms—Variations on a Theme by Haydn, in B flat major, op. 56A.
  Symphony No. 3, in F major, op. 90.
  Concerto for violin in D major, op. 77 (Kneisel).
  Akademische Fest Ouverture, op. 80.
  Tragische Ouverture, op. 81.
  Concerto for violin and violoncello in A minor, op. 102 (Kneisel and Schroeder).
  Symphony No. 4, in E minor, op. 98.
Chabrier—Overture to Gwendoline (twice).
Cherubini—Overture to Anacréon, op. [illegible].
Chopin—Concerto for piano, No. 2, in F minor, op. 21 (Burmeister).
Cornelius—Overture to Der Barbier von Bagdad.
Cowen—Symphony No. 3, in C minor, Scandinavian.
Dittersdorf—Symphony in C major, arranged by Kretzschmar.
Duparc—Symphonic poem, Lenore.
Dvorák—Slavonic Rhapsody, No. 3, in A flat major, op. 45.
  Symphony No 5, in E minor, From the New World, op. 95.
  Concerto for violoncello, in B minor, op. 104 (Schroeder).
  Overture to Othello, op. 93.
  Rondo for violoncello and orchestra, op. 94 (Leo Schulz).
Gluck—Selections from the ballet Don Juan, arranged by Kretzschmar.
  Overture to Iphigénie en Aulide, arranged by Wagner.
Goetz—Scena, Die Kraft Versagt, from Der Widerspenstigen Zähmung (Little).
Goldmark—Prelude to Part III. of Heimchen am Herd.
  Overture to Sakuntala, op. 13.
Grieg—Suite No. 1, from Peer Gynt, op. 46.
Händel—Overture No. 1, in D major, arranged by Wüllner.
  Recitation, Deeper and Deeper Still, and air, Waft Her, Angels, from Jephthah (Ben Davies).
Haydn—Air, Behold Along the Dewy Grass, from The Seasons (Plançon).
  Symphony in C minor (Breitkopf & Härtel, No. 9).
  Symphony in D major (Breitkopf & Härtel, No. 2).
Humperdinck—Selections from music to Königskinder.
Lalo—Symphonie Espagnole, for violin and orchestra, op. 21 (T. Adamowski).
Leoncavallo—Tonio's Prologue, from Pagliacci (Campanari).
Liszt—Concerto for piano, No. 1, in E flat major (Aus der Ohe).
  Scene in the Tavern (Mephisto Waltz), from Lenau's Faust.
  Hungarian Rhapsody No. 6, Pesther Carneval.
Loeffler—Divertimento for violin and orchestra, in A minor, op. 9 (Loeffler).
Massenet—Air, Vision Fuggitiva, from Hérodiade (Campanari).
  Sevillana in D major, from Don César de Bazan (Melba).
Mendelssohn—Symphony No. 4, in A major, Italian, op. 90.
  Overture, op. 21, Scherzo, Notturno and Wedding March from Midsummer Night's Dream, op. 61.
  Symphony No. 3, in A minor, Scotch, op. 56.
Mozart—Symphony No. 41, in C major, Jupiter.
  Aria, L'Amèro, from Il rè Pastore (Melba, Kneisel).
  Symphony No. 39, in E flat major.
  Overture to Don Giovanni.
  Symphony No. 40, in G minor.
Rimsky-Korsakoff—Symphonic suite, Scheherazade, op. 35.
Rubinstein—Symphony No. 2, in C major, Océan, op. 42 (second version).
  Ballet music from Feramors.
  Concerto for piano, No. 4, in D minor, op. 70 (Carreño).
Saint-Saëns—Suite for orchestra, in D major, op. 49.
Schillings—Prelude to Act II. of Ingwelde.
Schubert—Unfinished symphony in B minor.
  Symphony No. 9, in C major.
  Overture to Rosamunde, op. 26.
Schumann—Symphony No. 2, in C major, op. 61.
  Overture to Manfred, op. 115.
  Symphony No. 4, in D minor, op. 120.
  Concerto for piano, in A minor, op. 54 (Joseffy).
  Symphony No. 3, in E flat major, Rhenish, op. 97.
Schütt—Concerto for piano, No. 2, in F minor, op. 47 (Proctor).
Smetana—Symphonic poem, Valdstynuv Tábor.
Strauss, R.—Tone poem, Tod und Verklärung, op. 24.
Tschaikowsky—Concerto for piano, No. 1, in B flat minor, op. 35 (Sieveking).
  Symphony No. 4, in F minor, op. 36.
  Symphony No. 2, in C minor, op. 17.
  Symphony No. 6, in B minor, Pathétique, op. 74.
Volkmann—Overture to Shakespeare's Richard III., op. 68.
Wagner—Wotan's Farewell, from Die Walküre (Plançon).
  Overture to Tannhäuser.
  Prelude to Parsifal.
  Eine Faust Ouverture.
  Prelude to Lohengrin.
  Introduction to Act III. of Lohengrin.
  Ein Siegfried Idyll.
  Overture to Rienzi.
  Waldweben, from Siegfried.
  The Ride of the Valkyries, from Die Walküre.
Weber—Overture to Euryanthe.
  Overture to Der Freischütz.
  Aufforderung zum Tanz, op. 65, arranged by Weingartner.
  Overture to Oberon.
Whiting, Arthur B.—Fantasia for piano and orchestra in B flat minor, op. 11 (Whiting).

SUMMARY.

Bargiel	1	Lalo	1
Beach, Mrs. H. H. A	1	Leoncavallo	1
Beethoven	9	Liszt	3
Berlioz	2	Loeffler	1
Bizet	2	Massenet	2
Bourgault-Ducoudray	1	Mendelssohn	3
Brahms	7	Mozart	5
Chabrier	1	Rimsky-Korsakoff	1
Cherubini	1	Rubinstein	3
Chopin	1	Saint-Saëns	1
Cornelius	1	Schillings	1
Cowen	1	Schubert	3
Dittersdorf	1	Schumann	5
Duparc	1	Schütt	1
Dvorák	5	Smetana	1
Gluck	2	Strauss, R	1
Goetz	1	Tschaikowsky	4
Goldmark	2	Volkmann	1
Grieg	1	Wagner	10
Händel	2	Weber	4
Haydn	3	Whiting, A. B	1
Humperdinck	1	Total	100

The nationality of the composers is as follows: 25 are German, reckoning among them Dvorák, Smetana and Liszt; 8 are French, 3 are Russian, 2 are Italian, 2 are American, 1 is Polish, 1 is Scandinavian, 1 is English; and I confess I do not know to what nation Mr. Loeffler wishes to be assigned; he would honor America by calling himself an American.

* * *

Allow me to quote from a statistical review prepared by me for the Boston Journal, and published this morning. I have verified dates carefully, but I do not flatter myself with the belief that the lists are without error.

* * *

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1896-97.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

X. CONCERT.

[Last of the Season.]

THURSDAY, APRIL 29, AT 7.45, P. M.

Wagner Programme.

(BY REQUEST.)

"PARSIFAL."	PRELUDE.
"LOHENGRIN."	LOHENGRIN'S LEGEND.
"TANNHAEUSER."	OVERTURE.
"LOHENGRIN."	a. PRELUDE TO ACT I. b. PRELUDE TO ACT III.
A "SIEGFRIED" IDYL.
"RIENZI."	OVERTURE.
"DIE WALKÜRE."	SIEGMUND'S LOVE STORY.
"DIE WALKÜRE."	"RIDE OF THE WALKYRIES."

Soloist:

Mr. BEN DAVIES.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1896-97.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

IX. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, APRIL 8, AT 7.45, P. M.

Programme.

GOLDMARK.	OVERTURE, "Sakuntala."
	SOLI for VIOLONCELLO.
a. HAMERIK.	CONCERT ROMANCE.
b. POPPER.	DANCE OF SYLPHS.
TSCHAIKOWSKY.	SYMPHONY No. 6, in B minor, "Pathétique," op. 74. I. Adagio. — Allegro non troppo. II. Allegro con grazia. III. Allegro molto vivace. IV. Finale: Adagio lamentoso.
WEBER.	"INVITATION TO THE DANCE," op. 65. (Arranged for Orchestra by FELIX WEINGARTNER.)

Soloist:

Mr. LEO SCHULZ.

The programme of the tenth and last Concert, Thursday, April 29, 1897, will be composed entirely of Wagner Selections. Mr. Ben Davies will be the soloist, and will sing "Lohengrin's Legend," from "Lohengrin," and "Siegmund's Love Song," from "Die Walküre."

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

ACA[illegible]
Friday [illegible]
Saturday Afternoon, March [illegible], at 3 precisely.
Under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences and the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1896-97

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

5

Tickets at the Brooklyn Institute
and at Chandler's Music Store,
300 Fulton Street.

INFANTRY HALL, ... PROVIDENCE.
Wednesday Evening, April 21, at 8 precisely.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1896-97

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

6

Single tickets, at $1.25 each, on sale at Infantry Hall.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1896-97.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

XXI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, APRIL 10, AT 8, P. M.

In Memory of
JOHANNES BRAHMS.

BORN MAY 7, 1833. DIED APRIL 3, 1897.

Programme.

BRAHMS.	TRAGIC OVERTURE, op. 81.
BRAHMS.	VIER ERNSTE GESÄNGE, op. 121. a. Ecclesiastes, III. b. Ecclesiastes, IV. c. Ecclesiasticus, 41. d. I. Corinthians, XIII.
BRAHMS.	CONCERTO for VIOLIN and VIOLONCELLO, in A minor, op. 102. I. Allegro. II. Andante. III. Vivace non troppo.
BRAHMS.	SYMPHONY No. 4, in E minor, op. 98. I. Allegro non troppo. II. Andante moderato. III. Allegro giocoso. IV. Chaconne. Allegro energico e passionato.

Soloists:

Mr. MAX HEINRICH.
Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL.
Mr. ALWIN SCHROEDER.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1896-97.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

IX. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, APRIL 8, AT 7.45, P. M.

Programme.

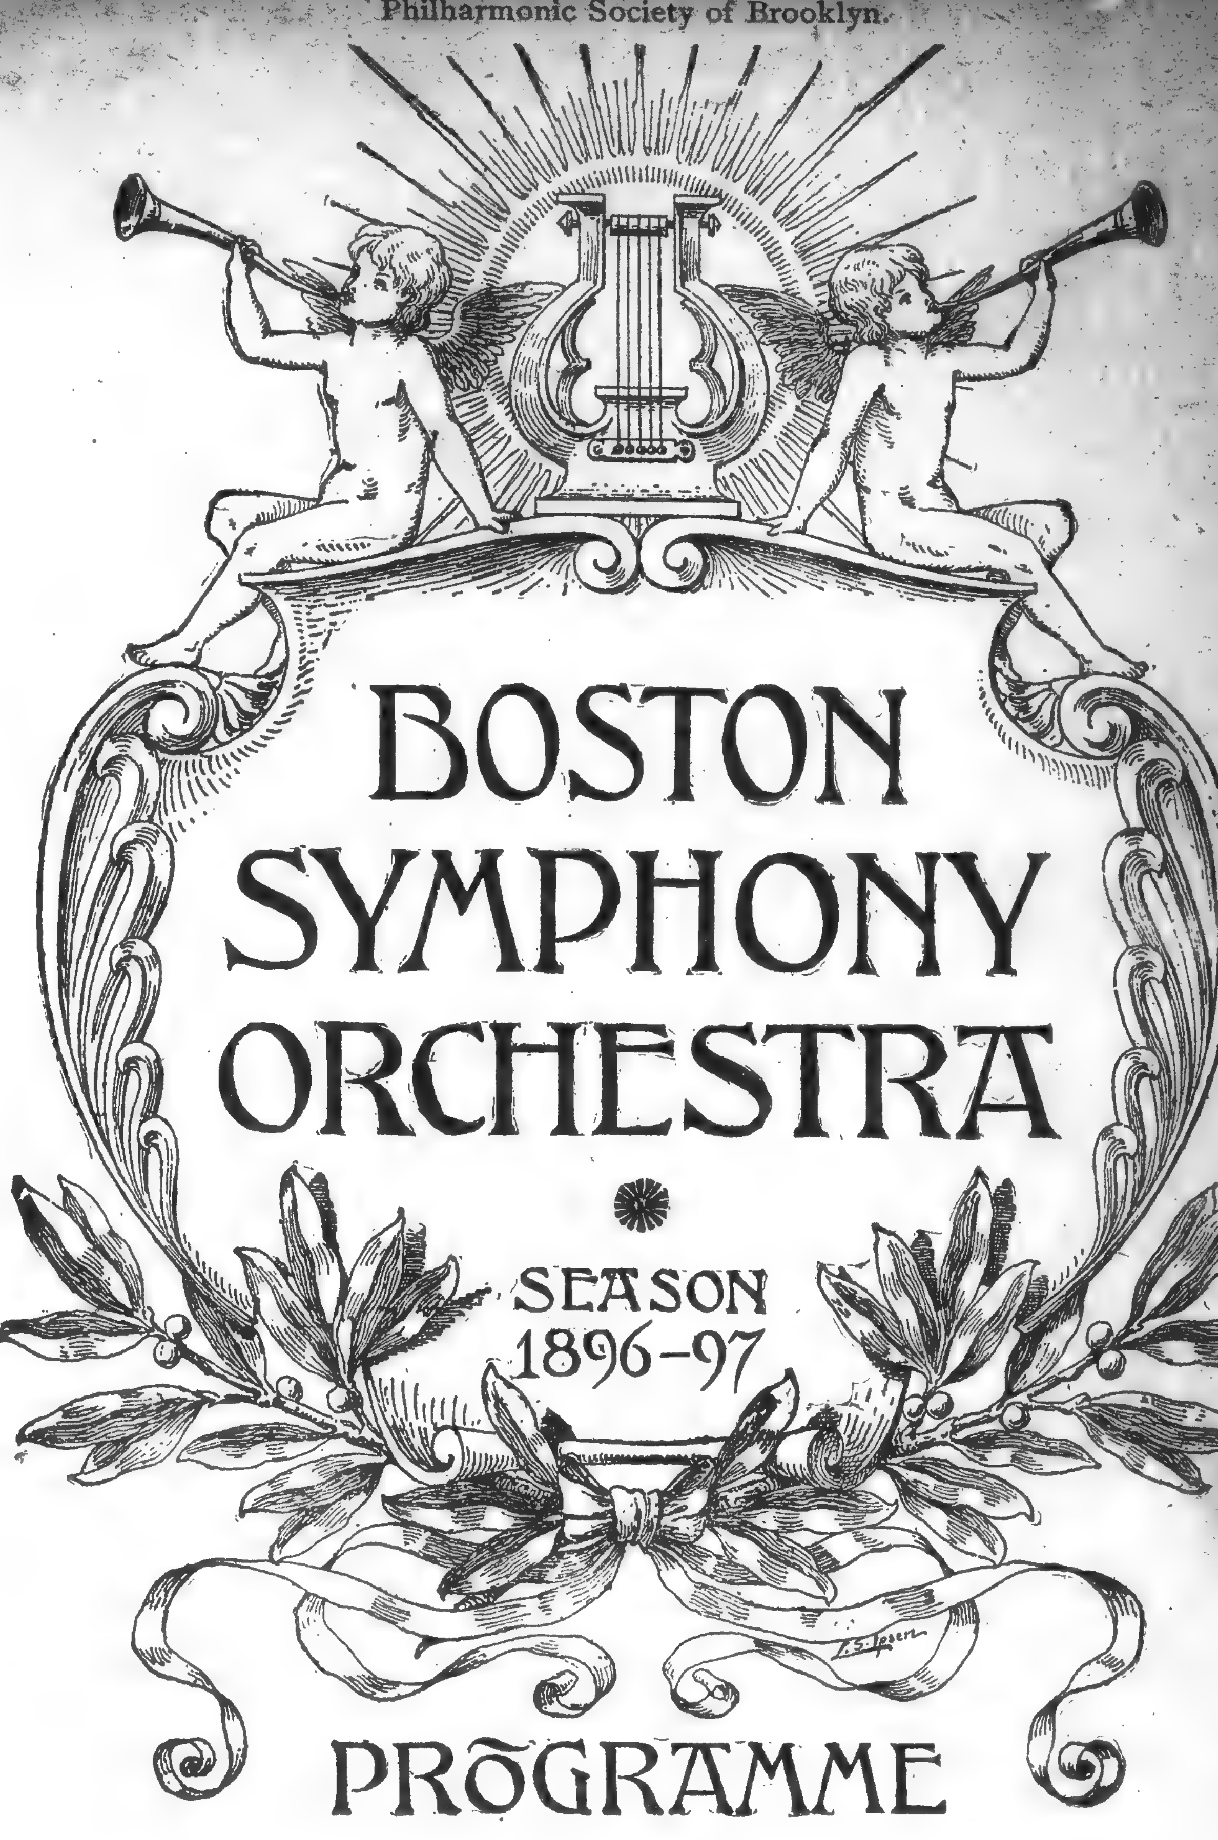
GOLDMARK.	OVERTURE, "Sakuntala."
	SOLI for VIOLONCELLO.
a. HAMERIK.	CONCERT ROMANCE.
b. POPPER.	DANCE OF SYLPHS.
TSCHAIKOWSKY.	SYMPHONY No. 6, in B minor, "Pathétique," op. 74. I. Adagio. — Allegro non troppo. II. Allegro con grazia. III. Allegro molto vivace. IV. Finale. Adagio lamentoso.
WEBER.	"INVITATION TO THE DANCE," op. 65. (Arranged for Orchestra by FELIX WEINGARTNER.)

Soloist:

Mr. LEO SCHULZ.

The programme of the tenth and last Concert, Thursday, April 29, 1897, will be composed entirely of Wagner Selections. Mr. Ben Davies will be the soloist, and will sing "Lohengrin's Legend," from "Lohengrin," and "Siegmund's Love Song," from "Die Walküre."

ACADEMY OF MUSIC . . . . . BROOKLYN.
Friday Evening, March 26, at 8.15 precisely.
Saturday Afternoon, March 27, at 3 precisely.
Under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences and the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn.

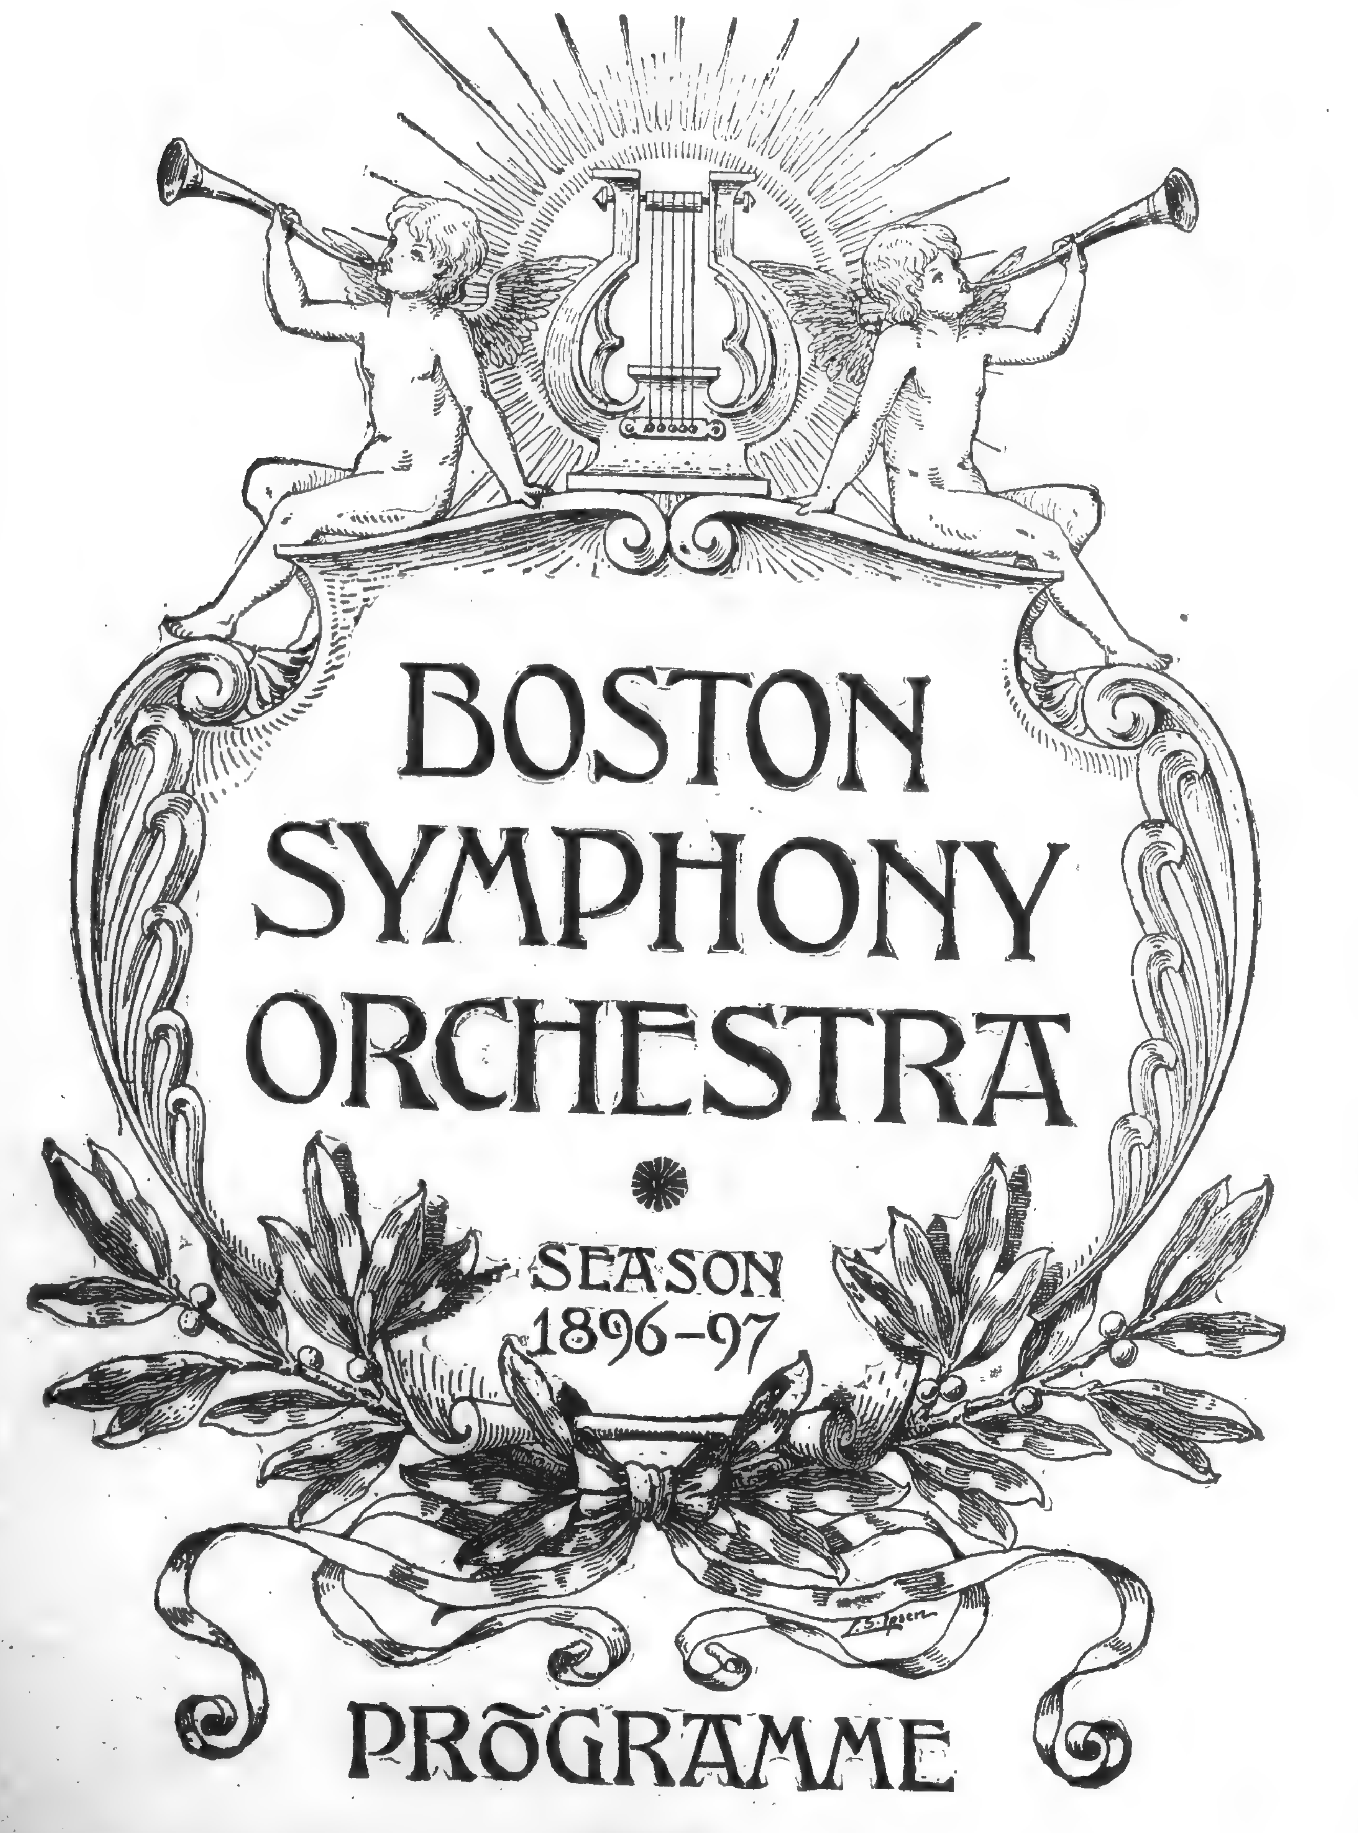


C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

5

Tickets at the Brooklyn Institute and at Chandler's Music Store, 300 Fulton Street.

INFANTRY HALL, ... PROVIDENCE.
Wednesday Evening, April 21, at 8 precisely.



C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

6

Single tickets, at $1.25 each, on sale at Infantry Hall.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1896-97.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

XXI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, APRIL 10, AT 8. P. M.

In Memory of
JOHANNES BRAHMS.

BORN MAY 7, 1833. DIED APRIL 3, 1897.

Programme.

BRAHMS.	TRAGIC OVERTURE, op. 81.
BRAHMS.	VIER ERNSTE GESÄNGE, op. 121. a. Ecclesiastes, III. b. Ecclesiastes, IV. c. Ecclesiasticus, 41. d. I. Corinthians, XIII.
BRAHMS.	CONCERTO for VIOLIN and VIOLONCELLO, in A minor, op. 102. I. Allegro. II. Andante. III. Vivace non troppo.
BRAHMS.	SYMPHONY No. 4, in E minor, op. 98. I. Allegro non troppo. II. Andante moderato. III. Allegro giocoso. IV. Chaconne. Allegro energico e passionato.

Soloists:

Mr. MAX HEINRICH.
Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL.
Mr. ALWIN SCHROEDER.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1896-97.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

IX. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, APRIL 8, AT 7.45, P. M.

Programme.

GOLDMARK.	OVERTURE, "Sakuntala."
	SOLI for VIOLONCELLO.
a. HAMERIK.	CONCERT ROMANCE.
b. POPPER.	DANCE OF SYLPHS.
TSCHAIKOWSKY.	SYMPHONY No. 6, in B minor, "Pathétique, op. 74. I. Adagio. — Allegro non troppo. II. Allegro con grazia. III. Allegro molto vivace. IV. Finale: Adagio lamentoso.
WEBER.	"INVITATION TO THE DANCE," op. 65. (Arranged for Orchestra by FELIX WEINGARTNER,)

Soloist:

Mr. LEO SCHULZ.

The programme of the tenth and last Concert, Thursday, April 29, 1897, will be composed entirely of Wagner Selections. Mr. Ben Davies will be the soloist, and will sing "Lohengrin's Legend," from "Lohengrin," and "Siegmund's Love Song," from "Die Walküre."

BOS
SYMP
ORCH SEA
189
PROG

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

"A perfect type of the highest order of excellence in manufacture."

Walter Baker & Co.'s
Breakfast Cocoa.

PURE,
DELICIOUS,
NUTRITIOUS.

COSTS LESS THAN ONE CENT A CUP.

"Why thoughtful persons drink tea and coffee is, to us, always a matter of wonder. The desire for some liquid at meals is, we believe, the expression of a requirement of the system; but why this requirement should be met with tea (which is, unquestionably, a poison) or with coffee (which, to say the least, is not a nutriment), when we have chocolate and cocoa ready at hand, is, we say, incomprehensible."
—The Annals of Hygiene.

Be sure that you get the genuine article.

Made by Walter Baker & Co., Limited,
Established 1780. DORCHESTER, MASS.

INFANTRY HALL, PROVIDENCE.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

Fifteenth Season in Providence.

PROGRAMME
OF THE
Sixth and Last Concert,

Wednesday Evening, April 21,
At Eight precisely.

With Historical and Descriptive Notes by
William F. Apthorp.

PUBLISHED BY C. A. ELLIS, MANAGER.

Boston

SEASO

BOSTON SYMPH

Mr. EMIL P

XXI. C

SATURDAY, AP

In M
JOHANNE

BORN MAY 7, 1833.

Prog

BRAHMS.	TRAGIC
BRAHMS.	VIER ER a. Ecclesiaste b. Ecclesiaste c. Ecclesiasti d. I. Corinthi
BRAHMS.	CONCERT A minor, o I. Allegro. II. Andante. III. Vivace non
BRAHMS.	SYMPHON I. Allegro non II. Andante m III. Allegro gio IV. Chaconne.

Solo

Mr. MAX HEINRICH.
Mr. FRANZ

The Pianoforte

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1896-97.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

IX. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, APRIL 8, AT 7.45. P. M.

Programme.

GOLDMARK. OVERTURE, "Sakuntala."

SOLI for VIOLONCELLO.

a. HAMERIK. CONCERT ROMANCE.
b. POPPER. DANCE OF SYLPHS.

TSCHAIKOWSKY. SYMPHONY No. 6, in B minor, "Pathetique," op. 74.
I. Adagio — Allegro non troppo.
II. Allegro con grazia.
III. Allegro molto vivace.
IV. Finale. Adagio lamentoso.

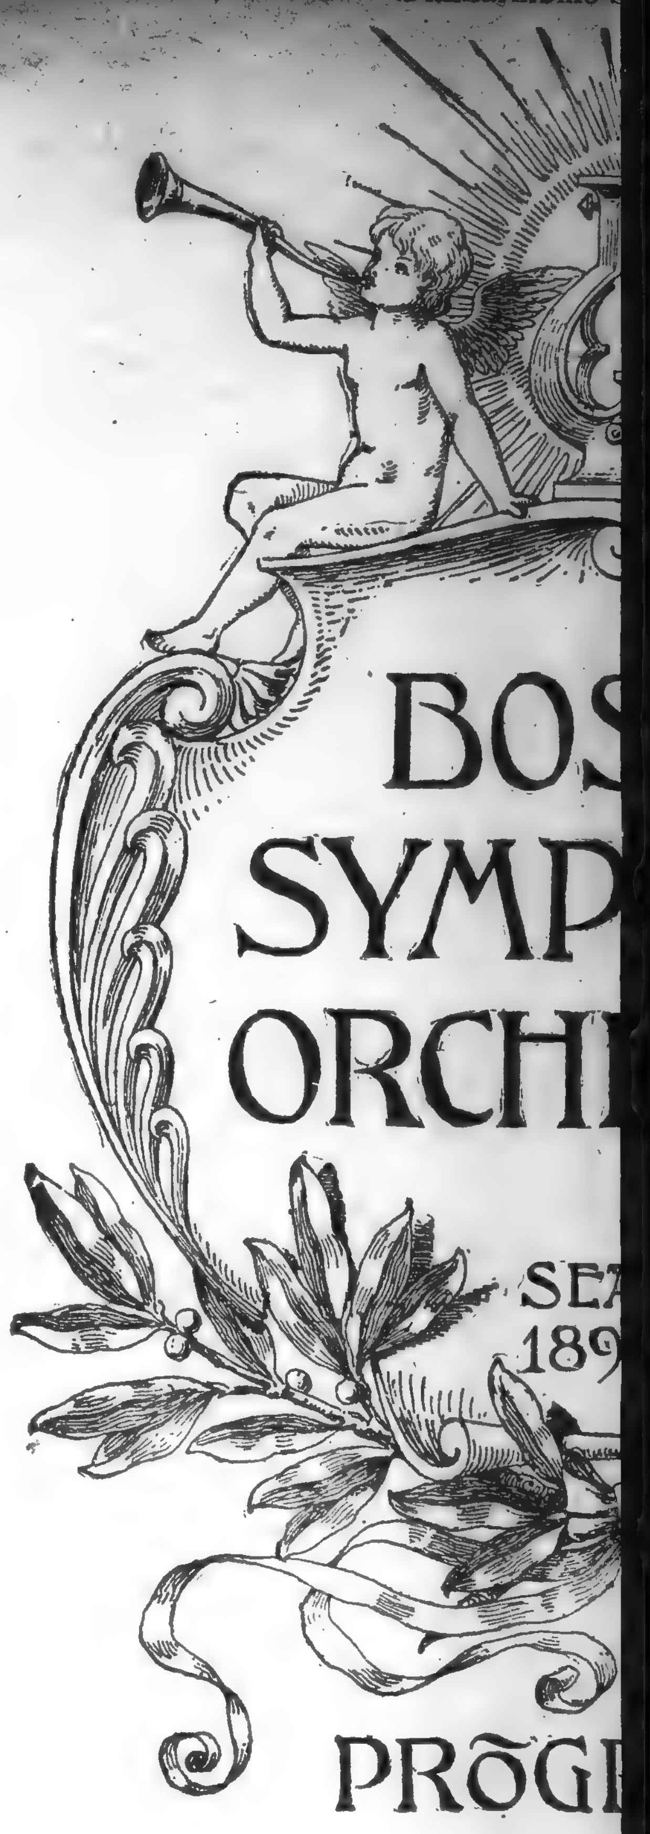
WEBER. "INVITATION TO THE DANCE," op. 65.
(Arranged for Orchestra by FELIX WEINGARTNER.)

Soloist:

Mr. LEO SCHULZ.

The programme of the tenth and last Concert, Thursday, April [illegible], will be composed entirely of Wagner Selections. Mr. Ben Davies will be the soloist, and will sing "Lohengrin's Legend" [illegible] and "Siegmund's Love Song" from "Die Walküre."

ACADEMY OF MUSIC
Friday Evening, Ma
Saturday Afternoon,
Under the auspices of the Brooklyn
Philharmonic S



C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

"A perfect type of the highest order of excellence in manufacture."

Walter Baker & Co.'s
Breakfast Cocoa.

PURE,
DELICIOUS,
NUTRITIOUS.

COSTS LESS THAN ONE CENT A CUP.

"Why thoughtful persons drink tea and coffee is, to us, always a matter of wonder. The desire for some liquid at meals is, we believe, the expression of a requirement of the system; but why this requirement should be met with tea (which is, unquestionably, a poison) or with coffee (which, to say the least, is not a nutriment), when we have chocolate and cocoa ready at hand, is, we say, incomprehensible."
—The Annals of Hygiene.

Be sure that you get the genuine article.

Made by Walter Baker & Co., Limited,
Established 1780. DORCHESTER, MASS.

INFANTRY HALL, PROVIDENCE.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

Fifteenth Season in Providence.

PROGRAMME
OF THE
Sixth and Last Concert,

Wednesday Evening, April 21,
At Eight precisely.

With Historical and Descriptive Notes by
William F. Apthorp.

PUBLISHED BY C. A. ELLIS, MANAGER.

Boston

SEASO
BOSTON SYMP
Mr. EMIL P

XXI. C
SATURDAY, AP

In M
JOHANNE
BORN MAY 7, 1833.

Prog

BRAHMS. TRAGIC

BRAHMS. VIER ER
a. Ecclesiast
b. Ecclesiast
c. Ecclesiast
d. I. Corinthi

BRAHMS. CONCERT
A minor, o
I. Allegro.
II. Andante.
III. Vivace non

BRAHMS. SYMPHON
I. Allegro non
II. Andante m
III. Allegro gio
IV. Chaconne.

Sol
Mr. MAX HEINRICH.
Mr. FRANZ

The Pianoforte

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1896-97.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

IX. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, APRIL 8, AT 7.45. P. M.

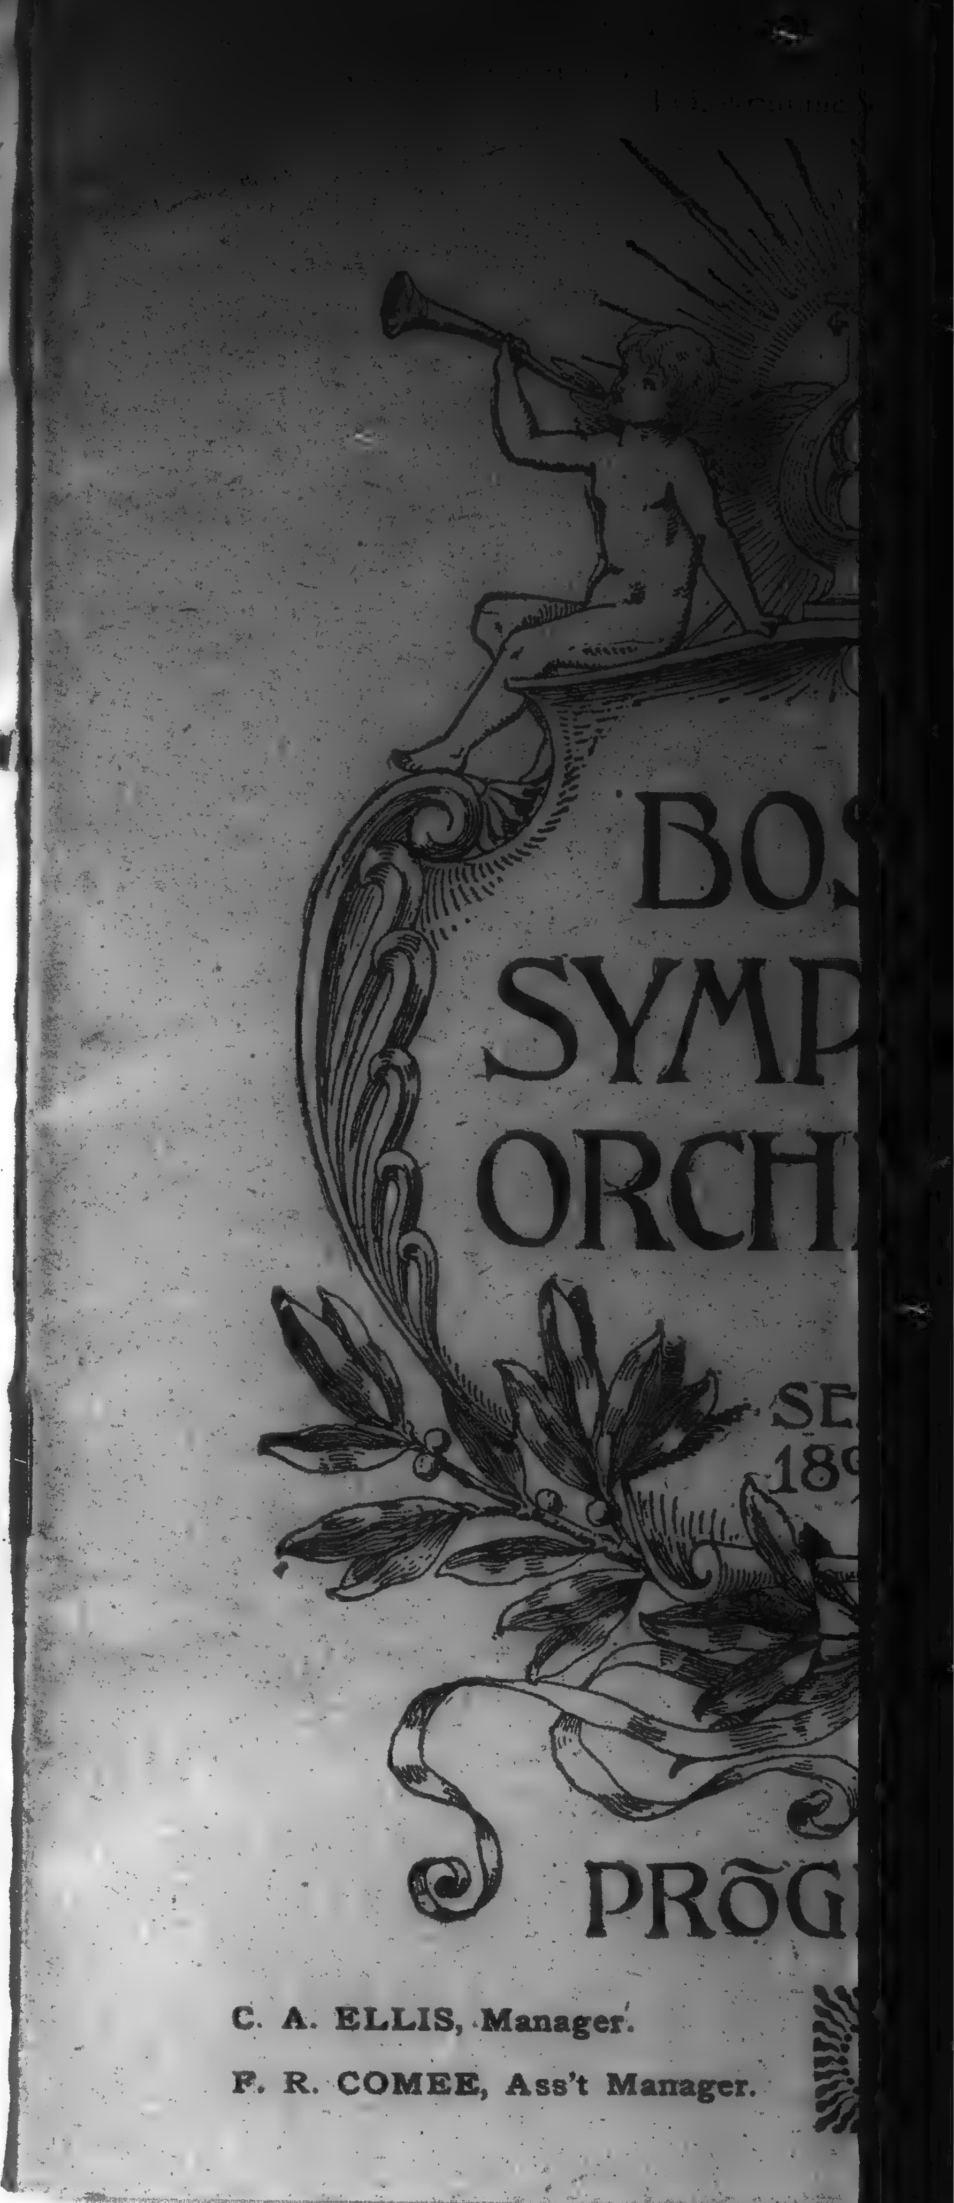
Programme.

GOLDMARK.	OVERTURE, "Sakuntala."
	SOLI for VIOLONCELLO.
a. HAMERIK.	CONCERT ROMANCE.
b. POPPER.	DANCE OF SYLPHS.
TSCHAIKOWSKY.	SYMPHONY No. 6, in B minor, "Pathétique, op. 74. I. Adagio. — Allegro non troppo. II. Allegro con grazia. III. Allegro molto vivace. IV. Finale: Adagio lamentoso.
WEBER.	"INVITATION TO THE DANCE," op. 65. (Arranged for Orchestra by FELIX WEINGARTNER.)

Soloist:

Mr. LEO SCHULZ.

The programme of the tenth and last Concert, Thursday, April 29, 1897, will be composed entirely of Wagner Selections. Mr. Ben Davies will be the soloist, and will sing "Lohengrin's Legend," from "Lohengrin," and "Siegmund's Love Song," from "Die Walküre."



C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

Steinway & Sons,

Piano Manufacturers

BY APPOINTMENT TO

HIS MAJESTY, WILLIAM II., EMPEROR OF GERMANY.
THE ROYAL COURT OF PRUSSIA.
His Majesty, FRANCIS JOSEPH, Emperor of Austria.
HER MAJESTY, THE QUEEN OF ENGLAND.
Their Royal Highnesses,
THE PRINCE AND PRINCESS OF WALES.
THE DUKE OF EDINBURGH.
His Majesty, UMBERTO I., the King of Italy.
Her Majesty, THE QUEEN OF SPAIN.

His Majesty, Emperor William II. of Germany, on June 13, 1893, also bestowed on our Mr. WILLIAM STEINWAY the order of THE RED EAGLE, III. Class, an honor never before granted to a manufacturer.

The Royal Academy of St. Cæcilia at Rome, Italy, founded by the celebrated composer Palestrina in 1584, has elected Mr. William Steinway an honorary member of that institution. The following the translation of his diploma: —

The Royal Academy of St. Cæcilia have, on account of his eminent merit in the domain of music, and in conformity to their Statutes, Article 12, solemnly decreed to receive William Steinway into the number of their honorary members. Given at Rome, April 15, 1894, and in the three hundred and tenth year from the founding of the society.
ALEX. PANSOTTI, Secretary. E. DI SAN MARTINO, President.

ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUES MAILED FREE ON APPLICATION.

STEINWAY & SONS,
Warerooms. Steinway Hall, 107-111 East 14th St., New York.

EUROPEAN DEPOTS:
Steinway Hall, 15 and 17 Lower Seymour St., Portman Sq., W., London, England.
Steinway's Pianofabrik, St. Pauli, Neue Rosen-Strasse, 20-24, Hamburg, Germany.

M. STEINERT & SONS CO., Sole Representatives,
246-248 Westminster Street, . . . Providence, R.I.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Infantry Hall, Providence.

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

Sixth and Last Concert, Wednesday Evening, April 21, At Eight precisely.

WAGNER PROGRAMME.

(By request.)

"Parsifal." Prelude.

"Tannhäuser." Overture.

"Lohengrin." { a. Prelude to Act I.
b. Prelude to Act III.

A "Siegfried" Idyl.

"Rienzi." Overture.

"Siegfried." Act II., "Forest Sounds."

"Die Walküre." "Ride of the Walkyries."

Boston

SEAS

BOSTON SYMP

Mr. EMIL

XXI.

SATURDAY, A

In M

JOHANN

BORN MAY 7, 1833.

Pro

BRAHMS.	TRAGIC
BRAHMS.	VIER E a. Ecclesias b. Ecclesias c. Ecclesias d. I. Corint
BRAHMS.	CONCE A minor I. Allegro. II. Andante III. Vivace
BRAHMS.	SYMPH I. Allegro II. Andante III. Allegro IV. Chaconn

Mr. MAX HEINRICH.
Mr. FRA

The Pian

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1896-97.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

IX. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, APRIL 8, AT 7.45. P. M.

Programme.

GOLDMARK.	OVERTURE, "Sakuntala."
	SOLI for VIOLONCELLO.
a. HAMERIK.	CONCERT ROMANCE.
b. POPPER.	DANCE OF SYLPHS.
TSCHAIKOWSKY.	SYMPHONY No. 6, in B minor, "Pathétique, op. 74. I. Adagio. — Allegro non troppo. II. Allegro con grazia. III. Allegro molto vivace. IV. Finale: Adagio lamentoso.
WEBER.	"INVITATION TO THE DANCE," op. 65. (Arranged for Orchestra by FELIX WEINGARTNER.)

Soloist:

Mr. LEO SCHULZ.

The programme of the tenth and last Concert, Thursday, April 29, 1897, will be composed entirely of Wagner Selections. Mr. Ben Davies will be the soloist, and will sing "Lohengrin's Legend," from "Lohengrin," and "Siegmund's Love Song," from "Die Walküre."

BOS
SYMP
ORCH
SE
189
PROG

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

We advertise only what we have, and exactly as it is.

A Bicycle of One-horse Power.

The best of cycling days are now with us, granting always that warmish clothes are provided.

We provide them, and everything the bicycle man or boy wears,— the cap, the bicycle scarf, the stockings, the sweater, and something far warmer than a sweater, far handsomer — bicycle reefers — short, heavy coats of black or Oxford frieze.

Jerome Kennedy & Co.

Your money back if you want it.

PRELUDE TO "PARSIFAL."

Parsifal, a stage-consecration festival play in three acts, the text and music by Richard Wagner, was first given in Bayreuth on July 28, 1882. The poem was published in 1877, and the music completed in 1879. The right of stage-performance belongs exclusively to the Festival Theatre in Bayreuth, and the drama has never been given on the stage anywhere else.

The prelude, which is perfectly free in form, begins, Sehr langsam (Lento assai) in A-flat major (4-4 time), with the SANGREAL-motive, given out in gentle crescendo and diminuendo, by the violins, 'celli, alto-oboe, clarinet, and bassoon in unison; the motive is then repeated by the trumpet, oboes, and half the first and second violins in unison against rising and falling arpeggj in the remaining violins and violas, repeated chords in the flutes, clarinets, and alto-oboe, and sustained harmonies in the bassoons and horns. Then the second phrase of the motive is given out and repeated, as before. Now the Call to Prayer is heard, swelling from piano to forte in the trumpets and trombones, ending with the "Dresden Amen," * which is softly echoed by the wood-wind. The time now changes to 6-4, and the brass instruments intone the FAITH-motive, which is carried out contrapuntally at considerable length by various combinations of instruments. With a return to 4-4 time comes a briefer working-out of the SANGREAL-motive, against tremulous harmonies in the violins, followed by a short stormier episode on one of the motives that refer to Amforta's torments. A brief coda on the SANGREAL-motive, closing with the solemn Call to Prayer and the "Dresden Amen," brings the prelude to a pianissimo final cadence in the original A-flat major.

This prelude is scored for 3 flutes, 3 oboes, 1 alto-oboe, 3 clarinets, 1 bass-clarinet, 3 bassoons, 1 double-bassoon, 4 horns, 3 trumpets, 3 trombones, 1 bass-tuba, kettle-drums, and the usual strings.

* This peculiar form of cadence, in ascending 6ths, was also introduced by Mendelssohn in his "Reformation" symphony.

Exhaustion

Horsford's Acid Phosphate

Overworked men and women, the nervous, weak and debilitated, will find in the Acid Phosphate a most agreeable, grateful and harmless stimulant, giving renewed strength and vigor to the entire system.

Dr. Edwin F. Vose, Portland, Me., says: "I have used it in my own case when suffering from nervous exhaustion, with gratifying results. I have prescribed it for many of the various forms of nervous debility, and it has never failed to do good."

Descriptive pamphlet free on application to Rumford Chemical Works, Providence, R.I.
Beware of Substitutes and Imitations. FOR SALE BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

Boston

SEAS

BOSTON SYMP

Mr. EMIL

XXI.

SATURDAY, A

In M

JOHANN

BORN MAY 7, 1833.

Pro

BRAHMS.	TRAG
BRAHMS.	VIER a. Eccle b. Eccle c. Eccle d. I. Co
BRAHMS.	CON A mi I. Alleg II. Anda III. Viva
BRAHMS.	SYM I. Alleg II. Anda III. Alleg IV. Chac

Mr. MAX HEINRICH
Mr. FR

The

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1896-97.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

IX. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, APRIL 8, AT 7.45. P. M.

Programme.

GOLDMARK.	OVERTURE, "Sakuntala."
	SOLI for VIOLONCELLO.
a. HAMERIK.	CONCERT ROMANCE.
b. POPPER.	DANCE OF SYLPHS.
TSCHAIKOWSKY.	SYMPHONY No. 6, in B minor, "Pathétique, op. 74. I. Adagio. — Allegro non troppo. II. Allegro con grazia. III. Allegro molto vivace. IV. Finale: Adagio lamentoso.
WEBER.	"INVITATION TO THE DANCE," op. 65. (Arranged for Orchestra by FELIX WEINGARTNER.)

Soloist:

Mr. LEO SCHULZ.

The programme of the tenth and last Concert, Thursday, April 29, 1897, will be composed entirely of Wagner Selections. Mr. Ben Davies will be the soloist, and will sing "Lohengrin's Legend," from "Lohengrin," and "Siegmund's Love Song," from "Die Walküre."

BOS
SYMP
ORCH
SE
189
PROG

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

OVERTURE TO "TANNHÄUSER."

Tannhäuser und der Sängerkrieg auf Wartburg, romantic opera in three acts, the text and music by Richard Wagner, was first given, under the composer's direction, at the Royal Court Opera in Dresden on October 19, 1845. The original cast contained some famous artists: Tichatschek sang Tannhäuser; Mitterwurzer, Wolfram; Johanna Wagner (the composer's niece), Elisabeth; and Schroeder-Devrient, Venus. Wagner wrote the poem in Dresden in 1843; and the score was finished in 1844–45. When the opera was to be given, in a French translation by Charles Nuitter, at the Académie Impériale de Musique in Paris in 1861, Wagner cut out the coda of the overture, connecting the latter immediately with the first scene of the opera, rewrote this first scene (Bacchanale) entirely, and largely extended the following scene between Tannhäuser and Venus. In this remodelled shape, the work was given on March 13, 1861. This is generally known as the "Paris version" — now to be regarded as the only authentic one.

Whatever may be thought of the wisdom of Wagner's changes in the first scenes of the opera itself,— and the Paris version of these scenes has been criticised as being too much in his later manner (he had already written Das Rheingold, Die Walküre, and Tristan) to harmonize well with the style of the rest of the work,— there can be no doubt about the wisdom of his change in the overture. When he first wrote Tannhäuser, he had not fully formulated his theories of the Music-Drama; the overture, with its resounding coda on the Pilgrim's Chorus and its full final cadence, was more a musical résumé of the opera than an introduction to it; its form was too complete and self-dependent to accord with Wagner's later theories, and it had too much the air of a concert piece. Cutting out the coda and enchaining it with the bacchanalian music of the first scene cured this. There was another gain, too: the Pilgrims' Chorus, as it appeared in the original coda, sung in E major by the united trumpets and trombones, to a rapidly rushing violin accompaniment, had the disadvantage of throwing the same chorus completely in the shade, when sung in E-flat major in the third act of the opera, with a simpler and less brilliant violin accompaniment. Omitting the coda of the overture allowed the chorus in the third act to make its full effect. The overture in its original form may now be considered as a concert composition by itself. It is in this shape that it is almost invariably given at concerts.

All the themes in the overture are taken from the music of the opera. It begins with a slow introduction, Andante maestoso in E major (3-4 time), in which the second Pilgrims' Chorus, "Beglückt darf nun dich, O Heimath, ich schauen," is given almost entire: at first piano in the lower wood-wind and horns, to which the lower strings are soon added; then fortissimo, with the melody in three trombones in unison, against an obstinate figure in the violins; then dying away to pianissimo in the clarinets and bassoons. This introduction leads immediately over to the main body of the overture.

This, Allegro in E major (4-4 time), begins with the spirally ascending first theme, the TANNHÄUSER-motive, in the violas and clarinets, against high tremolos in the violins, followed by other subsidiary themes, all taken

New England Conservatory of Music.

FOUNDED IN 1853 BY DR. EBEN TOURJÉE.

RICHARD H. DANA, President. CARL FAELTEN, Director.

COMPLETE IN ALL ITS DEPARTMENTS.

PIANOFORTE.
ORGAN.
VOICE.
VIOLIN.
ORCHESTRA.
THEORY.
HARMONY.
COUNTERPOINT.
COMPOSITION.
CONDUCTING.
ELOCUTION.
ORATORY.
PHYSICAL CULTURE.
LITERATURE.
LANGUAGES.

Special Classes for children in Elementary Principles of Music.
Orchestral and Ensemble practice for advanced students.
Thorough and systematic training for Soloists and Teachers.
Practical School for Operatic training and performance.

For further information address
New England Conservatory of Music, Franklin Square, Boston.

SHORE LINE BETWEEN BOSTON and NEW YORK

THROUGH TRAIN SERVICE FROM EITHER CITY.

10.00 a.m. "BAY STATE LIMITED." Vestibuled Buffet Parlor Cars only. Special Ticket required. Due 3.00 p.m.
10.03 a.m. "DAY EXPRESS." Vestibuled Buffet Parlor Cars, and Day Coaches. Due 4.30 p.m.
1.03 p.m. "AFTERNOON EXPRESS." Vestibuled Buffet Parlor Cars, and Day Coaches. Due 7.30 p.m.
3.00 p.m. "SHORE LINE EXPRESS." Daily, Sundays included. Vestibuled Parlor Cars, and Day Coaches. Dining Car Boston and New London. Due 9.00 p.m.
5.00 p.m. "GILT EDGE" EXPRESS. Daily, Sundays included. Vestibuled Parlor Cars, and Day Coaches. Dining Car, Boston and New London. Due 11.00 p.m.
12.00 "FIRST MIDNIGHT EXPRESS." Daily, Sundays included. Vestibuled State-room and Sleeping Cars only, Boston to New York. Due 6.30 a.m. (Open for occupation at 9.15 p.m.)
12.03 a.m. "SECOND MIDNIGHT EXPRESS." Daily, Sundays included. Passenger Coaches and Sleeping Ca Boston to New York. Sleeping Car, Providence to New York. Due 7.00 a.m. (Open for occupation at 9.15 p.m.)

PHILADELPHIA, BALTIMORE, and WASHINGTON SERVICE.
Via Shore Line, Transfer Steamer "Maryland," and Pennsylvania Route.

9.00 a.m. "COLONIAL EXPRESS." Pullman Vestibuled Buffet Parlor Cars, and Day Coaches. (Daily, Sundays excepted.) RETURNING, leave Washington 7.50 a.m. (Sundays excepted), Philadelphia 11.00 a.m.
7.00 p.m. "FEDERAL EXPRESS." Pullman Vestibuled Buffet Sleeping Cars, and Day Coaches. (Daily, Sundays included.) RETURNING, leave Washington 3.15 p.m. daily; Philadelphia 6.50 p.m. daily, Sundays included.
1.00 p.m. AIR LINE LIMITED, VIA MIDDLETOWN. Vestibuled Parlor Cars and Day Coaches. Stops at Willimantic, Middletown, and New Haven.

NEW YORK, NEW HAVEN and HARTFORD R.R.
GEO. L. CONNOR, Pass'r Traffic Manager. A. C. KENDALL, G. P. A. Old Colony System.

Boston

SEAS

BOSTON SYMP

Mr. EMIL

XXI.

SATURDAY, A

In M

JOHANN

BORN MAY 7, 1833.

Pro

BRAHMS.	TRAGIC
BRAHMS.	VIER E a. Ecclesias b. Ecclesias c. Ecclesias d. I. Corint
BRAHMS.	CONCER A minor, I. Allegro. II. Andante. III. Vivace no
BRAHMS.	SYMPHO I. Allegro n II. Andante III. Allegro g IV. Chaconne

So

Mr. MAX HEINRICH.

Mr. FRAN

The Pianof

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1896-97.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

IX. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, APRIL 8, AT 7.45, P. M.

Programme.

GOLDMARK.	OVERTURE, "Sakuntala."
	SOLI for VIOLONCELLO.
a. HAMERIK.	CONCERT ROMANCE.
b. POPPER.	DANCE OF SYLPHS.
TSCHAIKOWSKY.	SYMPHONY No. 6, in B minor, "Pathétique, op. 74. I. Adagio. — Allegro non troppo. II. Allegro con grazia. III. Allegro molto vivace. IV. Finale: Adagio lamentoso.
WEBER.	"INVITATION TO THE DANCE," op. 65. (Arranged for Orchestra by FELIX WEINGARTNER.)

Soloist:

Mr. LEO SCHULZ.

The programme of the tenth and last Concert, Thursday, April 29, 1897, will be composed entirely of Wagner Selections. Mr. Ben Davies will be the soloist, and will sing "Lohengrin's Legend," from "Lohengrin," and "Siegmund's Love Song," from "Die Walküre."

BOS
SYMP
ORCH
SE
189
PROG

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

---

from the bacchanalian music of the first scene of the opera. Next comes the heroic second theme, Tannhäuser's song to Venus, "Dir töne Lob! Die Wunder sei'n gepriesen," in the first act, given out in the dominant, B major, by the full orchestra (without trombones) with the melody in the violins. This is followed by a return of the bacchanalian music, which may be regarded either as taking the place of a conclusion-theme, or as beginning the free fantasia. The central point of the free fantasia is marked by a magical episode in which the clarinet sings the melody of Venus's enticing appeal to Tannhäuser (VENUS-motive), "Geliebter, komm'! sieh' dort die Grotte," in the first act, against contrapuntally interwoven fragments of the bacchanalian music. The third part begins irregularly, not with the first theme, but with its subsidiary in the tonic, E major, but otherwise maintains its regular relations to the first part, the second theme coming also in the tonic.* It is followed by a more and more furious return of the bacchanalian music, fortissimo in the full orchestra, which gradually leads over to the coda. This begins piano with a return of the Pilgrims' Chorus of the introduction against a diminution of the obstinately whirling violin figure. In the introduction this figure filled a whole measure; now it fills only half a measure and has to be repeated twice to every measure of the melody.† When, after a short crescendo, the pilgrims' melody returns fortissimo in three trumpets and three trombones in unison, the violin figure is repeated three times to every ("ideal") measure of the melody, and becomes a perfect vortex of fury. Berlioz has figured out that this violin figure occurs 142 times in the course of the overture.‡

In spite of some deviations from the traditional scheme, this overture to Tannhäuser is more symphonic in its form than any of Wagner's others, with the exception of Eine Faust-Ouvertüre. It is scored for 1 piccolo-flute, 2 flutes, 2 oboes, 2 clarinets, 2 bassoons, 4 horns, 3 trumpets, 3 trombones, 1 bass-tuba, 1 pair of kettle-drums, cymbals, triangle, tambourine, and the usual strings.

PRELUDE TO ACT III. OF "LOHENGRIN."

This introduction to the third act is supposed to be the ball-room music played at Lohengrin and Elsa's wedding. It begins, Sehr lebhaft (Molto vivace) in G major (2-2 time), with the jubilant first theme given out and briefly developed in fortissimo by the full orchestra. This soon makes way for the resounding second theme, in the same key, given out in fortissimo by the 'celli, horns, and bassoons in unison against harmony in repeated triplets in the strings, and repeated by all the brass and 'celli against a similar accompaniment in the rest of the orchestra. Then comes a softer, more march-like episodic theme, still in G major, given out and for the most part developed by the wind instruments. Then the first and second themes return, very much as at first, if with more variety in the way of modulation, the movement ending with the close of the second theme.

This movement is scored for 3 flutes, 3 oboes, 3 clarinets, 4 horns, 3 bassoons, 2 trumpets, 3 trombones, 1 bass-tuba, 1 pair of kettle-drums, triangle, cymbals, tambourine, and the usual strings.

A SIEGFRIED IDYL, IN E MAJOR.

This little piece was written as a birthday gift to Wagner's wife, and was first performed on her birthday morning on the staircase of the villa at Triebschen by a small orchestra (collected from Zürich and Lucerne), conducted by Wagner himself; the little band had been drilled by Hans Richter, who played the trumpet part at the performance. The title refers to Wagner's son, Siegfried, who was born while the composition of the drama, Siegfried, was in progress, and named after its hero. All the themes in the Idyl are, with a single exception, taken from Siegfried; the single exception being the little Folk-song, "Schlaf', mein Kind, schlaf' ein," which appears now and then during the development, in a rather fragmentary way. But the development of the themes is entirely new, and in no wise copied from the music-drama. The first public performance of the Idyl was at Mannheim in the course of the same year (1871).

The composition is a perfectly free piece of development on the following motives:

---

* This theme — Tannhäuser's song to Venus — appears, in all, six times in the course of the work: twice in the overture (in B major and E major), three times in the first act (in D-flat major, D major, and E-flat major), and once in the Singing Contest in the second act (in E major).

† That is, if we reduce the time to the same terms in both cases. The introduction is Andante, 3-4 time; the coda, Allegro, 4-4 time, two of its measures being equal to one of the introduction — so that it is "ideally" in 4-2 time, counting two measures as one. At the last fortissimo return of the melody in the brass, it appears in still further augmentation, three measures of the Allegro being equal to one of the first Andante — so that we have an "ideal" 3-1 time.

‡ This famous whirling violin figure has a history. Wagner himself reports that he got the idea for it from a violin passage in the accompaniment of a terzet in Bellini's Norma, when he was conducting a performance of that opera in his early days in Magdeburg; after the performance (or a rehearsal?) he even took the trouble to ask the violinists if the passage were congenial to the instrument. Norma was written in 1831, and Wagner got his idea from it in 1836. But the idea of using persistent repetitions of one and the same figure in the violins as an accompaniment to a sustained melody in the wind instruments was put in practice by him before he wrote Tannhäuser; there is a persistent ascending violin figure in the introduction of his overture to Rienzi — written in 1838-40 — which is very similar in its general effect. And a persistently repeated violin figure, far more like the one in Tannhäuser than that in Rienzi, is in the finale of Berlioz's Roméo et Juliette symphony, written in 1838-39.

OUR MOTTO: THE PUBLIC'S INTEREST.

KNABE . . . . .
FISCHER . . . .
STRICH & ZEIDLER
FRANKLIN . . . .
BAUS . . . . . .
Pianos.

We invite the public before purchasing to compare our goods and prices with those of other houses.

MANN & ECCLES,
THE MODERN PIANO DEALERS,
122 MATHEWSON STREET.

N.B.—Lightfoot Bros.' Sheet Music Department at our warerooms. Pianos for rent. Tuning, Repairing, and Polishing by expert workmen.

Boston

SEAS

BOSTON SYMP

Mr. EMIL

XXI.

SATURDAY, A

In M

JOHANN

BORN MAY 7, 1833.

Pro

BRAHMS. TRAGI

BRAHMS. VIER

a. Ecclesia
b. Ecclesia
c. Ecclesia
d. I. Corint

BRAHMS. CONCE
A minor
I. Allegro.
II. Andante.
III. Vivace no

BRAHMS. SYMPH
I. Allegro
II. Andante
III. Allegro
IV. Chaconne

So

Mr. MAX HEINRICH.
Mr. FRA

The Piano

[115]

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1896-97.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

IX. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, APRIL 8, AT 7.45, P. M.

Programme.

GOLDMARK.	OVERTURE, "Sakuntala."
	SOLI for VIOLONCELLO.
a. HAMERIK.	CONCERT ROMANCE.
b. POPPER.	DANCE OF SYLPHS.
TSCHAIKOWSKY.	SYMPHONY No. 6, in B minor, "Pathétique, op. 74. I. Adagio. — Allegro non troppo. II. Allegro con grazia. III. Allegro molto vivace. IV. Finale: Adagio lamentoso.
WEBER.	"INVITATION TO THE DANCE," op. 65. (Arranged for Orchestra by FELIX WEINGARTNER.)

Soloist:

Mr. LEO SCHULZ.

The programme of the tenth and last Concert, Thursday, April 29, 1897, will be composed entirely of Wagner Selections. Mr. Ben Davies will be the soloist, and will sing "Lohengrin's Legend," from "Lohengrin," and "Siegmund's Love Song," from "Die Walküre."

BOS
SYMP
ORCH
SE
189
PROG

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

Theme in E major, taken from the love-scene in the third act of Siegfried, at Brünnhilde's words: "Ewig war ich, ewig in süss sehnender Wonne — doch ewig zu deinem Heil!" In the strings.

SLUMBER-motive in the wood-wind, woven around the foregoing.

A short theme of two descending notes — the interval is not always the same, but is generally a minor 7th or major 6th — taken from Brünnhilde's exclamation: "O Siegfried, Siegfried, sieh' meine Angst!" in the scene above referred to. This phrase assumes considerable thematic importance in the course of the composition.

Another phrase in the same love-scene (in 3-4 time), at Brünnhilde's words: "O Siegfried, herrlicher! Hört der Welt!" Siegfried's WANDERLIED, in the shape in which it appears in the final climax of the above-mentioned love-scene at Brünnhilde's "Fahr' hin, Walhall's leuchtende Welt!" At first in the horn.

The BIRD-SONG motive, woven around the foregoing by the clarinet and other wooden wind instruments.

The billowing figure of the strings which accompanies Siegfried's "Ein herrlich Gewasser wogt vor mir."

Several of these themes often appear simultaneously. The development and working-out are exceedingly elaborate. This composition is scored for 1 flute, 1 oboe, 2 clarinets, 1 trumpet, 2 horns, 1 bassoon, and the usual strings.

OVERTURE TO "RIENZI, THE LAST OF THE TRIBUNES," IN D MAJOR.

Rienzi, der Letzte der Tribunen, grand opera in five acts, the text and music by Richard Wagner, was first brought out under the composer's direction at the Court Opera in Dresden on October 20, 1842. It was suggested to Wagner by reading Bulwer's novel in Dresden in 1837. He began his sketch of the text in Riga in the autumn of that year, and finished it in the summer of 1838; he almost immediately began the music, and finished the first two acts at Riga and Mittau in the spring of 1839. The remainder of the music was written in Paris. When completed, the opera was offered to the Académie de Musique, and then to the Théâtre de la Renaissance,* but was refused by both. In 1841 Wagner sent the score to Dresden, where it was accepted by the Court Opera; it was owing to this acceptance that he returned to Germany. The music of the opera was written on the general lines of French grand opéra, in emulation of the style of Spontini, Meyerbeer, and Halévy; there are but few essentially Wagnerish traits to be discovered in it, although the charactistically Wagnerish energy shows itself on almost every page.

All the themes of the overture are taken from the body of the work. It begins with a slow introduction, Molto sostenuto e maestoso in D major (4-4 time), opening with a long-sustained, swelled and diminished A on the trumpet — in the opera, the agreed signal for the uprising of the people to throw off the tyrannical yoke of the nobles. Soon comes a majestic cantilena of the violins and 'celli — the theme of Rienzi's prayer in the fifth act — the development of which is cut short by some stormy passage-work, leading in crescendo to a fortissimo return of the theme in all the brass, against ascending series of turns in the first violins.† Again is the development of the majestic melody interrupted, and some recitative-like phrases lead to a return of the trumpet call, interspersed with shuddering tremolos in the strings, the last long-drawn A leading over to the main body of the overture.

---

* Not the present house of that name, on the corner of the boulevard Saint-Martin and the rue de Bondy (now managed by Mme. Sarah Bernhardt), but the older theatre (now changed into a bank), once better known as the Théâtre-Italien, or Salle-Ventadour.

† These series of turns in the violins may be regarded as the first symptom in Wagner of that whirling violin accompaniment to a melody in the brass which we find in Tannhäuser. Wagner himself said that the Tannhäuser violin figure was suggested to him by a violin passage in Bellini's Norma. Curiously enough, however, a very similar violin effect is to be found in the choral finale of Berlioz's Roméo et Juliette; it is more like the figure in Tannhäuser than the one in Rienzi, being descending instead of ascending. Berlioz's symphony was written in 1838-39, about the same time that Wagner was at work on the music of Rienzi.

Drake, Payson & Whittier Electric Co.,

170-172 WEYBOSSET STREET.

COMPLETE ELECTRIC WIRING FOR RESIDENCES,

GAS AND ELECTRIC FIXTURES,

MOTORS, DYNAMOS, AND MILL EQUIPMENT.

New English Songs and Ballads.

FLORENTINE SERENADE. F and G. By George Henschel.
VOICE OF THE FATHER. E-flat, E, F, and G. By F. H. Cowen.
MIDSUMMER DREAMS. D and F. By Guy d'Hardelot.
A PASTORALE (Verracini). Arr. by A. L.
WHEN THOU ART NEAR. C, D, and E. By Hermann Lohr.
PRITHEE, MAIDEN. By A. E. Horrocks.
MAY-TIME. F, G, and A-flat. By Tosti.
DEARER FAR. By A. Seppilli.
THE OLD CLOCK ON THE STAIRS. By F. Allitsen.

To be had from the Leading Dealers or

BOOSEY & CO., 9 East 17th St., New York.

Boston

SEAS

BOSTON SYMP

Mr. EMIL

XXI.

SATURDAY, A

In M

JOHANN

BORN MAY 7, 1833.

Pro

BRAHMS. TRAGIC

BRAHMS. VIER E
a. Ecclesia
b. Ecclesia
c. Ecclesia
d. I. Corin

BRAHMS. CONC
A mino
I. Allegro
II. Andant
III. Vivace

BRAHMS. SYMP
I. Allegro
II. Andant
III. Allegro
IV. Chacon

Mr. MAX HEINRICH.
Mr. FRA

The Pia

SEASON 1896-97.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

IX. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, APRIL 8, AT 7.45, P. M.

Programme.

GOLDMARK.	OVERTURE, "Sakuntala."
	SOLI for VIOLONCELLO.
a. HAMERIK.	CONCERT ROMANCE.
b. POPPER.	DANCE OF SYLPHS.
TSCHAIKOWSKY.	SYMPHONY No. 6, in B minor, "Pathétique, op. 74. I. Adagio. — Allegro non troppo. II. Allegro con grazia. III. Allegro molto vivace. IV. Finale: Adagio lamentoso.
WEBER.	"INVITATION TO THE DANCE," op. 65. (Arranged for Orchestra by FELIX WEINGARTNER.)

Soloist:

Mr. LEO SCHULZ.

The programme of the tenth and last Concert, Thursday, April 29, 1897, will be composed entirely of Wagner Selections. Mr. Ben Davies will be the soloist, and will sing "Lohengrin's Legend," from "Lohengrin," and "Siegmund's Love Song," from "Die Walküre."

BOS
SYMP
ORCH
SE
189
PROG

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

This Allegro energico in D major (2-2 time) begins fortissimo in the full orchestra on the first theme — that of the chorus "Gegrüsst sei, hoher Tag!" at the beginning of the first finale of the opera — leading to the entrance of the first subsidiary in the brass — the theme of the battle-hymn, "Santo spirito cavaliere," of the revolutionary Rienzi faction in the third act. A transitional passage in the 'celli leads to the entrance of the second theme — that of Rienzi's prayer, already heard in the introduction of the overture — which is now given out in Allegro in the dominant, A major, by the violins. The "Santo spirito cavaliere" theme returns again in the brass, leading to the conclusion-theme — that of the stretto of the second finale, "Rienzi, dir sei Preis"; — this joyful theme is developed by fuller and fuller orchestra, ending the first part of the movement.

The free fantasia is short, and almost wholly devoted to a tempestuous working-out of the "Santo spirito cavaliere." The third part of the movement is an abbreviated repetition of the first, the battle-hymn and second theme being omitted, and the first theme being followed immediately by the conclusion-theme, against which the trumpets and trombones now play a resounding counter-theme — very like the phrase of the disappointed nobles, "Ha, dieser Gnade Schmach erdrückt das stolze Herz!" in the second finale,— leading over to the coda, Molto piu stretto, in which the "Santo spirito cavaliere" undergoes some exceedingly stormy developments in crescendo.

This overture is scored for 1 piccolo flute, 2 flutes, 2 oboes, 2 clarinets, 2 valve-horns, 2 plain horns, 2 bassoons, 1 serpent, 2 valve-trumpets, 2 plain trumpets, 3 trombones, 1 ophicleide, 1 pair of kettle-drums, 2 snare-drums,* triangle, bass-drum and cymbals, and the usual strings.

*The indications in the score are for "1 kleine Trommel" and "1 Militaire-Trommel." The difference between the two instruments is slight, and both come under the head of what we call "snare-drum." Wagner plainly means by "kleine Trommel" what the French call "caisse roulante," a snare-drum with a rather long body made of wood; his "Militaire-Trommel" corresponds to the French "caisse claire," a snare-drum of more incisive and brilliant tone, with a shorter body made of metal. The ophicleide mentioned in the score is now universally replaced by the more modern bass-tuba, as the serpent is by the double-bassoon.

LACE CURTAINS, dry cleansed, equal to new, from $1 per pair up, according to quality.

BLANKETS CLEANSED,
the nap raised, and made soft and fine, for $1 per pair.

DRESSES DYED AND CLEANSED WHOLE.

LACES a specialty, by our French process, pronounced the finest in the country by competent judges.

LEWANDO'S 337 Westminster Street, PROVIDENCE, R.I.
Telephone 907. With Butterick's Paper Patterns.

"FOREST SOUNDS," FROM "SIEGFRIED," ACT II., SCENE 2.

This little concert piece was compiled by Wagner himself from parts of the scene before Fafner's cave in the second act of Siegfried. He gave it the title of Waldweben (Forest Weaving). It is perfectly free in musical form. The leading-motives that appear in it are mainly as follows:

The VOLSUNG-motive, slow 6-8 time, now in the clarinets, now in the bassoons and horns.

The tender LOVE–LIFE motive, same time and tempo, in the 'celli, violas, and double-basses in full harmony, then in all the strings, later in the horns and bassoons.*

The FREIA-motive, C major, 3-4 time, in a solo violin over billowing arpeggio figures in the muted strings.

The BIRD-SONG-motive, in E major, 9-8 time, in the oboe, flute, clarinet, and other wind instruments, at first in fragments, then more coherently.

In the closing Vivace come the FIRE-motive, the SIEGFRIED-motive, the SLUMBER-motive, and the blithe BIRD-SONG-motive. In arranging this selection for concert performance, Wagner has made some changes in the original instrumentation, for the most part in the way of enriching rather than simplifying it.

ENTR'ACTE.

GLEANINGS FROM THE COURT LIBRARY IN UTOPIA.

"By progress," said Saint-Saëns, "we do not necessarily understand a process of amelioration; we merely mean that gradual process of change

* As this motive appears whenever the young Siegfried's thoughts turn to his unknown mother, it might well have been called the MOTHER-motive, or the motive of FILIAL LOVE.

This is the DREYDOPPEL'S kind to use.

Die einzige ächte Kernseife in Borax gesotten.

The only real, genuine borax soap, containing no doubtful ingredients, such as naphtha, rosin, etc. Full-pound bars (16 oz.), wrapped with full directions how to use it for all purposes that soap can be used for. All well-regulated stores sell it.

First Prizes: Centennial, 1876; Paris, 1878 and 1889; World's Fair, 1893.

DREYDOPPEL—SOAP.

SEAS

BOSTON SYMP

Mr. EMIL

XXI.

SATURDAY, A

In M

JOHANN

BORN MAY 7, 1833.

Pro

BRAHMS.	TRAGIC
BRAHMS.	VIER E a. Ecclesia b. Ecclesia c. Ecclesia d. I. Corint
BRAHMS.	CONCE A minor, I. Allegro. II. Andante. III. Vivace no
BRAHMS.	SYMPH I. Allegro n II. Andante III. Allegro g IV. Chaconne

So

Mr. MAX HEINRICH.

Mr. FRAN

The Pianof

[115]

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1896-97.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

IX. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, APRIL 8, AT 7.45. P. M.

Programme.

GOLDMARK.	OVERTURE, "Sakuntala."
	SOLI for VIOLONCELLO.
a. HAMERIK.	CONCERT ROMANCE.
b. POPPER.	DANCE OF SYLPHS.
TSCHAIKOWSKY.	SYMPHONY No. 6, in B minor, "Pathétique, op. 74. I. Adagio. — Allegro non troppo. II. Allegro con grazia. III. Allegro molto vivace. IV. Finale: Adagio lamentoso.
WEBER.	"INVITATION TO THE DANCE," op. 65. (Arranged for Orchestra by FELIX WEINGARTNER.)

Soloist:

Mr. LEO SCHULZ.

The programme of the tenth and last Concert, Thursday, April 29, 1897, will be composed entirely of Wagner Selections. Mr. Ben Davies will be the soloist, and will sing "Lohengrin's Legend," from "Lohengrin," and "Siegmund's Love Song," from "Die Walküre."

BOS
SYMP
ORCH
SE
189
PROG

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

---

to which the fine arts, and everything else in this world, are subjected in the course of time." A definition, the truth of which is perhaps somewhat liable to be veiled behind its apparent cautiousness! All progress, progressio, or marching forward, takes place in time — which never marches backward; and, in this sense, all change is progress. Whether the change is for the better or not, is only to be proved in the retrospect. Yet we may surely say that the process of change undergone by this or that art has at least this element of amelioration in it: it is at least an attempt to make the art keep pace with other shifting elements in our life, and to adapt it to unavoidably new points of view.— HIERONYMUS SPATZ, Glossarium universale.

Simplicity! simplicity! is ever the cry of the art-lover whose face is turned backward. At which one is tempted to exclaim: Sancta simplicitas! For how can the ever-growing complexity of our life be truly reflected in a simple art? And who ever heard of an art that grew more simple in the process of evolution?— KYON CHRONOGENES, De rebus vulgaribus.

We critics are too apt to speak of this or that old work of art beginning to show the wrinkles of age. Were it only the wrinkles, the matter would not be hopeless; for old age may be hale, hearty, and vigorous, in spite of wrinkles; and mens enim et ratio et consilium in senibus est. A work of art does not die till it gets well past the wrinkled stage; it is not till it arrives at its period of second childhood that it becomes unfit for the world's further use. We discard works of art, not for their seeming age, but their apparent childishness.— JEAN ROGNOSSE, Le Critique impeccable.

THE "FAR AND SURE"
DAYTON BICYCLE.
No Possible Improvement of Practical Value has been passed by.
The Safety and Comfort of the Rider are assured.
The '97 Dayton rides like a Bird.
The Congdon & Carpenter Co.,
New England Agents,
Exchange Place and Exchange Street.

Speak not too contemptuously of trash. Trash has its uses. It is adapted to them whose imbecility can not rise above it; also to them whose weight of brain must at times touch bottom, to find rest. Emerson could read only the trashiest of novels with pleasure; one of Bülow's favorite relaxations was opéra-bouffe; many intellectual men take acute delight in the most sensational forms of melo-drama. Show me a man who despises trash, and I shall be pretty sure that trash forms no very sharp contrast with his habitual train of thought.— DIOGENES HODOBATES, Cynicisms.

Draw thy inspiration from whence thou canst; be happy if it come to thee at all. Yet remember that, the nearer the source, the fresher it will be and the less costly. The artist always has to pay a certain mileage on his inspiration — in loss of vital force and immediateness of appeal. Look not far abroad for thy inspiration, nor into distant ages, till thou hast made sure that thou canst not find it next door.—DIOGENE CAVAFIASCHETTO, La filosofia delle cose rare.

RIDE OF THE WALKÜRIES FROM "DIE WALKÜRE."

According to Scandinavian mythology, the Walküries were demi-goddesses, whose duty it was not only to succor heroes in battle, but to pick out the elect from among the slain and conduct them to Walhalla, the abode of the gods. They were armed with helmets, shields, and spears;

TELEPHONE.
HOLDEN,
Shirtmaker,
268 Westminster Street,
PROVIDENCE, R.I.
TRAYNE BUILDING, Room 16,
Opposite Shepard's.

Boston

SEAS

BOSTON SYMP

Mr. EMIL

XXI.

SATURDAY, A

In M

JOHANN

BORN MAY 7, 1833.

Pro

BRAHMS.	TRAGIC
BRAHMS.	VIER E a. Ecclesias b. Ecclesias c. Ecclesias d. I. Corint
BRAHMS.	CONCER A minor, I. Allegro. II. Andante. III. Vivace no
BRAHMS.	SYMPHO I. Allegro n II. Andante III. Allegro g IV. Chaconne

So

Mr. MAX HEINRICH.
Mr. FRAN

The Pianofor

[115]

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1896-97.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

IX. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, APRIL 8, AT 7.45, P. M.

Programme.

GOLDMARK.	OVERTURE, "Sakuntala."
	SOLI for VIOLONCELLO.
a. HAMERIK.	CONCERT ROMANCE.
b. POPPER.	DANCE OF SYLPHS.
TSCHAIKOWSKY.	SYMPHONY No. 6, in B minor, "Pathétique, op. 74. I. Adagio. — Allegro non troppo. II. Allegro con grazia. III. Allegro molto vivace. IV. Finale: Adagio lamentoso.
WEBER.	"INVITATION TO THE DANCE," op. 65. (Arranged for Orchestra by FELIX WEINGARTNER.)

Soloist:

Mr. LEO SCHULZ.

The programme of the tenth and last Concert, Thursday, April 29, 1897, will be composed entirely of Wagner Selections. Mr. Ben Davies will be the soloist, and will sing "Lohengrin's Legend," from "Lohengrin," and "Siegmund's Love Song," from "Die Walküre."

BOS
SYMP
ORCH
SE
189
PROG

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

---

and, when they rode forth to the battlefield, their armor shed a strange, flickering light, which flashed up over the northern skies, making what is called the "Aurora Borealis," or "Northern Lights."

The Ride of the Walküries occurs at the beginning of the third act of Die Walküre — the second of the four dramas which together form the Nibelungen trilogy, and the scene in the drama represents an assemblage of Walküries on the top of a rocky height, each arriving on horseback, and with a slain warrior hanging over her saddle. It is a scene of general bustle and excitement, to which the elements also contribute, the driving clouds presaging the coming of a storm. The music which accompanies it vividly depicts the wild laughter with which the warrior-maidens greet each other on their arrival, their battle-call, the prancing and neighing of their steeds, and the brewing storm. It should be borne in mind, however, that it is but an adaptation for concert use of a portion of a scene in which the voices of the Walküries are often very prominent; and, though it was prepared by Wagner himself, and may therefore be regarded as producing the general effect of the original, much allowance is due to the absence of the vocal element and scenic accessories.

We quote a word from the pen of M. Adolphe Jullien, characterizing the third act of Die Walküre, the translation having been made for this programme: "The third act is a masterpiece throughout. After the violent and sublime scene of the ride of the Valkyries assembling at the rendezvous, rending the air with their war-cries, and ruling the tempest itself, one follows with anxiety the moving dialogue between Brünnhilde, imploring mercy, and her implacable father. One is struck with admiration by Murray School of Oratory and Acting.

Miss MAUD MURRAY, Principal, - - 314 Boylston Street, Boston.
Elocution, Voice, Delsarte Pantomime, Singing, Acting, Literature, Physical Culture, Shakespeare, Public Reading and Recitation.
School now open (October 15).
Hours 10 A.M. to 4 P.M.
Private or evening lessons if desired. Call or send for Prospectus.

ADELAIDE B. WOOD, Teacher of Elocution,
704 Public Street.

INFANTRY HALL, PROVIDENCE.

Wednesday Evening, April 28, 1897, 8 o'clock.

The only appearance in Providence of the world's greatest Cantatrice,

MLLE. CALVÉ,

SUPPORTED BY

Mr. BARRON BERTHALD, Tenor,
Sig. GIUSEPPE CAMPANARI, Baritone,

AND THE

BOSTON FESTIVAL ORCHESTRA,
FIFTY PERFORMERS,
EMIL MOLLENHAUER, Conductor.

PROGRAMME.

Overture, "Die Meistersinger." . . . . Wagner
Prize Song from "Die Meistersinger." . . . . Wagner
Mr. BERTHALD.
Prologue, "I Pagliacci." . . . . Leoncavallo
Sig. CAMPANARI.

Entire Fourth Act, Ambroise Thomas's Opera "Hamlet."
Mlle. CALVÉ.
(Sung and acted in costume.)

Ballet Music from "Carmen." . . . . Bizet
Toreador Song from "Carmen." . . . . Bizet
Sig. CAMPANARI.
Scene from "Carmen" (Habanera). . . . . Bizet
MLLE. CALVÉ.
Poème Symphonique, "Le Rouet d'Omphale." . . . . Saint-Saëns
Trio from "Faust" (Fifth Act). . . . . Gounod
Mlle. CALVÉ, Mr. BERTHALD, Sig. CAMPANARI.
Marche Héroïque. . . . . Saint-Saëns

Mason & Hamlin Piano used exclusively by Boston Festival Orchestra.

Boston

SEAS

BOSTON SYMP

Mr. EMIL

XXI.

SATURDAY, A

In M

JOHANN

BORN MAY 7, 1833.

Pro

BRAHMS.	TRAGI
BRAHMS.	VIER a. Ecclesia b. Ecclesia c. Ecclesia d. I. Corint
BRAHMS.	CONCE A minor, I. Allegro. II. Andante. III. Vivace no
BRAHMS.	SYMPH I. Allegro n II. Andante III. Allegro g IV. Chaconne

So

Mr. MAX HEINRICH.
Mr. FRAN

The Pianofo

[115]

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1896-97.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

IX. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, APRIL 8, AT 7.45, P. M.

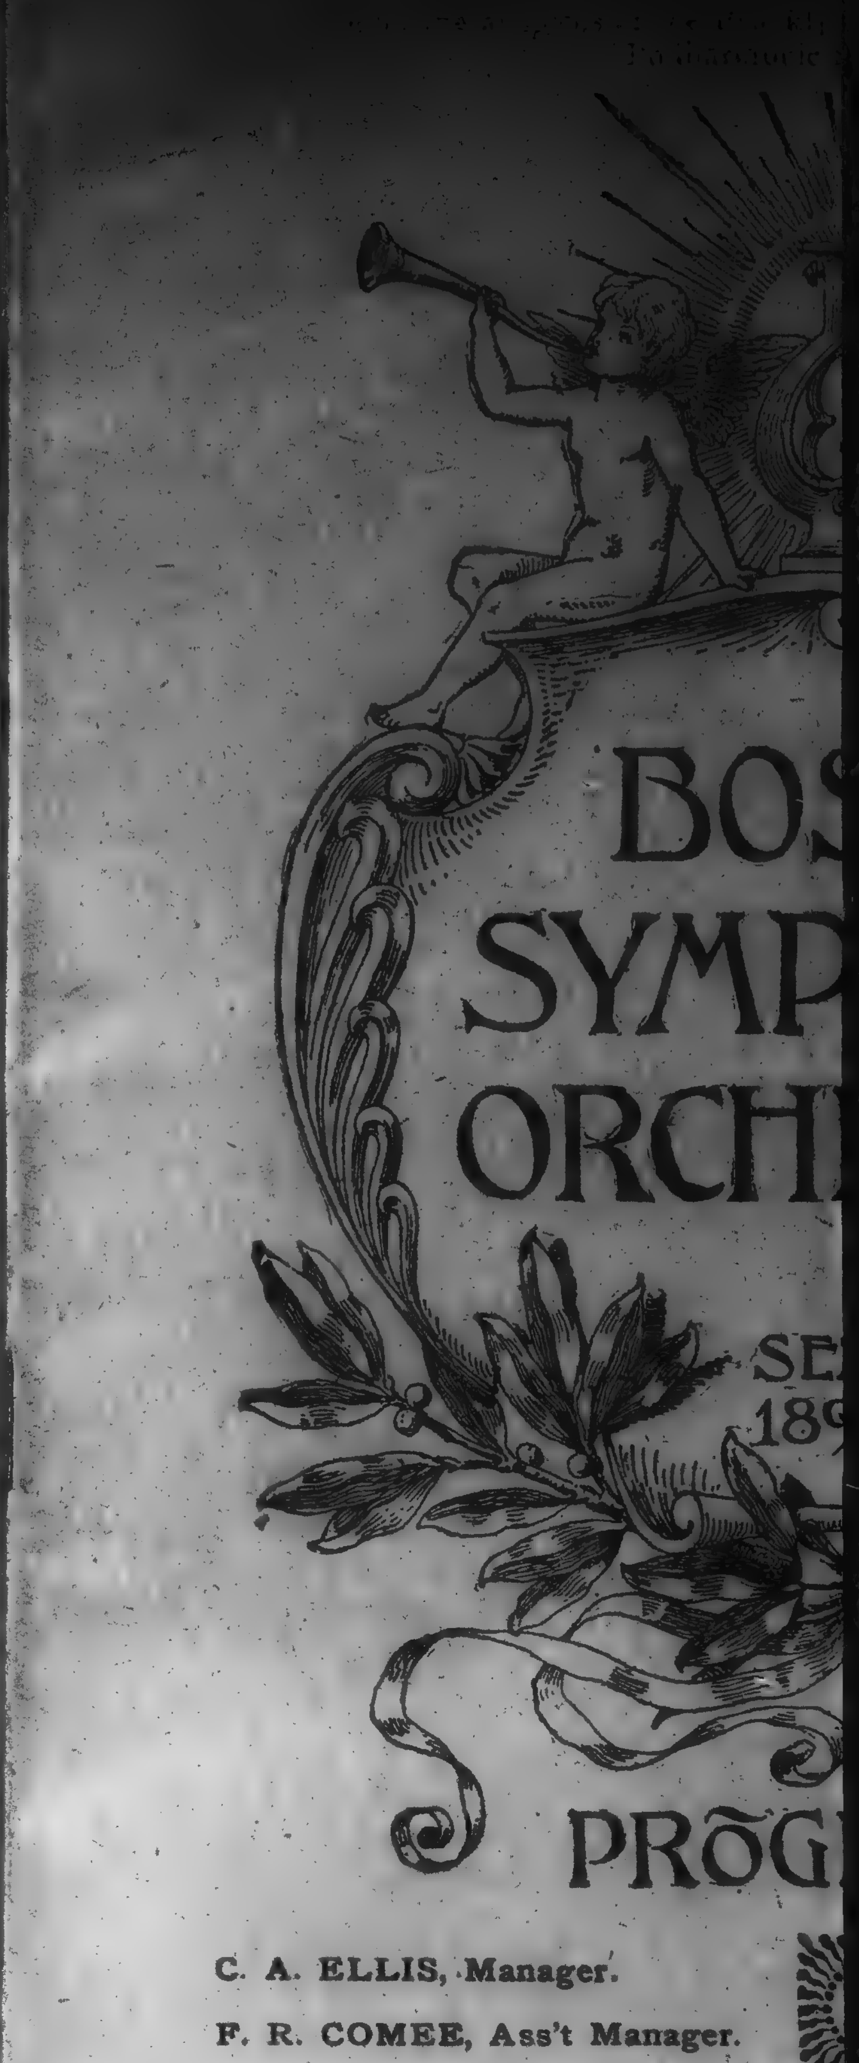
Programme.

GOLDMARK.	OVERTURE, "Sakuntala."
	SOLI for VIOLONCELLO.
a. HAMERIK.	CONCERT ROMANCE.
b. POPPER.	DANCE OF SYLPHS.
TSCHAIKOWSKY.	SYMPHONY No. 6, in B minor, "Pathétique, op. 74. I. Adagio. — Allegro non troppo. II. Allegro con grazia. III. Allegro molto vivace. IV. Finale: Adagio lamentoso.
WEBER.	"INVITATION TO THE DANCE," op. 65. (Arranged for Orchestra by FELIX WEINGARTNER.)

Soloist:

Mr. LEO SCHULZ.

The programme of the tenth and last Concert, Thursday, April 29, 1897, will be composed entirely of Wagner Selections. Mr. Ben Davies will be the soloist, and will sing "Lohengrin's Legend," from "Lohengrin," and "Siegmund's Love Song," from "Die Walküre."



BOS
SYMP
ORCH
SE
189
PROG

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

---

the sublime farewell of the father to his daughter in the fantastic scene of the sea of fire, which mounts and curls about the sleeping goddess. The entire opera is distinguished from Rhinegold by a bolder manner, an inspiration nobler and freer, crossed by flashes of tender feeling and of surprising beauty. Masterpiece, indeed, this third act! twice a masterpiece as well for the brilliancy and fury of the orchestra in the frantic ride of the Valkyries as for the intense vocal expression and force of emotion in the admirable scene between Brünnhilde and Wotan."

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PROGRAMME,
For the twenty-four Boston Concerts,
With Historical and Descriptive Notes by William F. Apthorp,

Will be sent by mail each week to any address upon the payment of two dollars. Bound copies of the Programme for the entire season can be had at the same price by applying before the last concert. Address all communications to

F. R. COMEE, Music Hall, Boston.

MUSICAL INSTRUCTION.
BOSTON.

HEINRICH SCHUECKER, Solo Harpist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and teacher at the New England Conservatory of Music, will accept a limited number of pupils during the monthly visit of the Orchestra in this city. For information address 10 Greenwich Park, Boston.

Miss GERTRUDE EDMANDS, Concert and Oratorio. Vocal Instruction.
No. 160 BOYLSTON STREET, ROOM 7.

HOTELS.

CARROLLTON HOTEL,
Baltimore, Light, and German Streets, - BALTIMORE, MD.
AMERICAN AND EUROPEAN PLAN.
The largest and leading hotel in the city, with all modern improvements. The most central location accessible to all parts of the city. All lines of city passenger cars pass its doors.
JAMES P. SHANNON, Manager.

THE CONTINENTAL.
9th and Chestnut Streets, - - - - - - Philadelphia
CENTRAL LOCATION. APPOINTMENTS PERFECT.
Rates, from $2.50 to $4.00 per day. L. U. MALTBY.

List of Works performed at these Concerts during the Season of 1896–97.

BEETHOVEN
- Symphony No. 4, in B-flat major, Op. 60
- Symphony No. 8, in F major, Op. 93.

BIZET
- Little Suite, "Children's Games," Op. 22 (First time at these Concerts.)
- Entr'actes and Ballet Music from "Carmen."

GOLDMARK . . . . . Overture to "Sakuntala," Op. 13

LALO . . Symphonie Espagnole, for Violin and Orchestra, Op. 21
Mr. T. ADAMOWSKI.

LISZT
- Hungarian Rhapsody No. 6 ("Pesther Carneval") (First time.)
- Scene in the Tavern (Mephisto Waltz), from Lenau's "Faust"

MENDELSSOHN
- Overture, Scherzo, Notturno, and Wedding March, from "Midsummer-Night's Dream" Music.

MOZART
- Symphony in G minor (Koechel, 550)
- Recitative, "Crudele? Ah no, mio bene!" and Aria, "Non mi dir, bell' idol mio," from "Don Giovanni," Act II., Scene 13
Mme. GEORGINE VON JANUSCHOWSKY.

ROSSINI . . . . Overture, "William Tell"

RUBINSTEIN . Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 4, in D minor, Op. 70
Mme. TERESA CARRENO.

SCHILLINGS . . . . . Prelude to Act II., "Ingwelde" (First time.)

SCHUMANN
- Symphony No. 4, in D minor, Op. 120.
- Overture to "Genoveva," in C minor, Op. 81.
- Overture to "Manfred," in E-flat minor, Op. 115.

SPOHR . . . Concerto for Violin in A, No. 8, Op. 47 (Tragic)
Mr. CARL HALIR.

TSCHAIKOWSKY
- Symphony No. 4, in F minor, Op. 36. (First time at these Concerts.)
- Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 1, in B-flat minor, Op. 23.
Mr. MARTINUS SIEVEKING.

WAGNER
- "Parsifal." Prelude.
- "Tannhäuser." Overture.
- "Lohengrin." { a. Prelude to Act I. / b. Prelude to Act III.
- A "Siegfried" Idyl.
- "Rienzi." Overture.
- "Siegfried." Act II., "Forest Sounds."
- "Die Walküre." "Ride of the Walkyries."
- Aria, "Adriano," from "Rienzi."
Mme. GEORGINE VON JANUSCHOWSKY.

WEBER
- "Invitation to the Dance" (Scored for Orchestra by HECTOR BERLIOZ.)

Boston

SEAS

BOSTON SYMP

Mr. EMIL

XXI.

SATURDAY, A

In M

JOHANN

BORN MAY 7, 1833.

Pro

BRAHMS.	TRAGI
BRAHMS.	VIER a. Ecclesia b. Ecclesia c. Ecclesia d. I. Corint
BRAHMS.	CONCE A minor, I. Allegro. II. Andante. III. Vivace no
BRAHMS.	SYMPH I. Allegro n II. Andante III. Allegro g IV. Chaconne

So

Mr. MAX HEINRICH.
Mr. FRAN

The Pianofo

[115]

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1896-97.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

IX. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, APRIL 8, AT 7.45, P. M.

Programme.

GOLDMARK.	OVERTURE, "Sakuntala."
	SOLI for VIOLONCELLO.
a. HAMERIK.	CONCERT ROMANCE.
b. POPPER.	DANCE OF SYLPHS.
TSCHAIKOWSKY.	SYMPHONY No. 6, in B minor, "Pathétique, op. 74. I. Adagio. — Allegro non troppo. II. Allegro con grazia. III. Allegro molto vivace. IV. Finale: Adagio lamentoso.
WEBER.	"INVITATION TO THE DANCE," op. 65. (Arranged for Orchestra by FELIX WEINGARTNER.)

Soloist:

Mr. LEO SCHULZ.

The programme of the tenth and last Concert, Thursday, April 29, 1897, will be composed entirely of Wagner Selections. Mr. Ben Davies will be the soloist, and will sing "Lohengrin's Legend," from "Lohengrin," and "Siegmund's Love Song," from "Die Walküre."

BOS
SYMP
ORCH
SE
189
PROG

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

MUSICAL INSTRUCTION.

Mr. N. B. SPRAGUE,
CONDUCTOR AND ORGANIST.
STUDIO:
Butler Exchange, Room No. 1,
FIFTH FLOOR.

FELIX R. WENDELSCHAEFER,
INSTRUCTOR OF VIOLIN,
Musical Director, Providence Opera House.
Studio, 204 Westminster St., Room 15,
PROVIDENCE, R.I.
Telephone 2499.

Mrs. A. C. Shepardson-Nauck,
Violinist.
Music Rooms,
387 ANGELL STREET.

European School of Languages,
Hoppin Homestead Building,
357 Westminster St.
None but competent and successful native teachers of long experience.
For further particulars apply at school, 357 Westminster Street, or at residence, 169 Angell Street.
WILHELM NAUCK, Principal.

Herr HANS SCHNEIDER,
LATE OF THE CONSERVATORY OF COLOGNE, GERMANY,
TEACHER OF MUSIC,
ROOM 39 C,
CONRAD BUILDING.

Gustav O. Hornberger,
'Cello Soloist and Teacher.
49 FRANCIS STREET.

Mrs. Fannie Clifford McAuslan,
VOICE CULTURE.
Apply TUESDAYS, 10-12 A.M., and FRIDAYS, 3-5 P.M., at 248 Weybosset Street, Room 9.

Miss JULIA V. MIDGLEY,
TEACHER OF VIOLIN.
ROOM 623,
BUTLER EXCHANGE.

Mrs. ANNE GILBRETH CROSS
Will teach in Providence on Tuesdays and Wednesdays of the coming season. Appointments for lessons may be made by correspondence addressed to
No. 57 Pierce Building,
Copley Square, Boston.

The Largest Piano Concern in the World.

M. Steinert & Sons Company,

246 and 248 Westminster Street,
Providence, R.I.

Operators of Fifteen Stores in New England.
Pianos sold for Cash or on the Hire System.

Sole New England representatives for

STEINWAY & SON,	HARDMAN,
E. GABLER & BRO.,	BRAUMULLER,
PEASE,	STANDARD,
WESER BROS.,	PRINCE & SON

PIANOS.

Also the world-famed ÆOLIAN.

A new and complete line of all the latest sheet music, including everything played or sung at the Symphony Concerts, constantly on hand.

Pianos tuned by competent tuners.

M. Steinert & Sons Company.

Boston

SEASO

BOSTON SYMP

Mr. EMIL

XXI.

SATURDAY, A

In M

JOHANNE

BORN MAY 7, 1833.

Pro

BRAHMS.	TRAGIC
BRAHMS.	VIER I a. Ecclesia b. Ecclesia c. Ecclesia d. I. Corint
BRAHMS.	CONCE A minor, I. Allegro. II. Andante. III. Vivace no
BRAHMS.	SYMPHO I. Allegro n II. Andante III. Allegro g IV. Chaconne

So

Mr. MAX HEINRICH.
Mr. FRAN

The Pianofo

[115]

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1896-97.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

IX. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, APRIL 8, AT 7.45, P. M.

Programme.

GOLDMARK.	OVERTURE, "Sakuntala."
	SOLI for VIOLONCELLO.
a. HAMERIK.	CONCERT ROMANCE.
b. POPPER.	DANCE OF SYLPHS.
TSCHAIKOWSKY.	SYMPHONY No. 6, in B minor, "Pathetique," op. 74. I. Adagio — Allegro non troppo. II. Allegro con grazia. III. Allegro molto vivace. IV. Finale. Adagio lamentoso.
WEBER.	"INVITATION TO THE DANCE," op. 65. (Arranged for Orchestra by FELIX WEINGARTNER.)

Soloist:

Mr. LEO SCHULZ.

The programme of the tenth and last Concert, Thursday, April [illegible], will be composed entirely of Wagner Selections. Mr. Ben Davies will be the soloist, and will sing "Lohengrin's Legend," from "Lohengrin," and "Siegmund's Love Song" from "Die Walküre."

ACADEMY OF MUSIC .

Friday Evening, Ma

Saturday Afternoon,

Under the auspices of the Brooklyn

Philharmonic S

BOS

SYMP

ORCH

SE

189

PRŌG

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

MUSICAL INSTRUCTION.

Mr. N. B. SPRAGUE,
CONDUCTOR AND ORGANIST.
STUDIO.
Butler Exchange, Room No. 1,
FIFTH FLOOR.

FELIX R. WENDELSCHAEFER,
INSTRUCTOR OF VIOLIN,
Musical Director, Providence Opera House
Studio, 204 Westminster St., Room 15,
PROVIDENCE, R.I.
Telephone [illegible]

Mrs. A. C. Shepardson-Nauck,
Violinist.
Music Rooms,
387 ANGELL STREET.

European School of Languages,
Hoppin Homestead Building,
357 Westminster St.

None but competent and successful native teachers of long experience.

For further particulars apply at school, 357 Westminster Street, or at residence, 169 Angell Street

WILHELM NAUCK, Principal.

Herr HANS SCHNEIDER,
LATE OF THE CONSERVATORY OF COLOGNE, GERMANY,
TEACHER OF MUSIC,
ROOM 39 C.
CONRAD BUILDING.

Gustav O. Hornberger,
'Cello Soloist and Teacher.
49 FRANCIS STREET.

Mrs. Fannie Clifford McAuslan,
VOICE CULTURE.
Apply TUESDAYS 10-12 A.M. and FRIDAYS, 3-5 P.M., at 248 Weybosset Street, Room 9.

Miss JULIA V. MIDGLEY,
TEACHER OF VIOLIN.
ROOM 623,
BUTLER EXCHANGE.

Mrs. ANNE GILBRETH CROSS

Will teach in Providence on Tuesdays and Wednesdays of the coming season. Appointments for lessons may be made by correspondence addressed to

No. 57 Pierce Building,
Copley Square, Boston.

The Largest Piano Concern in the World.

M. Steinert & Sons Company,

246 and 248 Westminster Street,
Providence, R.I.

Operators of Fifteen Stores in New England.
Pianos sold for Cash or on the Hire System.

Sole New England representatives for

STEINWAY & SON,
E. GABLER & BRO.,
PEASE,
WESER BROS.,
HARDMAN,
BRAUMULLER,
STANDARD,
PRINCE & SON

PIANOS.

Also the world-famed ÆOLIAN.

A new and complete line of all the latest sheet music, including everything played or sung at the Symphony Concerts, constantly on hand.

Pianos tuned by competent tuners.

M. Steinert & Sons Company.

Boston

SEAS

BOSTON SYMP

Mr. EMIL

XXI.

SATURDAY, A

In M

JOHANN

BORN MAY 7, 1833.

Pro

BRAHMS	TRAGI
BRAHMS.	VIER a. Ecclesia b. Ecclesia c. Ecclesia d. I. Corint
BRAHMS.	CONCE A minor I. Allegro. II. Andante. III. Vivace n
BRAHMS.	SYMPH I. Allegro n II. Andante III. Allegro g IV. Chaconne

So

Mr. MAX HEINRICH.

Mr. FRAN

The Pianofo

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1896-97.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

IX. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, APRIL 8, AT 7.45. P. M.

Programme.

GOLDMARK.	OVERTURE, "Sakuntala."
	SOLI for VIOLONCELLO.
a. HAMERIK.	CONCERT ROMANCE.
b. POPPER.	DANCE OF SYLPHS.
TSCHAIKOWSKY.	SYMPHONY No. 6, in B minor, "Pathétique," op. 74. I. Adagio. — Allegro non troppo. II. Allegro con grazia. III. Allegro molto vivace. IV. Finale. Adagio lamentoso.
WEBER.	"INVITATION TO THE DANCE," op. 65. (Arranged for orchestra by FELIX WEINGARTNER.)

Soloist:

Mr. LEO SCHULZ.

The programme of the tenth and last Concert, Thursday, April [illegible], will be composed entirely of Wagner Selections. Mr. Ben Davies will be the soloist, and will sing "Lohengrin's Legend," from "Lohengrin," and "Siegmund's Love Song" from "Die Walküre."

Wm. Knabe & Co

Manufacturers of

GRAND, SQUARE, and UPRIGHT Pianos

EUGEN D'ALBERT:
From fullest conviction, I declare them to be the best instrum of America.

* * *

Dr. HANS VON BÜLOW:
Their sound and touch are more sympathetic to my ears hands than all others of the country. I declare them the lutely best in America.

* * *

ALFRED GRÜNFELD:
I consider them the best instruments of our times.

* * *

P. TSCHAIKOWSKY:
Combines with great volume of tone rare sympathetic and tone color and perfect action.

WAREROOMS:

BALTIMORE, 22 and 24 E. Baltimore Street.
WASHINGTON, 1422 Pennsylvania Avenue.
NEW YORK, 148 Fifth Avenue.

MANN & ECCLES, Sole Representatives,
122 Mathewson Street.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC .
Friday Evening, M
Saturday Afternoon,
Under the auspices of the Brookly
Philharmonic

BOS
SYMP
ORCH
SE
189
PROG

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

Boston

SEAS

BOSTON SYMP

Mr. EMIL

XXI.

SATURDAY, A

In M JOHANNE
BORN MAY 7, 1833.

Pro

BRAHMS.	TRAGI
BRAHMS.	VIER
	a. Ecclesias b. Ecclesias c. Ecclesias d. I. Corint
BRAHMS.	CONCE A minor, I. Allegro. II. Andante. III. Vivace no
BRAHMS.	SYMPH I. Allegro n II. Andante III. Allegro g IV. Chaconne

So

Mr. MAX HEINRICH.
Mr. FRAN

The Pianofor

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1896-97.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

IX. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, APRIL 8, AT 7.45, P. M.

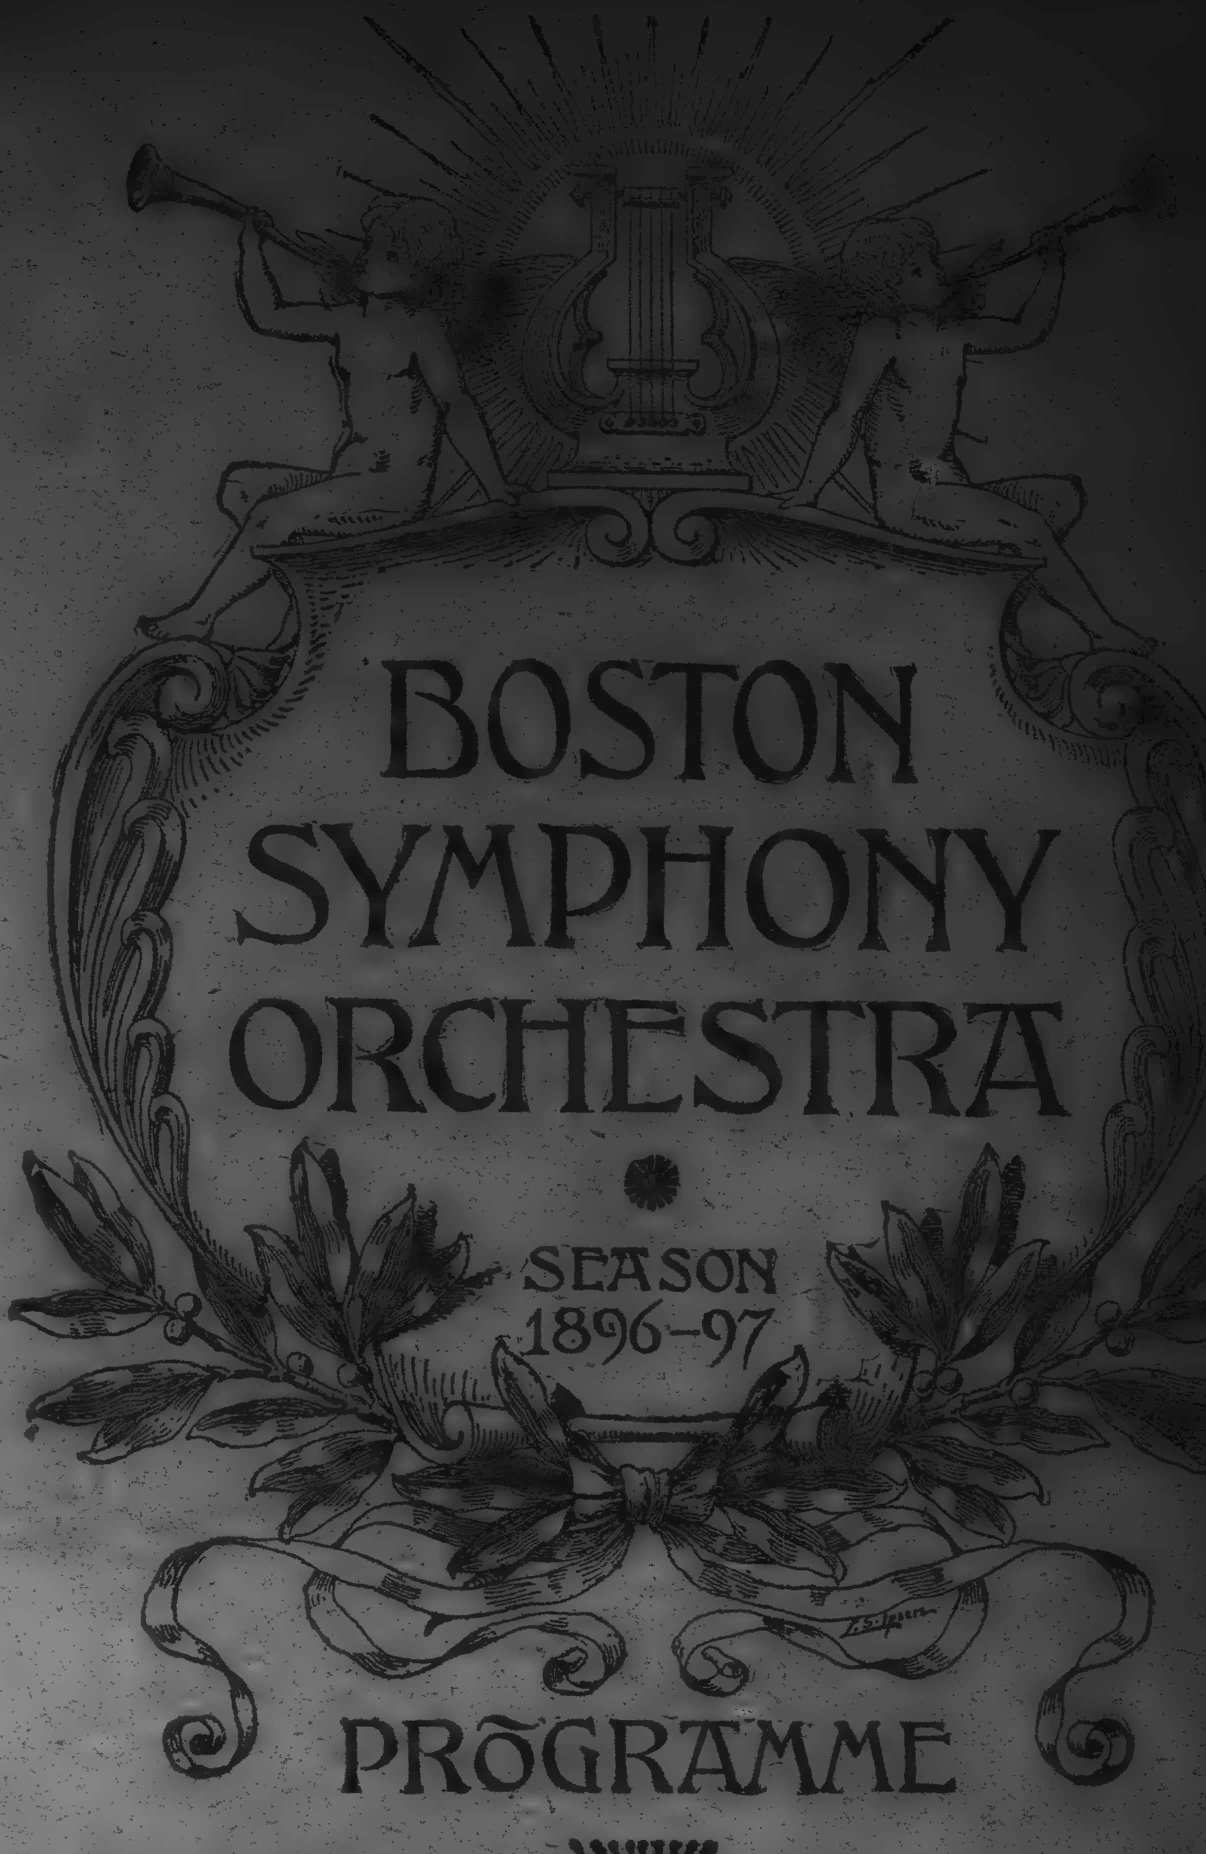
Programme.

GOLDMARK.	OVERTURE, "Sakuntala."
	SOLI for VIOLONCELLO.
a. HAMERIK.	CONCERT ROMANCE.
b. POPPER.	DANCE OF SYLPHS.
TSCHAIKOWSKY.	SYMPHONY No. 6, in B minor, "Pathétique, op. 74. I. Adagio. — Allegro non troppo. II. Allegro con grazia. III. Allegro molto vivace. IV. Finale: Adagio lamentoso.
WEBER.	"INVITATION TO THE DANCE," op. 65. (Arranged for Orchestra by FELIX WEINGARTNER.)

Soloist:

Mr. LEO SCHULZ.

The programme of the tenth and last Concert, Thursday, April 29, 1897, will be composed entirely of Wagner Selections. Mr. Ben Davies will be the soloist, and will sing "Lohengrin's Legend," from "Lohengrin," and "Siegmund's Love Song," from "Die Walküre."



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1896-97

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

5

Tickets at the Brooklyn Institute
and at Chandler's Music Store,
300 Fulton Street.

Johannes Brahms. Vier Ernste Gesange, op. 121.

a. ECCLESIASTES III.

"One thing befalleth the beasts and the sons of men; the beast must die, the man dieth also, yea, both must die; to beast and man one breath is given, and the man is not above the beast; for all things are but vanity. They go all to one place, for they are of the dust, and to dust they return. Who knoweth if a man's spirit goeth upward? and who knoweth if the spirit of the beast goeth downward to the earth? Therefore, I perceive there is no better thing than for a man to rejoice in his own works, for that is his portion. For who shall ever show him what will happen after him?"

b. ECCLESIASTES IV.

"So I returned and did consider all the oppressions done beneath the sun, and there was weeping and wailing from those that were oppressed and had no comfort; for with their oppressors there was power, so that no one came to comfort them. Then I did praise the dead — which are already dead — yea, more than the living which linger still in life; yea, he that is not is better than dead or living; for he doth not know of the evil that is wrought forever on earth."

c. ECCLESIASTICUS XLI.

"O death, how bitter art thou unto him that dwelleth in peace, to him that hath joy in his possessions, and liveth free from trouble, to him whose ways are prosperous in all things, to him that still may eat! O death, how bitter art thou! O death, how welcome thy call to him that is in want, and whose strength doth fail him, and whose life is but a pain, who hath nothing to hope for, and cannot look for relief! O death, how welcome art thou, how welcome is thy call!"

d. I CORINTHIANS XIII.

"Though I speak with the tongues of men, and of the angels, and have not charity, then am I become as a sounding brass, or a tinkling cymbal. And though I can prophesy and understand all mysteries, and am powerful in knowledge, and though I have the gift of faith and can move the mountains, and have not charity, yet am I nothing worth. And though I give my worldly goods to feed the poor, and though I give my fleshly body to be burned, and have not charity, it profiteth me nothing. For now we see the word darkly as through a glass, but then we shall see it face to face. Here I know but partly, but there I surely shall know it, even as I am also known. Now abideth faith, and hope and charity, these three; but the greatest of them all is charity."

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

6

Single tickets, at $1.25 each, on sale at Infantry Hall.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1896-97.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

XXII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, APRIL 17, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

N. RIMSKY KORSAKOW.	SYMPHONIC SUITE, "Scheherazade." (First time.)
SCHUMANN.	CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE.
SCHUMANN.	SYMPHONY No. 3, in E-flat major, "Rhenish."

Soloist:

Mr. RAFAEL JOSEFFY.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

COLUMBIA THEATRE, ... WASHINGTON.

Tuesday Evening, March 23, at 8 precisely.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1896-97

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

5

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Metzerott's Music Store.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, . . . PHILADELPHIA.

Monday Evening, March 22, at 8.15 precisely.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1896-97

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

5

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Fischer's, 1221 Chestnut St.

METROPOLITAN OPERA HOUSE, - NEW YORK.

Thursday Evening, March 25, at 8.15 precisely.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1896-97

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

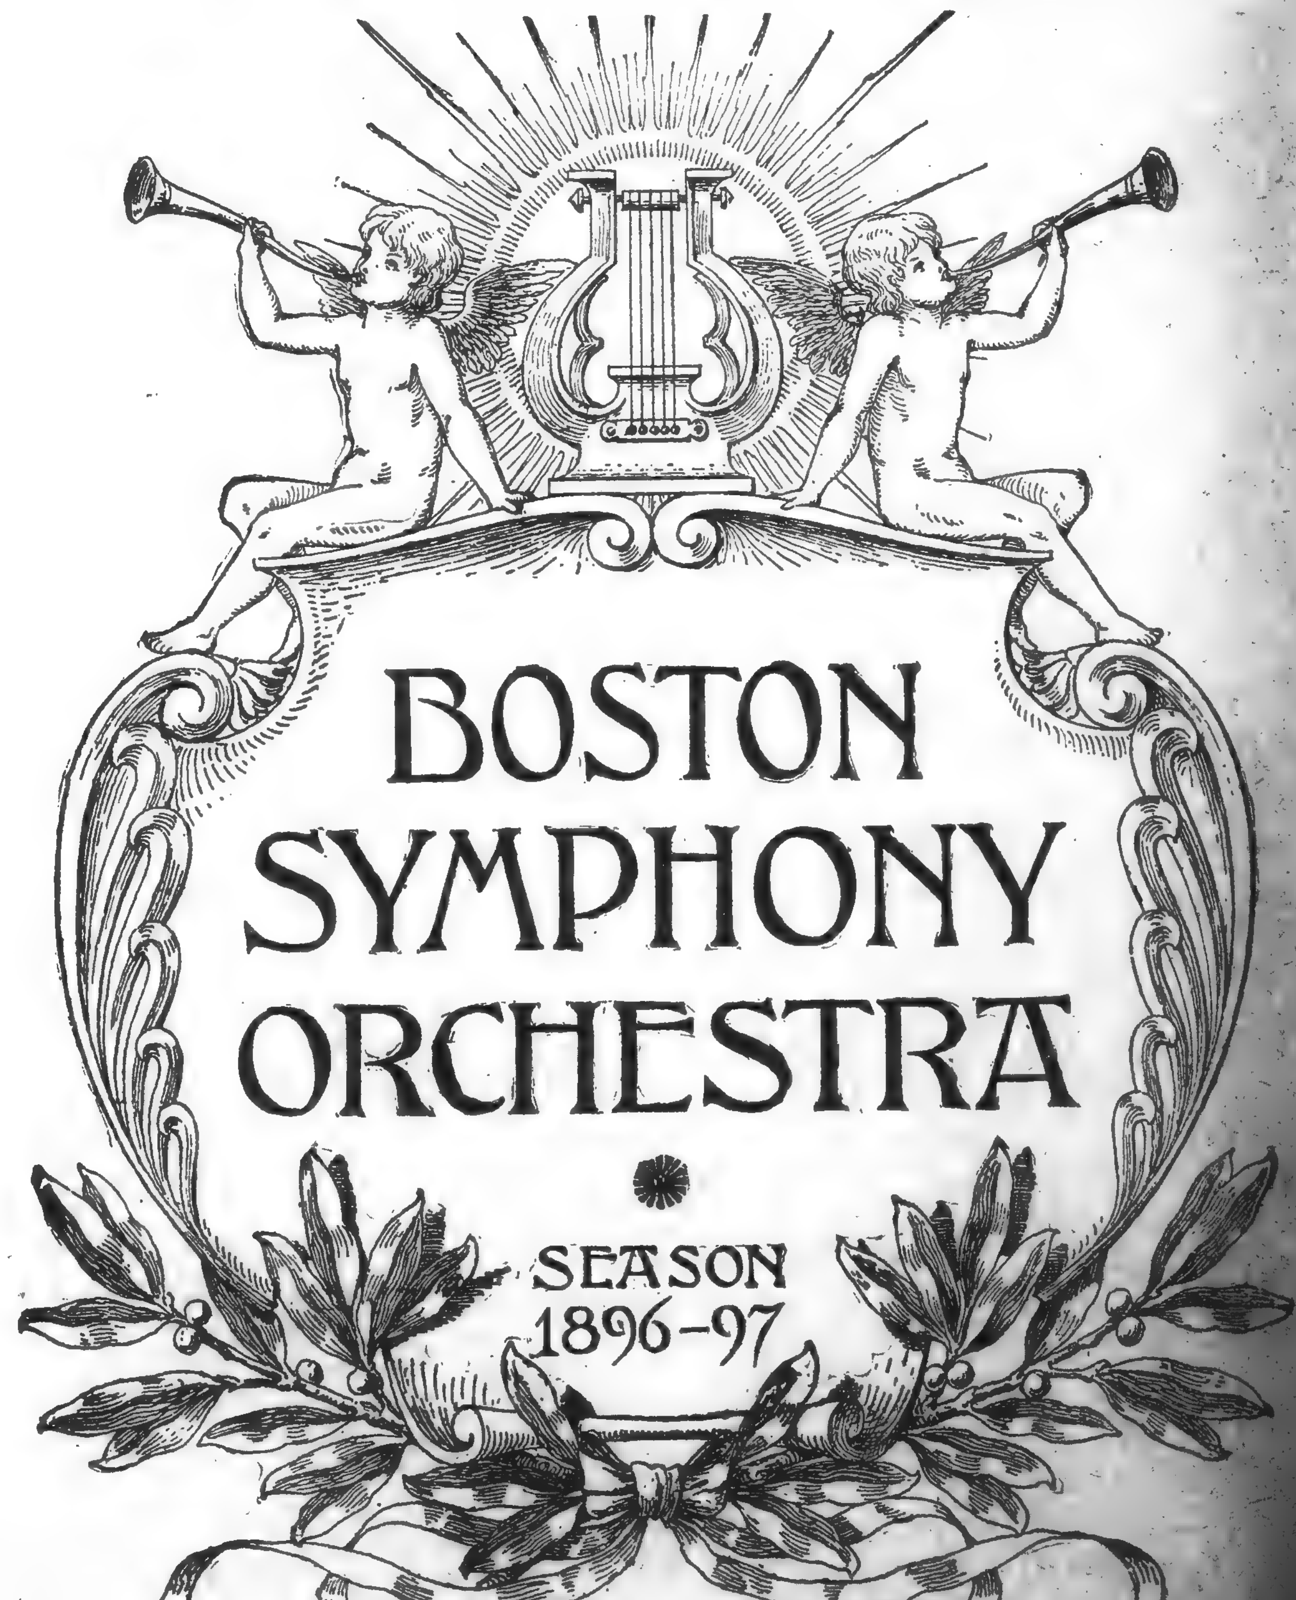
5

F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

Tickets at Schuberth's and at the Metropolitan Opera House.

MUSIC HALL, ... BALTIMORE.

Wednesday Evening, March 24, at 8.15 precisely.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1896-97

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

5

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Albert's, 13 No. Charles St.

[116]

BLANK PAGE

STEINERT HALL,

TUESDAY AFTERNOON,
MARCH 16, 1897, at 3.30.

THE

ADAMOWSKI QUARTET

T. ADAMOWSKI, First Violin,
ARNOLD MOLDAUER, 2d Violin.
MAX ZACH, Viola,
J. ADAMOWSKI, 'CELLO,

AND

MADAME SZUMOWSKA,

IN A CONCERT

OF

WORKS BY POLISH COMPOSERS.

Programme.

QUARTET in D minor, op. 9, — SIEGMUND NOSKOWSKI
Professor of Composition in the Conservatory of Music in Warsaw.
Allegro con brio. — Intermezzo.
Allegretto moderato. — Adagio non troppo.
Finale: Oberek (National Dance.)
(First time.)

VARIATIONS and FUGUE in A minor, for Pianoforte, — PADEREWSKI
MADAME SZUMOWSKA.

SOLOS for VIOLIN.
a. Legende, — WIENIAWSKI
b. Mazourka, — ZARZYCKI
the late Director of the Conservatory of Music in Warsaw.
MR. T. ADAMOWSKI.

TRIO for PIANOFORTE, VIOLIN, and 'CELLO, G minor, op. 8, — CHOPIN
Allegro con fuoco.
Scherzo: Con moto, ma non troppo.
Adagio: Sostenuto.
Finale: Allegretto.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1896-97.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

VII. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, MARCH 4, AT 7.45, P. M.

Programme.

SCHUBERT.	OVERTURE, "Rosamunde."
EDOUARD LALO.	SYMPHONIE ESPAGNOLE, for VIOLIN and ORCHESTRA, op. 21. I. Allegro non troppo. II. Scherzando (Allegro molto.) III. Andante. IV. Rondo (Allegro.)
HAYDN.	SYMPHONY in C minor (B. & H., No. 9.) I. Allegro. II. Andante cantabile. III. Menuetto. — Trio. IV. Finale: Vivace.

Soloist:

Mr. T. ADAMOWSKI.

Eighth Concert, Thursday, March 18, 1897. The Orchestral Selections will be Beethoven's Symphony No. 4; Goldmark's Prelude to Part III. of "The Cricket on the Hearth," and Rossini's Overture to "William Tell." The Soloist will be Mrs. H. H. Gallison, who will sing an Aria by Handel, and Songs with Pianoforte.

Academy of Music, Fall River.

SEASON 1896-97.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

CONCERT

MONDAY, MARCH 29, AT 8 P. M.

Programme.

BEETHOVEN.	SYMPHONY No. 4, in B-flat major, op. 60. I. Adagio. — Allegro vivace. II. Adagio. III. Allegro vivace. Trio: Un poco meno Allegro. IV. Finale: Allegro ma non troppo.
SAINT-SAËNS.	CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE, No. 2, in G minor, op. 60. I. Andante sostenuto. II. Allegretto scherzando. III. Presto.
BIZET.	LITTLE SUITE, "Children's Games," op. 22. I. March (Trumpets and Drums): Allegretto moderato. II. Berceuse (The Doll): Andantino quasi Andante. III. Impromptu (The Top): Allegro vivo. IV. Duo (Little Husband, Little Wife): Andantino. V. Galop (The Ball): Presto. (First time.)
WEBER.	"INVITATION TO THE DANCE," op. 65. (Arranged for Orchestra by FELIX WEINGARTNER.) (First time.)
ROSSINI.	OVERTURE. "William Tell"

The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

Soloist: Mme Szumowska.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1896-97.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

VIII. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, MARCH 18, AT 7.45, P. M.

Programme.

BEETHOVEN.	SYMPHONY No. 4, in B-flat major, op. 60. I. Adagio. — Allegro vivace. II. Adagio III. Allegro vivace. Trio: Un poco meno Allegro. IV. Finale: Allegro ma non troppo.
HANDEL.	ARIA. "Pena tiranna." (Orchestrated from the pianoforte accompaniment by OTTO DRESEL.)
GOLDMARK.	PRELUDE to Part III. of "The Cricket on the Hearth."
GERMAN FOLK-SONGS	a) "In stiller Nacht." b) "Mein Mädel hat einen Rosenmund." c) "Die Sonne scheint nicht mehr." (Pianoforte accompaniment arranged by JOHANNES BRAHMS.)
ROSSINI.	OVERTURE. "William Tell"

Soloist:

Mrs. H. H. GALLISON.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

Ninth Concert, Thursday, April 8, 1897. The Orchestral Selections will be Goldmark's Overture to "Sakuntala," Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 6, and Weber's "Invitation to Dance," orchestrated by FELIX WEINGARTNER.
Mr. Leo Schulz will be the Soloist, and will play Bargiel's Adagio, op. 38, and Popper's "Dance of Sylphs."

INCOMPLETE

THE

Kneisel Quartet.

Mendelssohn Glee Club Hall,
West Forty-first Street.

Programme of Fourth Concert,

TUESDAY, MARCH SECOND,

At Eight.

GEORG HENSCHEL	Quartet in E-flat major (MS. First time.)
LUDWIG VAN BEETHOVEN	Quartet in E minor, Op. 59, No. 2
JOHANNES BRAHMS .	Quartet for Piano, Violin, Viola, and Violoncello, in F minor.

Assisting Artist,

Mr. RAFAEL JOSEFFY.

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Schuberth's, 23 Union Square.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

MUSIC HALL, ... BALTIMORE.

Wednesday Evening, February 24, at 8.15 precisely.

BOSTON
SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
SEASON
1896-97
PROGRAMME

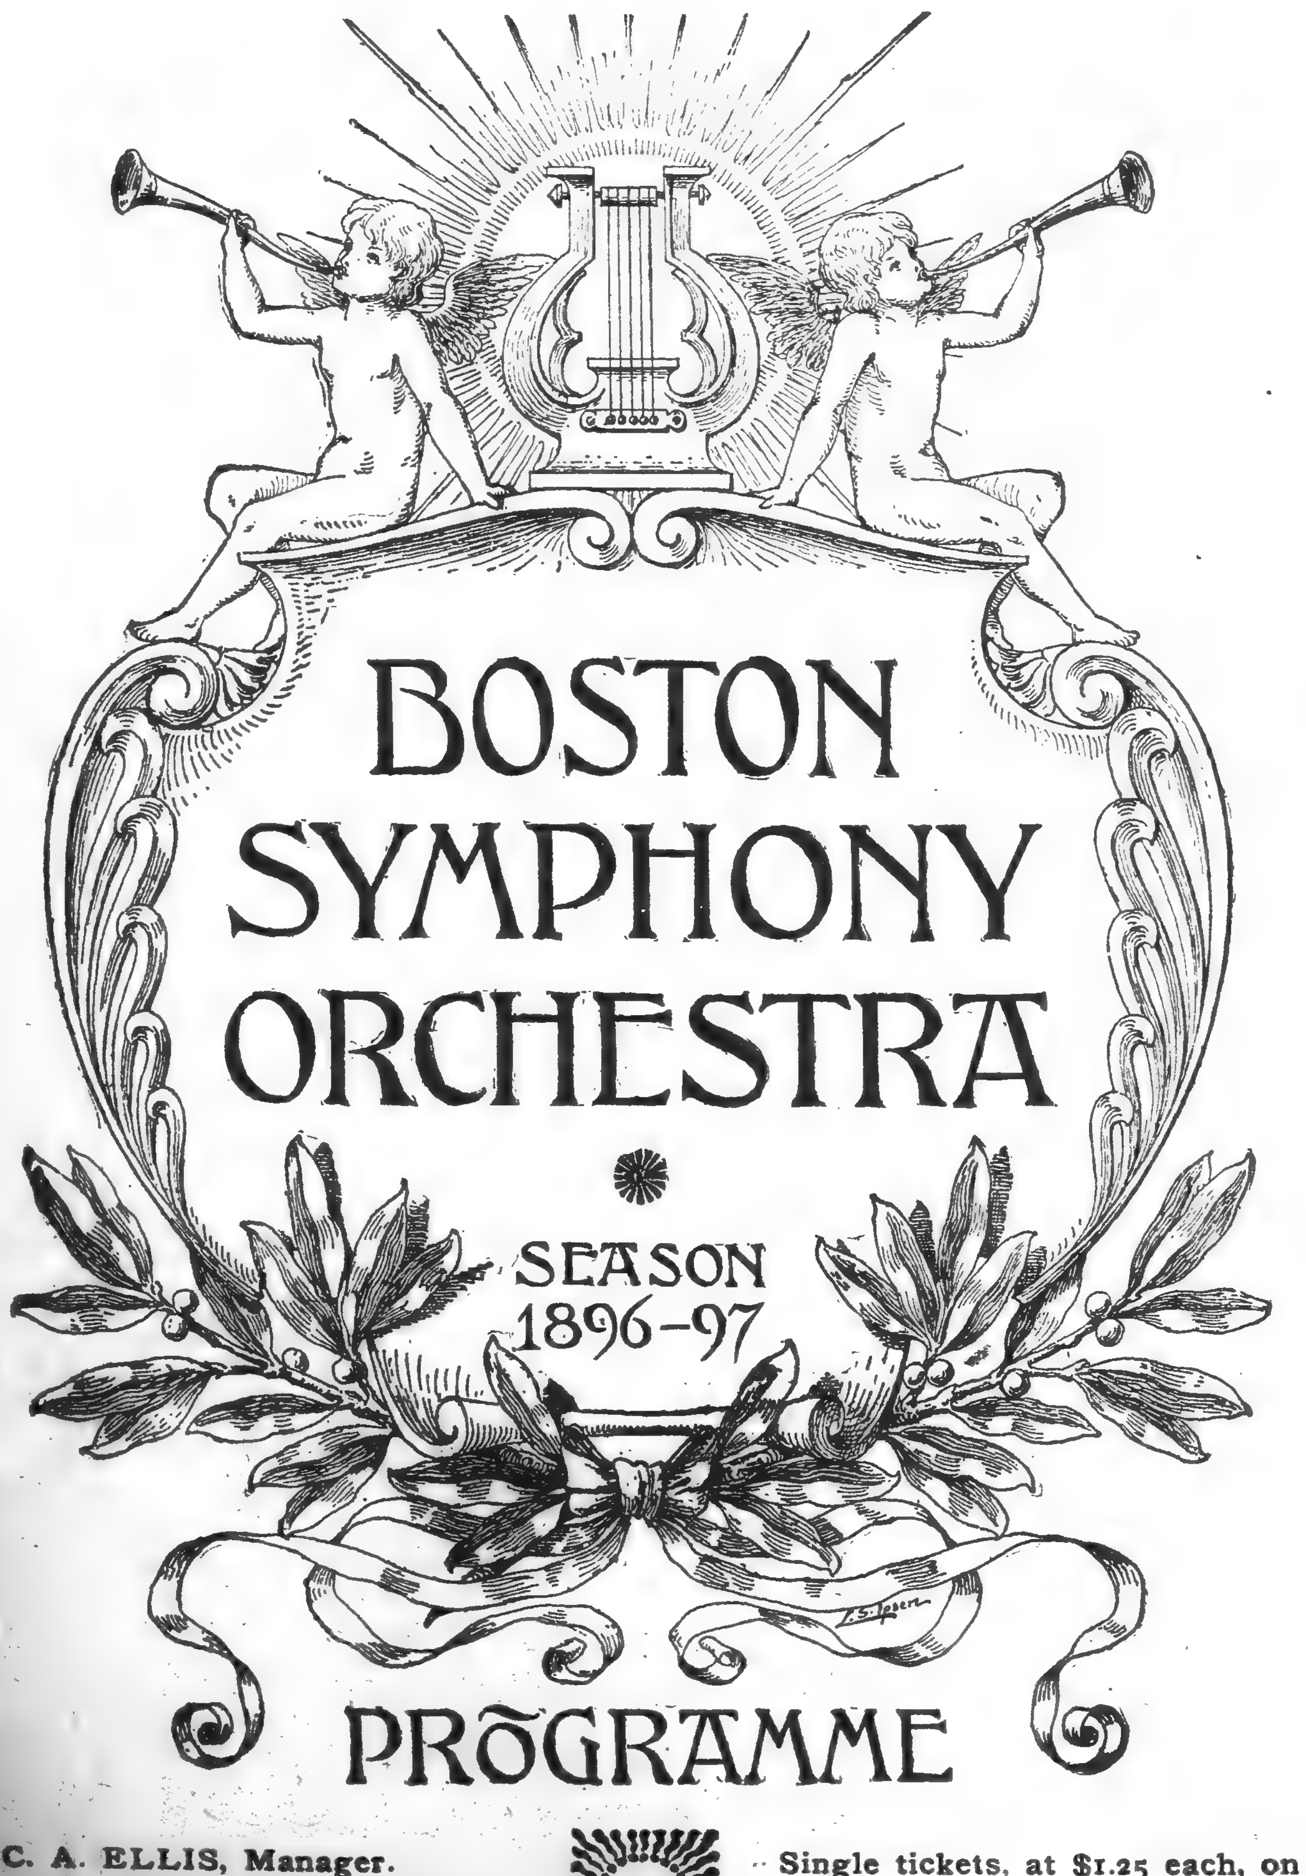
C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

4

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Albert's, 13 No. Charles St.

INFANTRY HALL, ... PROVIDENCE.

Wednesday Evening, March 10, at 8 precisely.



BOSTON
SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
SEASON
1896-97
PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

5

Single tickets, at $1.25 each, on sale at Infantry Hall.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC . . . . . BROOKLYN.

Friday Evening, February 26, at 8.15 precisely.
Saturday Afternoon, February 27, at 3 precisely.
Under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences and the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn.

BOSTON
SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
SEASON
1896-97
PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
[119] F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

4

Tickets at the Brooklyn Institute and at Chandler's Music Store, 300 Fulton Street.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1896-97.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

VI. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 4, AT 7.45, P. M.

Programme.

SCHUBERT. UNFINISHED SYMPHONY, in B minor.
I. Allegro moderato.
II. Andante con moto.

BEETHOVEN. CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE, No. 4, in G major, op. 50.
Allegro moderato. — Andante con moto. — Rondo.

BIZET. PETITE SUITE, "Jeu d'Enfants," op. 22.
I. Marche (Trompette et Tambour): Allegretto moderato.
II. Berceuse (La Poupée): Andantino quasi Andante.
III. Impromptu (La Toupie): Allegro vivo.
IV. Duo (Petit mari, petite femme): Andantino.
V. Galop (Le Bal): Presto.

BRAHMS. ACADEMIC OVERTURE.

Soloist:

Mr. HAROLD RANDOLPH.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

Seventh Concert, Thursday, March 4, 1897. The Orchestral Selections will be the Overture to "Rosamunde," by Schubert, and the Symphony in C minor (No. 9, B. & H.) by Haydn. Mr. Franz Kneisel will be the Soloist, and will play the Brahms Concerto for Violin

---

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

ACADEMY OF MUSIC . . . . . BROOKLYN.
Friday Evening, January 22, at 8.15 precisely.
Saturday Afternoon, January 23, at 3 precisely.
Under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences and the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1896-97

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

Tickets at the Brooklyn Institute
handler's Music Store, on Street.

COLUMBIA THEATRE, . . . WASHINGTON.

Tuesday Evening, February 23, at 8 precisely.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1896-97

PROGRAMME

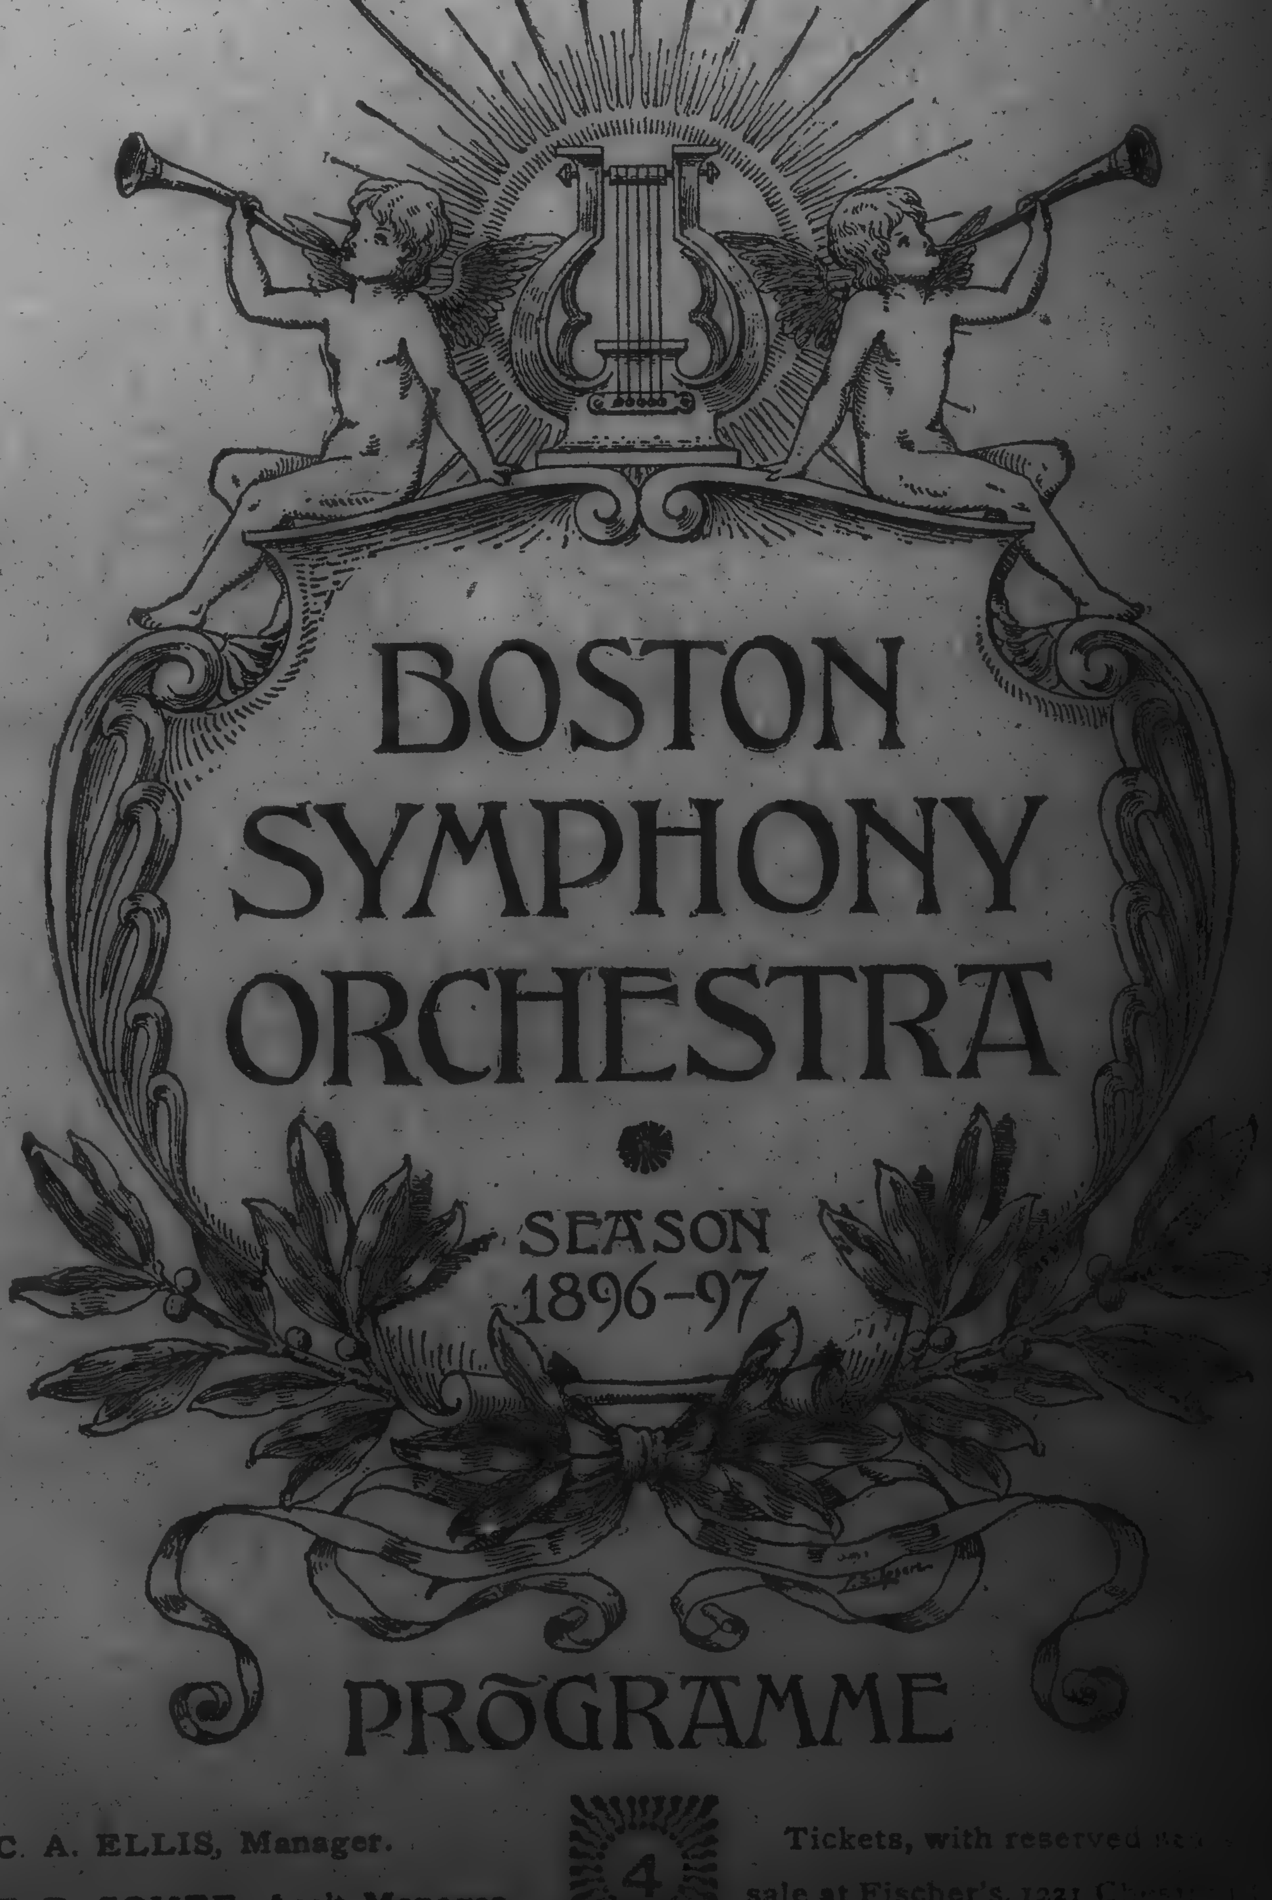
C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

4

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Metzerott's Music Store.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, . . . PHILADELPHIA.

Monday Evening, February 22, at 8.15 precisely.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1896-97

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

4

Tickets, with reserved sale at Fischer's, 1221 Ch

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1896-97.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

VI. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 4, AT 7.45, P. M.

Programme.

SCHUBERT. UNFINISHED SYMPHONY, in B minor.
I. Allegro moderato.
II. Andante con moto.

BEETHOVEN. CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE, No. 4, in G major, op. 50.
Allegro moderato. — Andante con moto. — Rondo

BIZET. PETITE SUITE, "Jeu d'Enfants," op. 22.
I. Marche (Trompette et Tambour): Allegretto moderato.
II. Berceuse (La Poupée): Andantino quasi Andante.
III. Impromptu (La Toupie): Allegro vivo.
IV. Duo (Petit mari, petite femme.): Andantino.
V. Galop (Le Bal): Presto.

BRAHMS. ACADEMIC OVERTURE

Soloist:

Mr. HAROLD RANDOLPH.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

Seventh Concert, Thursday, March 4, 1897. The Orchestral Selections will be the Overture to "Rosamunde," by Schubert, and the Symphony in C minor (No. 6, B. & H.) by Haydn. Mr. Franz Kneisel will be the Soloist, and will play the Brahms Concerto for Violin

---

ACADEMY OF MUSIC . . . . . BROOKLYN.
Friday Evening, January 22, at 8.15 precisely.
Saturday Afternoon, January 23, at 3 precisely.
Under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences and the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1896-97

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

Tickets at the Brooklyn Institute
handler's Music Store,
on Street.

COLUMBIA THEATRE, . . . WASHINGTON.

Tuesday Evening, February 23, at 8 precisely.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1896-97

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

4

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Metzerott's Music Store.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, . . . PHILADELPHIA.

Monday Evening, February 22, at 8.15 precisely.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1896-97

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

4

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Fischer's, 1221 Chestnut St.

[120]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

COLUMBIA THEATRE, ... WASHINGTON.

Tuesday Evening, January 19, at 8 precisely.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1896-97

PROGRAMME

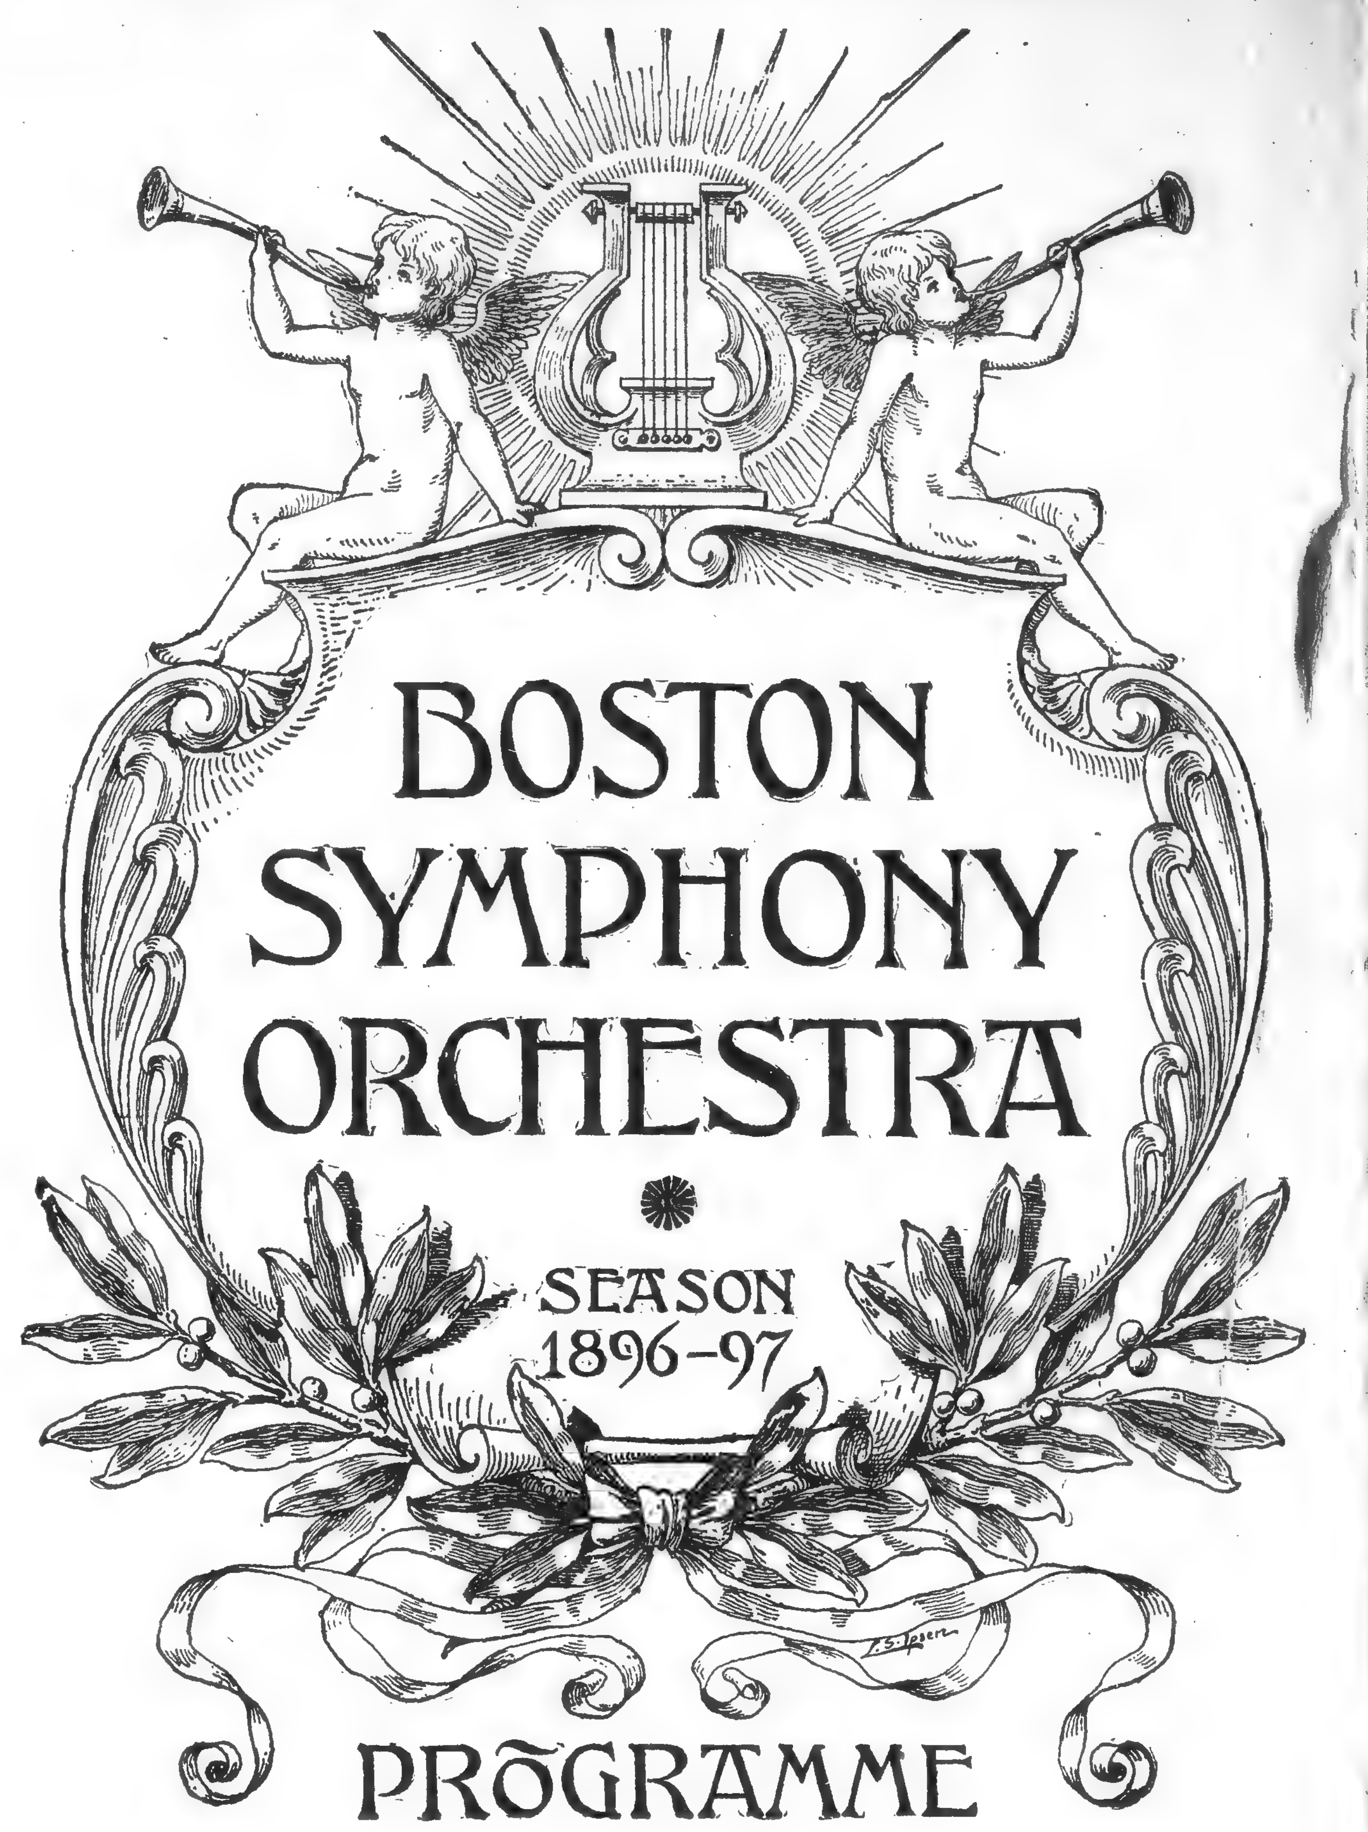
C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

3

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Metzerott's Music Store.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, ... PHILADELPHIA.

Monday Evening, January 18, at 8.15 precisely.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1896-97

PROGRAMME

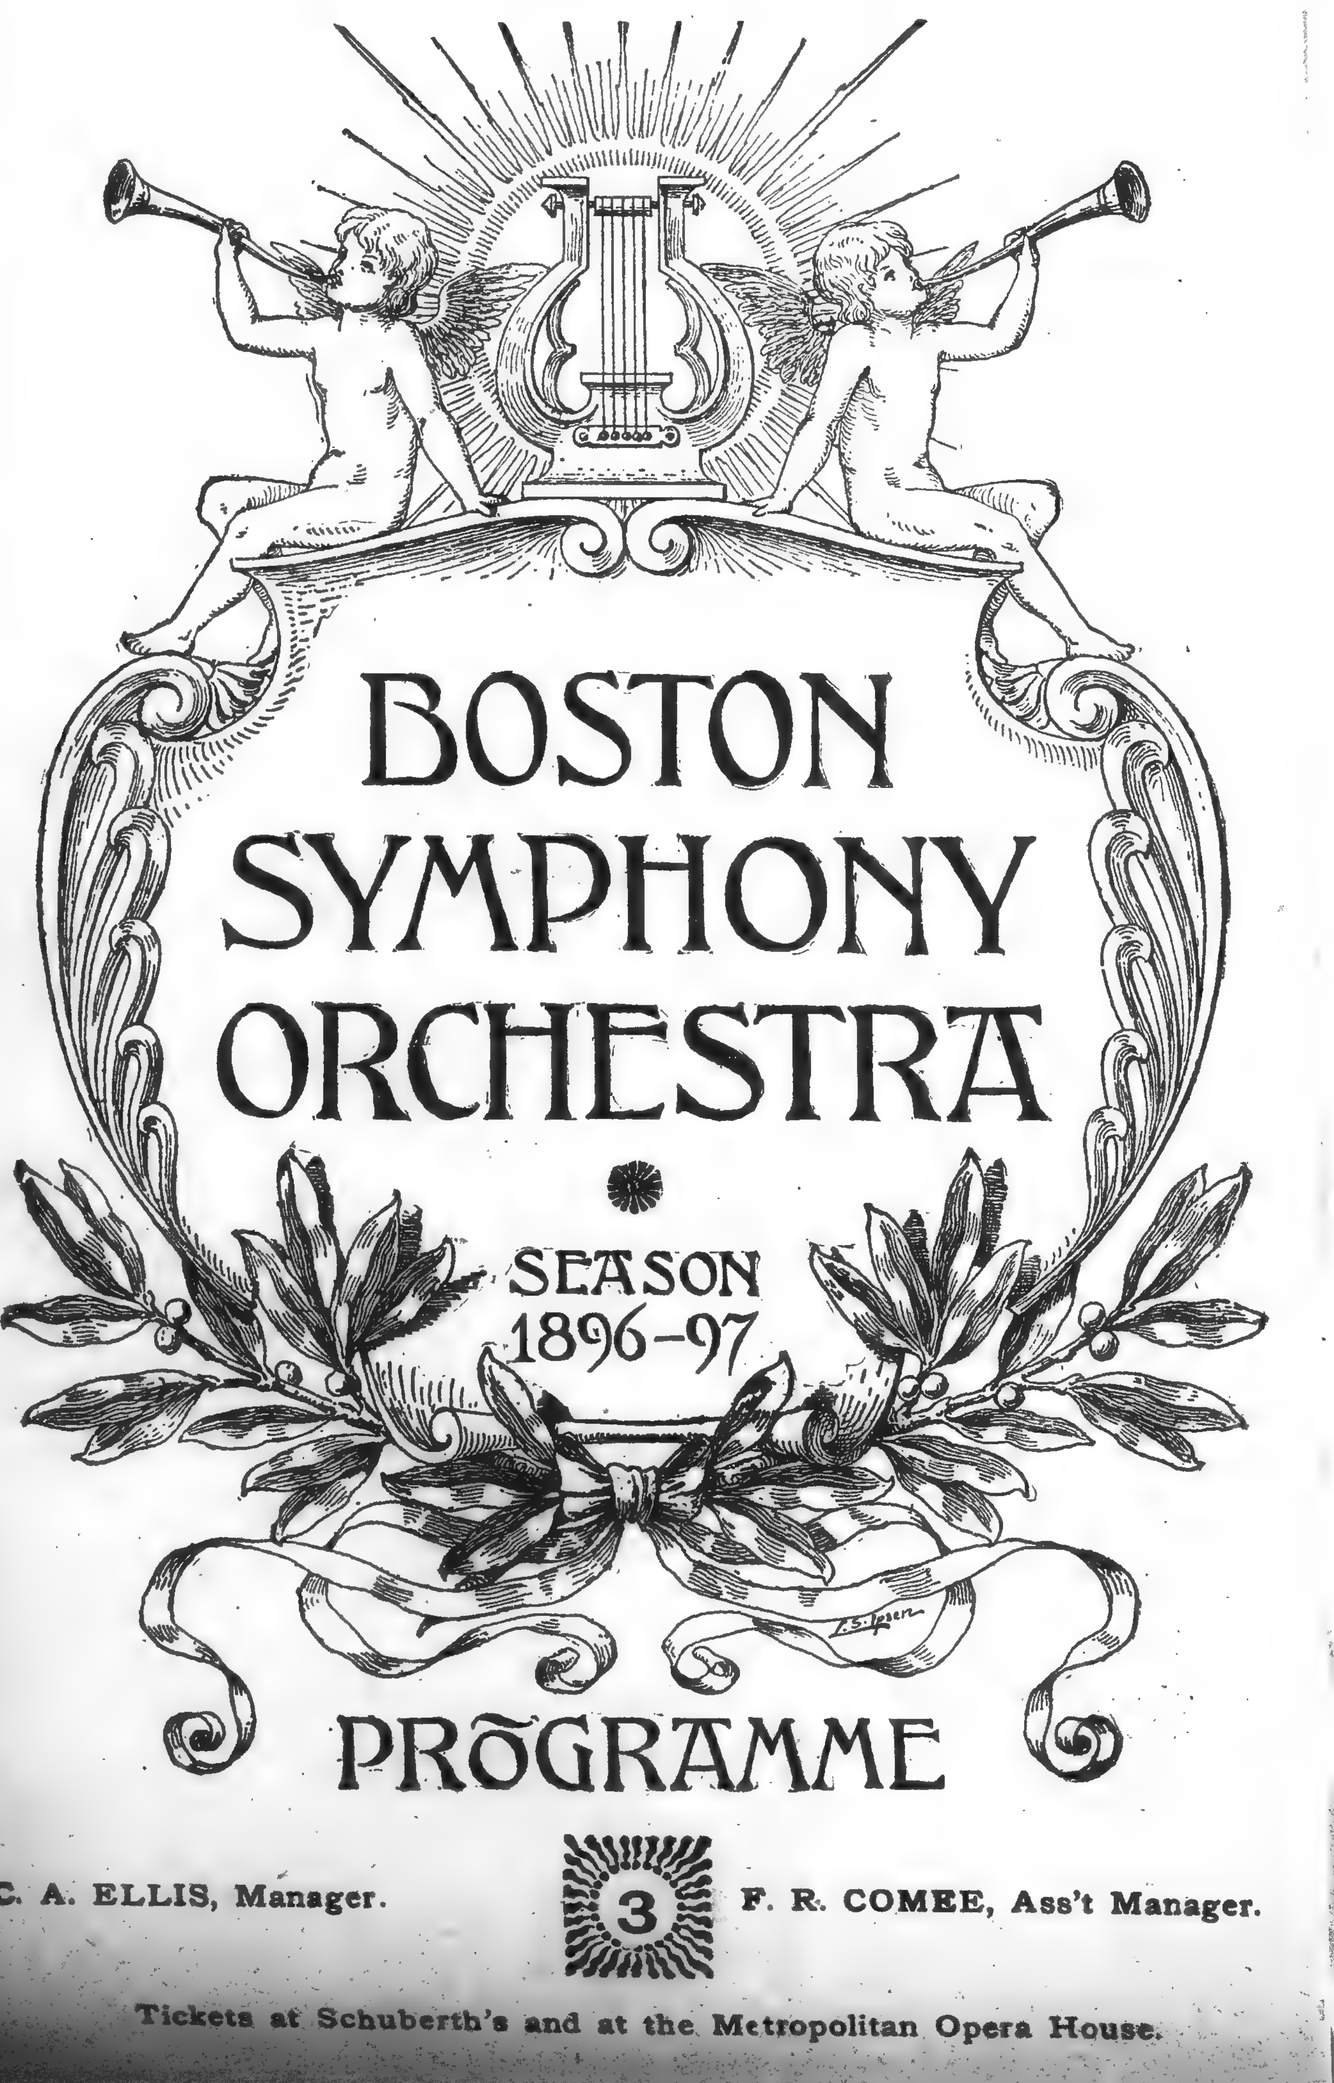
C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

3

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Fischer's, 1221 Chestnut St.

METROPOLITAN OPERA HOUSE, - NEW YORK.

Thursday Evening, January 21, at 8.15 precisely.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1896-97

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

3

F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

Tickets at Schuberth's and at the Metropolitan Opera House.

MUSIC HALL, ... BALTIMORE.

Wednesday Evening, January 20, at 8.15 precisely.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1896-97

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

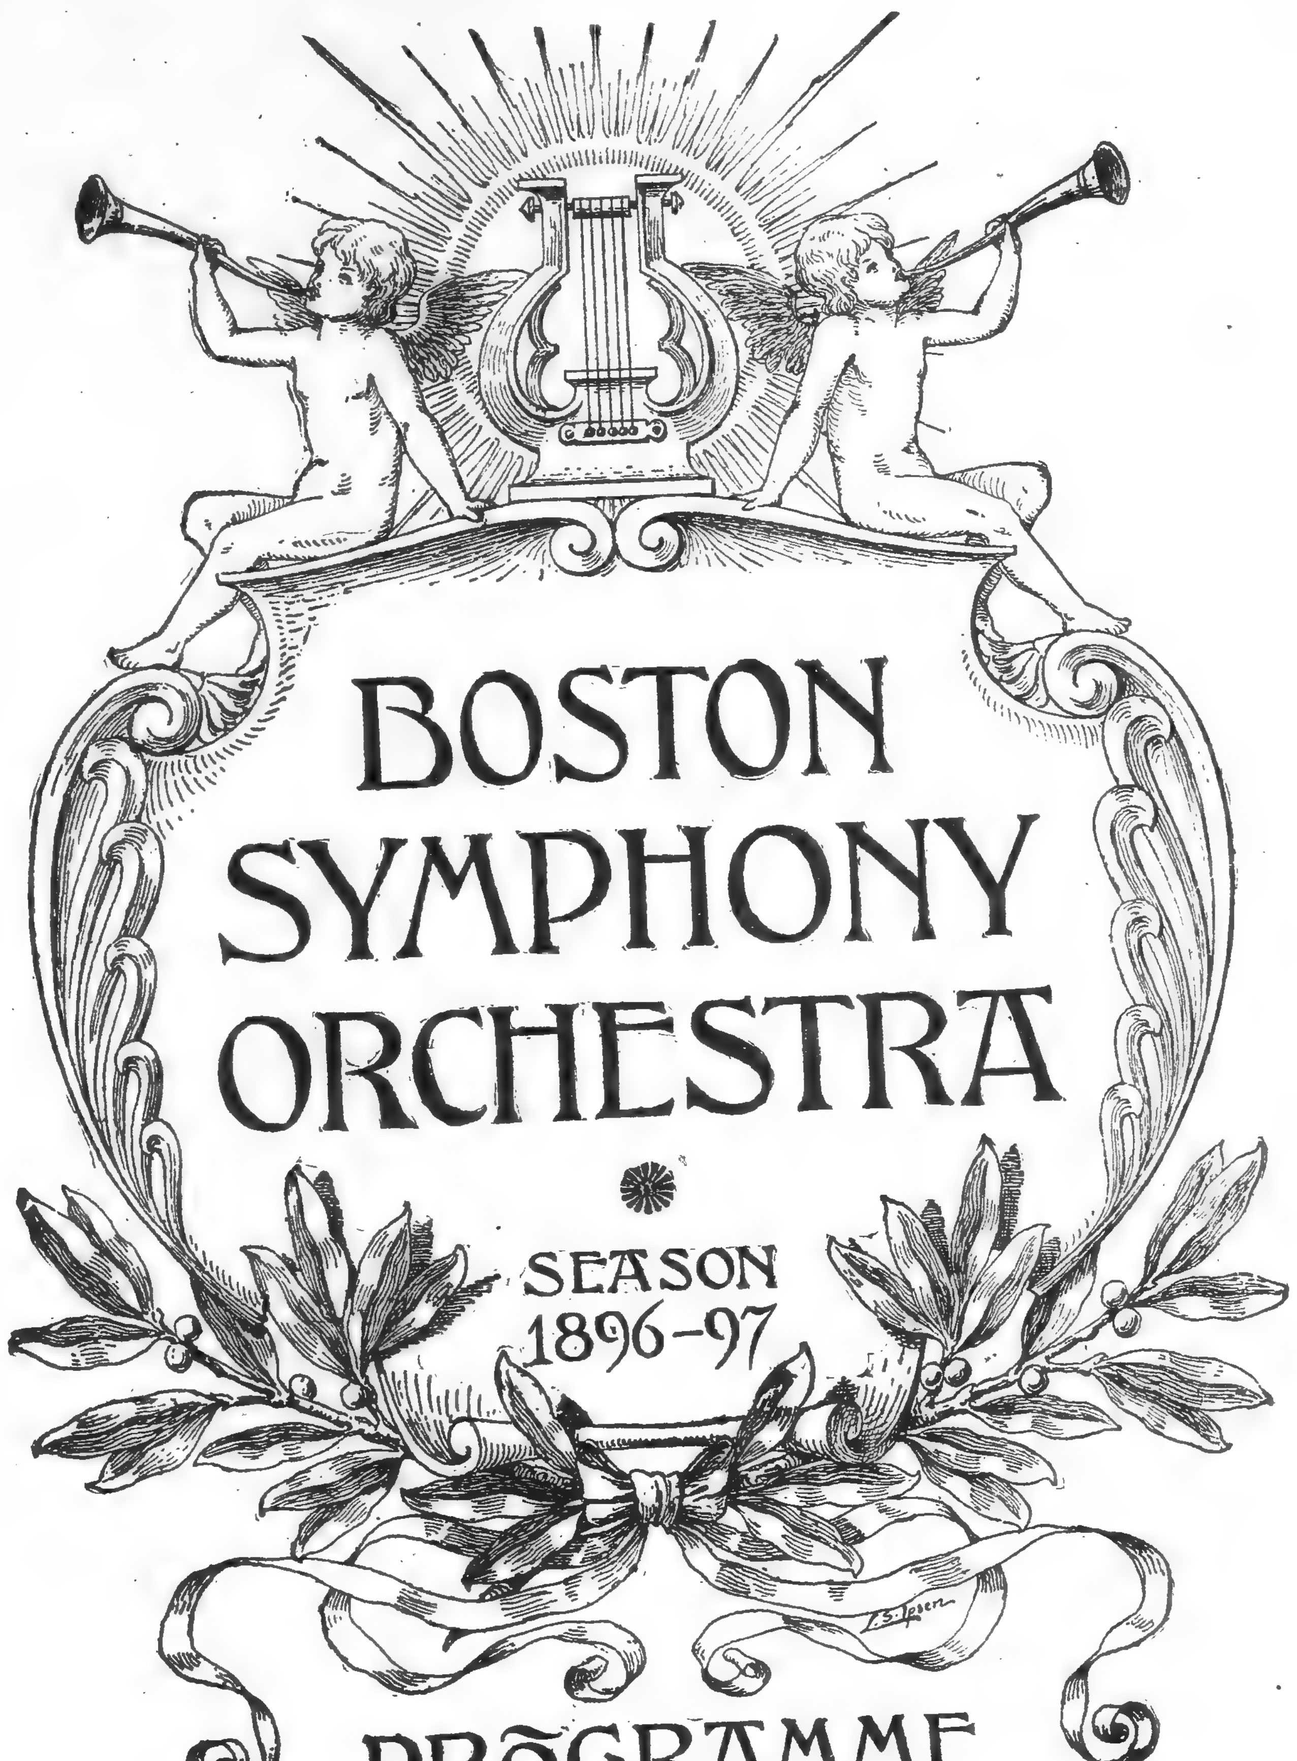
3

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Albert's, 13 No. Charles St.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

INFANTRY HALL, ... PROVIDENCE.

Wednesday Evening, February 10, at 8 precisely.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1896-97

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

4

Single tickets, at $1.25 each, on sale at Infantry Hall.

[122]

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1896-97.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

IV. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 31, AT 7.45, P. M.

Programme.

DVOŘÁK	SYMPHONY No. 5, in E minor, "From the New World," op. 95. I. Adagio. — Allegro molto. II. Largo. III. Scherzo: Molto vivace. IV. Allegro con fuoco.
MENDELSSOHN.	CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE, in G minor, No. 1, op. 25. I. Molto allegro con fuoco. II. Andante. III. Presto; molto allegro e vivace.
MENDELSSOHN.	OVERTURE, Scherzo, Notturno, and Wedding March from the "Midsummer-Night's Dream" Music.

Soloist:

Mr. GEORGE W. PROCTOR

The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

Fourth Concert, Thursday, January 14, 1897. The Orchestral Selections will be the Symphony No. 4, by Tschaikowsky, the Overture to "Freischütz," by Weber, and the "Mephisto Waltz," by Liszt.

The Soloist, Mme. Georgine von Januschowsky, will sing the "Letter Aria" from "Don Giovanni," by Mozart, and the Aria "Adriano," from "Rienzi," by Wagner.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1896-97.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

III. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 17, AT 7.45, P. M.

Programme.

BERLIOZ.	OVERTURE to "Benvenuto Cellini," op. 23.
SPOHR.	CONCERTO for Violin in A, No. 8, op. 47. ("Gesangscene.")
SCHUMANN.	SYMPHONY No. 2, in C major, op. 61. I. Sostenuto assai. — Allegro, ma non troppo. II. Scherzo: Allegro vivace. — Trio I. — Trio II. III. Adagio espressivo. IV. Allegro molto vivace.

Soloist:

Mr. CARL HALIR.

Fourth Concert, Thursday, December 31. The Orchestral Selections will be Symphony "From the New World," by Dvorák, and the "Midsummer Night's Dream." Music by Mendelssohn. The Soloist, Mr. Proctor, will play the Concerto for Pianoforte in G minor by Mendelssohn.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1896-97.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

V. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 14, AT 7.45, P. M.

Programme.

WEBER.	OVERTURE to "Der Freischütz."
MOZART.	RECITATIVE, "Crudele? Ah no, mio bene!" and ARIA, "Non mi dir, bell' idol mio," from "Don Giovanni," Act II., Scene 13.
LISZT.	SCENE IN THE TAVERN (Mephisto Waltz), from Lenau's "Faust."
WAGNER.	ARIA, "Adriano," from "Rienzi."
TSCHAIKOWSKY.	SYMPHONY No. 4, in F minor, op. 36. I. Andante sostenuto, — Moderato con anima. (Movimento di Valse). II. Andantino in modo di Canzona. III. Scherzo, "Pizzicato ostinato": Allegro. IV. Finale: Allegro con fuoco.

Soloist:

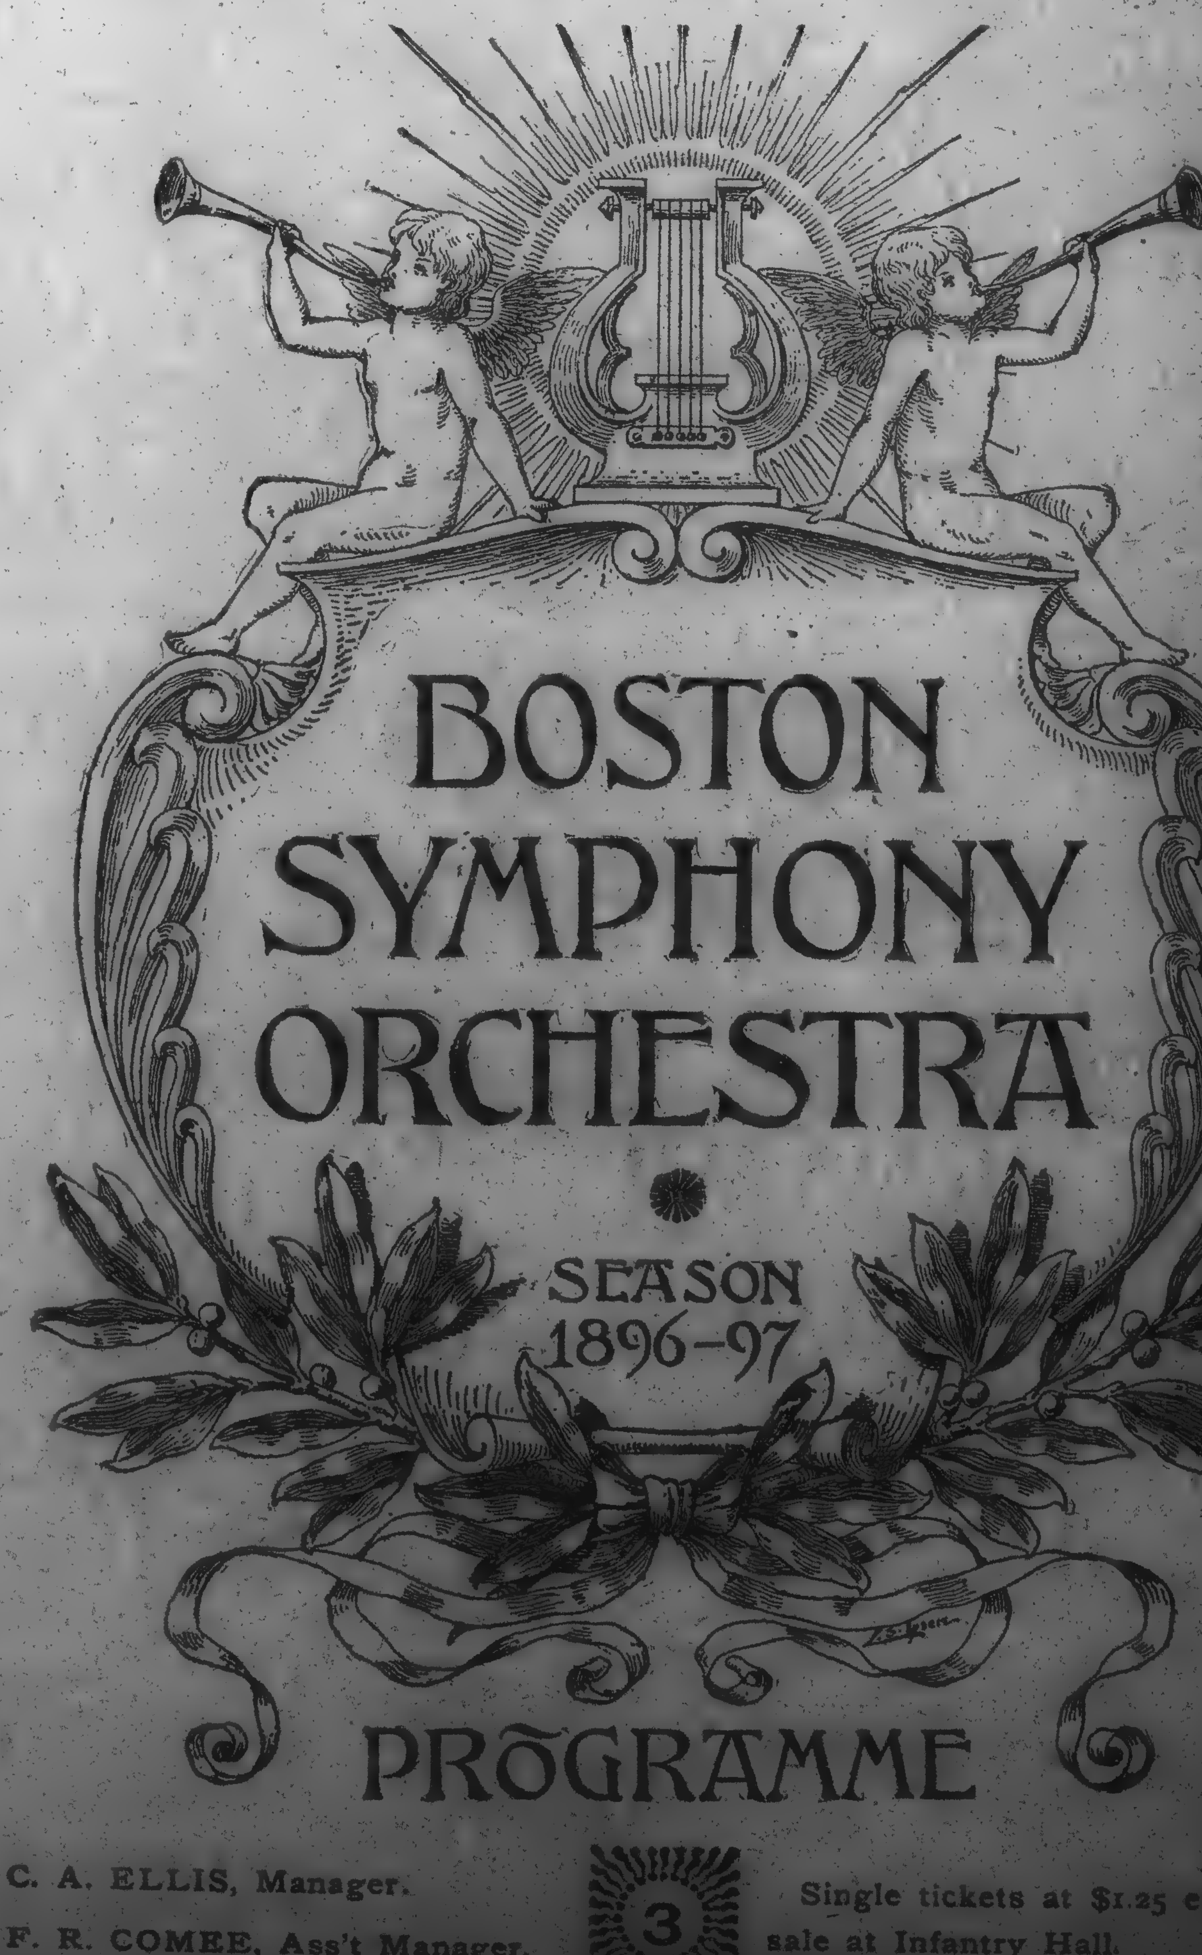
Mme. GEORGINE Von JANUSCHOWSKY.

Sixth Concert, Thursday, February 4, 1897. The Orchestral Selections will be the Unfinished Symphony by Schubert, the Entr'actes and Ballet Music from "Carmen," by Bizet, and the Academic Overture by Brahms. The soloist will be Mr. Harold Randolph, who will play the G major Concerto for Pianoforte by Beethoven.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

INFANTRY HALL, ... PROVIDENCE.

Wednesday Evening, January 6, at 8 precisely.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1896-97

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

3

Single tickets at $1.25 each, on sale at Infantry Hall.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1896-97.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

IV. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 31, AT 7.45, P. M.

Programme.

DVOŘAK — SYMPHONY No. 5, in E minor, "From the New World," op. 95.

- I. Adagio. — Allegro molto.
- II. Largo.
- III. Scherzo: Molto vivace.
- IV. Allegro con fuoco.

MENDELSSOHN. — CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE, in G minor, No. 1, op. 25.

- I. Molto allegro con fuoco.
- II. Andante.
- III. Presto: molto allegro e vivace.

MENDELSSOHN. — OVERTURE, Scherzo, Notturno, and Wedding March from the "Midsummer-Night's Dream" Music.

Soloist:

Mr. GEORGE W. PROCTOR

The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

Fourth Concert, Thursday, January 14, 1897. The Orchestral Selections will be the Symphony No. 4, by Tschaikowsky, the Overture to "Freischütz," by Weber, and the "Mephisto Waltz," by Liszt.

The Soloist, Mme. Georgine von Januschowsky, will sing the "Letter Aria" from "Don Giovanni," by Mozart, and the Aria "Adriano," from "Rienzi," by Wagner.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1896-97.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

V. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 14, AT 7.45, P. M.

Programme.

WEBER. — OVERTURE to "Der Freischütz."

MOZART. — RECITATIVE, "Crudele? Ah no, mio bene!" and ARIA, "Non mi dir, bell' idol mio," from "Don Giovanni," Act II., Scene 13.

LISZT. — SCENE IN THE TAVERN (Mephisto Waltz), from Lenau's "Faust."

WAGNER. — ARIA, "Adriano," from "Rienzi."

TSCHAIKOWSKY. — SYMPHONY No. 4, in F minor, op. 36.

- I. Andante sostenuto, — Moderato con anima. (Movimento di Valse).
- II. Andantino in modo di Canzona.
- III. Scherzo, "Pizzicato ostinato": Allegro.
- IV. Finale: Allegro con fuoco.

Soloist:

Mme. GEORGINE Von JANUSCHOWSKY.

Sixth Concert, Thursday, February 4, 1897. The Orchestral Selections will be the Unfinished Symphony by Schubert, the Entr'actes and Ballet Music from "Carmen," by Bizet, and the Academic Overture by Brahms. The soloist will be Mr. Harold Randolph, who will play the G major Concerto for Pianoforte by Beethoven.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1896-97.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

III. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 17, AT 7.45, P. M.

Programme.

BERLIOZ. — OVERTURE to "Benvenuto Cellini," op. 23.

SPOHR. — CONCERTO for Violin in A, No. 8, op. 47. ("Gesangscene.")

SCHUMANN. — SYMPHONY No. 2, in C major, op. 61.

- I. Sostenuto assai. — Allegro, ma non troppo.
- II. Scherzo: Allegro vivace. — Trio I. — Trio II.
- III. Adagio espressivo.
- IV. Allegro molto vivace.

Soloist:

Mr. CARL HALIR.

Fourth Concert, Thursday, December 31. The Orchestral Selections will be Symphony "From the New World," by Dvorák, and the "Midsummer Night's Dream." Music by Mendelssohn. The Soloist, Mr. Proctor, will play the Concerto for Pianoforte in G minor by Mendelssohn.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

INFANTRY HALL, ... PROVIDENCE.

Wednesday Evening, January 6, at 8 precisely.

BOSTON
SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
SEASON
1896-97
PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

3

Single tickets at $1.25 each, on sale at Infantry Hall.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

MUSIC HALL, ... BALTIMORE.

Wednesday Evening, December 9, at 8.15 precisely.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1896-97

PROGRAMME

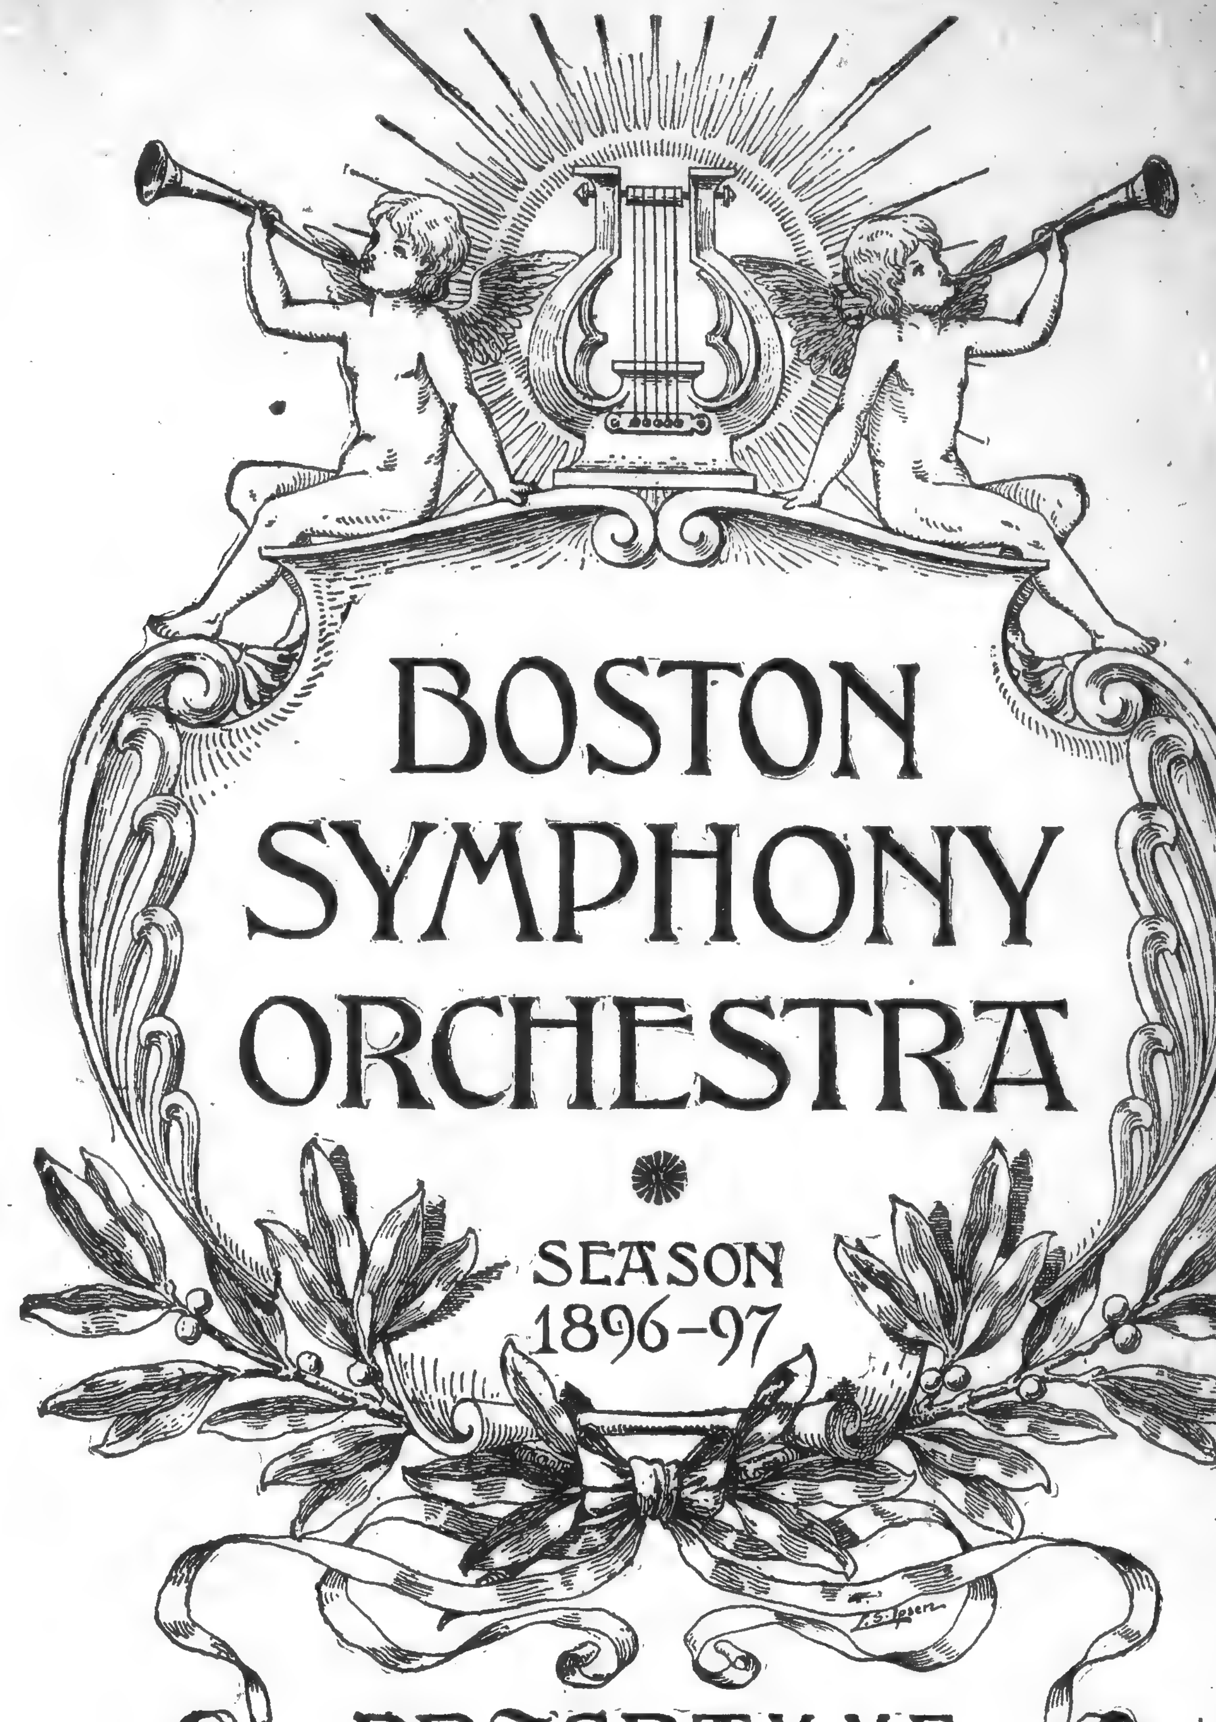
C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

2

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Albert's, 13 No. Charles St.

COLUMBIA THEATRE, . . . WASHINGTON.

Tuesday Afternoon, December 8, at 4.15.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1896-97

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

2

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Metzerott's Music Store.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC . . . . . BROOKLYN.

Friday Evening, December 11, at 8.15 precisely.
Saturday Afternoon, December 12, at 3 precisely.

Under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences and the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1896-97

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

2

Tickets at the Brooklyn Institute and at Chandler's Music Store, 300 Fulton Street.

METROPOLITAN OPERA HOUSE, - NEW YORK.

Thursday Evening, December 10, at 8.15 precisely.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1896-97

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

2

F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

[124]

Tickets at Schuberth's and at the Metropolitan Opera House.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1896-97.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

II. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 19, AT 7.45, P. M.

Programme.

BEETHOVEN.	SYMPHONY No. 8, in F major, op. 93. I. Allegro vivace e con brio. II. Allegretto scherzando. III. Tempo di Menuetto. IV. Allegro vivace.
SAINT-SAËNS.	ARIA. "Mon cœur s'ouvre a ta voix," from "Samson et Dalila."
MOZART.	OVERTURE to "Don Giovanni."
LISZT.	"LORELEY."
WEBER.	"INVITATION TO DANCE." (Scored for Orchestra by BERLIOZ.)

Soloist:

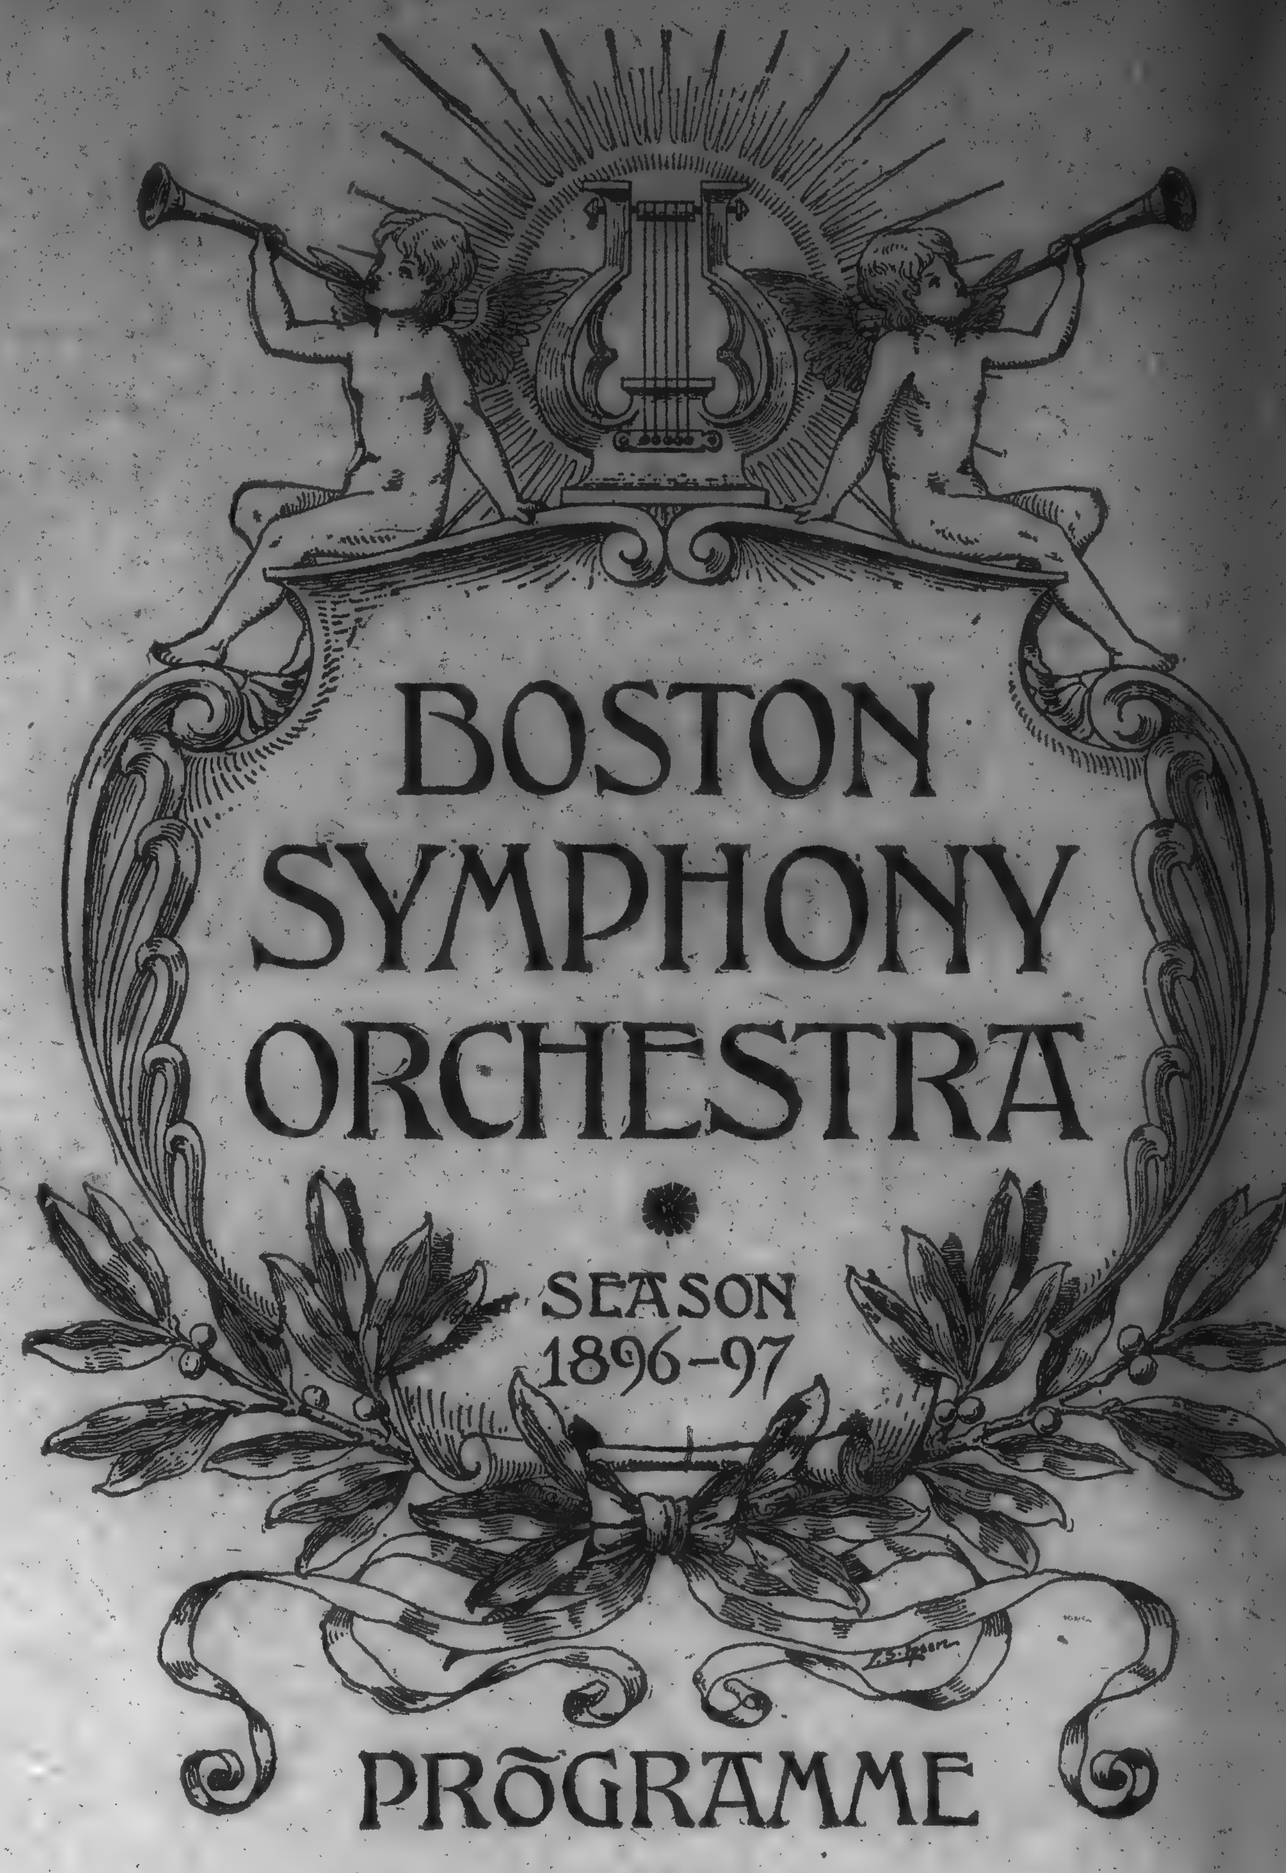
Miss LENA LITTLE.

Third Concert, Thursday, December 17. The Orchestral Selections will be Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini," by Berlioz; Concerto for Violin, by Tschaikowsky; and Symphony No. 2, in C major, by Schumann. Mr. Carl Halir will be the Soloist.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

CITY HALL, ... SPRINGFIELD.

Saturday Evening, November 14, 1896, at 8.



BOSTON
SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
SEASON
1896-97
PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

Tickets on sale at M. Steinert & Sons Company's, 422 Main St.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC PHILA

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, . . . PHILADELPHIA.

Monday Evening, December 7, at 8.15 precisely.

BOSTON
SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
SEASON
1896-97
PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

Tickets, with reserved seats, o sale at Fischer's, 1221 Chestnut S

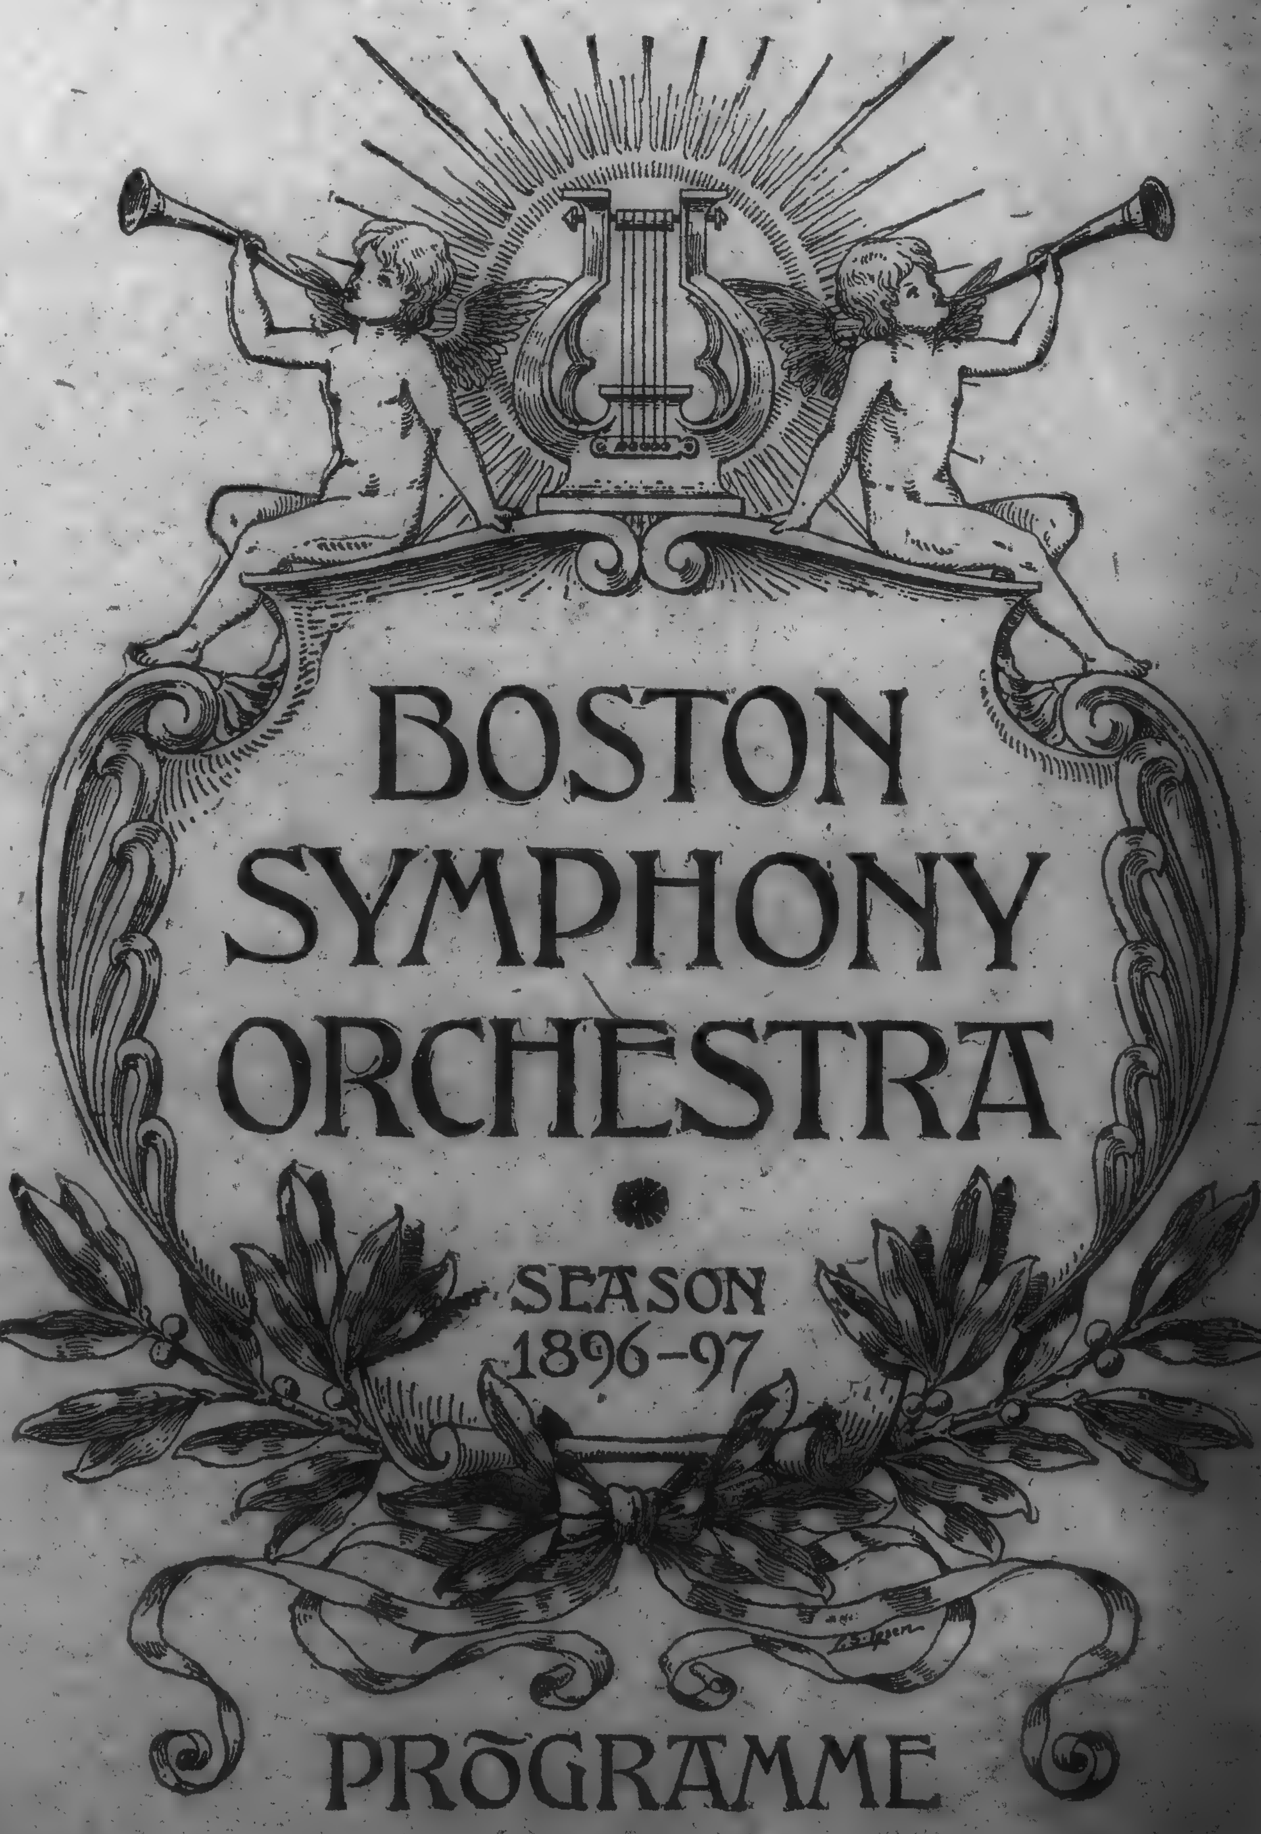
INFANTRY HALL, ... PROVIDENCE.

Wednesday Evening, November 25, at 8 o'clock precisely.



BOSTON
SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
SEASON
1896-97
PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

Season tickets, at $5 each, and single tickets for second concert, at $1 25 each, on sale at Infantry Hall.

[125]

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1896-97.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

II. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 19, AT 7.45, P. M.

Programme.

BEETHOVEN.	SYMPHONY No. 8, in F major, op. 93. I. Allegro vivace e con brio. II. Allegretto scherzando. III. Tempo di Menuetto. IV. Allegro vivace.
SAINT-SAËNS.	ARIA. "Mon cœur s'ouvre a ta voix," from "Samson et Dalila."
MOZART.	OVERTURE to "Don Giovanni."
LISZT.	"LORELEY."
WEBER.	"INVITATION TO DANCE." (Scored for Orchestra by BERLIOZ.)

Soloist:

Miss LENA LITTLE.

Third Concert, Thursday, December 17. The Orchestral Selections will be Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," by Berlioz; Concerto for Violin, by Tschaikowsky; and Symphony No. 2, in C major, by Schumann. Mr. Carl Halir will be the Soloist.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

CITY HALL, ... SPRINGFIELD.

Saturday Evening, November 14, 1896, at 8.

BOSTON
SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
SEASON
1896-97
PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

Tickets on sale at M. Steinert & Sons Company's, 422 Main St.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, . . . PHILADELPHIA.

Monday Evening, December 7, at 8.15 precisely.

BOSTON
SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
SEASON
1896-97
PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

2

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Fischer's, 1221 Chestnut St.

INFANTRY HALL, ... PROVIDENCE.

Wednesday Evening, November 25, at 8 o'clock precisely.

BOSTON
SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
SEASON
1896-97
PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

2

Season tickets, at $5 each, and single tickets for second concert, at $1 25 each, on sale at Infantry Hall.

[125]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

MUSIC HALL, ... BALTIMORE.

Wednesday Evening, November 11, at 8.15 precisely.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1896-97

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

1

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Albert's, 13 No. Charles St.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, . . . PHILADELPHIA.

Tuesday Evening, November 10, at 8.15 precisely.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1896-97

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

1

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Fischer's, 1221 Chestnut St.

METROPOLITAN OPERA HOUSE, - NEW YORK.

Friday Evening, November 13, at 8.15 precisely.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1896-97

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

1

F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

Tickets at Schuberth's and at the Metropolitan Opera House

COLUMBIA THEATRE, . . . WASHINGTON.

Thursday Evening, November 12, at 8.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1896-97

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

1

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Metzerott's Music Store.

[126]

INCOMPLETE

The Largest Piano Concern in the World.

M. Steinert & Sons Company,

246 and 248 Westminster Street,
Providence, R.I.

Operators of Fifteen Stores in New England.
Pianos sold for Cash or on the Hire System.

Sole New England representatives for

STEINWAY & SON, HARDMAN,
E. GABLER & BRO., BRAUMULLER,
PEASE, STANDARD,
WESER BROS., PRINCE & SON

PIANOS.

Also the world-famed ÆOLIAN.

A new and complete line of all the latest sheet music, including everything played or sung at the Symphony Concerts, constantly on hand.

Pianos tuned by competent tuners.

M. Steinert & Sons Company

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SIXTEENTH SEASON, 1896-97.
FOURTEEN HUNDRED AND TENTH PERFORMANCE.
ONE HUNDRED AND FIFTH PERFORMANCE IN CAMBRIDGE.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

I. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 29, AT 7.45, P. M.

In Memory of
FRANCIS J. CHILD, JOSIAH D. WHITNEY.

Programme.

MOZART.	SYMPHONY in G minor, (Koechel, 550). I. Allegro molto. II. Andante. III. Menuetto: Allegro. Trio. IV. Finale: Allegro assai.
BACH.	AIR from SUITE in D major, No. 1.
SCHUBERT.	FUNERAL MARCH.
TSCHAIKOWSKY.	CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE, No. 1, in B flat minor. op. 23. I. Allegro non troppo e molto moderato. II. Allegro con spirito. III. Andantino semplice. IV. Allegro con fuoco.
BEETHOVEN.	OVERTURE. "Coriolanus."

Soloist:

Mr. MARTINUS SIEVEKING.

The Pianoforte is a Mason & Hamlin.

Second Concert, Thursday, Nov'r 19. The Orchestral Selections will be Symphony No. 8, Beethoven; Overture, "Don Giovanni." Mozart; Overture, "Abu Hassan," Weber; and "Invitation to Dance," Weber-Berlioz. Miss Lena Little will be the Soloist.

SIXTEENTH SEASON, 1896-97.
1420th PERFORMANCE.
8th Performance in Springfield.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

75 PERFORMERS,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor,

Will give a
GRAND CONCERT
in . . . .

CITY HALL, SPRINGFIELD,

Saturday Evening, Nov. 14, 1896.

With the assistance of
MR. MARTINUS SIEVEKING,
The eminent Dutch Pianist.

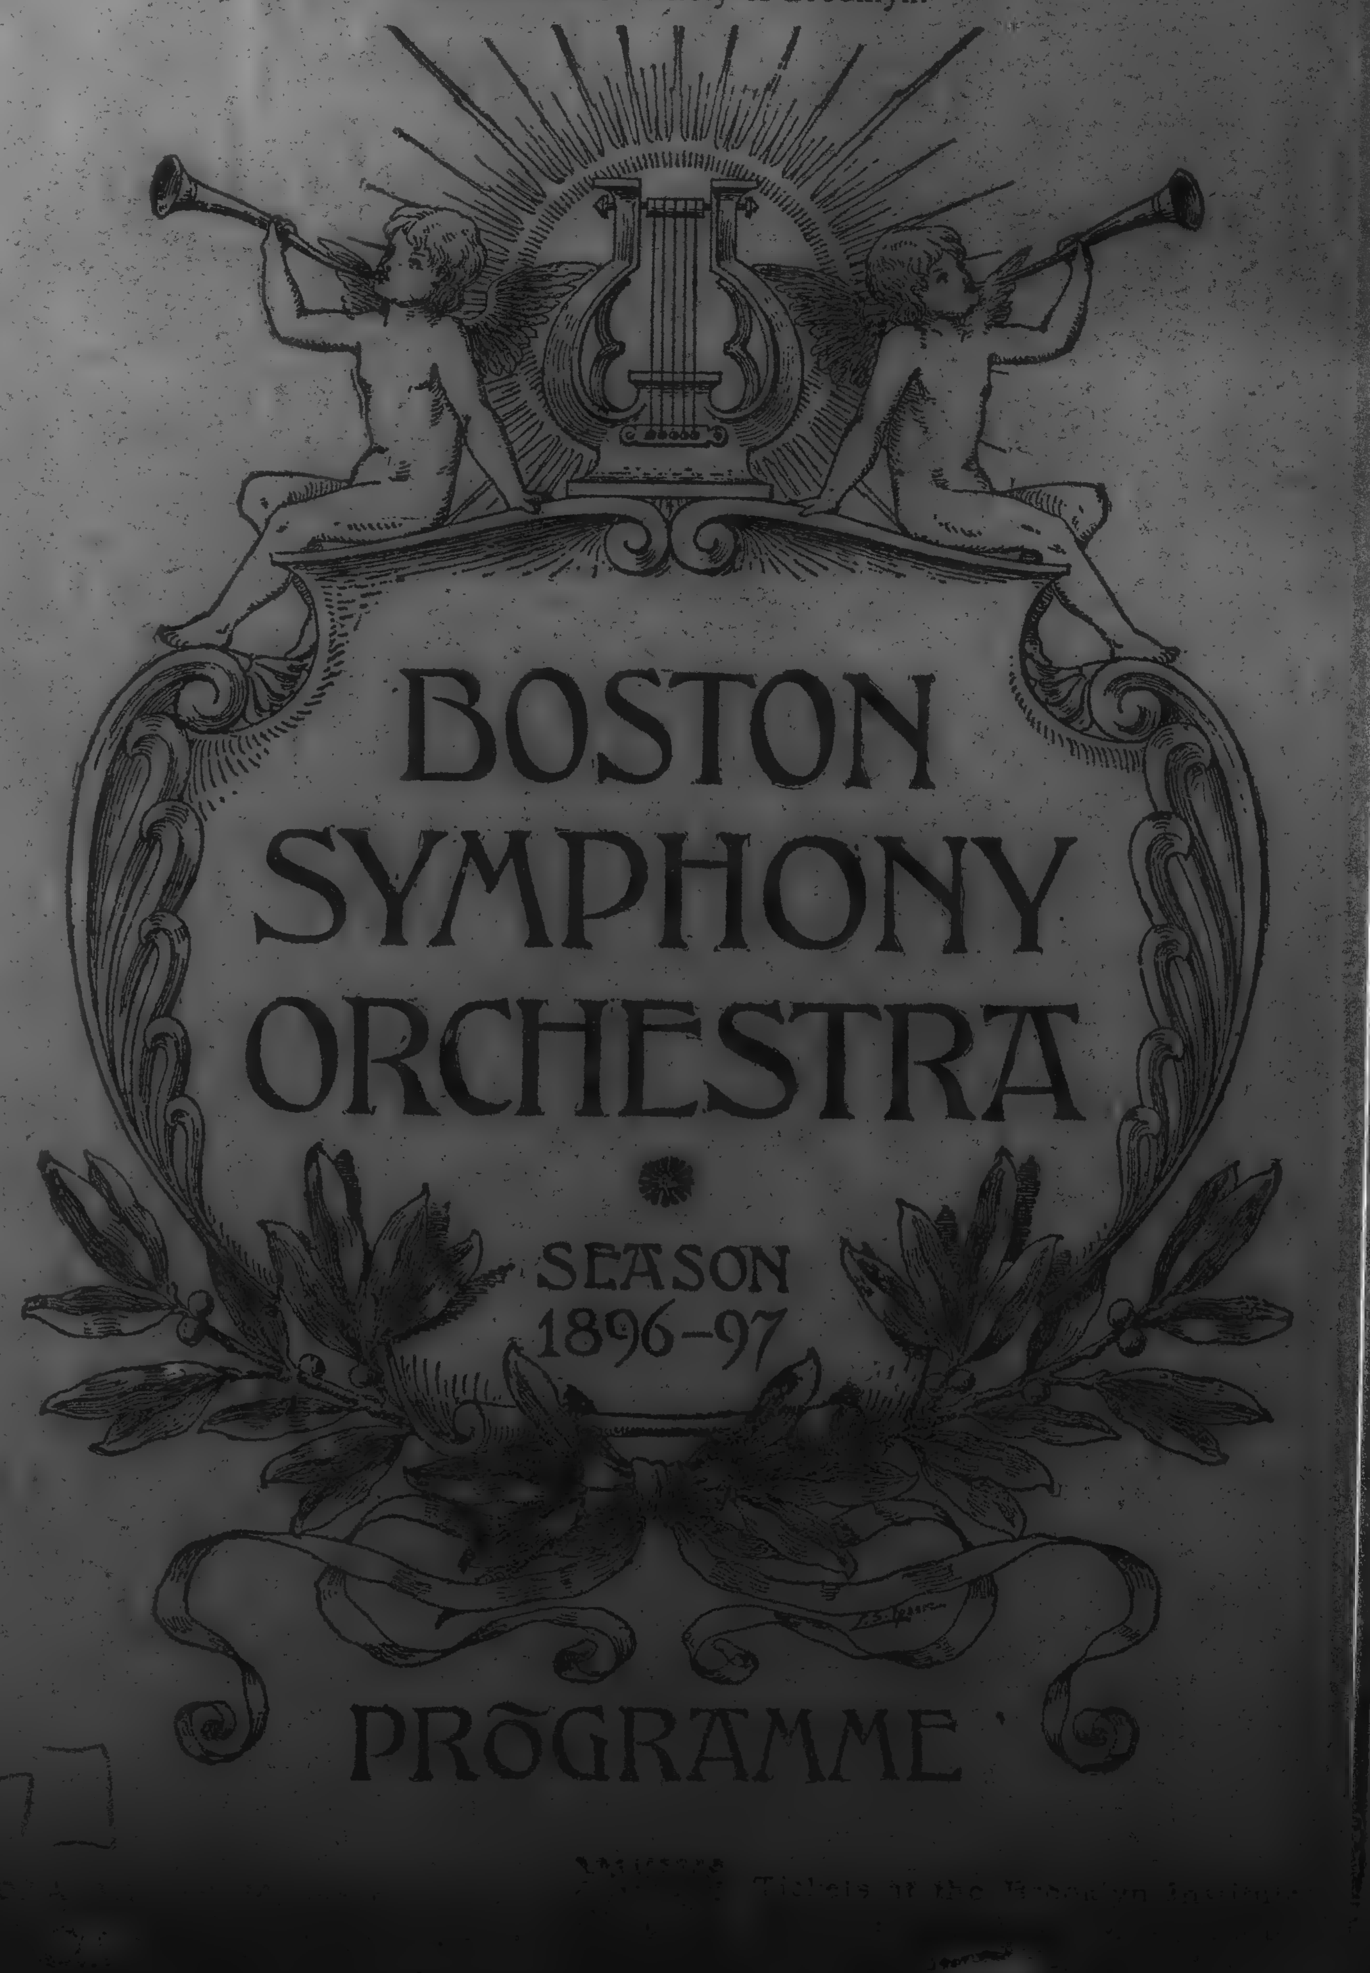
Subscribers will be allowed to select their seats on Wednesday, November 11, one day in advance of the general public; and it is earnestly requested that patrons will fill out and mail at once the inclosed postal card.

Tickets, $2.00, $1.50, and $1.00, on sale at M. Steinert & Sons Company, 422 Main Street, Springfield.

C. F. KOOP, Local Manager.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

ACADEMY OF MUSIC . . . . . BROOKLYN.
Monday Evening, November 9, at 8.15 precisely.
Under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences and the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn.



[127]

INCOMPLETE

The Largest Piano Concern in the World.

M. Steinert & Sons Company,

246 and 248 Westminster Street,
Providence, R.I.

Operators of Fifteen Stores in New England.
Pianos sold for Cash or on the Hire System.

Sole New England representatives for

STEINWAY & SON,
E. GABLER & BRO.,
PEASE,
WESER BROS.,
HARDMAN,
BRAUMULLER,
STANDARD,
PRINCE & SON

PIANOS.

Also the world-famed ÆOLIAN.

A new and complete line of all the latest sheet music, including everything played or sung at the Symphony Concerts, constantly on hand.

Pianos tuned by competent tuners.

M. Steinert & Sons Company

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SIXTEENTH SEASON, 1896-97.
FOURTEEN HUNDRED AND TENTH PERFORMANCE.
ONE HUNDRED AND FIFTH PERFORMANCE IN CAMBRIDGE.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

I. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 29, AT 7.45, P. M.

In Memory of
FRANCIS J. CHILD, JOSIAH D. WHITNEY.

Programme.

MOZART.	SYMPHONY in G minor, (Koechel, 550). I. Allegro molto. II. Andante. III. Menuetto: Allegro. Trio. IV. Finale: Allegro assai.
BACH.	AIR from SUITE in D major, No. 1.
SCHUBERT.	FUNERAL MARCH.
TSCHAIKOWSKY.	CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE, No. 1, in B flat minor. op. 23. I. Allegro non troppo e molto moderato. II. Allegro con spirito. III. Andantino semplice. IV. Allegro con fuoco.
BEETHOVEN.	OVERTURE. "Coriolanus."

Soloist:

Mr. MARTINUS SIEVEKING.

The Pianoforte is a Mason & Hamlin.

Second Concert, Thursday, Nov'r 19. The Orchestral Selections will be symphony No. 8, Beethoven; Overture, "Don Giovanni," Mozart; Overture, "Abu Hassan," Weber; and "Invitation to Dance," Weber-Berlioz. Miss Lena Little will be the Soloist.

SIXTEENTH SEASON, 1896-97.
1420th PERFORMANCE.
8th Performance in Springfield.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

75 PERFORMERS,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor,

Will give a
GRAND CONCERT
in . . . .

CITY HALL, SPRINGFIELD,

Saturday Evening, Nov. 14, 1896.

With the assistance of
MR. MARTINUS SIEVEKING,
The eminent Dutch Pianist.

Subscribers will be allowed to select their seats on Wednesday, November 11, one day in advance of the general public; and it is earnestly requested that patrons will fill out and mail at once the inclosed postal card.

Tickets, $2.00, $1.50, and $1.00, on sale at M. Steinert & Sons Company, 422 Main Street, Springfield.

C. F. KOOP, Local Manager.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

ACADEMY OF MUSIC . . . . . BROOKLYN.
Monday Evening, November 9, at 8.15 precisely.
Under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences and the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1896-97

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
[illegible] COMEE, [illegible] Manager.

1

Tickets at the Brooklyn Institute
and at Chandler's Music Store,
300 Fult[illegible]et.

The Largest Piano Concern in the World.

M. Steinert & Sons Company,

246 and 248 Westminster Street,
Providence, R.I.

Operators of Fifteen Stores in New England.
Pianos sold for Cash or on the Hire System.

Sole New England representatives for

STEINWAY & SON,
E. GABLER & BRO.,
PEASE,
WESER BROS.,
HARDMAN,
BRAUMULLER,
STANDARD,
PRINCE & SON

PIANOS.

Also the world-famed ÆOLIAN.

A new and complete line of all the latest sheet music, including everything played or sung at the Symphony Concerts, constantly on hand.

Pianos tuned by competent tuners.

M. Steinert & Sons Company

Sanders T

SIXTEENTH SEAS
FOURTEEN HUNDRED
ONE HUNDRED AND

BOSTON SYM

Mr. EMIL

I.

THURSDAY, OCT

In

FRANCIS J. CHILD,

P

MOZART. SYM
I. Alleg
II. Anda
III. Menu
IV. Final

BACH. AIR

SCHUBERT. FUN

TSCHAIKOWSKY. CONC
op. 2
I. Alleg
II. Allegr
III. Anda
IV. Allegr

BEETHOVEN. OVE

Mr. MART

The Pianofo

Second Concert, Thursday, Nov'r 1
No. 8, Beethoven; Overture, "Don Gi and "Invitation to Dance," Weber-Be

Press Comments on the Selections announced in the Programme of the Springfield Concert.

MR. MARTINUS SIEVEKING.

"Tschaikowsky is the one composer who can indulge in all the modern spasms and passionate outbursts without ever becoming either vague or incoherent. . . . The pianist [Sieveking] was most successful. From the first broad and massive chords to the terrific wrist-action of the last coda he held the strictest attention of the audience."— L. C. Elson, in Boston Advertiser, October 26, 1896.

"Mr. Sieveking has decidedly fingers of steel; and their work is always clear, masterly, and respond easily to every demand of modern pianoforte technique. His performance was thoughtful, musicianly, and interesting, and earned for him three as stormy recalls as any artist has received at these concerts."— B. E. Woolf, in Boston Herald, October 25, 1896.

"The playing of Bourgault-Ducoudray's 'Burial of Ophelia' was exquisitely perfect in every respect. It is wonderfully scored for orchestra, and its coloring is a constant seduction to the ear. We know nothing comparable to it in any of the famous German instrumental colorists since Wagner."— W. F. Apthorp, in Boston Transcript, October 19, 1896.

"The most joyous of all of Beethoven's symphonies, the eighth, was read by Mr. Paur with impressive virility. Both interpretation and performance were models of how the symphony may best be given."
Boston Herald, October 18, 1896.

"The overture to 'Gwendoline' is remarkable for original and daring harmonic treatment, furious swing, full heroic blood, and gorgeousness of orchestration. Chabrier's admiration for Wagner did not cause him to give up his birthright. In a hundred matters of detail he is French to the nails."— Philip Hale, in Boston Journal, October 25, 1896.

. . Programme . .

EMMANUEL CHABRIER, . . Overture to "Gwendoline"
(FIRST TIME.)

PETER ILYITCH TSCHAIKOWSKY,
Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 1, in B-flat minor, Op. 23

I.	Andante non troppo e molto maestoso (B-flat minor)	3-4
	Allegro con spirito (B-flat minor)	4-4
II.	Andantino semplice (D-flat major)	6-8
	Allegro vivace assai (D minor)	6-8
III.	Allegro con fuoco (B-flat minor)	3-4

(FIRST TIME.)

KARL MARIA VON WEBER, . . Overture, "Abu Hassan"
(FIRST TIME.)

LOUIS-ALBERT BOURGAULT-DUCOUDRAY,
"The Burial of Ophelia"
(FIRST TIME.)

KARL MARIA VON WEBER, . . "Invitation to the Dance" (Scored for Orchestra by HECTOR BERLIOZ.)

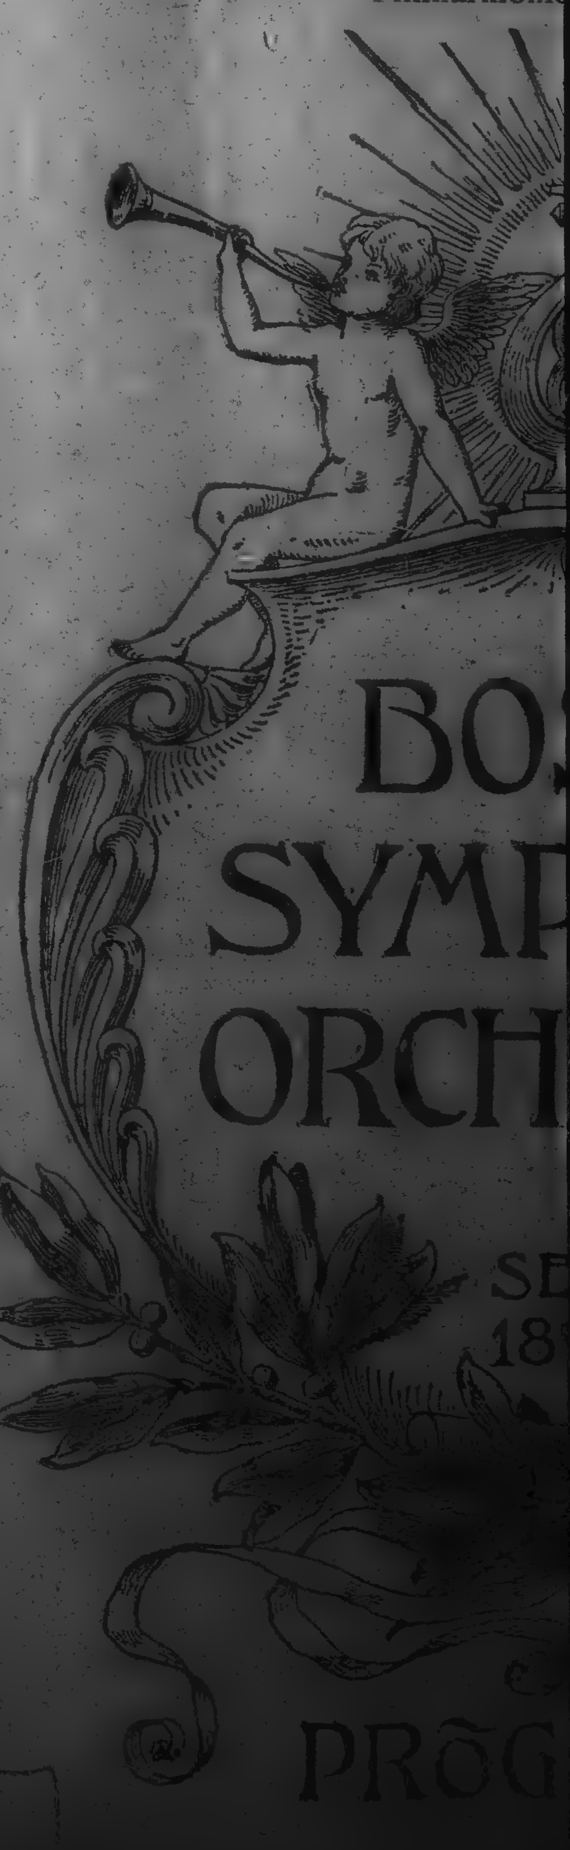
LUDWIG VAN BEETHOVEN, Symphony No. 8, in F major, Op. 93

I.	Allegro vivace e con brio (F major)	3-4
II.	Allegretto scherzando (B-flat major)	2-4
III.	Tempo di Menuetto (F major)	3-4
IV.	Allegro vivace (F major)	2-2

SOLOIST,
Mr. Martinus Sieveking.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC .
Monday Evening, No
Under the auspices of the Brookl
Philharmonic



Globe apr 11

NEW YORK IS LEFT OUT.

Plans of Charles A. Ellis and Mr Damrosch.

Season of Grand Opera in Boston Will Cover Some Weeks.

Cannot Confirm the Reported Engagement of Mme Melba.

Charles A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony orchestra, whose recently-effected copartnership with Walter Damrosch in a grand German, French and Italian opera enterprise for the coming season has made him a much-talked about man, arrived in Boston yesterday for a visit of a couple of days.

He was interviewed last evening by a Globe reporter, who sought further particulars of the proposed extension of the artistic work of the Damrosch company, as well as something definite in regard to the singers likely to be engaged, especially in regard to the reported engagement of Mme Melba.

Mr Ellis asserted that the plans of the new firm are in such an embroyotic condition as to make it impossible to give much definite information in regard to them. He could not say anything at all in regard to the reported engagement of Mme Melba, but he certainly did not deny it.

He spoke favorably of the probability of the return of Mme Gadski next season, but said that it would be impossible to suggest who the tenors may be, though it would probably be necessary to select them with a view to having one or more fitted for German opera and others for French and Italian. A new conductor for the later type of works would probably be engaged also.

He said that there will probably be a season of four or five weeks at the Boston theater with four performances, including one matinee a week. There will be similar engagements in Philadelphia, Chicago and perhaps shorter ones in a few other cities.

What French and Italian operas may be added to the Damrosch repertoire, Mr Ellis could not say, but he thought that perhaps some of those not the most familiar to the public, if good ones, can be found, might be preferred.

He said the partnership had been proposed over a year ago, but that while the company was purely devoted to German works, he had not seriously considered the proposition.

When Mr Damrosch was here with his company the first of last February, negotiations were renewed, and the enlarged field proposed had induced him to go into it.

New York, he said, has been entirely left out of the calculations of the management, and so, whether they can get into the Metropolitan opera house is of no interest to them at present. He laid stress upon a statement, however, to the effect that Mr Damrosch has for years succeeded in filling an engagement there.

What effect the new organization may have upon the Metropolitan opera company limited, should that organization continue, he said, has not been considered, the present intention being to cut entirely loose from any alliance in any way with any other organization, and to have a complete and entirely independent company.

Mr Ellis will join Mr Damrosch in Europe in the early summer.

DAMROSCH'S OPERA PLANS.

Manager C. A. Ellis last night authorized the following statement regarding the proposed reorganization of the Damrosch opera company:

"Walter Damrosch and C. A. Ellis have formed a corpartnership for the purpose of giving grand opera during the season of 1897-98. The company will continue to be known as the Damrosch opera company. The performances will by no means be confined to German opera, as heretofore, but will include, also, operas of the best French and Italian composers.

"The scheme includes a season of four or five weeks at the Boston Theatre, during which four performances a week will be given. There will also be seasons in Philadelphia, Chicago and other cities. Mr. Damrosch sailed for Europe Thursday on business connected with the enterprise."

Transcript Apr 12

DARK OUTLOOK FOR OPERA.

Metropolitan Opera House Likely to Pass Into the Hands of Messrs. Damrosch and Ellis.

New York, April 12—What course the directors of the Metropolitan Opera House will follod as to opera next winter, who will manage the affairs of the theatre, and what company he will engage are as undetermined matters now as they have been for a week past. Apparently the directors are still favorably inclined toward Mr. Grau as manager next winter; but, even if he gathers capital sufficient for the venture, he can scarcely secure the singers that have been his reliance in previous years. Mlle. Calvé will not return; MM. Jean and Edouard de Reszke are likely to remain in Europe, and Mme. Melba has seemingly slipped from Mr. Grau's hands. Without "star" singers to pursue his policy of "star" casts, he would probably be reluctant to undertake another year of management.

Two current reports seem to lack any visible warrant, one that the directors will intrust the management of the opera house to Mr. Seidl—a conjecture seemingly inspired by bitter hostility to Mr. Damrosch—the other that the directors will supervise affairs through a salaried staff—on improbable unbusinesslike step. At the moment conditions point either to the closing of the theatre next winter or to the passing of it into the hands of Mr. Damrosch and Mr. Ellis, if they care to undertake the management of it. The latter contingency is the more likely.

H. T. P.

It has been announced that Walter Damrosch had formed a partnership with Charles A. Ellis, and that the firm will give grand opera in French, German and Italian next season. Their plans embrace a longer season than usual in Philadelphia, Boston and Chicago. Mr. Damrosh will devote all his time to the artistic side of the productions. The firm expects to obtain the strongest list of artists yet presented by the Damrosch Opera company, under which name the organization will be known.

END OF VOLUME

VOLUME 11

BSO

1897 - 1898

SHIPMAN'S
Invoice & Scrap BOOK

BOSTON MUSIC HALL.
SEVENTEENTH SEASON—1897-98.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR,
WILL GIVE A SERIES OF

24 CONCERTS,

On Consecutive Saturday Evenings, from Oct. 16, 1897, to April 30, 1898, Omitting Nov. 13, Dec. 18, 1897, Jan. 22, Feb. 19 and March 26, 1898, and

24 PUBLIC REHEARSALS,

ON CONSECUTIVE FRIDAY AFTERNOONS, from Oct. 15, 1897, to April 29, 1898, Omitting Nov. 12, Dec. 17, 1897, Jan. 21, Feb. 18 and March 25, 1898.

Soloists: Mme. MELBA, Mrs. HENSCHEL, Mrs. TITUS, Miss WIENZKOWSKA, Mrs. BLOOMFIELD-ZEISLER, Miss OLIVE MEAD, Messrs. BISPHAM, ROSENTHAL, JOSEFFY, SILOTI, MACDOWELL, KNEISEL, LOEFFLER, ADAMOWSKI, SCHNITZLER, SCHROEDER and SCHULZ.

TICKETS for the Series of Concerts and for the Series of Rehearsals. $12.00 and $7.50 according to location.

The $12 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Monday, Sept. 27, at 10 A. M.
The $7.50 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Tuesday, Sept. 28, at 10 A. M.
The $12 Seats for the Concerts will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Thursday, Sept. 30, at 10 A. M.
The $7.50 Seats for the Concerts will be sold in like manner, at the same place, on Friday, Oct. 1, at 10 A. M.
Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets Will Be Delivered in the Hall, and Must Be Paid for as Soon as Bought or They Will Be Resold.

MR. EMIL PAUR, THE CONDUCTOR OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, AND MRS. PAUR AT HOME.
(From a snapshot photo, taken expressly for the Boston Journal.)

[illegible] 5

AMUSEMENTS.

MUSIC HALL

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor
Seventeenth Season. 1897-'98

TWENTY-FOUR CONCERTS

On Consecutive Saturday Evenings, from Oct. 16. 1897, to April 30, 1898, omitting Nov. 13, Dec. 18, 1897, Jan. 22, Feb. 19 and March 26, 1898, and

TWENTY-FOUR PUBLIC REHEARSALS

On Consecutive Friday Afternoons, from Oct. 15, 1897, to April 29, 1898, omitting Nov. 12, Dec. 17, 1897, Jan. 21, Feb. 18 and March 25, 1898.

Tickets for the series of Concerts and for the series of Rehearsals, $12 and $7.50 according to location.

The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold by auction at Music Hall, MONDAY. Sept. 27, at 10 A.M.
The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold by auction at Music Hall, TUESDAY, Sept. 28, at 10 A.M.
The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold by auction at Music Hall, on THURSDAY, Sept. 30, at 10 A.M.
The $7.50 seats for the concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place on FRIDAY, Oct. 1, at 10 A.M.
Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets will be delivered in the Hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold. 1t

---

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

AUCTION SALE OF $7.50 SEATS FOR THE FRIDAY AFTERNOON PUBLIC REHEARSALS AT MUSIC HALL THIS (TUESDAY) MORNING, AT 10 O'CLOCK.

Auction Sale of $12 Seats for SATURDAY Ev'g Concerts THURSDAY, Sept. 30. Auction Sale of $7.50 Seats for Concerts FRIDAY, Oct. 1. sep28

Engraved by Hub Engraving Co.

Photo. by Notman Photo. Co.

EMIL PAUR,
LEADER OF THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

[2]

BOSTON MUSIC HALL.
SEVENTEENTH SEASON—1897-98.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR,
WILL GIVE A SERIES OF

24 CONCERTS,

On Consecutive Saturday Evenings, from Oct. 16, 1897, to April 30, 1898, Omitting Nov. 13, Dec. 18, 1897, Jan. 22, Feb. 19 and March 26, 1898, and

24 PUBLIC REHEARSALS,

ON CONSECUTIVE FRIDAY AFTERNOONS, from Oct. 15, 1897, to April 29, 1898, Omitting Nov. 12, Dec. 17, 1897, Jan. 21, Feb. 18 and March 25, 1898.

Soloists: Mme. MELBA, Mrs. HENSCHEL, Mrs. TITUS, Miss WIENZKOWSKA, Mrs. BLOOMFIELD-ZEISLER, Miss OLIVE MEAD, Messrs. BISPHAM, ROSENTHAL, JOSEFFY, SILOTI, MACDOWELL, KNEISEL, LOEFFLER, ADAMOWSKI, SCHNITZLER, SCHROEDER and SCHULZ.

TICKETS for the Series of Concerts and for the Series of Rehearsals. $12.00 and $7.50 according to location.

The $12 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Monday, Sept. 27, at 10 A. M.
The $7.50 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Tuesday, Sept. 28, at 10 A. M.
The $12 Seats for the Concerts will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Thursday, Sept. 30, at 10 A. M.
The $7.50 Seats for the Concerts will be sold in like manner, at the same place, on Friday, Oct. 1, at 10 A. M.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets Will Be Delivered in the Hall, and Must Be Paid for as Soon as Bought or They Will Be Resold.

AMUSEMENTS.

MUSIC HALL

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor
Seventeenth Season. 1897-'98

TWENTY-FOUR CONCERTS

On Consecutive Saturday Evenings, from Oct. 16, 1897, to April 30, 1898, omitting Nov. 13, Dec. 18, 1897, Jan. 22, Feb. 19 and March 26, 1898, and

TWENTY-FOUR PUBLIC REHEARSALS

On Consecutive Friday Afternoons, from Oct. 15, 1897, to April 29, 1898, omitting Nov. 12, Dec. 17, 1897, Jan. 21, Feb. 18 and March 25, 1898.

Tickets for the series of Concerts and for the series of Rehearsals, $12 and $7.50 according to location.

The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold by auction at Music Hall, MONDAY. Sept. 27, at 10 A.M..

The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold by auction at Music Hall, TUESDAY, Sept. 28, at 10 A.M.

The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold by auction at Music Hall, on THURSDAY, Sept. 30, at 10 A.M.

The $7.50 seats for the concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place on FRIDAY, Oct. 1, at 10 A.M.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets will be delivered in the Hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold. 1t

---

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

AUCTION SALE OF $7.50 SEATS FOR THE FRIDAY AFTERNOON PUBLIC REHEARSALS AT MUSIC HALL THIS (TUESDAY) MORNING, AT 10 O'CLOCK.

Auction Sale of $12 Seats for SATURDAY Ev'g Concerts THURSDAY, Sept. 30. Auction Sale of $7.50 Seats for Concerts FRIDAY, Oct. 1. sep28

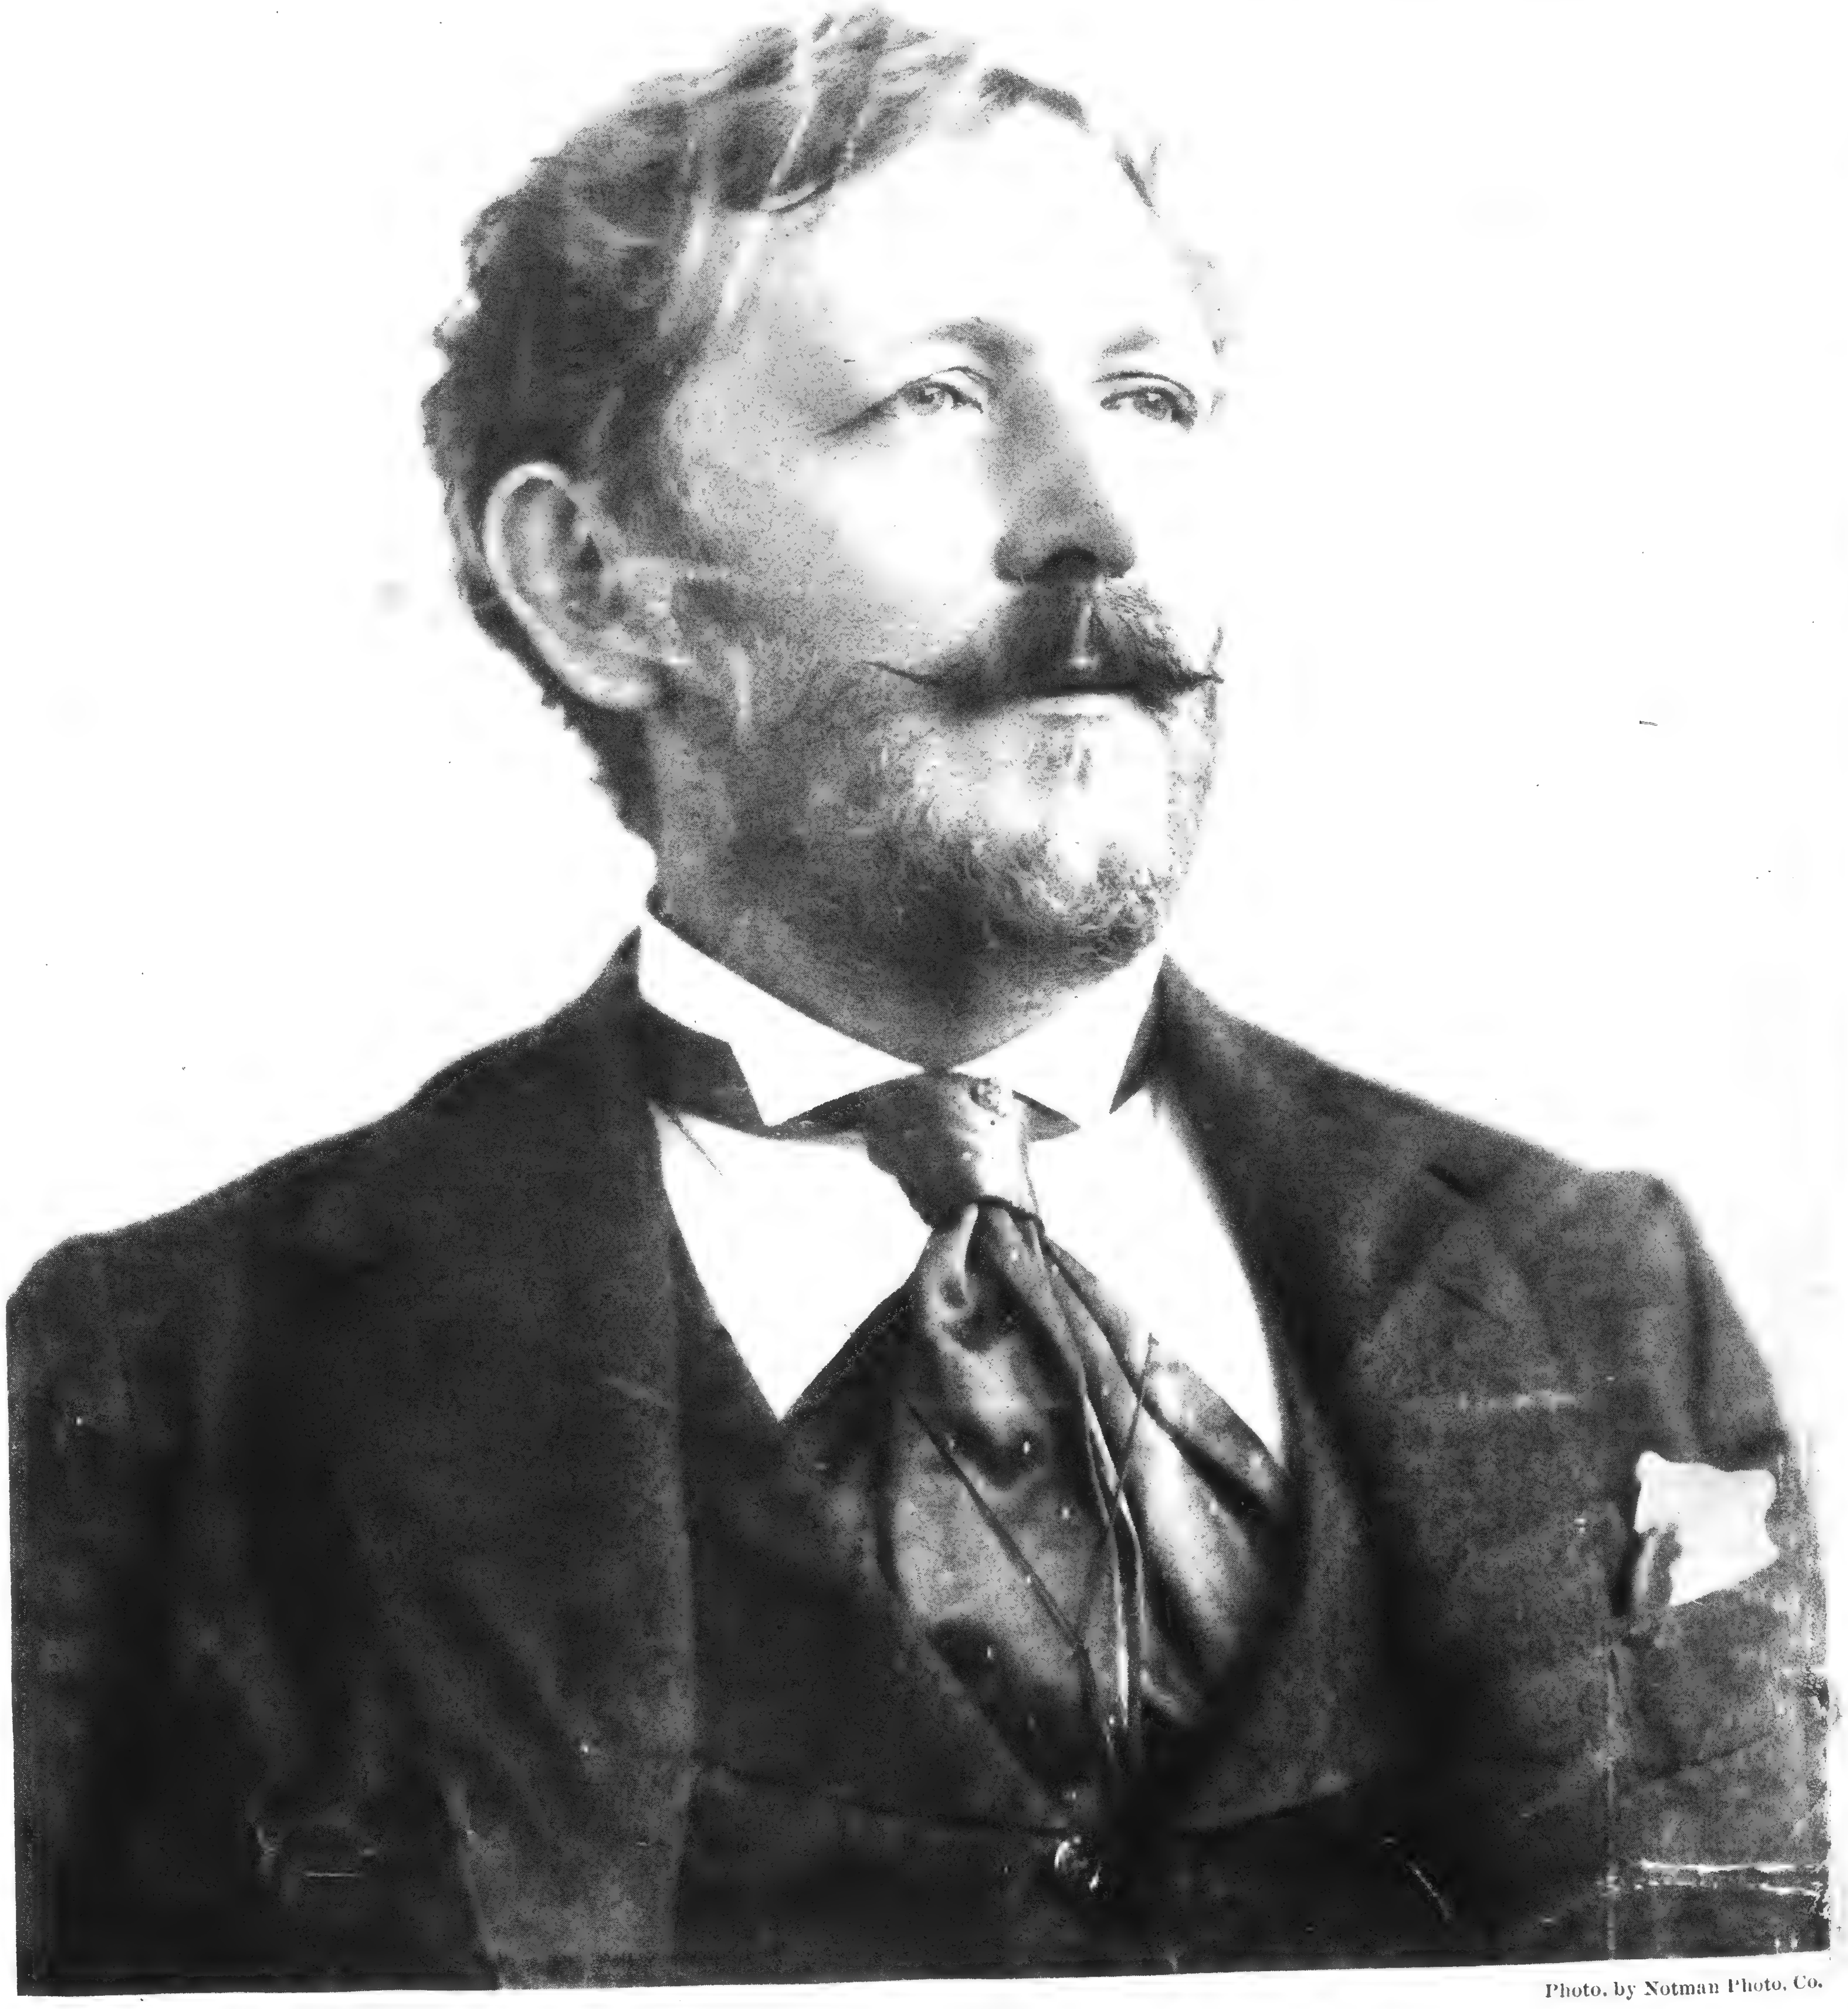
MR. EMIL PAUR, THE CONDUCTOR OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, AND MRS. PAUR, AT HOME.
(From a snapshot photo, taken expressly for the Boston Journal.)



Engraved by Hub Engraving Co.

Photo. by Notman Photo. Co.

EMIL PAUR,
LEADER OF THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

BOSTON
MUSIC HALL

SEVENTEENTH SEASON
✤ 1897-98 ✤

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

TWENTY-FOUR CONCERTS

ON CONSECUTIVE SATURDAY EVENINGS, FROM OCT. 16, 1897, TO APRIL 30, 1898, OMITTING NOV. 13, DEC. 18, 1897, JAN. 22, FEB. 19, AND MARCH 26, 1898, AND

TWENTY-FOUR PUBLIC REHEARSALS

ON CONSECUTIVE FRIDAY AFTERNOONS, FROM OCT. 15, 1897, TO APRIL 29, 1898, OMITTING NOV. 12, DEC. 17, 1897, JAN. 21, FEB. 18, AND MARCH 25, 1898.

SOLOISTS: Mme. Melba, Mrs. Henschel, Miss Wienzkowska, Mrs. Titus, Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler, Miss Olive Mead, Mr. Bispham, Mr. Rosenthal, Mr. Joseffy, Mr. Siloti, Mr. MacDowell, Mr. Kneisel, Mr. Loeffler, Mr. Adamowski, Mr. Schnitzler, Mr. Schroeder, and Mr. Schulz.

TICKETS for the series of Concerts and for the series of Rehearsals, $12.00 and $7.50 according to location.

The $12 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, MONDAY, September 27, at 10 A.M.

The $7.50 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, TUESDAY, September 28, at 10 A.M.

The $12 Seats for the Concerts will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, on THURSDAY, September 30, at 10 A.M.

The $7.50 Seats for the Concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place, on FRIDAY, October 1, at 10 A.M.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets will be delivered in the Hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be immediately resold.

(OVER.)

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.
FOUNDED 1881.
EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.

MUSIC HALL, BOSTON.

CHARLES A. ELLIS, MANAGER.
FREDERIC R. COMEE, ASSISTANT MANAGER.

September 25, 1897.

DEAR

As a subscriber to concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in past seasons, we should be pleased to reserve seats for you before the public subscription is opened.

Should you desire to renew your subscription, please sign and mail enclosed order.

Yours respectfully,

C. A. ELLIS, MANAGER.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.
FOUNDED 1881.
EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.

MUSIC HALL, BOSTON.

CHARLES A. ELLIS, MANAGER.
FREDERIC R. COMEE, ASSISTANT MANAGER.

September 25, 1897.

DEAR

We beg to call your attention to the announcement of the new series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the Metropolitan Opera House.

Should you desire to subscribe, please sign and mail enclosed order, indicating the location of seats preferred.

Yours respectfully,

C. A. ELLIS, MANAGER.

UNITED STATES POSTAGE
TWO 2 CENTS

CHARLES A. ELLIS,
Manager Boston Symphony Orchestra,
Metropolitan Opera House,
New York, N.Y.

New York, September 28, 1897.

I hereby subscribe to .... season tickets for the series of five concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Metropolitan Opera House.

....

....

Location desired, as near as possible, ...

....

BOSTON
MUSIC HALL

SEVENTEENTH SEASON
1897-98

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

TWENTY-FOUR CONCERTS

ON CONSECUTIVE SATURDAY EVENINGS, FROM OCT. 16, 1897, TO APRIL 30, 1898, OMITTING NOV. 13, DEC. 18, 1897, JAN. 22, FEB. 19, AND MARCH 26, 1898, AND

TWENTY-FOUR PUBLIC REHEARSALS

ON CONSECUTIVE FRIDAY AFTERNOONS, FROM OCT. 15, 1897, TO APRIL 29, 1898, OMITTING NOV. 12, DEC. 17, 1897, JAN. 21, FEB. 18, AND MARCH 25, 1898.

SOLOISTS: Mme. Melba, Mrs. Henschel, Miss Wienzkowska, Mrs. Titus, Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler, Miss Olive Mead, Mr. Bispham, Mr. Rosenthal, Mr. Joseffy, Mr. Siloti, Mr. MacDowell, Mr. Kneisel, Mr. Loeffler, Mr. Adamowski, Mr. Schnitzler, Mr. Schroeder, and Mr. Schulz.

TICKETS for the series of Concerts and for the series of Rehearsals, $12.00 and $7.50 according to location.

The $12 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, MONDAY, September 27, at 10 A.M.

The $7.50 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, TUESDAY, September 28, at 10 A.M.

The $12 Seats for the Concerts will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, on THURSDAY, September 30, at 10 A.M.

The $7.50 Seats for the Concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place, on FRIDAY, October 1, at 10 A.M.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets will be delivered in the Hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be immediately resold.

(OVER.)

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.
FOUNDED 1881.
EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.

MUSIC HALL, BOSTON.

CHARLES A. ELLIS, MANAGER.
FREDERIC R. COMEE, ASSISTANT MANAGER.

September 25, 1897.

DEAR

We beg to call your attention to the announcement of the new series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the Metropolitan Opera House.

Should you desire to subscribe, please sign and mail enclosed order, indicating the location of seats preferred.

Yours respectfully,

C. A. ELLIS, MANAGER.

CHARLES A. ELLIS,
Manager Boston Symphony Orchestra,
Metropolitan Opera House,
New York, N. Y.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.
FOUNDED 1881.
EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.

MUSIC HALL, BOSTON.

CHARLES A. ELLIS, MANAGER.
FREDERIC R. COMEE, ASSISTANT MANAGER.

September 25, 1897.

DEAR

As a subscriber to concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in past seasons, we should be pleased to reserve seats for you before the public subscription is opened.

Should you desire to renew your subscription, please sign and mail enclosed order.

Yours respectfully,

C. A. ELLIS, MANAGER.

New York, September 28, 1897.

I hereby subscribe to season tickets for the series of five concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Metropolitan Opera House.

Location desired, as near as possible,

METROPOLITAN OPERA HOUSE.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

87 PERFORMERS.

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

A PERMANENT ORCHESTRA
MAINTAINED SOLELY FOR
CONCERT PERFORMANCES.

SEVENTEENTH SEASON, 1897–98.

FIVE CONCERTS.

Thursday Evening, November 11.
Thursday Evening, December 16.
Thursday Evening, January 20.
Thursday Evening, February 17.
Thursday Evening, March 24.

At 8.15 o'clock.

SOLO ARTISTS.

Madame MELBA.

Madame NORDICA. Mr. JOSEFFY.

Mr. KNEISEL. Mr. LOEFFLER.

* * *

Subscription tickets, with reserved seats for the series of five concerts, $7.50, $6, $5, and $3, and Boxes, $50, $40, and $30, according to location.

Programme books with descriptive notes on the works to be performed will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.

F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

SANDERS THEATRE, CAMBRIDGE.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

A PERMANENT ORCHESTRA
MAINTAINED SOLELY FOR
CONCERT PERFORMANCES.

SEVENTEENTH SEASON, 1897–98.

TEN CONCERTS.

Thursday Evening, October 28.
Thursday Evening, November 18.
Thursday Evening, December 9.
Thursday Evening, January 6.
Thursday Evening, January 27.
Thursday Evening, February 10.
Thursday Evening, February 24.
Thursday Evening, March 17.
Thursday Evening, April 7.
Thursday Evening, April 28.

At 7.45 o'clock.

SOLO ARTISTS.

Mr. FRANGCON DAVIES. Mrs. TITUS. Miss WOOD.

Madame SZUMOWSKA. Mr. SILOTI.

Mr. JONAS. Mr. KNEISEL. Mr. LOEFFLER.

And others, to be announced.

* * *

Subscription tickets, with reserved seats for the series of ten concerts, $7.50, on sale at the University Book Store, Saturday morning, October 23, at 8 o'clock. A limited number of seats have been reserved for college officers and invited guests.

F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

LAFAYETTE SQUARE OPERA HOUSE.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

87 PERFORMERS.

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

A PERMANENT ORCHESTRA
MAINTAINED SOLELY FOR
CONCERT PERFORMANCES.

SEVENTEENTH SEASON, 1897–98.

Five Matinees.

Tuesday Afternoon, November 9.
Tuesday Afternoon, December 14.
Tuesday Afternoon, January 18.
Tuesday Afternoon, February 15.
Tuesday Afternoon, March 22.

AT 4.15.

SOLO ARTISTS:

Mme. LILLIAN BLAUVELT.

Mr. RAFAEL JOSEFFY. Mr. G. CAMPANARI.

Mr. C. M. LOEFFLER.

Season tickets, with reserved seats for the series of five concerts, $7 and $5, according to location. Programme books, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.

The sale of season tickets will open at the Lafayette Square Opera House, Monday morning, October 18, at 9 o'clock. To secure a fair distribution of seats, no more than ten tickets will be sold to one person.

F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, PHILADELPHIA.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

87 PERFORMERS.

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

A PERMANENT ORCHESTRA
MAINTAINED SOLELY FOR
CONCERT PERFORMANCES.

SEVENTEENTH SEASON, 1897–98.

FIVE CONCERTS.

Monday Evening, November 8.
Monday Evening, December 13.
Monday Evening, January 17.
Monday Evening, February 14.
Monday Evening, March 21.

AT 8.15.

SOLO ARTISTS.

Mme. LILLIAN BLAUVELT. Mr. DAVID BISPHAM.

Mr. RAFAEL JOSEFFY. Mr. C. M. LOEFFLER.

* * *

Proscenium boxes seating eight, and the new boxes seating six and four, will be sold at $75, $63, and $42, respectively, for the series of five concerts.

Season tickets, with reserved seats for the series of five concerts, $7, $5, and $3.50, according to location.

The sale of tickets will open Monday morning, October 18, at Fischer's Music Store, 1221 Chestnut Street.

Programme books, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.

F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

" A virtuoso orchestra."— Sun.

" Peerless band of musicians."— Herald.

" For the past decade our standard of orchestral performance."— Times.

" A fine virtuosity paired with equally fine musical feeling."— Tribune.

" The highest exponents of orchestral work in the country."— World.

LIST OF WORKS TO BE PERFORMED.

BEETHOVEN	Symphony No. 3 (Eroica)
BEETHOVEN	Three movements from the Symphony No. 9
BRAHMS	Symphony No. 3, in F major
DVORAK	Symphony, " From the New World "
Mrs. H. H. A. BEACH	Symphony in E minor (Gaelic), Op. 32 (MS., first time.)
TSCHAIKOWSKY	Italian Caprice (First time.)
RIMSKY KORSAKOFF	Three movements from the Symphonic Suite, " Scheherazade " (First time.)
MASSENET	Suite, " Les Erinnyes " (First time.)
CHABRIER	Symphonic Poem, " Espagna " (First time.)
RICHARD STRAUSS	Symphonic Poem, " Also spracht Zarathustra " (First time.)
VOLKMANN	Serenade for String Orchestra, No. 3, in D minor Solo Violoncello, Mr. Alwin Schroeder.
WEBER–WEINGARTNER	" Invitation to Dance "
BEETHOVEN	Overture, " Lenore, No. 3 "
BERLIOZ	Overture, " Benvenuto Cellini "
BRAHMS	Academic Overture
WAGNER	Selections

SANDER

Th

Symph

Mr.

SEVEN

TEN

Thursday Evenin

Thursday Evenin

Thursday Evenin

Thursday Evenin

Thursday Evenin

❧ ❧

Mr. FRANGCON DAVIE

Madame S

Mr. JONAS.

An

Subscription tickets, certs, $7.50, on sale at October 23, at 8 o'clock. for college officers and in

F. R. COMEE, Assistan

" A virtuoso orchestra."— New York Sun.

" Peerless band of musicians."— New York Herald.

" For the past decade our standard of orchestral performance."— New York Times.

" A fine virtuosity paired with equally fine musical feeling."— New York Tribune.

" The highest exponents of orchestral work in the country."— New York World.

LIST OF WORKS TO BE PERFORMED.

BEETHOVEN	Symphony No. 3 (Eroica)
BEETHOVEN	Three movements from the Symphony No. 9
SCHUMANN	Symphony No. 4, in D minor
HAYDN	Symphony No. 7
DVORAK	Symphony, " From the New World "
TSCHAIKOWSKY	Italian Caprice (First time.)
GLAZOUNOW	Poème Lyrique
BERLIOZ	Three movements from " The Damnation of Faust "
CHABRIER	Symphonic Poem, " Espagna " (First time.)
WEBER–WEINGARTNER	" Invitation to Dance "
BEETHOVEN	Overture, " Lenore, No. 3 "
BEETHOVEN	Overture, " Egmont "
AUBER	Overture, " Carlo Broschi "
BRAHMS	Academic Overture
WAGNER	Kaisermarsch
WAGNER	Selections

ACADEMY O

The Sympho

Mr. EM

A MA
CO

SEVENTEE

FIVE

Monday Evening, Novem

Monday Evening, January

Monday Evening, March

❧ ❧ SO

Mme. LILLIAN BLAUVELT.

Mr. RAFAEL JOSEFFY.

Proscenium boxes seatin four, will be sold at $75, $6 five concerts.

Season tickets, with rese $7, $5, and $3.50, according t

The sale of tickets will o Fischer's Music Store, 1221 Ch

Programme books, with d formed, will be mailed in ad season tickets.

F. R. COMEE, Assistant Ma

"A virtuoso orchestra."—New York Sun.

"Peerless band of musicians."—New York Herald.

"For the past decade our standard of orchestral performance."—New York Times.

"A fine virtuosity paired with equally fine musical feeling."—New York Tribune.

"The highest exponents of orchestral work in the country."—New York World.

LIST OF WORKS TO BE PERFORMED.

BEETHOVEN	Symphony No. 5
BEETHOVEN	Three movements from the Symphony No. 9
SCHUMANN	Symphony No. 1, in B
SCHUMANN	Symphony No. 4, in D minor
MOZART	Symphony No. 3
HAYDN	Symphony No. 7
PAINE	Symphony No. 2, "In the Spring"
RAFF	Symphony, "Im Walde"
TSCHAIKOWSKY	Symphony No. 5
TSCHAIKOWSKY (First time.)	Italian Caprice
MOZART	Serenade
GOETZ	Largo and Scherzo, from Symphony in F major
RIMSKY KORSAKOFF (First time.)	Three movements from the Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade"
RIMSKY KORSAKOFF (First time.)	Symphonic Poem ("Oster Fest")
BACH	Prelude and Fugue
MASSENET (First time.)	Suite, "Les Erinnyes"
CHABRIER (First time.)	Symphonic Poem, "Espagna"
CHABRIER	Entr'acte, "Gwendoline"
VOLKMANN	Serenade for String Orchestra, No. 3, in D minor Solo Violoncello, Mr. ALWIN SCHROEDER.
WEBER	Overture, "Euryanthe"
BEETHOVEN	Overture, "Lenore, No. 3"
BEETHOVEN	Overture, "Egmont"
BERLIOZ	Overture, "Carnaval Romain"
BRAHMS	Tragic Overture
MEYERBEER	Overture, "Struensee"
WAGNER	Selections

"The perfection of execution."—Philadelphia Ledger.

"A virtuoso orchestra."—New York Sun.

"A truly great orchestra."—Philadelphia Press.

"Peerless band of musicians."—New York Herald.

"Impossible to conceive of anything finer."—Philadelphia North American.

"For the past decade our standard of orchestral performance."—New York Times.

"A distinct triumph."—Philadelphia Inquirer.

"A fine virtuosity paired with equally fine musical feeling."—New York Tribune.

"Exactness and brilliancy of execution, with richness of color."—Philadelphia Times.

"The highest exponents of orchestral work in the country."—New York World.

LIST OF WORKS TO BE PERFORMED.

BEETHOVEN	Symphony No. 5
BEETHOVEN	Three movements from the Symphony No. 9
SCHUMANN	Symphony No. 4, in D minor	✓
HAYDN	Symphony No. 7	✓
RAFF	Symphony. "Im Walde"	✓
TSCHAIKOWSKY (First time.)	Italian Caprice
BERLIOZ	Three movements from "The Damnation of Faust"	✓
MASSENET (First time.)	Suite, "Les Erinnyes"	✓
CHABRIER (First time.)	Symphonic Poem, "Espagna"	✓
WEBER-WEINGARTNER	"Invitation to Dance"	✓
BEETHOVEN	Overture, "Lenore, No. 3"
BERLIOZ	Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini"	✓
WEBER	Overture, "Euryanthe"
BRAHMS	Academic Overture	✓
AUBER	Overture, "Carlo Broschi"
WAGNER	Selections	✓

INFANTRY HALL, PROVIDENCE.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra,

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

A PERMANENT ORCHESTRA
MAINTAINED SOLELY FOR
CONCERT PERFORMANCES.

SEVENTEENTH SEASON, 1897-98.
SIXTEENTH SEASON IN PROVIDENCE.

EIGHT CONCERTS.

Wednesday Evening, November 3.
Wednesday Evening, December 1.
Wednesday Evening, December 29.
Wednesday Evening, January 12.
Wednesday Evening, February 2.
Wednesday Evening, March 9.
Wednesday Evening, March 30.
Wednesday Evening, April 20.

At 8 o'Clock Sharp.

SOLO ARTISTS:

MME. GADSKI. MME. LILLIAN BLAUVELT.
MISS GERTRUDE MAY STEIN.
MR. RAFAEL JOSEFFY. MR. SILOTI.
MR. GEORGE PROCTOR. MR. I. SCHNITZLER.
MR. ALWIN SCHROEDER.

Programme books with descriptive notes on the works to be performed will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.

Subscription tickets, with reserved seats for the series of eight concerts, $7, on sale at Infantry Hall, Monday morning, October 25, at 9 o'clock.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

INFANTRY HALL.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.
SECOND CONCERT,
Wednesday Evening, December 1,
At 8 Sharp.

PROGRAMME.

Dvorak,.............................Symphony No. 5
"From the New World."
Mendelssohn..Two Movements from Concerto for Violin.
Berlioz { a. Minuet of Will-o'-the-Wisps
b. Waltz of Sylphs
c. Rakoczy March
From "The Damnation of Faust."
Tchaikovsky...Italian Capriccio, for Orchestra
(First Time.)

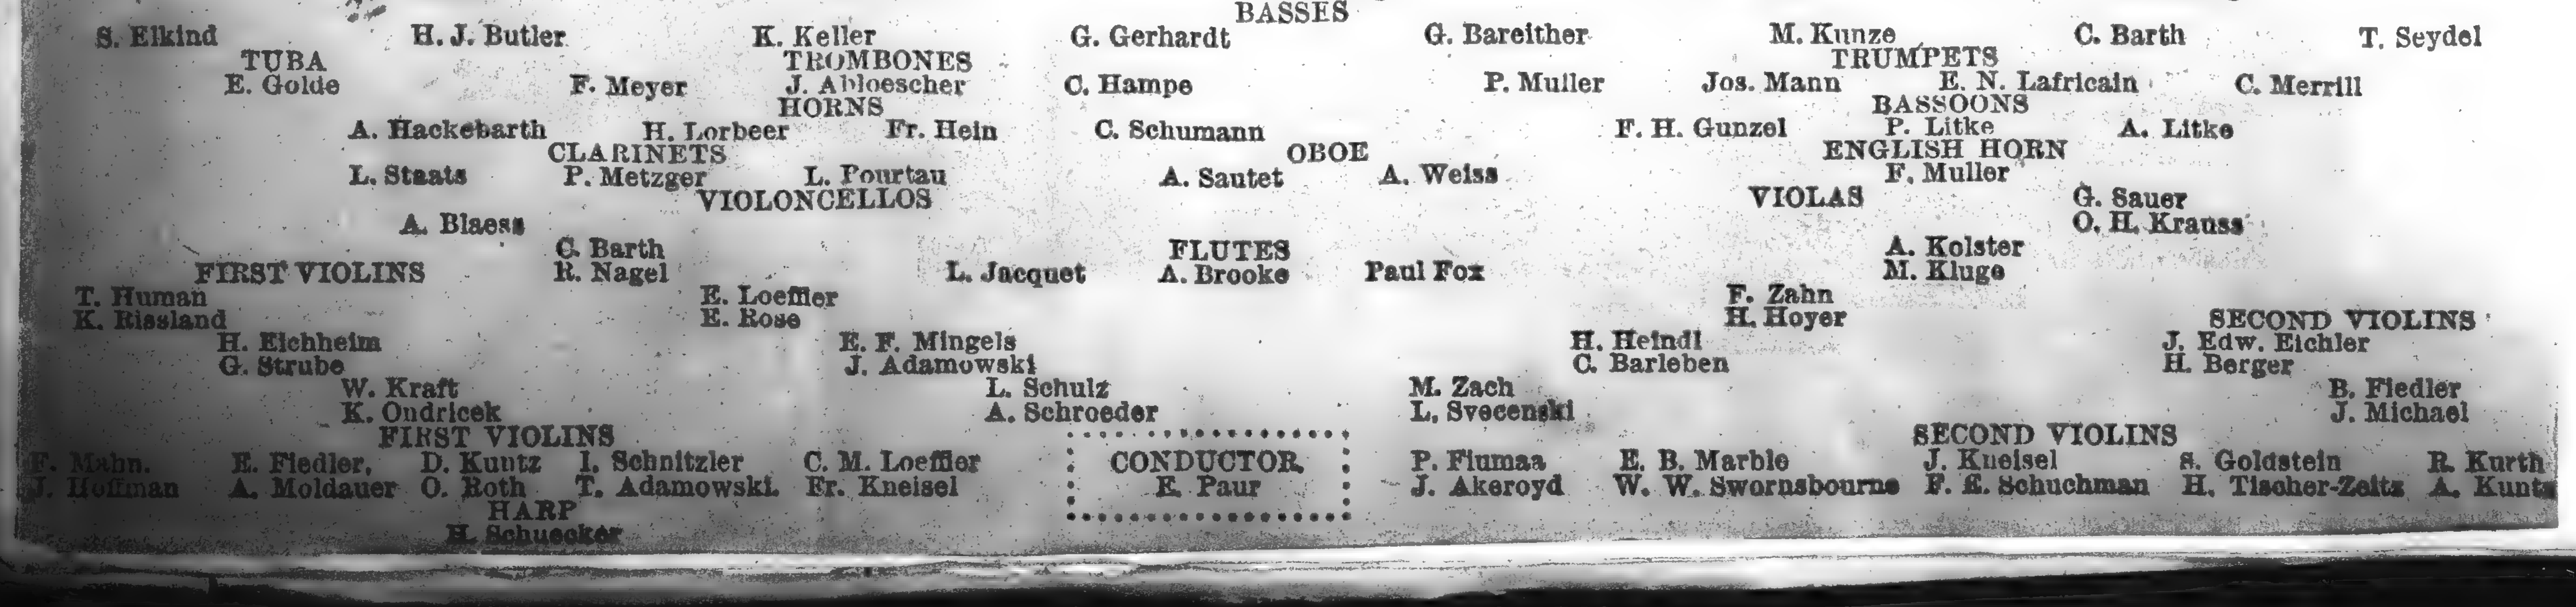
Soloist, MR. I. SCHNITZLER.

Tickets now on sale at Infantry Hall. n29-3t

BOSTON POST, THURSDAY, JANUARY 6, 1898.

SEATING PLAN OF SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

THE FOLLOWING SEATING PLAN OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA WILL DOUBTLESS PROVE OF REFERENCE VALUE, BOTH TO REGULAR AND OCCASIONAL PATRONS OF THE CONCERTS IN MUSIC HALL:



TAMBOUR T. B. Senia TRIANGLE H. Burkhardt CYMBALS H. Boernig DRUMS H. D. Simpson TYMPANI C. R. Ludwig
BASSES
S. Elkind H. J. Butler K. Keller G. Gerhardt G. Bareither M. Kunze C. Barth T. Seydel
TUBA E. Golde
TROMBONES F. Meyer J. Ahloescher C. Hampe
TRUMPETS P. Muller Jos. Mann E. N. Lafricain C. Merrill
HORNS A. Hackebarth H. Lorbeer Fr. Hein C. Schumann
BASSOONS F. H. Gunzel P. Litke A. Litke
CLARINETS L. Staats P. Metzger L. Pourtau
OBOE A. Sautet A. Weiss
ENGLISH HORN F. Muller
VIOLONCELLOS
A. Blaess C. Barth R. Nagel E. Loeffler E. Rose E. F. Mingels J. Adamowski L. Schulz A. Schroeder
FLUTES L. Jacquet A. Brooke Paul Fox
VIOLAS G. Sauer O. H. Krauss A. Kolster M. Kluge F. Zahn H. Hoyer H. Heindl C. Barleben M. Zach L. Svecenski
FIRST VIOLINS
T. Human K. Rissland H. Eichheim G. Strube W. Kraft K. Ondricek
FIRST VIOLINS
F. Mahn. J. Hoffman E. Fiedler, A. Moldauer D. Kuntz O. Roth I. Schnitzler T. Adamowski. C. M. Loeffler Fr. Kneisel
HARP H. Schuecker
CONDUCTOR. E. Paur
SECOND VIOLINS
J. Edw. Eichler H. Berger B. Fiedler J. Michael
SECOND VIOLINS
P. Fiumaa J. Akeroyd E. B. Marble W. W. Swornsbourne J. Kneisel F. E. Schuchman S. Goldstein H. Tischer-Zeitz R. Kurth A. Kuntz

BLANK PAGE

INFANTRY HALL, PROVIDENCE.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

A PERMANENT ORCHESTRA
MAINTAINED SOLELY FOR
CONCERT PERFORMANCES.

SEVENTEENTH SEASON, 1897-98.
SIXTEENTH SEASON IN PROVIDENCE.

EIGHT CONCERTS.

Wednesday Evening, November 3.
Wednesday Evening, December 1.
Wednesday Evening, December 29.
Wednesday Evening, January 12.
Wednesday Evening, February 2.
Wednesday Evening, March 9.
Wednesday Evening, March 30.
Wednesday Evening, April 20.
At 8 o'clock sharp.

*

SOLO ARTISTS.

Mme. GADSKI.
Mme. LILLIAN BLAUVELT.
Miss GERTRUDE MAY STEIN.
Mr. RAFAEL JOSEFFY.
Mr. SILOTI.
Mr. GEORGE PROCTOR.
Mr. I. SCHNITZLER.
Mr. ALWIN SCHROEDER.

*

Programme books with descriptive notes on the works to be performed will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.

Subscription tickets, with reserved seats for the series of eight concerts, $7, on sale at Infantry Hall, Monday morning, October 25, at 9 o'clock.

F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.
C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

HARVARD UNIVERSITY

TEN CHAMBER CONCERTS

IN

SANDERS THEATRE

CAMBRIDGE

OPEN TO ALL MEMBERS OF THE UNIVERSITY AND TO THE PUBLIC

These concerts are supplementary to a course of lectures given to students by Professor JOHN K. PAINE, on the Chamber Music of Beethoven and other modern masters (Music 8).

Season tickets, with reserved seats, price $7.00, will be for sale at the University Bookstore, Cambridge, SATURDAY MORNING, October 9, at 8 o'clock. A limited number of seats have been reserved for officers of the University, the students who take the course, and invited guests.

"A virtuoso orchestra."—New York Sun.

"Peerless band of musicians."—New York Herald.

"For the past decade our standard of orchestral performance."—New York Times.

"A fine virtuosity paired with equally fine musical feeling."—New York Tribune.

"The highest exponents of orchestral work in the country."—New York World.

LIST OF WORKS TO BE PERFORMED.

BEETHOVEN	Symphony No. 5
BEETHOVEN	Three movements from the Symphony No. 9
SCHUMANN	Symphony No. 1, in B
HAYDN	Symphony No. 7
RAFF	Symphony, "Im Walde"
BRAHMS	Symphony No. 3
DVORAK	Symphony, "From the New World"
TSCHAIKOWSKY	Symphony No. 6 (Pathetic)
TSCHAIKOWSKY	Italian Caprice (First time.)
RIMSKY KORSAKOFF	Two movements from the Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade" (First time.)
BERLIOZ	Three selections from "The Damnation of Faust"
GRIEG	Three Norwegian Melodies
CHABRIER	Symphonic Poem, "Espagna" (First time.)
CHABRIER	Entr'acte, "Gwendoline"
WEBER-WEINGARTNER	"Invitation to Dance"
WEBER	Overture, "Freischütz"
BEETHOVEN	Overture, "Lenore, No. 3"
BEETHOVEN	Overture, "Egmont"
BERLIOZ	Overture, "Carnaval Romain"
MEYERBEER	Overture, "Struensee"
WAGNER	Prelude, "Die Meistersinger"
WAGNER	Selections
MENDELSSOHN	Overture, "Ruy Blas"
BERLIOZ	Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini"
HUMPERDINCK	Overture, "Hansel and Gretel"

FIRST SEASON. 1897–98

Tuesday evening	Oct. 19	Tuesday evening	Feb. 1
Tuesday evening	Nov. 2	Tuesday evening	March 8
Tuesday evening	Nov. 30	Tuesday evening	March 29
Tuesday evening	Dec. 7	Tuesday evening	April 12
Tuesday evening	Jan. 11	Tuesday evening	April 26

At 7.45, precisely

LIST OF PERFORMERS

THE KNEISEL QUARTET (AT EIGHT CONCERTS)
THE ADAMOWSKI QUARTET

SOLO PIANISTS

MADAME SZUMOWSKA

MR. CARL BAERMANN MR. RAFAEL JOSEFFY

AND THE FOLLOWING SOLOISTS

MR. C. JACQUET	Flute	MR. A. HACKEBARTH	Horn
" A. SAUTET	Oboe	" M. ZACH	Viola
" L. POURTAU	Clarinet	" L. SCHULZ	Violoncello
" H. LITKE	Bassoon	" K. KELLER	Bass

AND OTHERS

LIST OF WORKS TO BE PERFORMED

The Programmes have been selected to represent most of the forms of Modern Chamber Music: The Piano Sonata, Piano and Violin Sonata, Piano Quintet, Piano Septet, the String Quartet and Quintet, the Septet and Octet.

BEETHOVEN	Septet for Strings, Clarinet, Bassoon, and Horn, op. 20, E flat
BEETHOVEN	String Quartet, op. 18, A major
BEETHOVEN	String Quartet, op. 59, C major
BEETHOVEN	String Quartet, op. 74, E flat (Harp)
BEETHOVEN	String Quartet, op. 132, A minor
BEETHOVEN	Kreutzer Sonata for Piano and Violin, op. 47, A minor
BEETHOVEN	Sonata Appassionata for Piano, op. 57, F minor
BRAHMS	String Quartet, op. 51, C minor
CHOPIN	Piano Selections
CHADWICK	String Quartet, E minor
DVORAK	String Quartet (American), F major
FOOTE	Quintet for Piano and Strings (First time)
GRIEG	String Quartet
HAYDN	String Quartet, op. 76, G major
HAYDN	String Quartet
HUMMEL	Septet for Piano, Flute, Oboe, Horn, Viola, Violoncello and Contrabass, op. 74, D minor
MENDELSSOHN	String Quintet, op. 87, B flat
MOZART	Quintet for Piano, Oboe, Clarinet, Horn, and Bassoon, op. 108, E flat
MOZART	String Quintet, G minor
MOZART	String Quartet, C major. (Dedicated to Haydn)
SCHUBERT	Octet for Strings, Clarinet, Bassoon, and Horn, op. 166, F major
SCHUBERT	Variations from the Posthumous Quartet, D minor
SCHUBERT	Quintet for Piano and Strings, op. 114, A major
SCHUMANN	Quintet for Piano and Strings, op. 44, E flat
SCHUMANN	String Quartet, op. 41, A major
TSCHAIKOWSKY	String Quartet, op. 22, F major

AND OTHER WORKS

INFANTRY HALL, PROVIDENCE.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

A PERMANENT ORCHESTRA
MAINTAINED SOLELY FOR
CONCERT PERFORMANCES.

SEVENTEENTH SEASON, 1897-98.
SIXTEENTH SEASON IN PROVIDENCE.

EIGHT CONCERTS.

Wednesday Evening, November 3.
Wednesday Evening, December 1.
Wednesday Evening, December 29.
Wednesday Evening, January 12.
Wednesday Evening, February 2.
Wednesday Evening, March 9.
Wednesday Evening, March 30.
Wednesday Evening, April 20.

At 8 o'clock sharp.

SOLO ARTISTS.

Mme. GADSKI.
Mme. LILLIAN BLAUVELT.
Miss GERTRUDE MAY STEIN.
Mr. RAFAEL JOSEFFY.
Mr. SILOTI.
Mr. GEORGE PROCTOR.
Mr. I. SCHNITZLER.
Mr. ALWIN SCHROEDER.

* * *

Programme books with descriptive notes on the works to be performed will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.

Subscription tickets, with reserved seats for the series of eight concerts, $7, on sale at Infantry Hall, Monday morning, October 25, at 9 o'clock.

F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

PROGRAMME OF THE FIRST CONCERT

Tuesday Evening, October 19, at 7.45

KNEISEL QUARTET

FRANZ KNEISEL	1st Violin
OTTO ROTH	2d Violin
L. SVECENSKI	Viola
ALWIN SCHROEDER	Violoncello

HAYDN	Quartet, op. 76, in G major
MOZART	Quartet in C major (dedicated to Haydn)
BEETHOVEN	Quartet, op. 74, in E flat major ("Harp Quartet")

Address all business communications to F. R. COMEE, Music Hall, Boston

BLANK PAGE

Boston Journal.

FRIDAY, MARCH 11, 1898.

O BIG SALES.

Congregational House and Music Hall.

Name of the Buyer of Hall Withheld.

Mr. Dutton Gets Congregational House.

The Boston Music Hall, situated on Hamilton Place and Music Hall Place, off Winter Street, has been sold. There was a meeting of the Directors yesterday, and the offer was accepted by a majority.

This will not interfere with the Symphony concerts, as there is an understanding that Music Hall will be let for two more years to the Symphony concert management.

The property is assessed for $415,000. Of this $300,000 is on 18,000 square feet of land.

After two years, in all probability, the building will be changed into an office building. This is one of the largest sales in this section of Boston for a number of years.

The property was owned by the Music Hall Associates. The name of the purchaser is withheld, but it is understood that he is a New York man.

The meeting of the Music Hall Directors was held yesterday, and the offer, which was submitted to them, was agreed to by a majority of the stockholders. For a long time the sale of this property has been contemplated. The building is four stories in height and is built of light stone.

The land is divided into two parcels, and is assessed accordingly. The larger portion has its entrance on Hamilton Place, contains 15,000 square feet of land, and is assessed for $256,000, or $16 a square foot. The building is assessed for $100,000. The smaller parcel, which has its entrance on Music Hall Place, off Winter Street, comprises 2093 square feet of land, and a portion of the Music Hall building. The total assessment on this is $59,000, $44,000 being on the land, which makes the land value on this small parcel $21 a square foot.

The sale of this property will probably necessitate the building of a new Music Hall. The sale was made through Real Estate Broker Charles W. Whittier. He refuses to give the name of the purchaser or the price paid, but the latter is believed to have been about $450,000.

Boston Journal.

SATURDAY, MARCH 12, 1898.

IN NEW HANDS.

Music Hall Bought by Real Estate Trust.

Journal Informant Is a Stockholder.

Price Was $450,000, as Journal Announced.

The Governor is able to announce today on the authority of a stockholder of the Boston Real Estate Trust that the Music Hall property was purchased by the trust, and that the price paid for it, as told by the Journal on Thursday, was $450,000. The Journal's informant said nobody knew at present to what use the property will be put. He thought it probable that in time the building would be made over into offices.

Immediately after the sale the property was leased to Henry L. Higginson for two or three years in order that the Symphony concerts may be continued as arranged.

The consummation of this big real estate deal was brought about by Lawrence Minot of 39 Court Street, who is the Secretary of the Boston Real Estate Trust.

Yesterday afternoon a Journal man saw Mr. C. E. Cotting, but as a vendor of the property he did not feel at liberty to either confirm or deny the rumors of the street concerning its sale to the Boston Real Estate Trust.

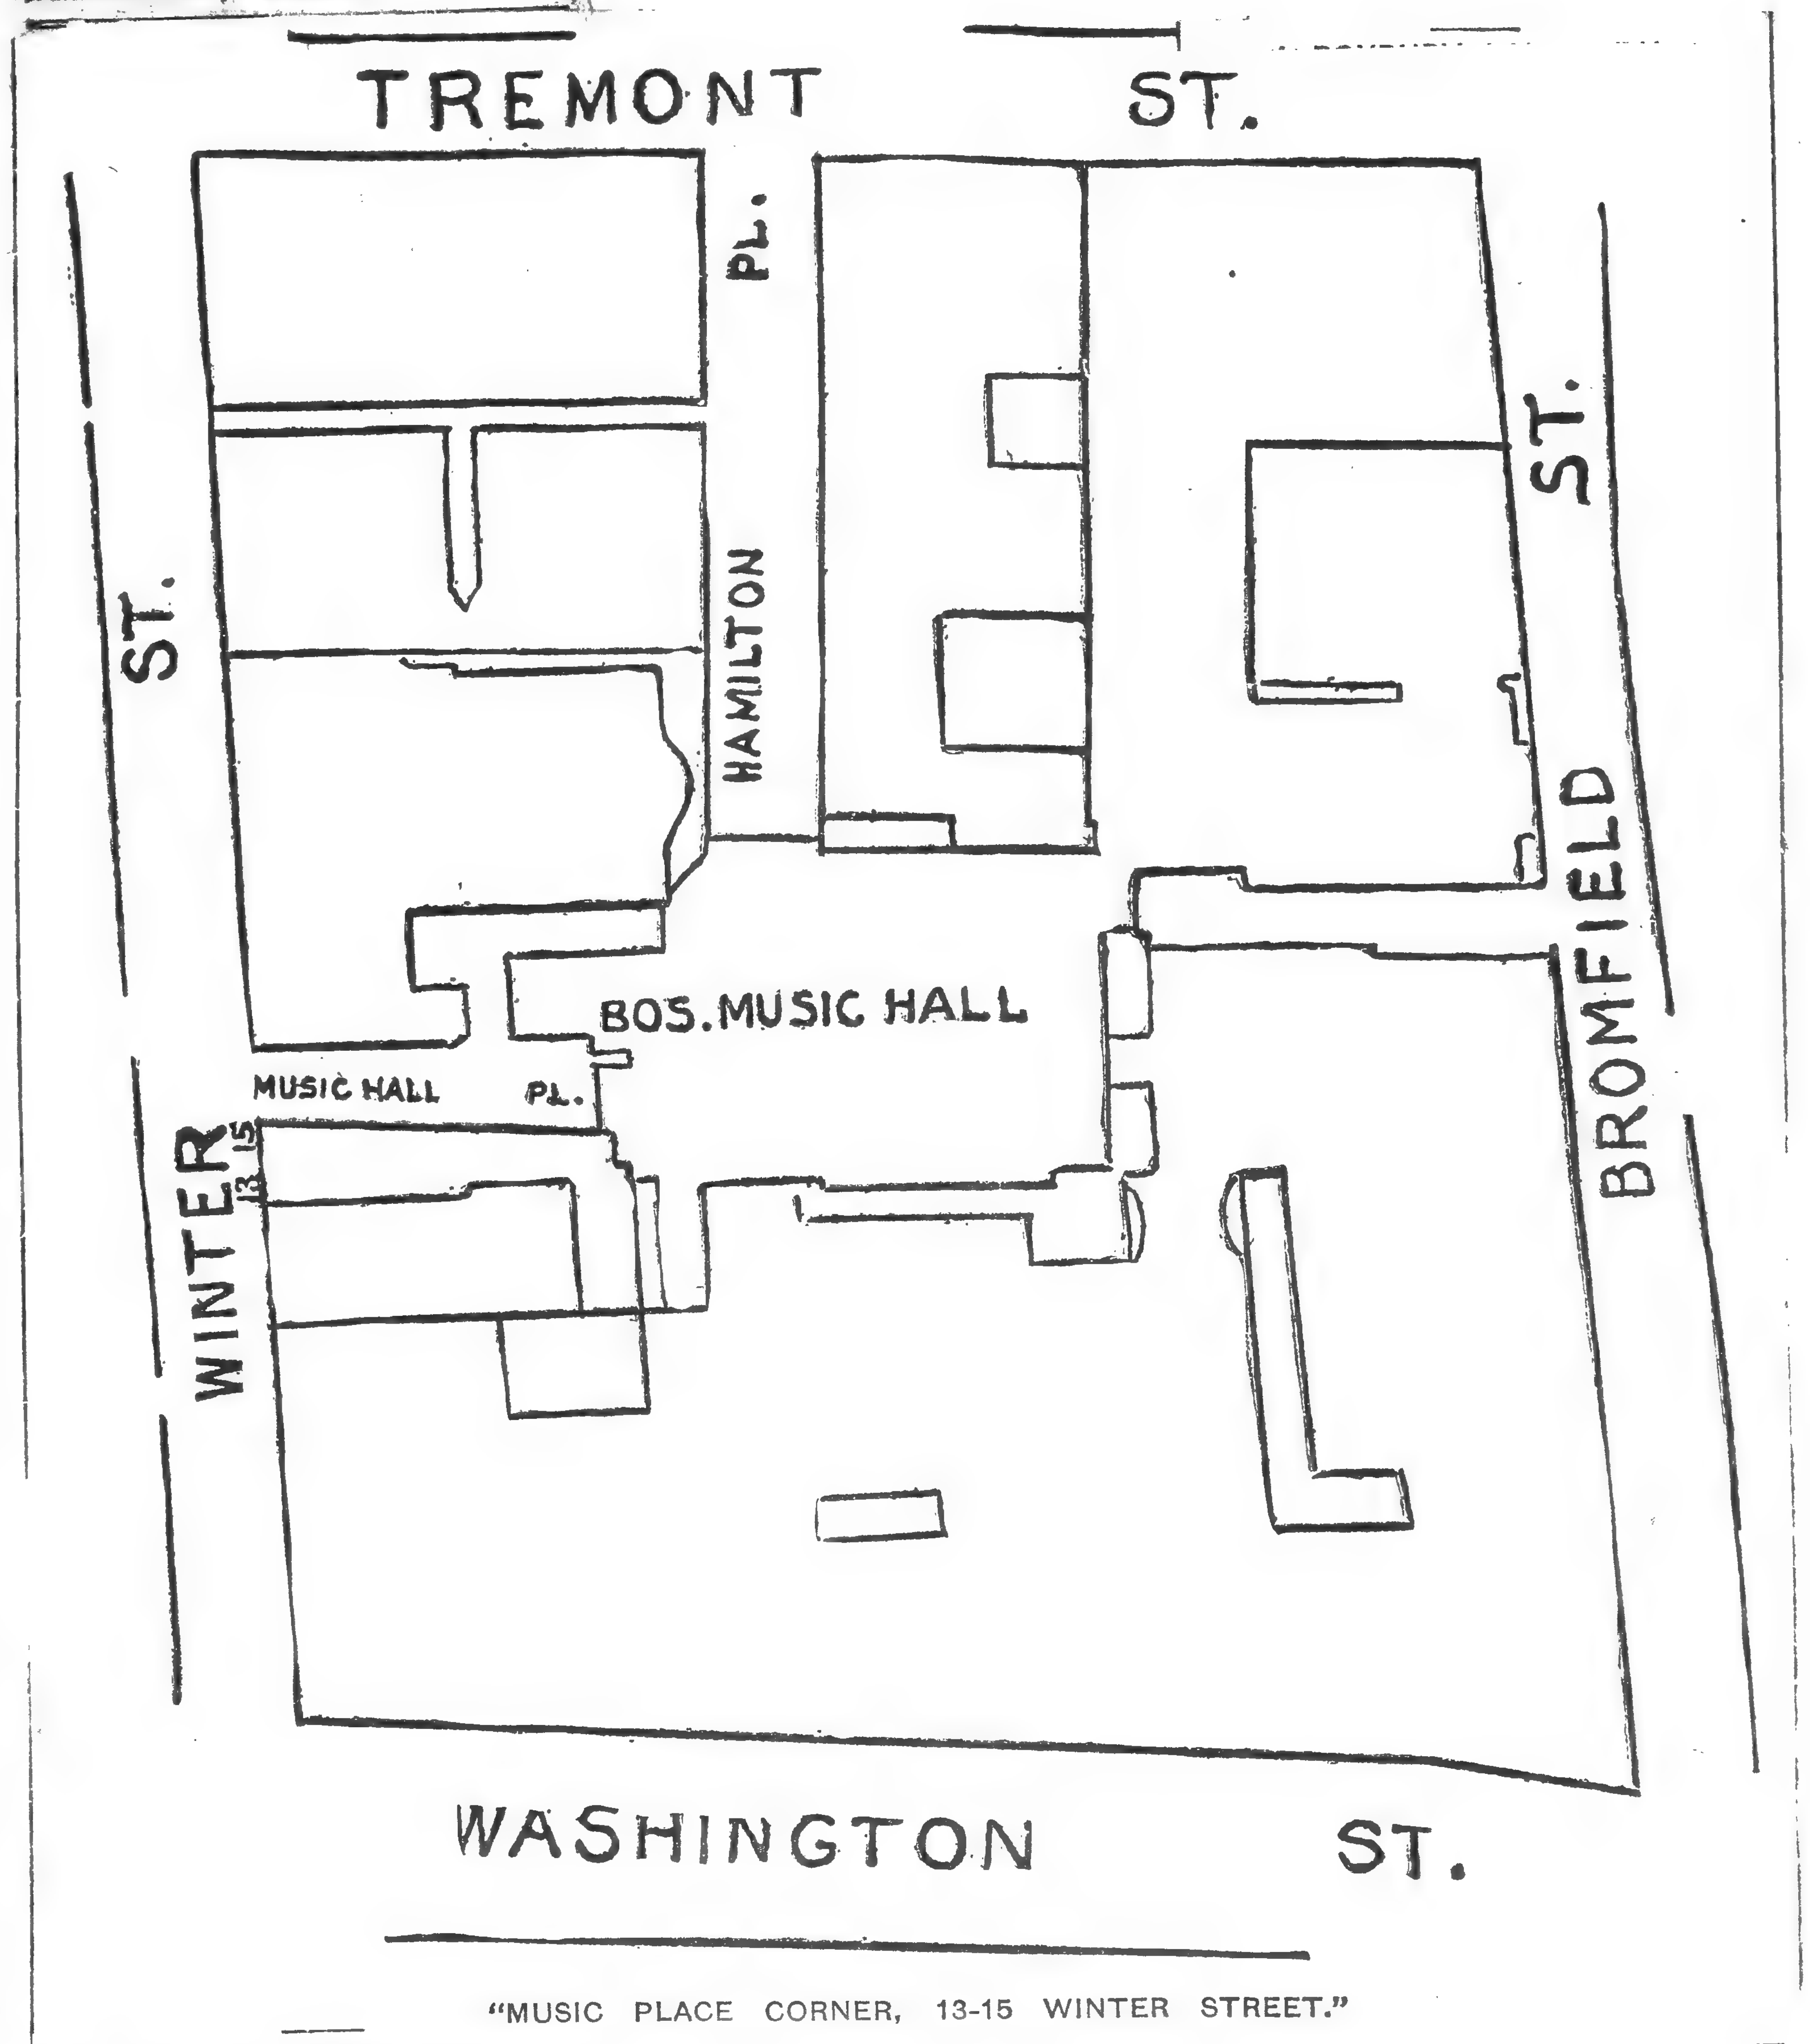
Last night one of the Trustees of the trust said he had requested Mr. Minot to inform him when the purchase was made. He had not heard from Mr. Minot at that hour, and consequently knew nothing about the deal.

The great association which the Journal today says has bought the property is the richest of all the real estate organizations in Boston. It was organized about 10 years ago by Alexander S. Porter, who originated the scheme. The trust began with a capital of $2,000,000, and has increased its capital from time to time until it now has as capital over $6,000,000. The Trustees are Samuel Wells, Wm. S. Dexter, Robert Codman, William Minot and C. E. Cotting.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CIII., NO. 89.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 30, 1898.



"MUSIC PLACE CORNER, 13-15 WINTER STREET."

The Right to Build Over Music Hall Place Secured.

Valuable Lincoln Street Property Changes Ownership — Kneeland Street Estate Passes Into Other Hands—Tract in Roxbury Sold—Recorded Transfers.

Negotiations which have been pending for the last few weeks for the purchase of the estate 13-15 Winter street, on the corner of Music Hall place, adjoining Music Hall, have just been completed.

The agreements have been signed for the purchase of this property by the trustees of the Boston Real Estate Trust, who have purchased this estate as well as Music Hall property, through Mr. C. W. Whittier.

The purchasers propose to add this parcel to their recent purchase of the Music Hall estate, thus making Music Hall a Winter street property, with a total area of about 24,000 square feet.

The Music Hall estate owns the fee of the 15-foot passageway, known as Music Hall place, but the estate just purchased have rights over this passageway.

By securing this estate the Boston Real Estate Trust acquires the right to build over Music Hall place, as per cut, if they so desire, thus adding materially to the size of the present building on the lot, giving a wide frontage on Winter street.

The property which would give this vantage is owned at the present time by F. W. Andrews of Washington, D. C., whose home was formerly on this Boston site.

The trustees of the Boston Real Estate Trust are to give back a lease of the Music Hall portion of the property to Henry L Higginson, who is to use it for the Symphony concerts

It is the intention of the new owners of this property and Music Hall estate to improve or rebuild at the expiration of the present leases.

It seems probable that this property, which is in the very focus of the retail centre of Boston, will be used by some great retail store, applications for this purpose having already been made.

COLORED PAPER

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Boston, September 27, 1897.

Auction sale of $12 Season Tickets for the Friday Afternoon Public Rehearsals at Music Hall, this (MONDAY) morning, at ten o'clock.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Boston, September 30, 1897.

Auction Sale of $12 Season Tickets for the SATURDAY EVENING CONCERTS, at Music Hall, this (THURSDAY) morning, at TEN o'clock.

500

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

SEASON 1897-8.

$7.50 REHEARSALS.

No. ....

Premium, ...

Name, ...

1000

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

SEASON 1897-8.

$12 REHEARSALS.

No. ....

Premium, ...

Name, ...

500

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

SEASON 1897-8.

$7.50 CONCERTS.

No. ....

Premium, ...

[illegible] ....

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

SEASON 1897-8.

$12 CONCERTS.

No. ....

Premium, ...

Name, ...

COLORED PAPER

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Boston, September 27, 1897

Auction sale of $12 Season Tickets for the Friday Afternoon Public Rehearsals at Music Hall, this (MONDAY) morning, at ten o'clock.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Boston, September 30, 1897

Auction Sale of $12 Season Tickets for the SATURDAY EVENING CONCERTS at Music Hall, this (THURSDAY) morning, at TEN o'clock.

500

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

SEASON 1897-8.

$7.50 REHEARSALS.

No.

Premium,

Name,

1000

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

SEASON 1897-8.

$12 REHEARSALS.

No.

Premium,

Name,

500

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

SEASON 1897-8.

$7.50 CONCERTS.

No.

Premium,

Name,

998

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

SEASON 1897-8.

$12 CONCERTS.

No.

Premium,

Name,

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

SEVENTEENTH SEASON, 1897-98.

1510th TO 1515th CONCERT.

NOVEMBER ITINERARY.

Leave Boston Sunday, November 7, at 7, P. M. Providence Depot.

Arrive Philadelphia, Broad Street Station Penna. R. R., Monday, November 8, at 7 A.M.

CONTINENTAL HOTEL.

Concert at Academy of Music at 8, P.M.

Hotel baggage not ready directly after the concert will be moved at owner's expense.

Leave Philadelphia, Tuesday, November 9, Baltimore & Ohio R. R., Twenty-fourth and Chestnut Sts., at 10.22, A.M.

Arrive Washington, B. & O. R. R. at 1.40 P.M.

Matinee at Lafayette Square Opera House, Tuesday, November 9, at 4 o'clock.

Leave Washington, B. & O. R. R., at 6.20, P.M.

Arrive Baltimore, at 7.20 P. M.

Concert at Music Hall, Mount Royal Avenue and Cathedral St., Wednesday, November 10, at 8, P.M.

Hotel baggage not ready directly after the concert will be moved at owner's expense.

Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station, B. & O. R. R., Wednesday, November 10, at midnight. Sleeping cars ready at 10, P.M.

Arrive New York, Depot Central R.R. of N J., Thursday, November 11, at 7, A.M.

NEW YORK ADDRESS, METROPOLITAN OPERA HOUSE.

Concert at Metropolitan Opera House, at 8, P.M.

Matinee at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Friday, November 12, at 3.

Concert at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Saturday, November 13, at 8, P.M.

Leave New York, Grand Central Depot, Saturday, November 13, at midnight.

Hotel baggage will be collected after the concert Saturday night.

Arrive Boston Sunday, November 14, at 7 A.M. Providence Depot.

Instruments must be ready and marked to-night, (Saturday), after the Concert.

C. A. ELLIS, MANAGER.
F. R. COMEE, ASS'T MANAGER.

SATURDAY, November 6, 1897.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

SEVENTEENTH SEASON, 1897-98.

1527th TO 1532d CONCERT.

DECEMBER ITINERARY.

Leave Boston Sunday, December 12, at 7, P. M. Providence Depot.

Arrive Philadelphia, Broad Street Station Penna. R. R, Monday, December 13, at 7 A.M.

CONTINENTAL HOTEL.

Rehearsal at Academy of Music at 5 P. M.

Concert at Academy of Music at 8, P.M.

Hotel baggage not ready directly after the concert will be moved at owner's expense.

Leave Philadelphia. Tuesday, December 14, Baltimore & Ohio R. R., Twenty-fourth and Chestnut Sts., at 10.22, A.M.

Arrive Washington, B. & O. R. R. at 1.40 P.M.

Matinee at Lafayette Square Opera House, Tuesday, December 14, at 4 o'clock.

Leave Washington, B. & O. R. R., at 6.20, P.M.

Arrive Baltimore, at 7.20 P. M.

Concert at Music Hall, Mount Royal Avenue and Cathedral St., Wednesday, December 15, at 8, P.M.

Hotel baggage not ready directly after the concert will be moved at owner's expense.

Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station, B. & O. R. R., Wednesday, December 15, at midnight. Sleeping cars ready at 10, P.M.

Arrive New York, Depot Central R.R. of N. J., Thursday, December 16, at 7, A.M.

NEW YORK ADDRESS, METROPOLITAN OPERA HOUSE.

Rehearsal at Chickering Hall, Fifth Avenue and Eighteenth Streets, at 12, noon.

Concert at Metropolitan Opera House, at 8, P.M.

Matinee at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Friday, December 17, at 3.

Concert at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Saturday, December 18, at 8, P.M.

Leave New York, Grand Central Depot, Saturday, December 18, at midnight.

Hotel baggage will be collected after the concert Saturday night.

Arrive Boston Sunday, December 19, at 7 A.M. Providence Depot.

Instruments must be ready and marked to-night (Saturday), after the Concert.

C. A. ELLIS, MANAGER.
F. R. COMEE, ASS'T MANAGER.

SATURDAY, December 11, 1897.

The usual rehearsals in Boston will be held on Monday and Tuesday, December 20 and 21, with performances Wednesday afternoon, December 22, and Thursday evening, December 23, on account of Christmas.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

SEVENTEENTH SEASON, 1897-98.

1559th TO 1564th CONCERT.

FEBRUARY ITINERARY.

Leave Boston Sunday. February 13, at 7, P. M. Providence Depot.

Arrive Philadelphia. Broad Street Station Penna. R. R, Monday, February 14, at 7 A.M.

CONTINENTAL HOTEL.

Concert at Academy of Music at 8, P.M.

Hotel baggage not ready directly after the concert will be moved at owner's expense.

Leave Philadelphia. Tuesday, February 15, Baltimore & Ohio R. R., Twenty-fourth and Chestnut Sts., at 10.22, A.M.

Arrive Washington, B. & O. R. R. at 1.40 P.M

Matinee at Lafayette Square Opera House, Tuesday, February 15, at 4 o'clock.

Leave Washington, B. & O. R. R., at 6.20, P.M.

Arrive Baltimore, at 7.20 P. M.

Concert at Music Hall, Mount Royal Avenue and Cathedral St., Wednesday, February 16, at 8, P.M.

Hotel baggage not ready directly after the concert will be moved at owner's expense

Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station, B. & O. R. R., Wednesday, February 16, at midnight. Sleeping cars ready at 10, P. M.

Arrive New York, Depot Central R.R. of N.J., Thursday, February 17, at 7, A.M.

NEW YORK ADDRESS, METROPOLITAN OPERA HOUSE.

Concert at Metropolitan Opera House, at 8, P.M.

Matinee at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Friday, February 18, at 3.

Concert at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Saturday, February 19, at 8, P.M.

Leave New York, Grand Central Depot, Saturday, February 19, at midnight.

Hotel baggage will be collected after the concert Saturday night.

Arrive Boston Sunday, February 20, at 7 A.M. Providence Depot.

Instruments must be ready and marked to-night (Saturday), after the Concert.

C. A. ELLIS, MANAGER.
F. R. COMEE, ASS'T MANAGER.

SATURDAY, February 12, 1898.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

SEVENTEENTH SEASON, 1897-98.

1576th TO 1581st CONCERT.

MARCH ITINERARY.

Leave Boston Sunday, March 20, at 7, P. M. Providence Depot.

Arrive Philadelphia, Broad Street Station Penna. R. R., Monday, March 21, at 7 A.M.

CONTINENTAL HOTEL.

Concert at Academy of Music at 8, P.M.

Hotel baggage not ready directly after the concert will be moved at owner's expense.

Leave Philadelphia, Tuesday, March 22, Baltimore & Ohio R. R., Twenty-fourth and Chestnut Sts., at 10.22, A.M.

Arrive Washington, B. & O. R. R. at 1.40 P.M

Matinee at Lafayette Square Opera House, Tuesday, March 22, at 4 o'clock.

Leave Washington, B. & O. R. R., at 6.20, P.M.

Arrive Baltimore, at 7.20 P. M.

Concert at Music Hall, Mount Royal Avenue and Cathedral St., Wednesday, March 23, at 8, P.M.

Hotel baggage not ready directly after the concert will be moved at owner's expense.

Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station, B. & O. R. R., Wednesday, March 23, at midnight. Sleeping cars ready at 10, P. M.

Arrive New York, Depot Central R.R. of N.J., Thursday, March 24, at 7, A.M.

NEW YORK ADDRESS, METROPOLITAN OPERA HOUSE.

Concert at Metropolitan Opera House, at 8, P.M.

Matinee at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Friday, March 25, at 3.

Concert at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Saturday, March 26, at 8, P.M.

Leave New York, Grand Central Depot, Saturday, March 26, at midnight.

Hotel baggage will be collected after the concert Saturday night.

Arrive Boston Sunday, March 27, at 7 A.M. Providence Depot.

Instruments must be ready and marked to-night (Saturday), after the Concert.

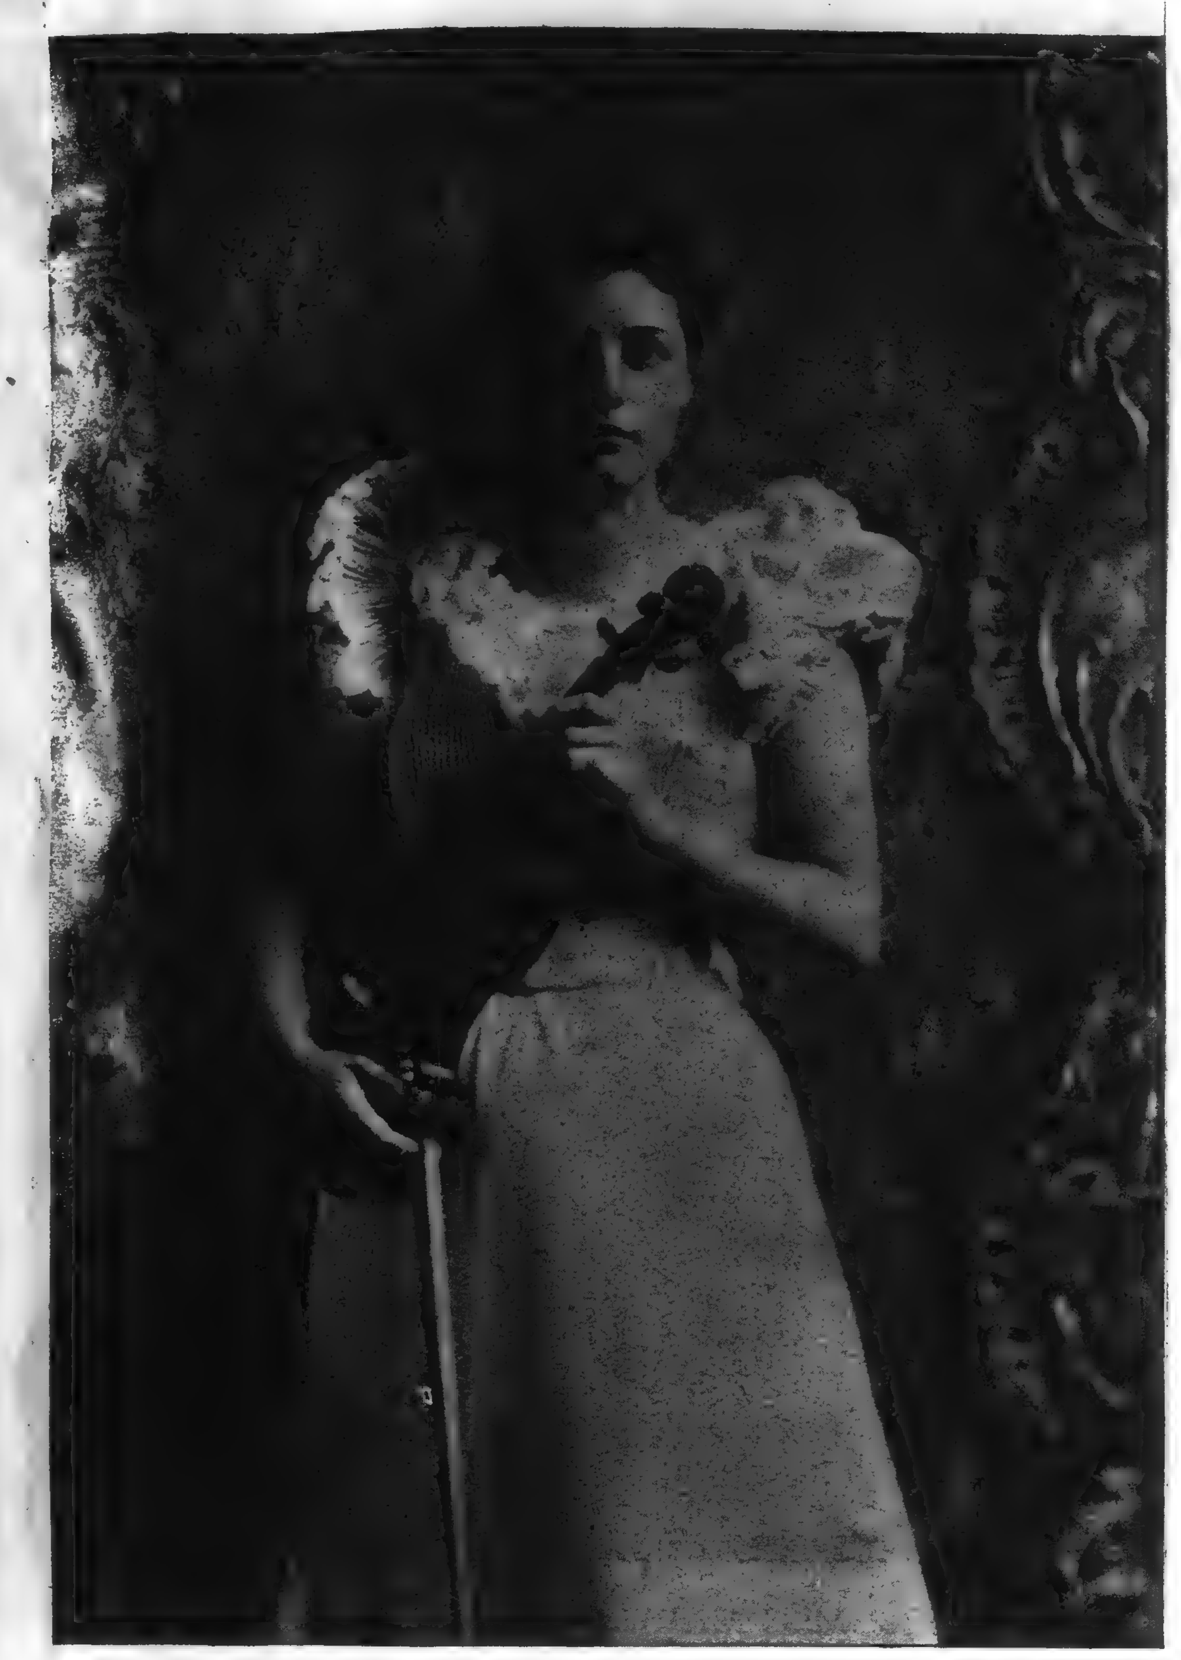
C. A. ELLIS, MANAGER.
F. R. COMEE, ASS'T MANAGER.

SATURDAY, March 19, 1898.

BLANK PAGE

The Boston Sunday Journal
PRESENTS FREE TO ITS READERS EACH WEEK
The New England Home Magazine,
The two being combined, for the price of five cents, to Sunday Journal readers exclusively.

A TALENTED CAMBRIDGE GIRL.



MISS OLIVE MEAD,

Who has just had the honor of appearing as solo violinist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. (See page 204.)

Olive Mead (whose portrait is on page 222), who was solo violinist at a Symphony concert last week, enjoys the distinction of being the first violinist to appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra whose musical education has been acquired in this country. It is ten years since any "girl violinist" has been presented by that organization, and Miss Mead is, indeed, the third woman soloist who has ever played with the Symphony.

She was born in Cambridge, Mass. At the age of 7 she began the serious tudy of the violin. After several ears' instruction by the late Julius ichberg, she passed under the torage of Franz Kneisel, concert aster of the Boston Symphony Or-hestra.

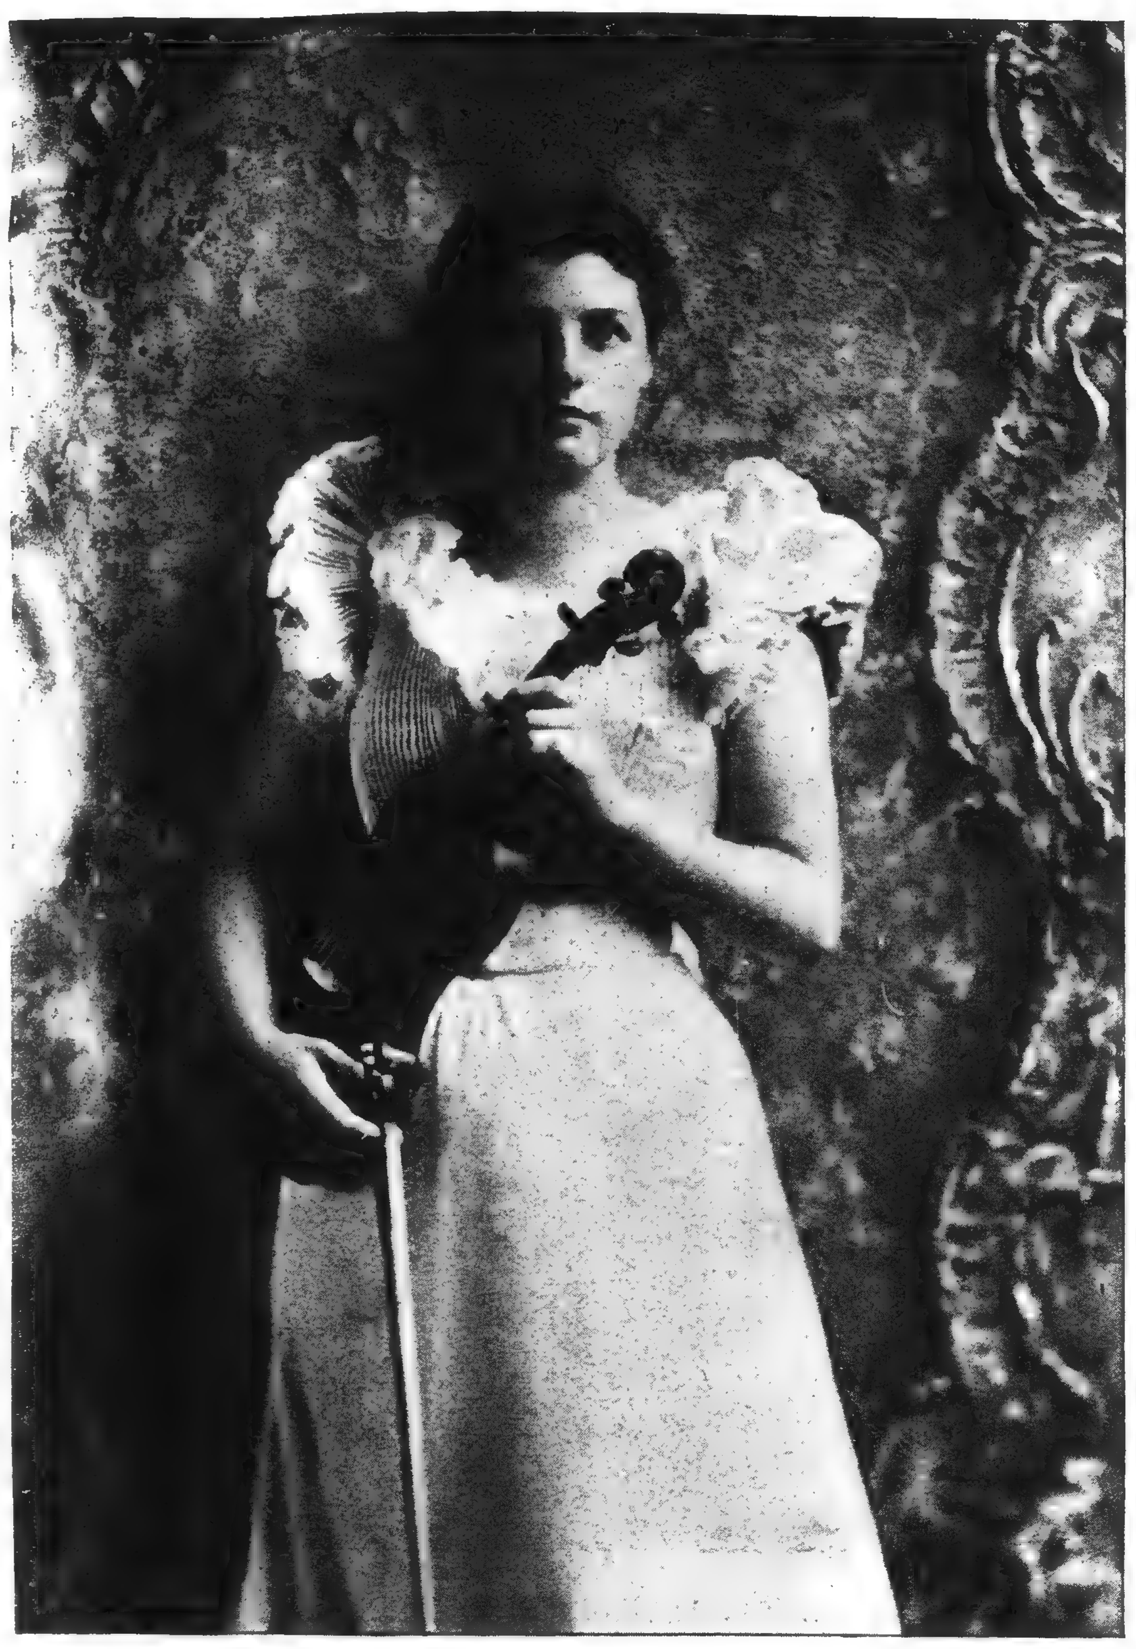
Although her education may be called purely American, she has visited the musical centres of Europe and formed the acquaintance of their leading musicians, composers and performers. Among them was the late Johannes Brahms, whose friendship and admiration she enjoyed, and with whom she had correspondence until the time of his death, last year.

She has had the pleasure of appearing with the New York Symphony Orchestra, the New York German Liederkranz, the New York Manuscript Society, the Boylston Club and Cecelia of Boston and many other organizations throughout the country.

Her life-size portrait by W. A. J. Claus is now in the exhibition of the Boston Art Club.

The Boston Sunday Journal
PRESENTS FREE TO ITS READERS EACH WEEK
The New England Home Magazine,
the two being combined, for the price of five cents, to Sunday Journal readers exclusively.

A TALENTED CAMBRIDGE GIRL.



MISS OLIVE MEAD,

Who has just had the honor of appearing as solo violinist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. (See page 204.)

Olive Mead (whose portrait is on page 229), who was solo violinist at the Symphony concert last week, enjoys the distinction of being the first violinist to appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra whose musical education has been acquired in this country. It is ten years since any "girl violinist" has been presented by that organization, and Miss Mead is, indeed, the third woman soloist who has ever played with the Symphony.

She was born in Cambridge, Mass. At the age of 7 she began the serious study of the violin. After several years' instruction by the late Julius Eichberg, she passed under the tutorage of Franz Kneisel, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Although her education may be called purely American, she has visited the musical centres of Europe and formed the acquaintance of their leading musicians, composers and performers. Among them was the late Johannes Brahms, whose friendship and admiration she enjoyed, and with whom she had correspondence until the time of his death, last year.

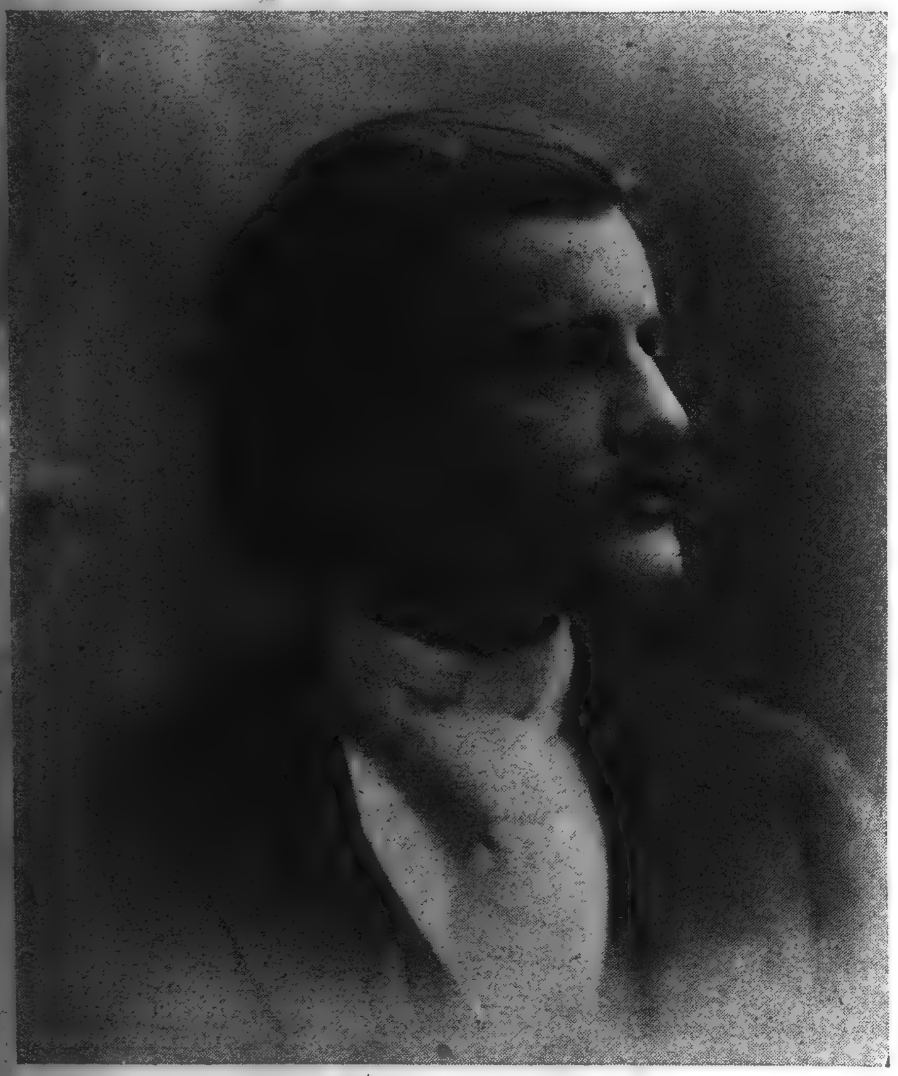
She has had the pleasure of appearing with the New York Symphony Orchestra, the New York German Liederkranz, the New York Manuscript Society, the Boylston Club and Cecelia of Boston and many other organizations throughout the country.

Her life-size portrait by W. A. J. Claus is now in the exhibition of the Boston Art Club.

[14]

MRS. HENSCHEL,
Soprano.

MME. MELBA.
Soprano.

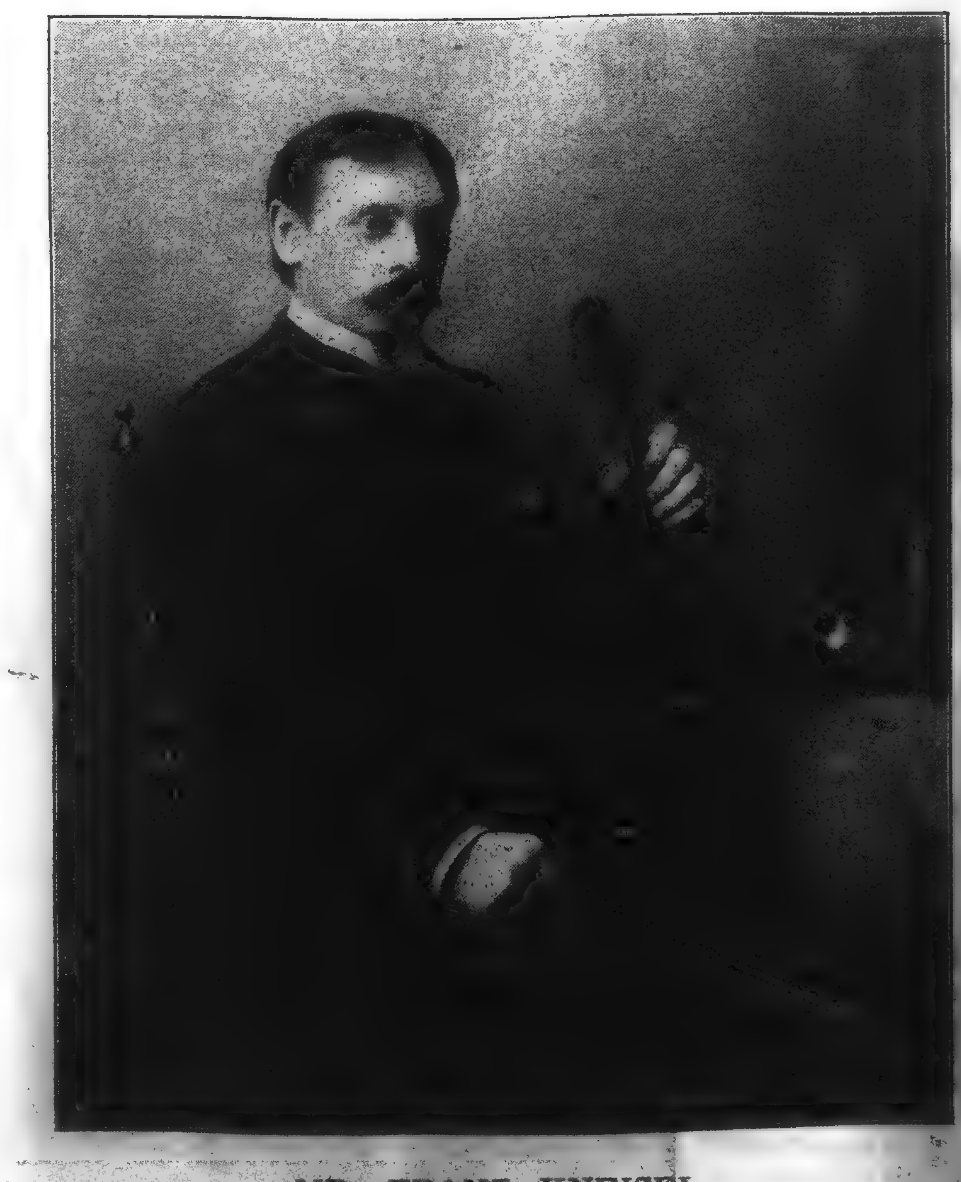


MR. MORITZ ROSENTHAL,
Pianist.

MR. EMIL PAUR,
Conductor Boston Symphony Orchestra.

MR. DAVID BISPHAM,
Baritone.

MR. RAFAEL JOSEFFY,
Pianist.

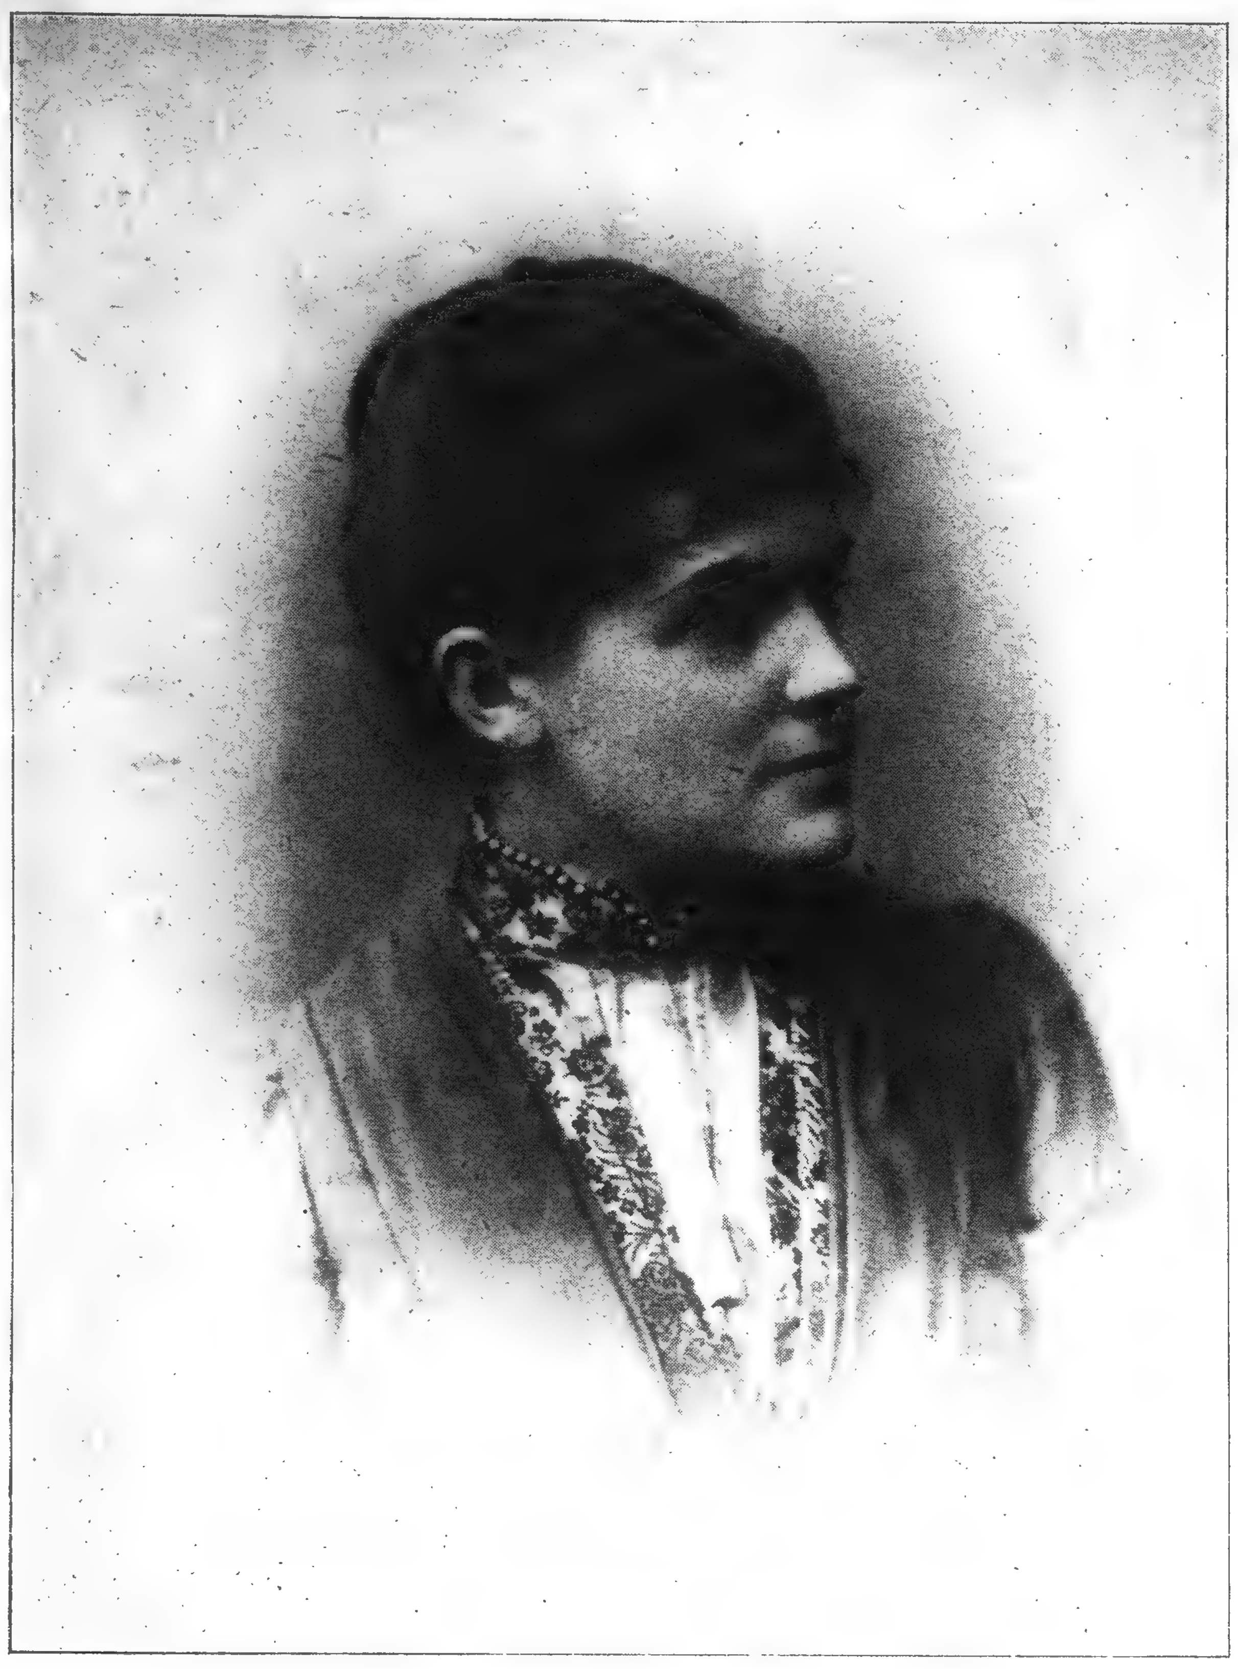


MR. FRANZ KNEISEL,
Violinist.

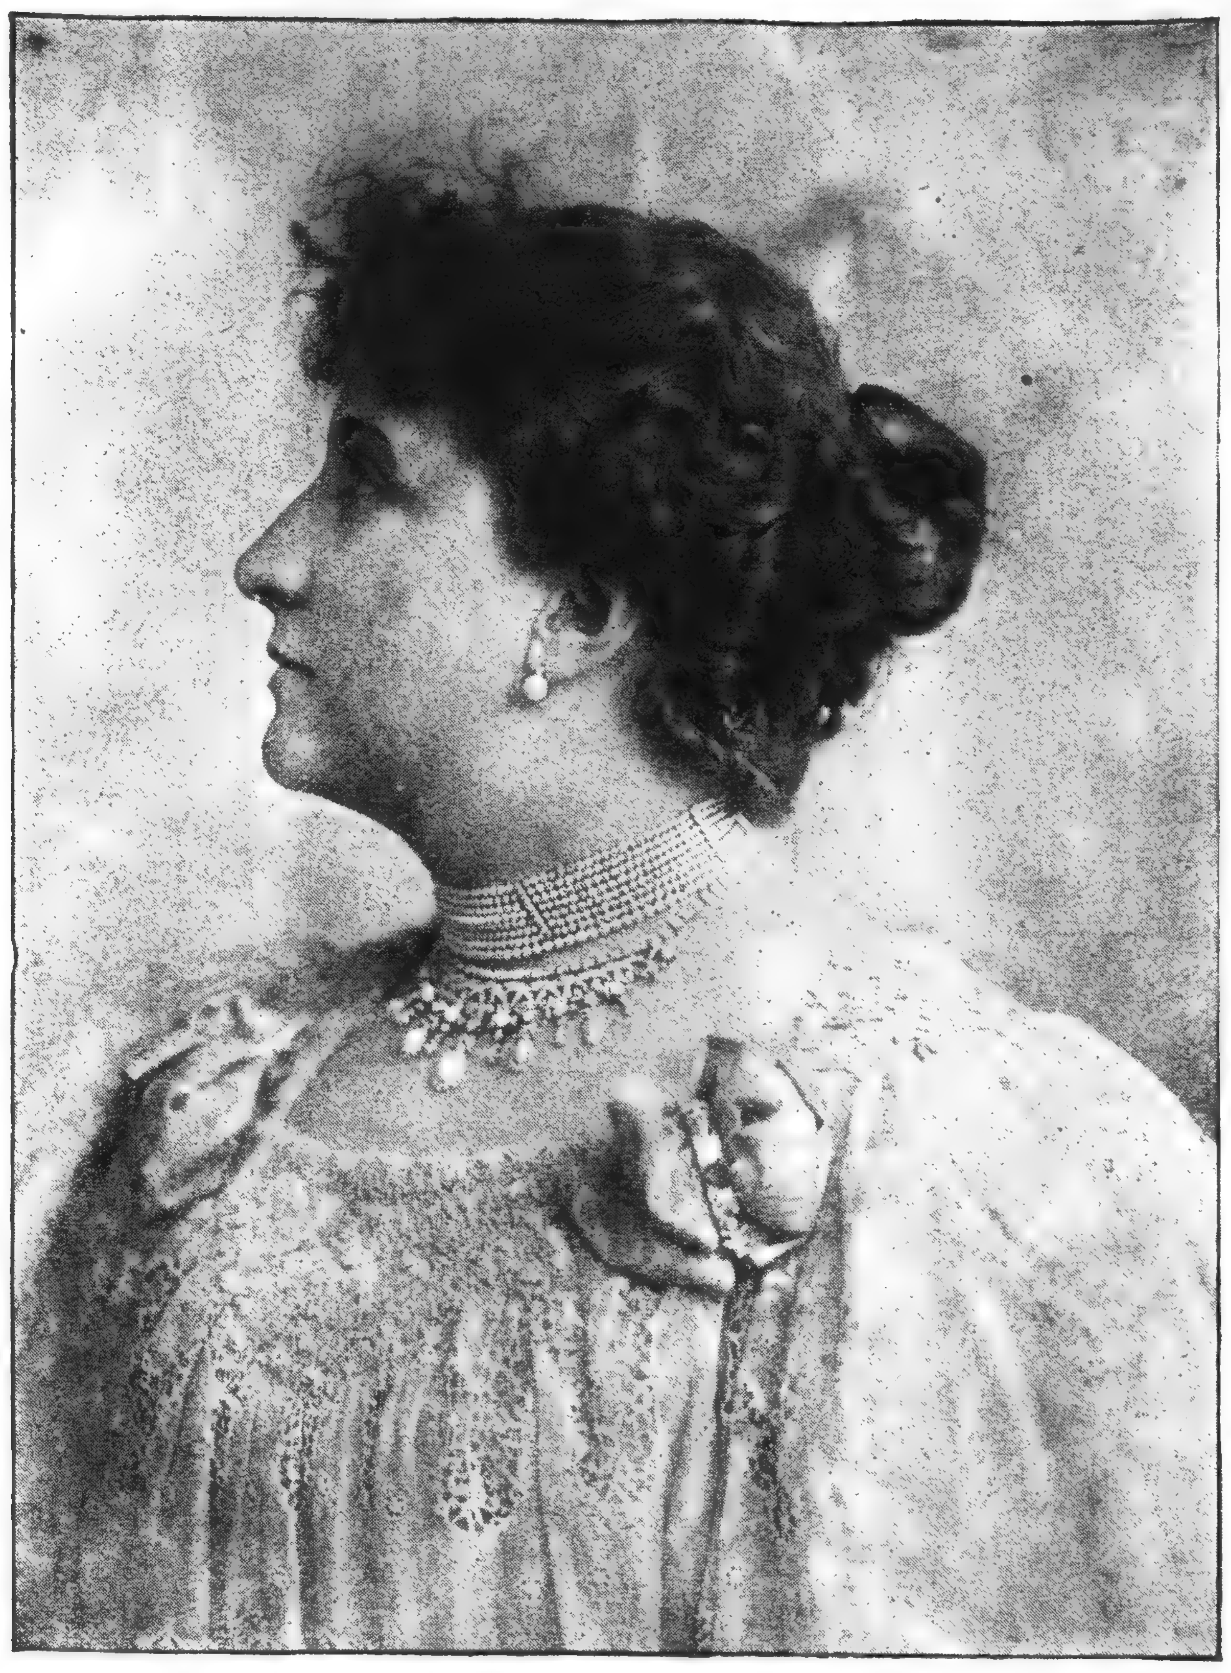
ARTISTS OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

TO BE HEARD WITH THE ORCHESTRA DURING THE COMING SEASON.

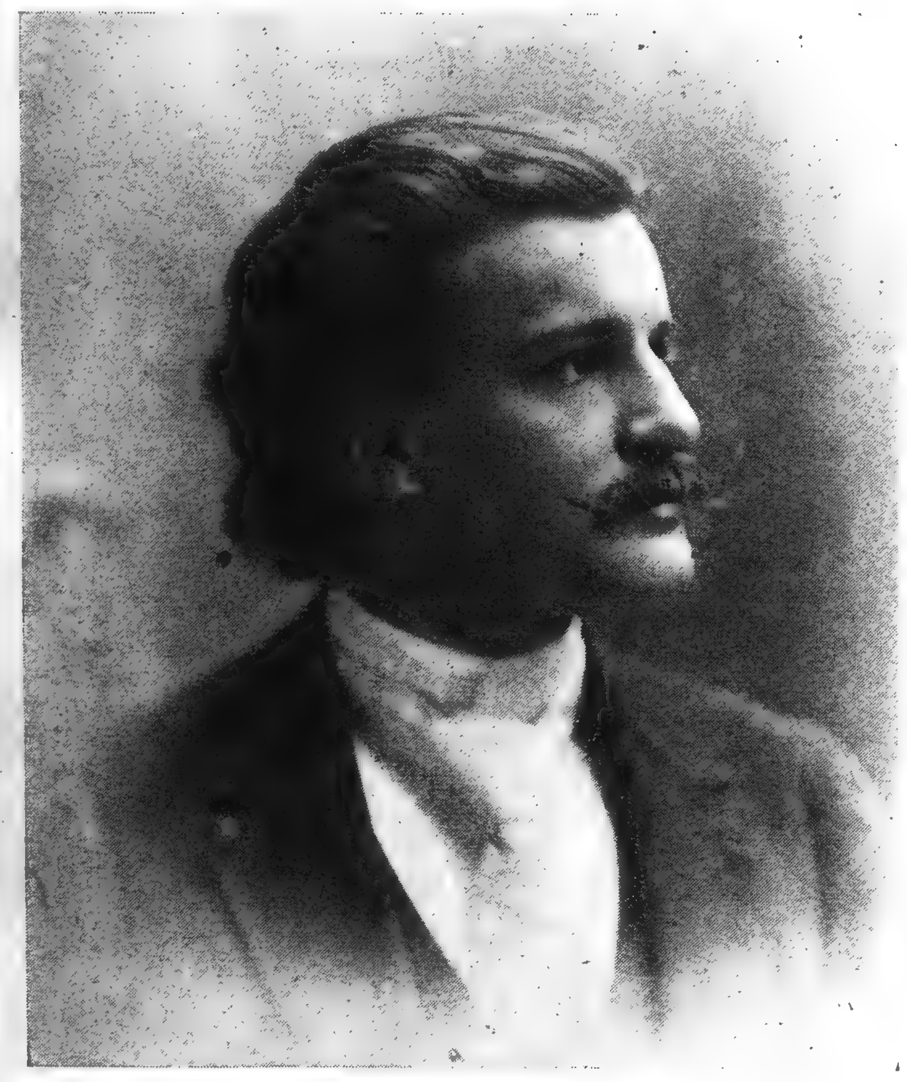
[15]



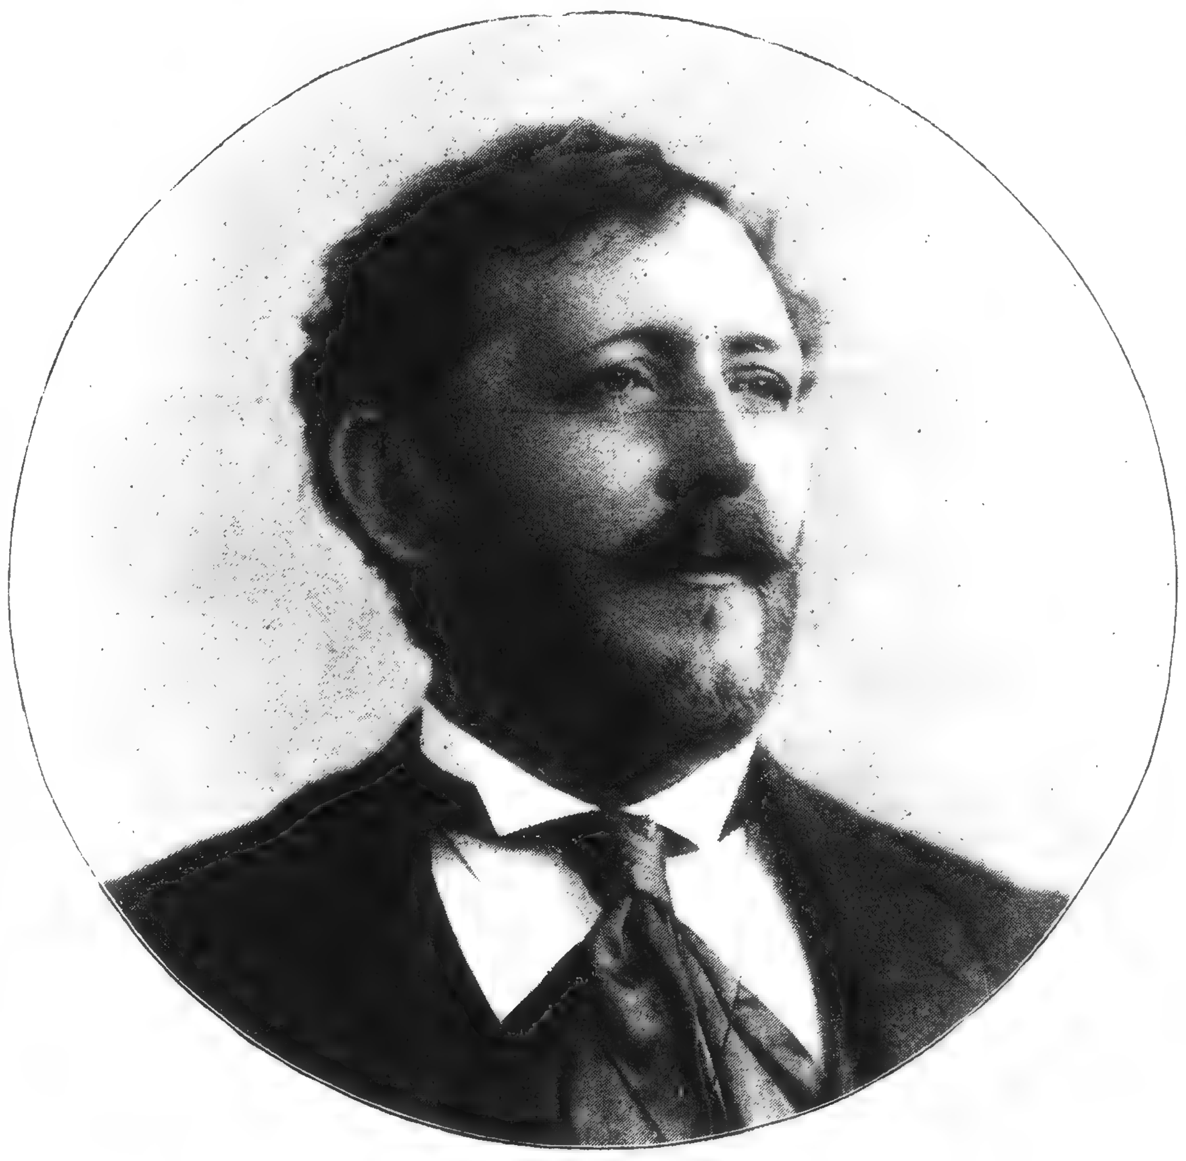
MRS. HENSCHEL,
Soprano.



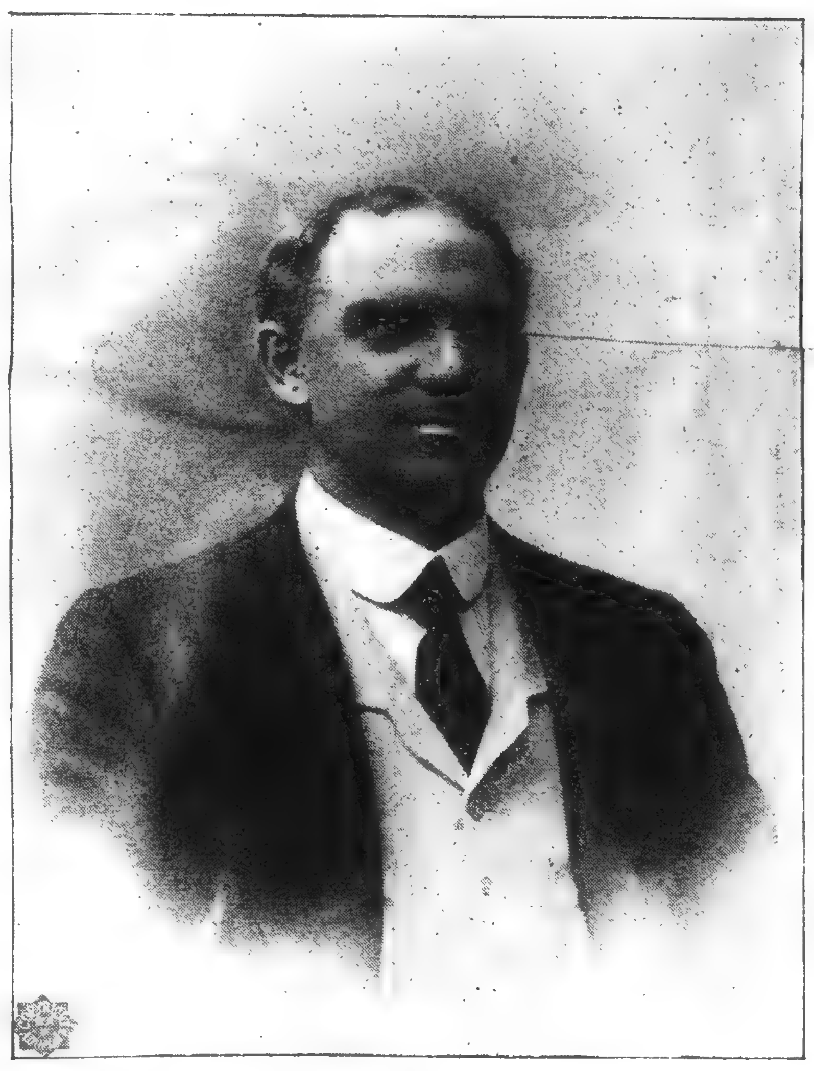
MME. MELBA.
Soprano.



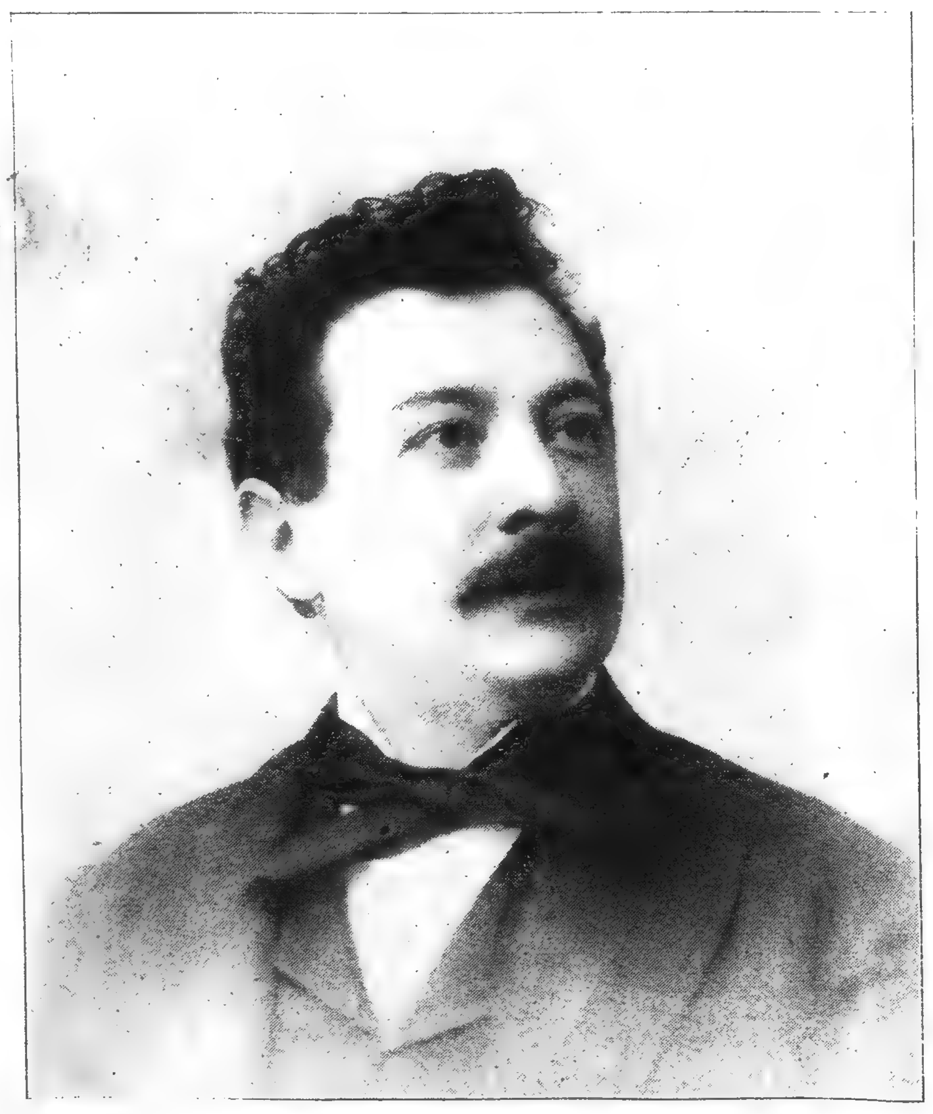
MR. MORITZ ROSENTHAL,
Pianist.



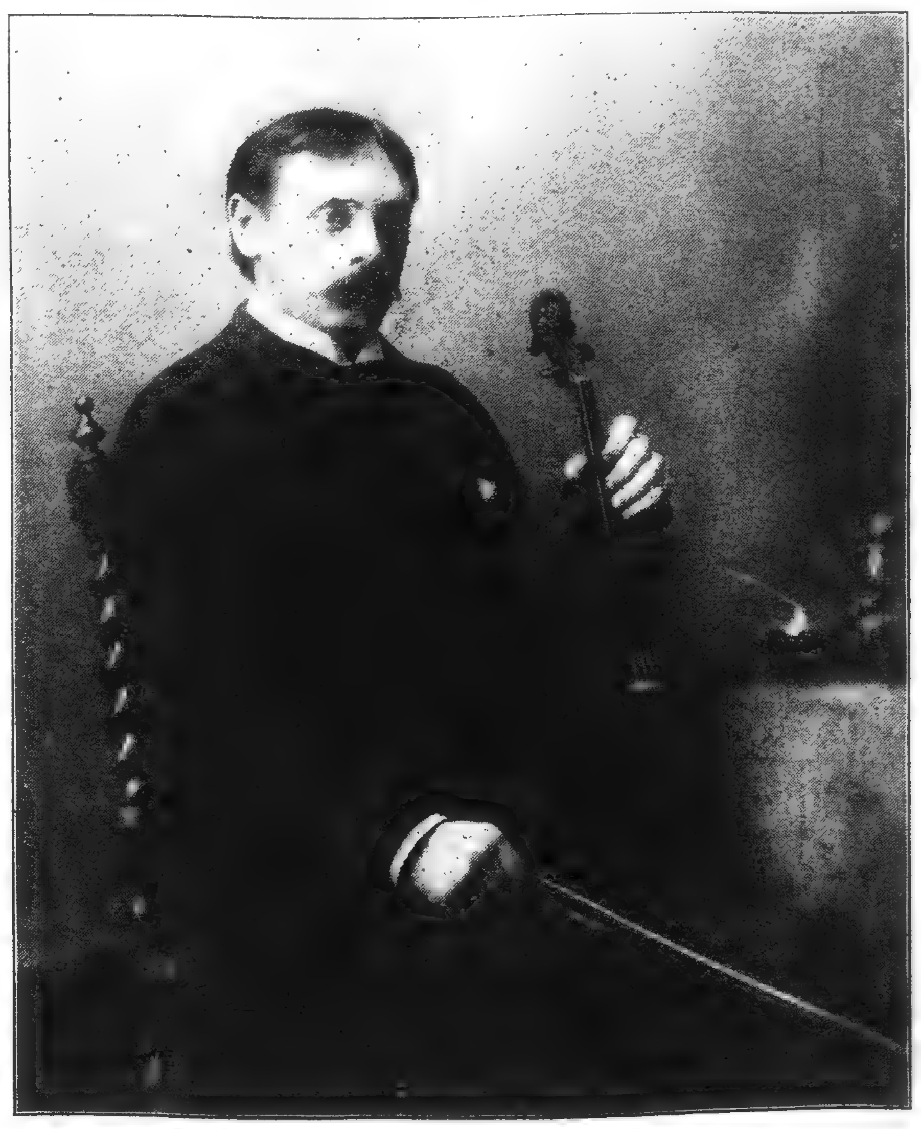
MR. EMIL PAUR,
Conductor Boston Symphony Orchestra.



MR. DAVID BISPHAM,
Baritone.



MR. RAFAEL JOSEFFY,
Pianist.



MR. FRANZ KNEISEL,
Violinist.

ARTISTS OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

TO BE HEARD WITH THE ORCHESTRA DURING THE COMING SEASON.

rcester Daily
Of[illegible] 444 Main St., opp., City Hall,
WORCESTER MASS.
SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 11, 1897.

We have received the following pleasant little note apropos of the coming musical season in Boston from Miss Mabel A. Cowie:

To the casual observant visitor, Boston would not appear especially musical at present, as all the musical people and instructors are still out of town and nothing of a musical character is going on; but the different directors and managers are beginning to whisper things promising a very brilliant season. A visit to Mr. Comee, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, found him well and good natured, as usual, and busy with the programs which will appear next week. The preliminary announcement for the season of 1897-98 will appear in next Sunday's issue of the Boston papers.

Musical people and patrons of the Symphony course arranging musicales, parties, etc., will be glad to know in advance that the weeks when the orchestra will be out of Boston making annual tours will be the weeks of Nov. 13-14, Dec. 11-12, Jan. 22-23, Feb. 26-27 and March 26-27, when rehearsals and concerts will of course be omitted.

Boston Journal.
SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 12, 1897.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Few organizations, if any, can show a record of continuous success equal to that of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Year after year its concerts maintain the highest standard of musical excellence, and its patrons look forward to them with pleasant expectations which never fail to be realized. Each season they provide a hearing of many standard orchestral works, all important novelties and incidentally the leading solo artists who are in the country. The orchestra enters upon its 17th season this autumn, and the same liberal policy that has brought success in the past will be followed. The list of soloists engaged is a very attractive one, and will be announced during the coming week. Twenty-four concerts will be given in Music Hall Saturday evenings, beginning Oct. 16, and 24 public rehearsals Friday afternoon, beginning Oct 15. One week in November, December, January, February and March will be devoted to the customary series of performances in New York and other cities, and in these weeks the Boston concerts will be omitted. The sale of season tickets will be by auction, and will be held in Music Hall on Monday, Tuesday, Thursday and Friday, Sept. 27, 28, 30 and Oct 1.

SUNDAY HERALD
SEPTEMBER 12,

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

For the 17th time the Boston Symphony orchestra announces its annual series of concerts at Boston Music Hall. It required but a few seasons for this organization to establish itself firmly in the favor of the musical public, and the unfailing popularity that it has since enjoyed is world famous. This popularity is not confined to the city of its birth, but is equally marked in New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, Providence, and wherever the orchestra is known. The same policy that has brought success in the past is to be followed during the season of 1897-98 which will soon begin. Twenty-four concerts will be given on Saturday evenings beginning Oct. 16, and 24 public rehearsals on Friday afternoons beginning Oct. 15. One week in November, December, January, February and March will be devoted to the customary series of concerts in other cities, and in these weeks the Boston performances will, of course, be omitted. The list of soloists for this season, which will shortly be announced, is a very strong one, and includes many of the foremost artists of the profession. The sales of season tickets will be by auction, and will be held at Music Hall on Monday, Tuesday, Thursday and Friday, Sept. 27, 28, 30 and Oct. 1.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, SEPT. 12, 1897.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

On Monday, Sept 27, the opening day of the "symphony sale," the keynote of the musical year in Boston will be sounded for the 17th consecutive season. The first public rehearsal on Friday afternoon, Oct 15, will be the 1500th performance by the Boston Symphony orchestra and the 801st performance in Boston. Such totals as these, with the slight changes in the personnel of the orchestra in the past 10 years, explain the high musical rank of the organization and establish its claim to be the leading factor in the musical history of the country.

Boston is justly proud of its Symphony orchestra, and shows the sincerity of its appreciation each September by contributions to its maintenance at a sale which in spirit, loyalty and enthusiasm has no parallel in the world, and all because of the integrity of the institution and the absolute confidence that a fair return will be realized on the investment.

The coming season will be as attractive as ever in the performance of new works, soloists of renown and the constant and unremitting effort in the direction of perfect ensemble which always obtains with the Boston Symphony orchestra. Complete details will be published the coming week. Twenty-four concerts and 24 public rehearsals will be given as usual at Music hall. The sales of season tickets will be by auction, and will be held on Monday, Tuesday, Thursday and Friday, Sept 27, 28, 30 and Oct 1.

BOSTON POST.
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.
SUNDAY MORNING, SEPTEMBER 12, 1897.
(Copyright, 1897, Post Publishing Company.)

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The numerous inquiries received at Music Hall both by mail and in person indicate very plainly the widespread interest in the dates of the auction sales of season tickets for the twenty-four public rehearsals on Friday afternoons and the twenty-four concerts on Saturday evenings by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the coming season of 1897-98, the seventeenth year of the orchestra.

The rehearsal tickets will be sold on Monday and Tuesday, Sept. 27 and 28, the concert tickets on Thursday and Friday, Sept. 30 and Oct. 1. That each new season shall be at least the equal of its predecessors in all the features which combine to make it a brilliant success is the constant aim and effort of the management.

To ask that the orchestra itself shall be any better is almost unreasonable, yet Conductor Paur will strive to raise the standard of performance even higher than before. A list of soloists surpassing all that have gone before is assured, and a glance at the programmes already prepared reveals a sufficient number of brilliant novelties to satisfy the devotees of modern composition. Full details will be published during the coming week, and the patrons of these concerts, many of them from the very outset, in 1881, will find the season of 1897-98 equal in every way to their desires.

HOME JOURNAL
A PAPER OF TO-DAY
SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 18, 1897.

EMIL PAUR.

ON the first page of this issue of the HOME JOURNAL is shown the portrait of a man just now very much in the public mind. This is Emil Paur, at the waving of whose baton the Symphony concerts for the season of 1897–8 will begin. Mr. Paur has become a feature of Boston since his coming here in 1893. He is by birth an Austrian and came into the world July 29, 1855, at Czerowitz, Austria, being the son of Franz and Emilie (Ruah) Paur.

Of musical family—for his father was a pupil of Czerny, a conductor and also a teacher of music—young Paur began his musical studies early at home. In time he became a pupil at the Vienna Conservatory, studying the violin with Hellmesberger and composition with Dessoff. High honors were his when he graduated from the conservatory; he received the first prize and the large medal, and secured the position of first violin in the orchestra of the Vienna Opera House.

Although a fine player, his great talent for conducting was soon noticed, and he was appointed to conduct a great performance of a new oratorio, "Die Sieben Todsunden," in Berlin. His success was such that, though only twenty-one, he was given the position of court conductor at Cassell in 1876. Then came a higher offer from Königsberg, which he accepted, and a short time after—in 1880, to be accurate—he was made first conductor and director of the Abonnements Konzerte and the court theatre at Mannheim.

For nine years he remained at the last-named place, winning constantly increasing renown. He became widely known as a pianist, a violinist and a composer of songs as well as of pieces for the various instruments of which he was master. In 1891 he went to Leipzig as first conductor at the opera. He was already well known personally in that city, where he had conducted many concerts.

At Leipzig the plans were made which resulted in his removal to America. His services were secured by Mr. Henry L. Higginson, he being engaged to succeed Mr. Nikisch as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The interest felt in this city, and indeed throughout musical circles all over the country, when this engagement was announced was great, for Mr. Paur's fame had preceded him. His début in Boston was made Oct. 13, 14, 1893. It was seen at once that he was in every way able to perform the duties to which he had been called. At this present beginning of his fifth season the interest felt in the concerts is shared in large proportion by the personal regard in which Mr. Paur is held.

On Jan. 29, 1882, Mr. Paur was married to Marie Burger, whom he met at Mannheim when she was a pupil of Leschetitzky in Vienna. Mrs. Paur is a fine pianist, and occasionally consents to play in public to the great delight of lovers of fine music. The Paurs are extremely domestic in taste. They live quietly in an artistic home, and Mr. Paur belongs to no organizations other than musical. Their home is brightened by two clever boys, Hans and Kurt Paur.

THE BOSTON TIMES
BOSTON, SUNDAY, SEPT. 19, 1897.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Plans for the Coming Season—The Auction Sale of Seats.

The arrangements for the new season of the Symphony orchestra, make it certain that Boston will continue to enjoy a series of orchestral concerts that can be equalled in no other city. Mr. Paur will enter upon his fifth year as conductor, and those who have seen his scheme for the coming season pronounce it superior to any he has heretofore planned. A goodly number of interesting novelties and a wide variety of standard works are promised. The orchestra will be the same as last year in size and membership. The assistance of many of the best solo artists who are to be in the country has been secured, and none of the attractive features of past seasons will be lacking. Twenty-four concerts will be given on Saturday evenings and twenty-four public rehearsals on Friday afternoons, beginning Oct. 15. The sales of season tickets will be by auction, and will be held at Music hall.

The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music hall, Monday, Sept. 27, at 10 a. m. The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction. at Music hall, Tuesday, Sept. 28, at 10 a. m. The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold at auction, at Music hall, Thursday, Sept. 30, at 10 a. m. The $7.50 seats for the concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place, Friday, Oct 1, at 10 a.m.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they wil be immediately resold.

Among the soloists at this year's concerts will be Mme. Melba, Mme. Nordica, Mrs. Henschel, Rosenthal Joseffy, Siloti, a pianist who comes for the first time to win the approval of American audiences; Mrs. Bloomfield-Ziesler, Miss Wienzkowska, Miss Olive Mead, Miss Titus, Messrs. Kneisel, Loeffler, Adamowski, Schnitzler, Schroeder and Schultz.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, SEPT. 20, 1897.

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Oct. 15 is the date fixed for the first performance of the coming season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, whose Friday afternoon and Saturday evening performances at Music Hall will once more be the principal feature of the musical year. No organization enjoys greater favor with the public and its constantly growing popularity is a tribute to its proficiency in its art. The arrangements now completed for these concerts leave nothing to be desired, and subscribers will enjoy all the attractive features for which they have become famous.

Conductor Paur, desirous of making his fifth season memorable, has made the arrangement of the programmes the care of his summer days. He will present a carefully selected variety of ever-welcome standard works, and has secured from the great number of novelties submitted to him for examination such as appeal to him as being worthy.

The list of solo artists is by all odds the best ever announced. It includes Melba, Mrs. Henschel, Rosenthal, Joseffy, Siloti, Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler, Miss Wienzkowska, Miss Olive Mead, Miss Titus, and Messrs. Bispham, Kneisel, Loeffler, Adamowski, Schnitzler, Schroder, Schulz, and others. Mr. Siloti and Miss Wienzkowska are pianists of distinction who have never been heard in these concerts. Miss Olive Mead is a young violinist, and Miss Titus is a debutante who is said to possess a voice of great beauty which gives promise of a brilliant career.

Some of the novelties to be presented are: Chabrier's "Espagna" and "Marche Joyeuse," Glazounow's "Poeme Lyrique," Rimsky Korsakoff's "Oster Fest," Tschalkowsky's "Italian Caprice," Richard Strauss's symphonic poem "Zarathustra," and Saint-Saens' symphonic poem "Princess Jaune."

The orchestral numbers of the first four programmes will be:—

1. Oct. 15-16.—Brahms, Academic Ov[illegible]ture; Beethoven, Symphony No. 7 in [illegible] major; Chabrier, "Espagna;" Glazoun[illegible] "Poeme Lyrique;" Wagner, "Kai[illegible]marsch."
2. Oct. 22-23.—Rimsky Korsakoff, "Oster Fest;" Schumann, Symphony No. 1 in B flat; Eschaikowsky, "Italian Caprice."
3. Oct. 29-30.—Richard Strauss, symphonic poem "Zarathustra;" Brahms, Symphony No. 3 in F major; Weber-Weingartner, "Invitation to Dance."
4. Nov. 5-6.—Haydn, Symphony No. 7 in C; Mozart, Serenade; Beethoven, overture, "Lenore," No. 2.

The sales of season tickets will be by auction, and will be held at Music Hall during the week beginning Sept. 27. Although no expense has been spared to keep the concerts up to the modern standard, the prices of tickets will be the same as before, $12 and $7.50 for the series of public rehearsals, and for the series of concerts, according to the location of seats. The $12 season tickets for the public rehearsals will be sold at auction in Music Hall on Monday, Sept. 27; the $7.50 tickets for rehearsals on Tuesday, Sept. 28; the $12 tickets for the Saturday evening concerts on Thursday, Sept. 30, and the $7.50 tickets for the concerts on Friday, Oct. 1.

The sales will begin each day at 10 A. M., and will be conducted by Auctioneer Jackson. Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. A very important detail is that the premium bid will be on each ticket. Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought or they will be resold. The seats open to competition will be shown on a large diagram and will be marked off as soon as sold.

The Beacon.
BOSTON, SATURDAY, SEPT. 18, 1897.

THE SYMPHONIES.

Boston without her Symphony concerts and rehearsals would be worse than "Hamlet" with Hamlet left out; in fact, it would not be Boston at all. We may have to do without opera, but we have twenty-four of the best concerts in the world, and an equal number of rehearsals quite as fine.

Indeed, it is a musical education in itself to attend the course of our Symphony concerts. The orchestra this year will number as fine players as are to be found in the world, and will be led by that most distinguished of conductors, Emil Paur.

The sale of seats will open September 27.

Friday afternoon public rehearsal season tickets will be sold Monday and Tuesday, September 27 and 28; and Saturday evening concert tickets on Thursday and Friday, September 30 and October 1.

The rehearsals will begin October 15, and the Saturday evening concerts on October 16. But the sale of seats opens at Music Hall week after next.

SATURDAY EVENING
Gazette
BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, SEPT. 19.

The seventeenth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra begins on Friday afternoon, Oct. 15. The auction sale of $12 seats for rehearsals will take place in Music Hall on Monday, Sept. 27, at 10 A. M.; for the $7.50 seats for rehearsals, Tuesday, Sept. 28, at 10 A. M. The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place on Thursday, Sept. 30, at 10 A. M.; and the $7.50 seats for the concerts on Friday, Oct. 1, at 10 A. M. Bids are for the seats in their order and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. Tickets must be paid for as soon as bought or they will be immediately resold.

Worcester Daily Spy.

Office 444 Main St., opp., City Hall,
WORCESTER MASS.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 11, 1897.

We have received the following pleasant little note apropos of the coming musical season in Boston from Miss Mabel A. Cowie:

To the casual observant visitor, Boston would not appear especially musical at present, as all the musical people and instructors are still out of town and nothing of a musical character is going on; but the different directors and managers are beginning to whisper things promising a very brilliant season. A visit to Mr. Comee, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, found him well and good natured, as usual, and busy with the programs which will appear next week. The preliminary announcement for the season of 1897-98 will appear in next Sunday's issue of the Boston papers.

Musical people and patrons of the Symphony course arranging musicales, parties, etc., will be glad to know in advance that the weeks when the orchestra will be out of Boston making annual tours will be the weeks of Nov. 13-14, Dec. 11-12, Jan. 22-23, Feb. 26-27 and March 26-27, when rehearsals and concerts will of course be omitted.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 12, 1897.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Few organizations, if any, can show a record of continuous success equal to that of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Year after year its concerts maintain the highest standard of musical excellence, and its patrons look forward to them with pleasant expectations which never fail to be realized. Each season they provide a hearing of many standard orchestral works, all important novelties and incidentally the leading solo artists who are in the country. The orchestra enters upon its 17th season this autumn, and the same liberal policy that has brought success in the past will be followed. The list of soloists engaged is a very attractive one, and will be announced during the coming week. Twenty-four concerts will be given in Music Hall Saturday evenings, beginning Oct. 16, and 24 public rehearsals Friday afternoon, beginning Oct 15. One week in November, December, January, February and March will be devoted to the customary series of performances in New York and other cities, and in these weeks the Boston concerts will be omitted. The sale of season tickets will be by auction, and will be held in Music Hall on Monday, Tuesday, Thursday and Friday, Sept. 27, 28, 30 and Oct 1.

SUNDAY HERALD

SEPTEMBER 12,

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

For the 17th time the Boston Symphony orchestra announces its annual series of concerts at Boston Music Hall. It required but a few seasons for this organization to establish itself firmly in the favor of the musical public, and the unfailing popularity that it has since enjoyed is world famous. This popularity is not confined to the city of its birth, but is equally marked in New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, Providence, and wherever the orchestra is known. The same policy that has brought success in the past is to be followed during the season of 1897-98 which will soon begin. Twenty-four concerts will be given on Saturday evenings beginning Oct. 16, and 24 public rehearsals on Friday afternoons beginning Oct. 15. One week in November, December, January, February and March will be devoted to the customary series of concerts in other cities, and in these weeks the Boston performances will, of course, be omitted. The list of soloists for this season, which will shortly be announced, is a very strong one, and includes many of the foremost artists of the profession. The sales of season tickets will be by auction, and will be held at Music Hall on Monday, Tuesday, Thursday and Friday, Sept. 27, 28, 30 and Oct. 1.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, SEPT. 12, 1897.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

On Monday, Sept 27, the opening day of the "symphony sale," the keynote of the musical year in Boston will be sounded for the 17th consecutive season. The first public rehearsal on Friday afternoon, Oct 15, will be the 1500th performance by the Boston Symphony orchestra and the 801st performance in Boston. Such totals as these, with the slight changes in the personnel of the orchestra in the past 10 years, explain the high musical rank of the organization and establish its claim to be the leading factor in the musical history of the country.

Boston is justly proud of its Symphony orchestra, and shows the sincerity of its appreciation each September by contributions to its maintenance at a sale which in spirit, loyalty and enthusiasm has no parallel in the world, and all because of the integrity of the institution and the absolute confidence that a fair return will be realized on the investment.

The coming season will be as attractive as ever in the performance of new works, soloists of renown and the constant and unremitting effort in the direction of perfect ensemble which always obtains with the Boston Symphony orchestra. Complete details will be published the coming week. Twenty-four concerts and 24 public rehearsals will be given as usual at Music hall. The sales of season tickets will be by auction, and will be held on Monday, Tuesday, Thursday and Friday, Sept 27, 28, 30 and Oct 1.

BOSTON POST.
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, SEPTEMBER 12, 1897.
(Copyright, 1897, Post Publishing Company.)

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The numerous inquiries received at Music Hall both by mail and in person indicate very plainly the widespread interest in the dates of the auction sales of season tickets for the twenty-four public rehearsals on Friday afternoons and the twenty-four concerts on Saturday evenings by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the coming season of 1897-98, the seventeenth year of the orchestra.

The rehearsal tickets will be sold on Monday and Tuesday, Sept. 27 and 28, the concert tickets on Thursday and Friday, Sept. 30 and Oct. 1. That each new season shall be at least the equal of its predecessors in all the features which combine to make it a brilliant success is the constant aim and effort of the management.

To ask that the orchestra itself shall be any better is almost unreasonable, yet Conductor Paur will strive to raise the standard of performance even higher than before. A list of soloists surpassing all that have gone before is assured, and a glance at the programmes already prepared reveals a sufficient number of brilliant novelties to satisfy the devotees of modern composition. Full details will be published during the coming week, and the patrons of these concerts, many of them from the very outset, in 1881, will find the season of 1897-98 equal in every way to their desires.

HOME JOURNAL
A PAPER OF TO-DAY

SATURDAY. SEPTEMBER 18, 1897.

EMIL PAUR.

ON the first page of this issue of the HOME JOURNAL is shown the portrait of a man just now very much in the public mind. This is Emil Paur, at the waving of whose baton the Symphony concerts for the season of 1897–8 will begin. Mr. Paur has become a feature of Boston since his coming here in 1893. He is by birth an Austrian and came into the world July 29, 1855, at Czerowitz, Austria, being the son of Franz and Emilie (Ruah) Paur.

Of musical family—for his father was a pupil of Czerny, a conductor and also a teacher of music—young Paur began his musical studies early at home. In time he became a pupil at the Vienna Conservatory, studying the violin with Hellmesberger and composition with Dessoff. High honors were his when he graduated from the conservatory; he received the first prize and the large medal, and secured the position of first violin in the orchestra of the Vienna Opera House.

Although a fine player, his great talent for conducting was soon noticed, and he was appointed to conduct a great performance of a new oratorio, "Die Sieben Todsunden," in Berlin. His success was such that, though only twenty-one, he was given the position of court conductor at Cassell in 1876. Then came a higher offer from Königsberg, which he accepted, and a short time after—in 1880, to be accurate—he was made first conductor and director of the Abonnements Konzerte and the court theatre at Mannheim.

For nine years he remained at the last-named place, winning constantly increasing renown. He became widely known as a pianist, a violinist and a composer of songs as well as of pieces for the various instruments of which he was master. In 1891 he went to Leipzig as first conductor at the opera. He was already well known personally in that city, where he had conducted many concerts.

At Leipzig the plans were made which resulted in his removal to America. His services were secured by Mr. Henry L. Higginson, he being engaged to succeed Mr. Nikisch as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The interest felt in this city, and indeed throughout musical circles all over the country, when this engagement was announced was great, for Mr. Paur's fame had preceded him. His début in Boston was made Oct. 13, 14, 1893. It was seen at once that he was in every way able to perform the duties to which he had been called. At this present beginning of his fifth season the interest felt in the concerts is shared in large proportion by the personal regard in which Mr. Paur is held.

On Jan. 29, 1882, Mr. Paur was married to Marie Burger, whom he met at Mannheim when she was a pupil of Leschetitzky in Vienna. Mrs. Paur is a fine pianist, and occasionally consents to play in public to the great delight of lovers of fine music. The Paurs are extremely domestic in taste. They live quietly in an artistic home, and Mr. Paur belongs to no organizations other than musical. Their home is brightened by two clever boys, Hans and Kurt Paur.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, SEPT. 19, 1897.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Plans for the Coming Season—The Auction Sale of Seats.

The arrangements for the new season of the Symphony orchestra, make it certain that Boston will continue to enjoy a series of orchestral concerts that can be equalled in no other city. Mr. Paur will enter upon his fifth year as conductor, and those who have seen his scheme for the coming season pronounce it superior to any he has heretofore planned. A goodly number of interesting novelties and a wide variety of standard works are promised. The orchestra will be the same as last year in size and membership. The assistance of many of the best solo artists who are to be in the country has been secured, and none of the attractive features of past seasons will be lacking. Twenty-four concerts will be given on Saturday evenings and twenty-four public rehearsals on Friday afternoons, beginning Oct. 15. The sales of season tickets will be by auction, and will be held at Music hall.

The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music hall, Monday, Sept. 27, at 10 a. m. The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction. at Music hall, Tuesday, Sept. 28, at 10 a. m. The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold at auction, at Music hall, Thursday, Sept. 30, at 10 a. m. The $7.50 seats for the concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place, Friday, Oct 1, at 10 a.m.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they wil be immediately resold.

Among the soloists at this year's concerts will be Mme. Melba, Mme. Nordica, Mrs. Henschel, Rosenthal Joseffy, Siloti, a pianist who comes for the first time to win the approval of American audiences; Mrs. Bloomfield-Ziesler, Miss Wienzkowska, Miss Olive Mead, Miss Titus, Messrs. Kneisel, Loeffler, Adamowski, Schnitzler, Schroeder and Schultz.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.

The Official Paper of the City.

MONDAY MORNING, SEPT. 20, 1897.

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Oct. 15 is the date fixed for the first performance of the coming season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, whose Friday afternoon and Saturday evening performances at Music Hall will once more be the principal feature of the musical year. No organization enjoys greater favor with the public and its constantly growing popularity is a tribute to its proficiency in its art. The arrangements now completed for these concerts leave nothing to be desired, and subscribers will enjoy all the attractive features for which they have become famous.

Conductor Paur, desirous of making his fifth season memorable, has made the arrangement of the programmes the care of his summer days. He will present a carefully selected variety of ever-welcome standard works, and has secured from the great number of novelties submitted to him for examination, such as appeal to him as being worthy.

The list of solo artists is by all odds the best ever announced. It includes Melba, Mrs. Henschel, Rosenthal, Joseffy, Siloti, Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler, Miss Wienzkowska, Miss Olive Mead, Miss Titus, and Messrs. Bispham, Kneisel, Loeffler, Adamowski, Schnitzler, Schroder, Schulz, and others. Mr. Siloti and Miss Wienzkowska are pianists of distinction who have never been heard in these concerts. Miss Olive Mead is a young violinist, and Miss Titus is a debutante who is said to possess a voice of great beauty which gives promise of a brilliant career.

Some of the novelties to be presented are: Chabrier's "Espagna" and "Marche Joyeuse," Glazounow's "Poeme Lyrique," Rimsky Korsakoff's "Oster Fest," Tschaikowsky's "Italian Caprice," Richard Strauss's symphonic poem "Zarathustra," and Saint-Saens' symphonic poem "Princess Jaune."

The orchestral numbers of the first fo programmes will be:—

1. Oct. 15-16.—Brahms, Academic Ov ture; Beethoven, Symphony No. 7 in major; Chabrier, "Espagna;" Glazoun "Poeme Lyrique;" Wagner, "Kai marsch."
2. Oct. 22-23.—Rimsky Korsakoff, "Oster Fest;" Schumann, Symphony No. 1 in B flat; Eschaikowsky, "Italian Caprice."
3. Oct. 29-30.—Richard Strauss, symphonic poem "Zarathustra;" Brahms, Symphony No. 3 in F major; Weber-Weingartner, "Invitation to Dance."
4. Nov. 5-6.—Haydn, Symphony No. 7 in C; Mozart, Serenade; Beethoven, overture, "Lenore," No. 2.

The sales of season tickets will be by auction, and will be held at Music Hall during the week beginning Sept. 27. Although no expense has been spared to keep the concerts up to the modern standard, the prices of tickets will be the same as before, $12 and $7.50 for the series of public rehearsals, and for the series of concerts, according to the location of seats. The $12 season tickets for the public rehearsals will be sold at auction in Music Hall on Monday, Sept. 27; the $7.50 tickets for rehearsals on Tuesday, Sept. 28; the $12 tickets for the Saturday evening concerts on Thursday, Sept. 30, and the $7.50 tickets for the concerts on Friday, Oct. 1.

The sales will begin each day at 10 A. M., and will be conducted by Auctioneer Jackson. Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. A very important detail is that the premium bid will be on each ticket. Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought or they will be resold. The seats open to competition will be shown on a large diagram and will be marked off as soon as sold.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, SEPT. 18, 1897.

THE SYMPHONIES.

Boston without her Symphony concerts and rehearsals would be worse than "Hamlet" with Hamlet left out; in fact, it would not be Boston at all. We may have to do without opera, but we have twenty-four of the best concerts in the world, and an equal number of rehearsals quite as fine.

Indeed, it is a musical education in itself to attend the course of our Symphony concerts. The orchestra this year will number as fine players as are to be found in the world, and will be led by that most distinguished of conductors, Emil Paur.

The sale of seats will open September 27.

Friday afternoon public rehearsal season tickets will be sold Monday and Tuesday, September 27 and 28; and Saturday evening concert tickets on Thursday and Friday, September 30 and October 1.

The rehearsals will begin October 15, and the Saturday evening concerts on October 16. But the sale of seats opens at Music Hall week after next.

SATURDAY EVENING
Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, SEPT. 19.

The seventeenth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra begins on Friday afternoon, Oct. 15. The auction sale of $12 seats for rehearsals will take place in Music Hall on Monday, Sept. 27, at 10 A. M.; for the $7.50 seats for rehearsals, Tuesday, Sept. 28, at 10 A. M. The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place on Thursday, Sept. 30, at 10 A. M.; and the $7.50 seats for the concerts on Friday, Oct. 1, at 10 A. M. Bids are for the seats in their order and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. Tickets must be paid for as soon as bought or they will be immediately resold.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CII., NO. 81.

SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 19, 1897.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Seventeenth Season to Begin the 15th of October.

Especially Attractive Array of Soloists—Programmes of the First Four Performances—Musical Novelties—Arrangements for the Sale of Season Tickets.

The Boston Symphony orchestra will begin its 17th season Oct. 15, under the leadership of Mr. Emil Paur. The personnel will be the same as that of last season. It seems almost superfluous to reiterate that the same high standard of performance which has obtained for the past decade will be maintained. An esprit du corps exists in the ranks of this organization which insures strenuous effort in the direction of perfect ensemble. Tht result is shown in the general sentiment of satisfaction and approval which prevails after each performance, and the verdict of the press, not only in Boston, but in all the cities visited, warrants the claim of the Boston Symphony orchestra to rank among the foremost musical organizations of the world. Exceptions may be taken now and then to some slight variation from the general rule of excellent performance, but the audiences as a whole, and among them many a patron from the very beginning of the concerts, enjoy to the fullest extent the work of as skilled a body of musicians as can be found either abroad or at home.

The season will include, as usual, 24 public rehearsals on Friday afternoons, and 24 concerts on Saturday evenings. Once a month, in the five winter months, the orchestra will be absent for a week, giving concerts in New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Washington and Baltimore. The dates on which there will be no performances in Boston are Nov. 12 and 13, Dec. 17 and 18, Jan. 21 and 22, Feb. 18 and 19 and March 25 and 26. As Christmas comes on a Saturday, the public rehearsal and concert Christmas week will be given on Wednesday afternoon and Thursday evening.

Although each year the list of soloists has been on the same high plane as the orchestra, the array of artists for this season is especially attractive. It includes Mme. Melba, Mrs. Henschel, Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield Zeisler, Mrs. Titus, a soprano, and a debutante of great promise; Miss Wienzkowska, a pianiste, who scored a marked success with the Kneisel quartet in New York last season, and Miss Olive Mead, a talented pupil of Mr. Kneisel; Mr. Rosenthal, the eminent piano virtuoso, will make good his non-appearance last season; Mr. Bispham, who was one of the leading baritones of the Metropolitan opera company, returns to this country with a reputation firmly established by several successful seasons abroad. Mr. Joseffy, of whom it is not necessary to speak; Mr. Siloti, a pianist who makes his first visit to this country, and is considered by many European critics as in the front rank of pianists; Mr. E. A. MacDowell, Messrs. Kneisel, Loeffler, Adamowski, Schnitzler, Schroeder and Schulz.

A glance at the programmes reveals among the prominent novelties, Chabrier's "Espagna" and "Marche Joyeuse," Glazounow's "Poeme Lyrique," Rimsky Korsakoff's "Oster Fest," Tschaikowsky's "Italian Caprice," Richand Strauss' Symphonic Poem "Zarathustra," and Saint-Saens' Symphonic Poem "Princess Jaune." The orchestral selections for the first four concerts are:

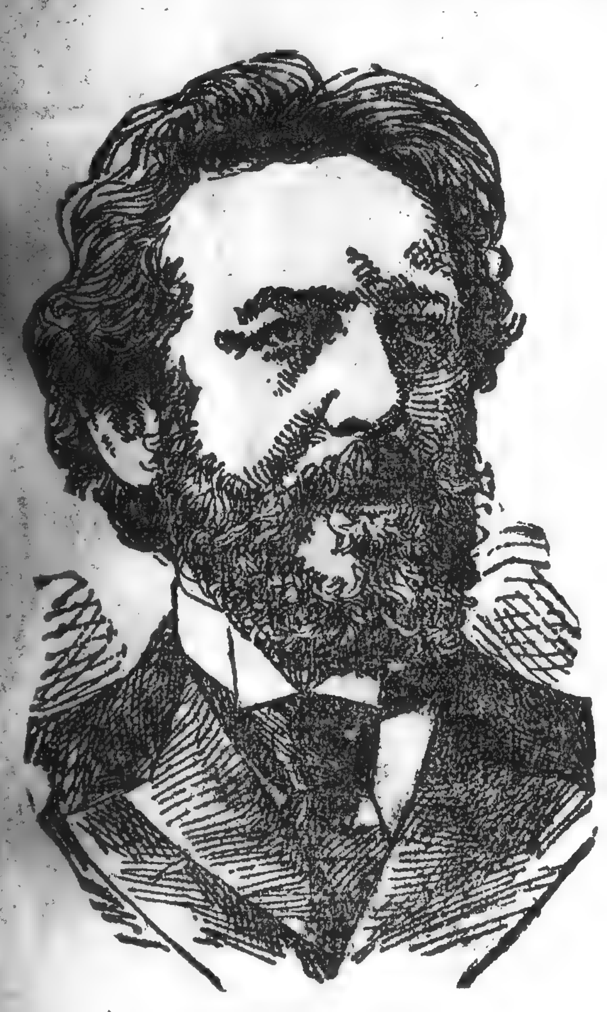
I. Oct. 15-16—Brahms, Academic Overture; Beethoven, Symphony No. 7 in A major; Chabrier, "Espagna"; Glazounow, "Poeme Lyrique"; Wagner, Kaisermarsch."

II. Oct. 22-23—Rimsky Korsakoff, "Oster Fest"; Schumann, Symphony No. 1 in B flat; Tschaikowsky, "Italian Caprice."

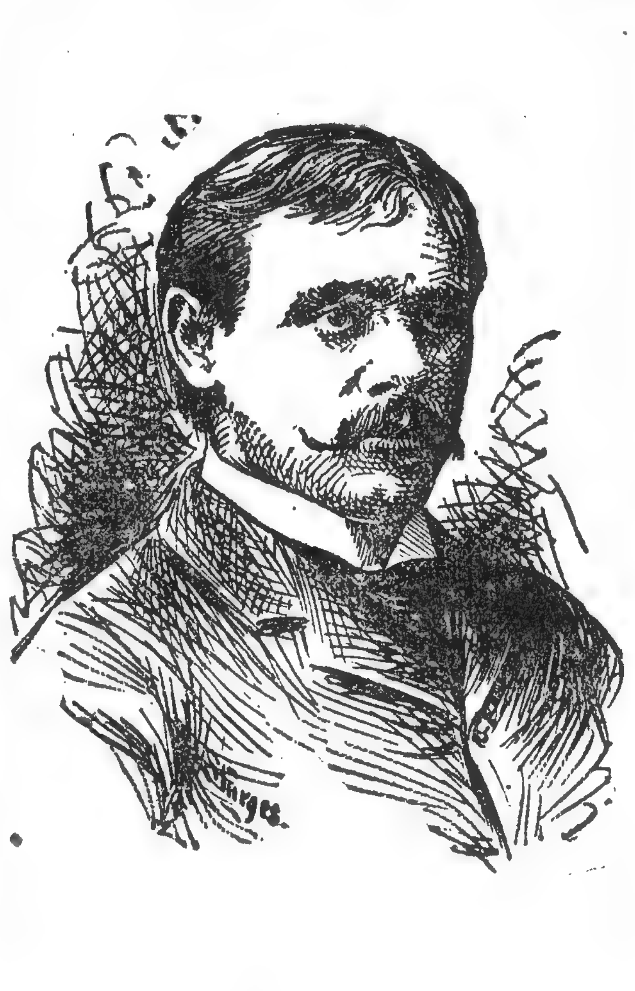
III. Oct. 29-30—Richard Strauss, Symphonic Poem "Zarathustra"; Brahms, Symphony No. 3 in F major; Weber-Weingartner, "Invitation to Dance."

IV. Nov. 5-6—Haydn, Symphony No. 7 in C; Mozart, "Serenade"; Beethoven, Overture, "Leonore" No. 2.

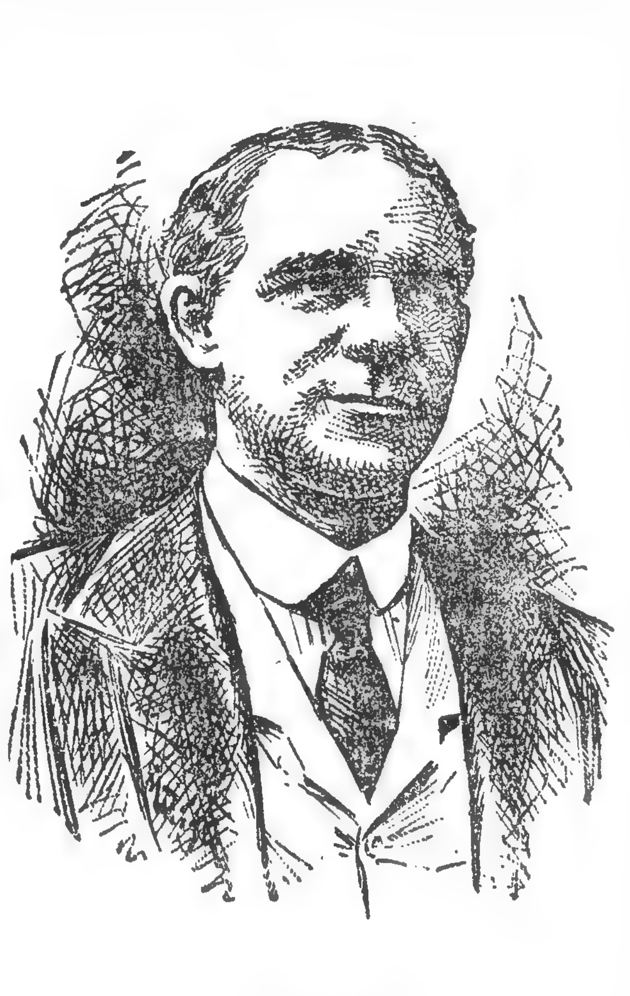
The sale of season tickets will be by auction, as usual, and will be held at Music Hall during the week of Sept. 27. The prices of tickets will be precisely the same as in the past, $12 and $7.50 for the series of public rehearsals and for the series of concerts, according to the location of seats. The $12 season tickets for the public rehearsals will be sold Monday, Sept. 27; the $7.50 tickets for the rehearsals on Tuesday, Sept. 28. The $12 tickets for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold on Thursday, Sept. 30, and the $7.50 tickets for the concerts on Friday, Oct. 1. The sales will begin at 10 A. M. each day, and will be conducted by Auctioneer Jackson. Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. A most important detail is that the premium bid is on each ticket. Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought or they will be resold. The seats open to competition will be shown on a large diagram, and will be marked off as soon as sold.



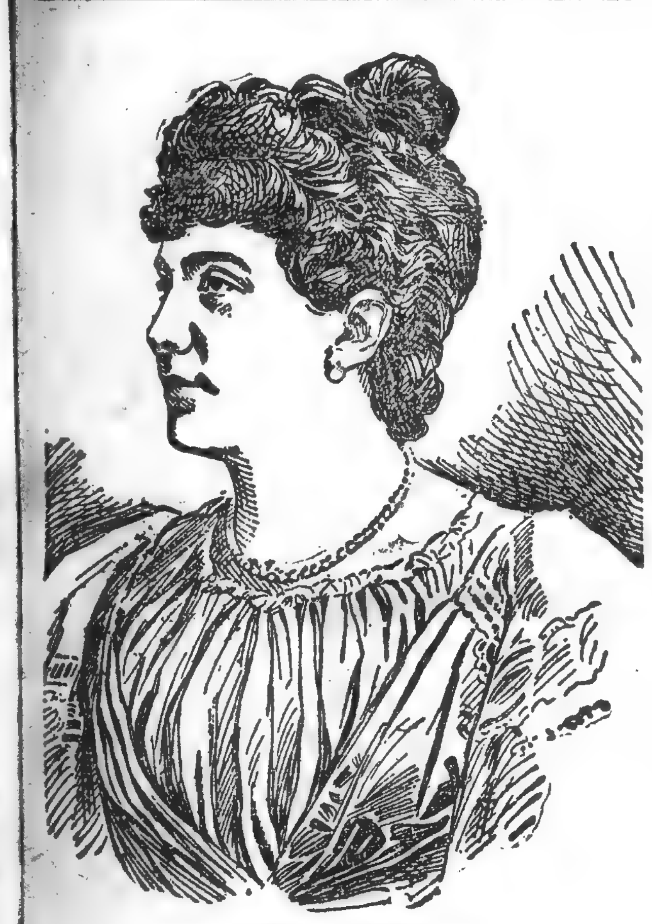
CONDUCTOR PAUR.



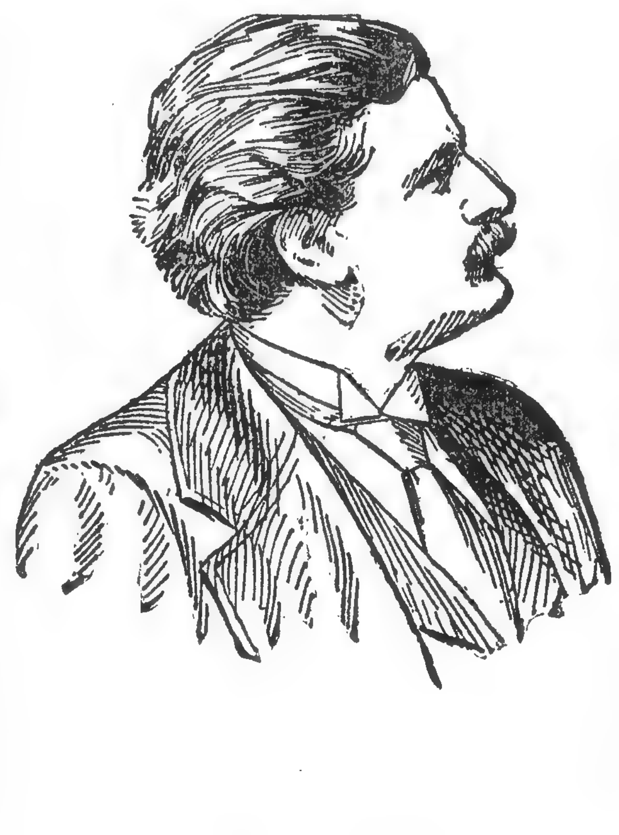
MR. KNEISEL.



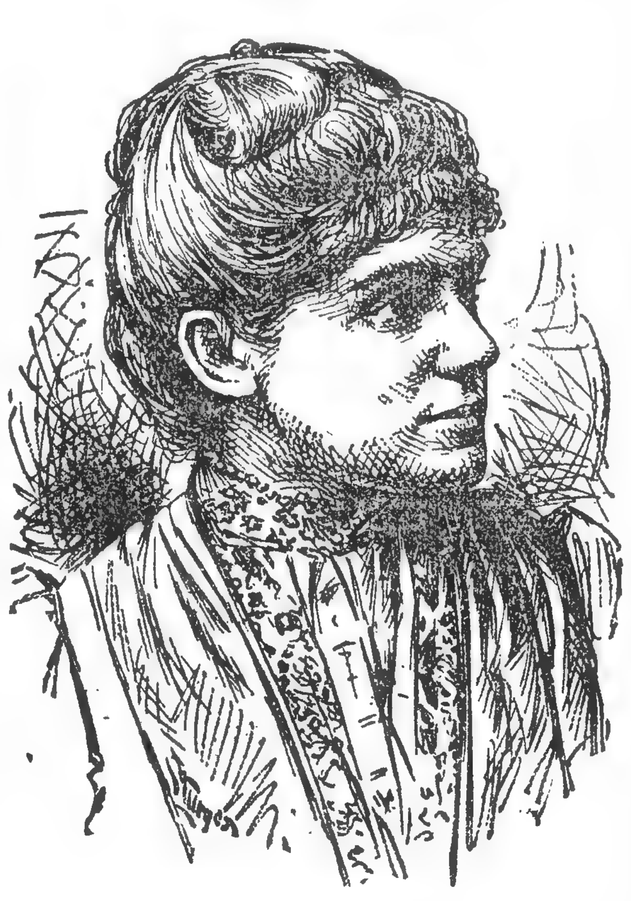
MR. BISPHAM.



MME. MELBA.



MORITZ ROSENTHAL.



MRS. HENSCHEL.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, SEPT. 19. 1897.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony orchestra will begin its new series of concerts Oct 15, and will give performances in Music hall Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of each week until April 30, with occasional omissions to permit of its visits to New York and other cities.

Less than 20 years ago Bostonians depended upon visiting organizations for the best orchestral concerts, and listened to some of them with wonder and delight; but for more than a decade the playing of the Boston Symphony orchestra has been the standard of orchestral performances in America. Both for quality and number, this series of concerts has been equalled in no other city. They have become famous throughout the country, and have done much to make Boston the mecca of musical students.

The arrangements for the coming season are practically complete. No changes have been made in the membership of the orchestra. To many the soloists of these concerts are a secondary consideration, and some claim that concerts with no soloists give them greater pleasure; but the number of inquiries received and the curiosity displayed as to whether certain favorite singers and players are to be heard indicate the attraction these singers and players possess for a goodly portion of the public.

The list of artists is a very strong one, headed by Mme Melba. We are also to have Mme Nordica, who has not sung in Boston for two years, and Mrs Henschel, who has not been heard here during that time. Other vocalists engaged are Miss Titus, a debutante of great promise, and Mr Bispham, who has not yet appeared in these concerts Rosenthal, whose unfortunate illnes prevented his playing last year, and Joseffy, have been engaged. Also Siloti who comes for the first time to win the favor of American audiences, and Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler, a highly esteemed player. Equally welcome will be Messrs Kneisel, Loeffler, Adamowski, Schnitzler, Schroeder and Schulz, from the ranks of the orchestra.

Mr Paur has selected for performance a goodly number of interesting novelties, and the usual number of standard works are also included in his programs. Among the novelties are: Chabrier's "Espagna" and "Marche Joyeuse," Glazounow's "Poeme Lyrique," Rimsky Koraakoff's "Oster Fest, Tschaikowsky's "Italian Caprice," Richard Strauss' symphonic poem, "Zarathustra" and Saint-Saens' symphonic poem. "Princess Jaune."

The following are the orchestral parts of the first four programs:

Oct 15-16.
Academic overture	Brahm
Symphony No. 7 in A major	Beethoven
Espagna	Chabrier
Poeme Lyrique	Glazouno
Kaisermarsch	Wagner
Oct 22-23.
Oster Fest	Rimsky Korsakoff
Symphony No. 1 in B flat	Schumann
Italian caprice	Tschaikowsky
Oct 29-30.
Symphonic poem, Zarathustra	Richard Strauss
Symphony No. 3 in F major	Brahms
Invitation to Dance	Weber-Weingartner
Nov 5-6.
Symphony No. 7 in C	Haydn
Serenade	Mozart
Overture, Leonore No. 2	Beethoven

The sales of season tickets will be by auction, and will be held at Music hall during the week beginning Sept 27. Although no expense has been spared to keep the concerts up to the modern standard, the prices of tickets will be the same as before, $12 and $7.50 for the series of public rehearsals, and for the series of concerts, according to the location of seats. The $12 season tickets for the public rehearsals will be sold at auction in Music hall, Monday, Sept 27; the $7.50 tickets for rehearsals, Tuesday, Sept 28; the $12 tickets for the Saturday evening concerts, Thursday, Sept 30, and the $7.50 tickets for the concerts, Friday, Oct 1.

The sales will begin each day at 10 a m, and will be conducted by auctioneer Jackson. Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. A very important detail is that the premium bid will be on each ticket. Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought or they will be resold. The seats open to competition will be shown on a large diagram and will be marked off as soon as sold.

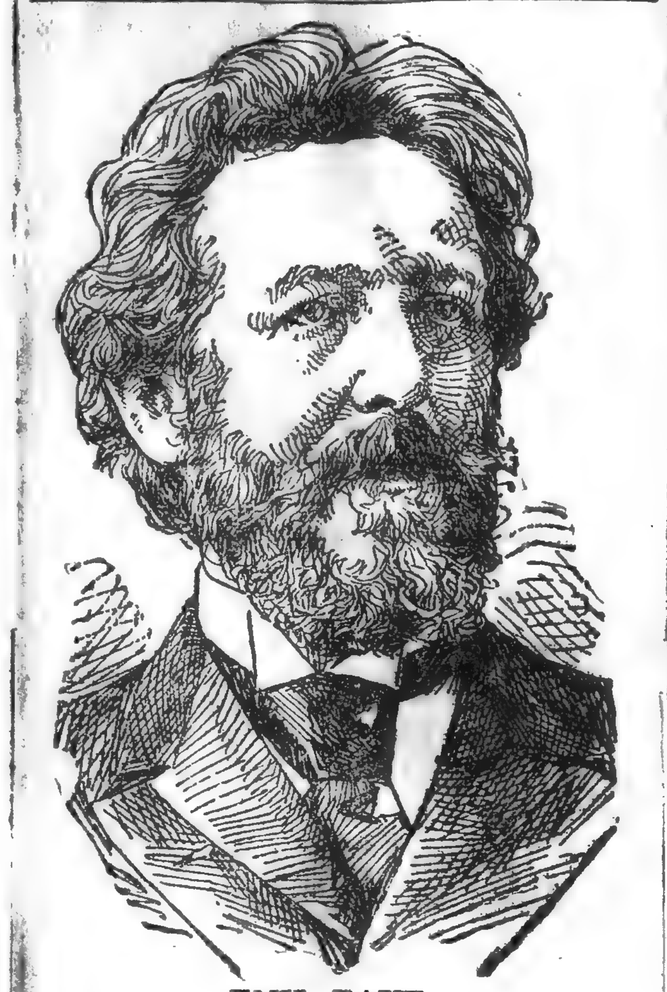
[17]

BOSTON POST.
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, SEPTEMBER 19, 1897.

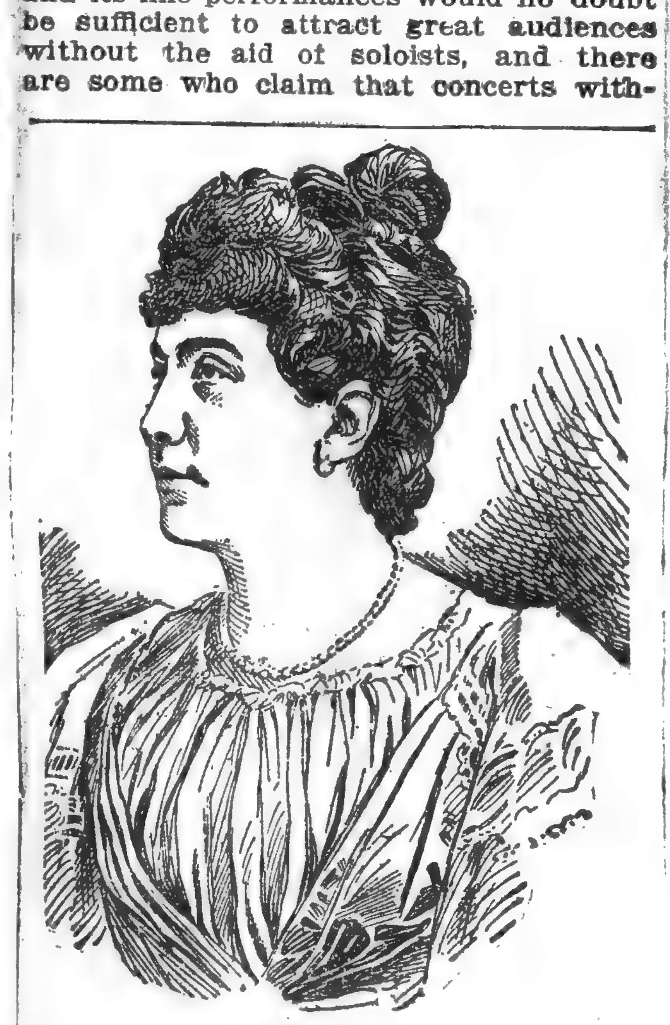
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its seventeenth season at Music Hall on Oct. 15 and will give its customary series of twenty-four public rehearsals on Friday afternoons and twenty-four concerts on Saturday evenings. The quality and number of these performances make them the most important feature of the musical season in Boston and many thousands of music lovers in this vicinity look with interest, about this time, for the announcement of what they are to be offered in the way of programmes, soloists, etc.



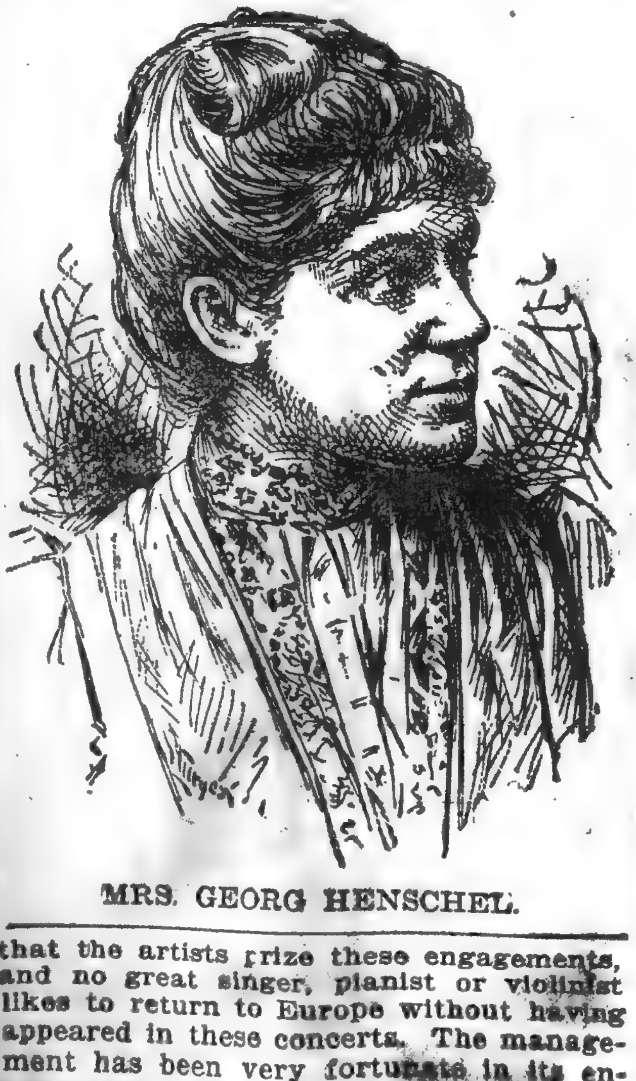
EMIL PAUR.

The orchestra is admittedly unsurpassed by any similar organization in the world, and its fine performances would no doubt be sufficient to attract great audiences without the aid of soloists, and there are some who claim that concerts without soloists are the most enjoyable. On the other hand the eager curiosity displayed by many to learn the list of soloists indicates that these features of the concerts constitute a powerful attraction.

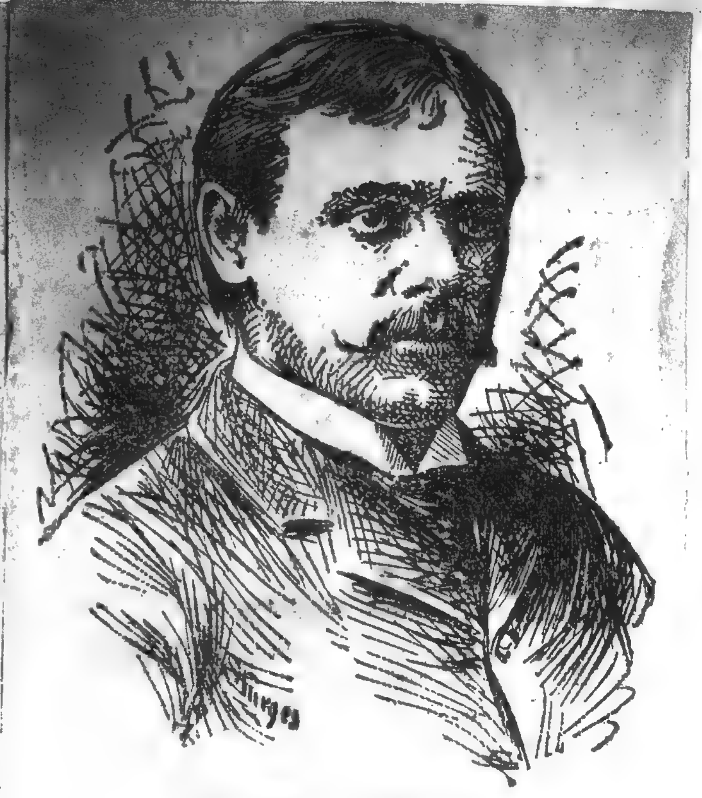


MME. MELBA.

Certainly great artists are always welcome and they are heard nowhere to better advantage than when supported by this superb orchestra. It is equally true that the artists prize these engagements, and no great singer, pianist or violinist likes to return to Europe without having appeared in these concerts. The management has been very fortunate in its engagements this year.



MRS. GEORG HENSCHEL.



FRANZ KNEISEL.

Mme. Melba heads the list of singers. Then we are to have Mme. Nordica, who has not sung for two years in Boston; Mrs. Henschel, another favorite, who has not been heard here for several seasons; Miss Titus, a debutante of great promise, and Mr. Bispham, who has not sung before in these concerts. Rosenthal, whose unfortunate illness prevented him from fulfilling his engagement last year, and Joseffy have both been secured, and Siloti, who comes for the first time to seek the favor of American audiences, and Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler, a highly esteemed player, complete the list of pianists.

Equally welcome will be Kneisel, Loeffler, Adamowski, Schnitzler, Schroeder and Schulz from the ranks of the orchestra. No more attractive list has ever been announced for these concerts. Some of the promised novelties are: Chabrier's "Espagna" and "Marche Joyeuse," Glazounow's "Poeme Lyrique," Rimsky Korsakoff's "Oster Fest," Tschaikowsky's "Italian Caprice," Richard Strauss's symphonic poem, "Zarathustra," and Saint-Saens's symphonic poem, "Princess Jaune."

The orchestral numbers of several of the earlier programmes will be as follows:

I., Oct. 15-16—Academic overture, Brahms; Symphony No. 7 in A major, Beethoven; "Espagna," Chabrier; "Poeme Lyrique," Glazounow; "Kaisermarsch," Wagner.

II., Oct. 22-23—"Oster Fest," Rimsky Korsakoff; Symphony No. 1 in B flat, Schumann; "Italian Caprice," Tschaikowsky.

III., Oct. 29-30—Symphonic poem, "Zarathustra," Richard Strauss; Symphony No. 3 in F major, Brahms; "Invitation to Dance," Weber-Weingartner.

IV., Nov. 5-6—Symphony No. 7 in C, Haydn; Serenade, Mozart; overture, "Leonore," No. 2, Beethoven.

The scale of prices for season tickets will be the same that was established several years ago—$12 and $7.50, according to location of seats, and will be the same for each series. The tickets will be sold by auction at Music Hall on Monday, Tuesday, Thursday and Friday, Sept. 27, 28, 30 and Oct. 1. The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold on Monday and the $7.50 seats for the same series on Tuesday, and the $12 and $7.50 seats for the concerts on Thursday and Friday, respectively.

The seats will be sold in regular order, beginning with the front row on the floor, and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. A large diagram will be displayed and the seats will be marked off as sold. This method of sale creates a wide range of prices and to suit all purses, and intending purchasers will do well to attend the sales personally if possible. Ladies will experience no difficulty in making their own purchases.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 19, 1897.

Boston Symphony Concerts for 1897-1898.

Programs and Soloists of the Coming Season.

Novelties at the Kneisel Concerts —Harvard and Music.

For 16 consecutive seasons the Boston Symphony Orchestra has given to the people of Boston and the neighborhood two series of public rehearsals and concerts which will compare favorably with similar series in the whole musical world. There has been a total of 800 performances in Boston, which have been of an extraordinarily high order of merit. The personnel of the orchestra has contributed very largely to this result, and this personnel, as may well be imagined, has been practically unchanged during the past 10 years. The best artists in Europe and America have been secured for this organization. The Boston Symphony Orchestra has an established reputation in leading foreign cities. No conductor has returned to Europe, prejudiced by his sojourn here; on the contrary the direction of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been a distinct and crowning honor to Mr. Henschel, Mr. Gericke and Mr. Nikisch, the predecessors of Mr. Paur. The glory of such an organization does not belong entiely to Boston. New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, Cambridge, Providence share in the enjoyment of listening to this admirable body of musicians. Do you deem this an idle boast? See the newspaper reviews of concerts given in these cities, notably in New York.

This orchestra is as much of a Boston institution as the Common, the Public Library, the Art Museum. It is a most potent factor in the intellectual ensemble that distinguishes this city.

⁂

The seventeenth season promises to be of even greater interest than those that have preceded.

The following symphonies will be given:

Beethoven—Nos. 2, 3, 5, 6, 7, and three movements of the 9th.
Berlioz—Symphonie fantastique.
Mrs. Beach—Gaelic.
Brahms—Nos. 2, 3.
Dvorak—No. 5.
Haydn—No. 7.
Liszt—Faust.
Mendelssohn—No. 3.
Mozart—G minor.
Paine—Spring.
Raff—Im Walde.
Schumann—Nos. 1, 4.
Tschaikowsky—Nos. 5, 6.

⁂

These overtures, symphonic poems and miscellaneous pieces will be played:

Auber—Overtures to "Part du Diable," and "Domino Noir."
Bach—Pastorale.
Berlioz—Overture, "Roman Carnival."
Three scenes from "Damnation of Faust."
Bizet—Suite "L'Arlesienne."
Brahms—Academic overture, serenade.
Beethoven—Overtures "Leonore" No. 3, "Egmont," "Fidelio."
Chabrier—Entr'acte from "Gwendoline."
Dvorak—"Carnival" overture.
Grieg—Two Norwegian melodies.
Liszt—Hungarian Rhapsody.
MacDowell—Symphonic poem.
Mendelssohn—Overtures "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage" and "Ruy Blas."
Meyerbeer—Overture "Struensee."
Mozart—Overtures "Magic Flute" and "Marriage of Figaro."
Rubinstein—Ballet music, "The Demon."
Saint-Saens—"Omphale's Spinning Wheel."
Smetana—Symphonic Poem.
Svendsen—Carnival.
Tschaikowsky—"Francesca da Rimini," "Romeo and Juliet."
Weber—Overture, "Euryanthe."
Weber-Weingartner—"Invitation to the Dance."

And there will be several pieces by Wagner, as well as pieces by Volkmann, Reinecke, Kern, and others.

⁂

The novelties announced will be by Chabrier, Glazounoff, Rimsky-Korsakoff, Richard Strauss, Humperdinck and Saint-Saëns, Tschaikowsky.

⁂

The programs of the first four concerts will be as follows:

I.—OCT. 15, 16.

Academic overture	Brahms
Symphony No. 7	Beethoven
Espagne	Chabrier
Poeme lyrique	Glazounoff
Kaisermarsch	Wagner

II.—OCT. 22, 23.

Easter Festival	Rimsky-Korsakoff
Symphony No. 1	Schumann
Italian Caprice	Tschaikowsky

III.—OCT. 29, 30.

"Thus Spake Zarathusthra"	Richard Strauss
Symphony No. 3	Brahms
Invitation to the Dance	Weber-Weingartner

IV.—NOV. 5, 6.

Symphony No. 7	Haydn
Serenade	Mozart
Overture Leonore No. 2	Beethoven

⁂

The list of soloists is a striking one: Melba, Mrs. Henschel, Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler, Mrs. Titus, Miss Olive Mead, Messrs. Rosenthal, Joseffy, Siloti, MacDowell, Bispham, Kneisel, Loeffler, Adamowski, Schnitzler, Schroeder, Schulz.

Mrs. Titus is a soprano of Boston; Miss Mead is a violinist who has studied here.

Alexander Siloti is one of the most distinguished pianists in Europe. He was born Oct. 10, 1863, at Charkow, South Russia. He studied at the Moscow Conservatory from 1875 to 1881 under Swereff, Nicolas Rubinstein, Tschaikowsky and Hubert; from '83 to '86 under Liszt. He made his début in 1880 at Moscow in a concert given by the Music Society. His appearance in 1883 at Leipsic in a concert of the Tonkünstler Versammlung provoked stormy applause. Since then he has given concerts throughout Europe.

⁂

The sales of season tickets will be by auction, and will be held at Music Hall during the week beginning Sept. 27. Although no expense has been spared to keep the concerts up to the modern standard, the prices of tickets will be the same as before, $12 and $7 50 for the series of public rehearsals and for the series of concerts, according to the location of seats. The $12 season tickets for the public rehearsals will be sold at auction in Music Hall, on Monday, Sept. 27; the $7 50 tickets for rehearsals on Tuesday, Sept. 28; the $12 tickets for the Saturday evening concerts on Thursday, Sept. 30, and the $7 50 tickets for the concerts on Friday, Oct. 1. The sales will begin each day at 10 A. M., and will be conducted by Auctioneer Jackson. Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. A very important detail is that the premium bid will be on each ticket. Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold.

The seats open to competition will be shown on a large diagram, and will be marked off as soon as sold.

⁂

The Kneisel Quartet will give eight concerts in Association Hall this season. The first will be given Monday evening, Oct. 25. The sale will begin Oct. 18. Among the novelties to be produced in the course of the season are a trio for piano, violin and 'cello by César Franck, op. 1 in F sharp minor; Tschaikowsky's third string quartet in F major; concerto for violin, piano and string quartet by Chausson; Brahms's second clarinet sonata in E flat, and Russian vocal quartets by Henschel. Other works to be performed are Beethoven's A minor quartet, op. 132, C minor quartet, op. 59, No. 3, and op. 95; string quartets by Mozart, Haydn and Smetana; Brahm's C minor quartet. Chamber music for wind instruments with and without strings will be performed with the assistance of wind players of the Symphony Orchestra. Among the soloists who will appear at these concerts are Mrs. Szumowska, Mrs. Hopekirk, Mrs. Henschel, Messrs. Rosenthal, Joseffy, Pourtau and Proctor.

The Kneisel Quartet will give this season 8 concerts in New York, 5 in Philadelphia, 5 at Princeton University, 5 in Baltimore, 4 in Washington, and 9 in Cambridge. The club will give 10 concerts in the West next month. The first will be at Chicago Oct. 1.

The chamber concerts, under the auspices of Harvard University, will be given in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, this season, Tuesday evenings, Oct. 19, Nov. 2, 30, Dec. 7, Jan. 11, Feb. 1, March 8, 29, April 12, 26. They will be open to all members of the university and to the public. They will be suplementary to a course of lectures given to students by Prof. John K. Paine on the "Chamber Music of Beethoven" and other modern masters. (Music, 8). Among the performers will be the Kneisel Quartet (at 8 concerts), the Adamowski Quartet, Mrs. Szumowska, Rafael Joseffy, Carl Baermann and Messrs. Jacquet, Sauter, Pourtau, Litke, Hackebarth, Zach, Schulz, Keller and others.

The programs will be chosen to represent most of the forms of modern chamber music: the piano sonata, piano and violin sonata, piano quintet, piano septet, string quartet, quintet, septet, octet. Pieces by Beethoven, Brahms, Chadwick, Chopin, Dvorak, Foote (quintet for piano and strings, first time), Grieg, Haydn, Hummel, Mendelssohn, Mozart, Schubert, Schumann, Tschaikowsky and others will be played. The program of the first concert, Oct. 19, at 7.45, by the Kneisel Quartet, will include Haydn's string quartet, op. 76, in G major; Mozart's quartet in C major; and Beethoven's quartet in E flat major, op. 74.

All business communications should be addressed to Mr. Fred. R. Comee, Music Hall, Boston.

Season tickets, with reserved seats, price $7, will be for sale at the University Bookstore, Cambridge, Saturday morning, Oct. 9, at 8 o'clock. A limited number of seats has been reserved for officers of the university, the students who take the course and invited guests.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 20, 1897

The department of music of the Brooklyn Institute, whose membership increased last year from 949 to upwards of 1400, is about to enter upon the most ambitious period in its history. The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a series of five Saturday evening Philharmonic concerts and also a series of five popular Friday afternoon concerts in the Academy of Music, beginning in November and ending in March. The department will present concerts by the most notable artists who are to appear in this country during the year. Moritz Rosenthal will give his first piano recital before the Institute on Dec. 1 at the Academy of Music. Ysaye will give a recital at the Academy of Music on the evening of Dec. 29. Alexandre Guilmant will give an organ recital at the New York Avenue Methodist Episcopal Church in January. Among the other artists who will appear during the year are Melba, Mme. Barna, Gadsky, David Bispham, Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel, Max Heinrich, Miss Emma Juch, Rafael Joseffy, Ffrangçon Davies, Mme. Lillian Blauvelt, Mme. Bloomfield Zeisler, Henri Marteau, Alexander Salotti, Constantin Sternberg, William H. Sherwood, Victor Herbert, Maude Powell, Bertha Bucklin, Purdon Robinson, Miss Lotta Mills, Franz Kneisel, Giuseppe Campanari and Alvin Schroeder.

A course of ten chamber concerts is announced to be given in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, on Tuesday evenings, beginning Oct. 19, and ending April 26. These concerts are to be given under the auspices of Harvard University, supplementary to a course of lectures by Professor John K. Paine to students in "Music 8" on the chamber music of Beethoven and other modern masters. They are to be open to all members of the university and to the public. The artists engaged for these concerts are the Kneisel and Adamowski quartets, Mme. Szumowska, Mr. Carl Baermann, Mr. Rafael Joseffy, Mr. C. Jacquet, Mr. A. Sautet, Mr. L. Pourtau, Mr. H. Litke, Mr. A. Hackebarth, Mr. M. Zach, Mr. L. Schulz, Mr. K. Keller and others. The programmes are to be made up from chamber works by Beethoven, Brahms, Chadwick, Chopin, Dvorak, Foote, Grieg, Haydn, Hummel, Mendelssohn, Mozart, Schubert, Schumann and Tchaikovsky. The scheme is worthy of all encouragement, giving, as it does, the students of music in the university opportunities of hearing the lectures in a regular course illustrated by thoroughly good performances of the works mentioned therein. That the concerts will also be largely attended by the general musical public of Cambridge is confidently to be expected. The chance of hearing chamber music in a place like Sanders Theatre is in itself enough to lure not a few music-lovers from Boston. The business management of the concerts is in the experienced hands of Mr. F. R. Comee of the Boston Music Hall.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.

WEDNESDAY MORNING, SEPT. 22, 1897.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, through its fine performances, gains new admirers each season, and the hold it maintains on its subscribers from year to year is the highest tribute that can be paid to its proficiency.

The announcements in reference to the coming season make it plain that these performances will again provide a series of highly enjoyable concerts that will lack no element that could add to their musical value or attractiveness.

The auction sales of season tickets for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals will be held at Music Hall on Monday and Tuesday, and for the Saturday evening concerts on Thursday and Friday of next week. The sales will begin each day at 10 A.M.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

23

The fine quality of the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra never fails to make them a potent attraction with the musical public, and the galaxy of distinguished solo artists engaged as soloists will add to the brilliancy of the new series which begin on Oct. 15. The auction sales of season tickets for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals will be held at Music Hall on Monday and Tuesday, and for the Saturday evening concerts on Thursday and Friday of next week.

[18]

The Boston Traveler

PUBLISHED BY THE
BOSTON TRAVELER CO.,
TORREY E. WARDNER, President

MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 20, 1897.

THE SYMPHONY.

A Fine Prospectus for the Coming Season—Notable List of Soloists.

The season of that fine and distinctively Bostonian institution, the Symphony Orchestra, will begin October 15, and from all appearances it will be one of the most prosperous and enjoyable ever known. Conductor Paur has now firmly established himself in the public heart, and his great ability as a director and programme maker is more and more recognized. His announcements for this year cannot but be hailed with satisfaction by the music lovers of Boston. He will present a carefully selected variety of ever-welcome standard works, and has secured from the great number of novelties submitted to him for examination, such as appeal to him as being worthy.

The list of solo artists is the best ever announced. It includes Melba, Mrs. Henschel, Rosenthal, Joseffy, Siloti, Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler, Miss Wienzkowska, Miss Olive Mead, Miss Titus, and Messrs. Bispham, Kneisel, Loeffler, Adamowski, Schnitzler, Schroder, Schulz and others. Mr. Siloti and Miss Wienskowska are pianists of distinction who have never been heard in these concerts. Miss Olive Mead is a young violinist, and Miss Titus is a debutante who is said to possess a voice of great beauty which gives promise of a brilliant career.

Some of the novelties to be presented are: Chabrier's "Espagna" and "Marche Joyeuse," Glazounow's "Poeme Lyrique," Rimsky Korsakoff's "Oster Fest," Tschaikowsky's "Italian Caprice," Richard Strauss's symphonic poem "Zarathustra," and Saint-Saens' symphonic poem "Princess Jaune."

The orchestral numbers of the first four programmes will be:

1. Oct. 15-16—Brahms, Academic Overture; Beethoven, Symphony No. 7 in A major; Chabrier, "Espagna"; Glasounow, "Poeme Lyrique"; Wagner, "Kaisermarsch."

2. Oct. 22-23—Rimsky Korsakoff, "Oster Fest"; Schumann, Symphony No. 1 in B flat; Eschalkowsky, "Italian Caprice."

3. Oct. 29-30—Richard Strauss, symphony poem "Zarathustra"; Brahms, Symphony No. 3 in F major; Weber-Weingartner, "Invitation to Dance."

4. Nov. 5-6—Haydn, Symphony No. 7 in C; Mozart, Serenade; Beethoven, overture, "Lenore," No. 2.

The sales of season tickets will be by auction, and will be held at Music Hall during the week beginning Sept. 27. Although no expense has been spared to keep the concerts up to the modern standard, the price of tickets will be the same as before, $12 and $7.50 for the series of public rehearsals, and for the series of concerts, according to the location of seats. The $12 season tickets for the public rehearsals will be sold at auction in Music Hall on Monday, Sept. 27; the $7.50 tickets for rehearsals on Tuesday, Sept. 28; the $12 tickets for the Saturday evening concerts on Thursday, Sept. 30, and the $7.50 tickets for the concerts on Friday, Oct. 1.

The sales will begin each day at 10 A.M., and will be conducted by Auctioneer Jackson. Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. A very important detail is that the premium bid will be on each ticket. Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought or they will be resold. The seats open to competition will be shown on a large diagram and will be marked off as soon as sold.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.

THURSDAY MORNING, SEPT. 23, 1897.

MR. PAUR WILL STAY

The New Contract He Is Said to Have Signed.

It is understood among musicians of this city that Mr. Emil Paur, director of the Symphony orchestra, has signed a contract with Mr. H. L. Higginson, under which the former is to serve another five years' term at the head of the orchestra.

It is stated that, under this contract, if for any reason Mr. Higginson should decide to secure another director before the five years' term is up, Mr. Paur will receive a bonus of $10,000.

The news that the director is probably to remain in Boston does not come exactly as a surprise, but it is generally received with a good deal of satisfaction by local musicians.

When Mr. Paur came to Boston there existed two cliques among symphony audiences. One group might be called the Gericke adherents, while the other was apparently discontented that Mr. Nikisch was not to remain at the head of the orchestra.

During Mr. Paur's directorship these factions have entirely disappeared and both parties have apparently joined in a common sentiment of admiration over the striking success which the present director has achieved.

Boston Daily Globe.

THURSDAY, SEPT. 23, 1897.

Prodigal in attractions is the new season of the Boston symphony orchestra, and it is clearly to be seen that these concerts will fully maintain their popularity with the public. The auction sales of season tickets for the Friday afternoon rehearsals will be held at Music hall next Monday and Tuesday, and for the Saturday evening concerts Thursday and Friday of next week.

Boston Journal.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 24, 1897.

The announcements that have been made concerning this year's symphony concerts give unqualified satisfaction to patrons of this popular series. The programs promised and the number and distinction of the solo artists engaged lend great attractiveness to the scheme and will make the concerts more than ever the vogue. The auction sales of season tickets will be held at Music Hall on Monday, Tuesday, Thursday and Friday of next week.

Arlington Advocate

OFFICE
Fowle's Block, Mass. Avenue.

Published every Friday forenoon by
C. S. PARKER & SON,
Editors and Proprietors.
Subscription—$2. Single copies 5 cts.

Arlington, Sept. 24, 1897.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Emil Paur conductor, will begin its new season on Oct. 15, and with occasional omissions to permit its usual visits to New York and other cities, will give concerts at Music Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of each week until April 30. The fine quality of the performances of this great organization have made these concerts famous, and they appeal to music lovers from all parts of New England. The list of distinguished solo artists engaged for the series includes Mme. Melba, Mrs. Henschel, Mrs. Titus, Miss Wienzkowska, Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler, Miss Olive Mead, Mr. Bispham, Mr. Rosenthal, Mr. Joseffy, Mr. Siloti, Mr. McDowell, Mr. Kneisel, Mr. Loeffler, Mr. Adamowski, Mr. Schnitzler, Mr. Schroeder and Mr. Schulz. The auction sales of season tickets will be held at Boston Music Hall on Monday, Tuesday, Thursday and Friday, Sept. 27, 28, 30 and Oct. 1.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, SEPT. 25, 1897.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The Boston Symphony orchestra will begin its seventeenth season October 15, under the leadership of Mr. Emil Paur. The season will include, as usual, twenty four public rehearsals on Friday afternoons, and twenty-four concerts on Saturday evenings.

The array of artists for this season is especially attractive. It includes Mme. Melba, Mrs. Henschel, Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield Zeisler, Mrs. Titus, a soprano, and a debutante of great promise; Miss Wienzkowska, the pianiste, who scored a marked success with the Kneisel Quartet in New York last season, and Miss Olive Mead, a talented pupil of Mr. Kneisel; Mr. Rosenthal, the eminent piano virtuoso; Mr. Bispham, who was one of the leading baritones of the Metropolitan opera company; Mr. Joseffy, of whom it is not necessary to speak; Mr. Siloti, a pianist, who makes his first visit to this country; Mr. E. A. MacDowell, Messrs. Kneisel, Loeffler, Adamowski, Schnitzler, Schroeder and Schulz.

Among the prominent novelties will be Chabrier's "Espagna" and "Marche Joyeuse," Glazounow's "Poeme Lyrique," Rimsky Korsakoff's "Oster Fest," Tschaikowsky's "Italian Caprice," Richard Strauss' symphonic poem, "Zaratnusta," and Saint-Saens' symphonic poem, "Princess Jaune."

The sale of season tickets will be by auction, as usual, and will be held at Music Hall during next week. The prices of tickets will be precisely the same as in the past, $12 and $7.50 for the series of public rehearsals and for the series of concerts, according to the location of seats. The $12 season tickets for the public rehearsals will be sold Monday, September 27; the $7.50 tickets for the rehearsals on Tuesday, September 28. The $12 tickets for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold on Thursday, September 30, and the $7.50 tickets for the concerts on Friday, October 1. The sales will begin at 10 A. M. each day.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.

SATURDAY MORNING, SEPT. 25, 1897.

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Emil Paur, conductor, will begin its new season on Oct. 15, and with occasional omissions to permit its usual visits to New York and other cities, will give concerts at Boston Music Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of each week until April 30.

The fine quality of the performances of this great organization have made these concerts famous and they appeal to music lovers from all parts of New England. The list of distinguished solo artists engaged for the series includes Mme. Melba, Mrs. Henschel, Mrs. Titus, Miss Wienzkowska, Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler, Miss Olive Mead, Mr. Bispham, Mr. Rosenthal, Mr. Joseffy, Mr. Siloti, Mr. MacDowell, Mr. Kneisel, Mr. Loeffler, Mr. Adamowski, Mr. Schnitzler, Mr. Schroeder and Mr. Schulz.

The auction sales of season tickets will be held at Boston Music Hall on Monday, Tuesday, Thursday and Friday, Sept. 27, 28, 30 and Oct. 1.

Boston Daily Globe.

SATURDAY, SEPT. 25, 1897.

Next Monday morning at 10 o'clock the sale of tickets for the 17th symphony season will open in Music hall.

MALDEN MIRROR
AND MESSENGER.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 25, 1897.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Emil Paur conductor, will begin its new season on October 15, and with occasional omissions to permit its usual visits to New York and other cities, will give concerts at Boston Music Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of each week until April 30. The fine quality of the performances of this great organization have made these concerts famous, and they appeal to music lovers from all parts of New England. The list of distinguished solo artists engaged for the series includes Mme. Melba, Mrs. Henschel, Mrs. Titus, Miss Wienzkowska, Mrs. Bloomfield-Reisler, Miss Olive Mead, Mr. Bispham, Mr. Rosenthal, Mr. Joseffy, Mr. Siloti, Mr. MacDowell, Mr. Kneisel, Mr. Leoffler, Mr. Aadmowski, Mr. Schnitzler, Mr. Schroeder, and Mr. Schulz. The auction sales of season tickets will be held at Boston Music Hall on Monday, Tuesday, Thursday and Friday, Sept. 27, 28, 30 and Oct. 1.

Boston Journal.

FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 24, 1897.

MR. PAUR'S CONTRACT.

Understood That Symphony Conductor Has Signed for Another Five Years.

It is understood among musicians that Mr. Emil Paur, director of the Symphony Orchestra, has signed a contract with Mr. H. L. Higginson, under which the former is to serve another five years' term at the head of the orchestra.

It is stated that under this contract, if for any reason Mr. Higginson should decide to secure another director before the five years' term is up, Mr. Paur will receive a bonus of $10,000.

N. Y. Times Sept. 26.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Emil Paur, conductor, will give concerts at the Metropolitan Opera House on Thursday evenings, Nov. 11, Dec. 16, Jan. 20, Feb. 17, and March 24. Mr. Joseffy will be the soloist at the first concert. Mme. Melba, Mme. Nordica, Mr. Kneisel, and Mr. Loeffler will also appear in the series. Less than twenty years ago Bostonians depended on the visits of New York organizations for their best orchestral concerts and listened to them with delight, owing to their superiority over the performances of the best local organizations. But time has changed all this, and for more than a decade Boston has provided its own high-class concerts, and the playing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been the standard of orchestral performances in America. New Yorkers are beginning to appreciate this orchestra and to look to it for the most finished and satisfying performances. The organization is maintained solely for concert performances, and the individual musicianship of its players and the care exercised in rehearsals for all its performances have placed it on a plane where few orchestras of the world can be compared to it.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, SEPT. 25, 1897.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The Boston Symphony orchestra will begin its seventeenth season October 15, under the leadership of Mr. Emil Paur. The season will include, as usual, twenty four public rehearsals on Friday afternoons, and twenty-four concerts on Saturday evenings.

The array of artists for this season is especially attractive. It includes Mme. Melba, Mrs. Henschel, Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield Zeisler, Mrs. Titus, a soprano, and a debutante of great promise; Miss Wienzkowska, the pianiste, who scored a marked success with the Kneisel Quartet in New York last season, and Miss Olive Mead, a talented pupil of Mr. Kneisel; Mr. Rosenthal, the eminent piano virtuoso; Mr. Bispham, who was one of the leading baritones of the Metropolitan opera company; Mr. Joseffy, of whom it is not necessary to speak; Mr. Siloti, a pianist, who makes his first visit to this country; Mr. E. A. MacDowell, Messrs. Kneisel, Loeffler, Adamowski, Schnitzler, Schroeder and Schulz.

Among the prominent novelties will be Chabrier's "Espagna" and "Marche Joyeuse," Glazounow's "Poeme Lyrique," Rimsky Korsakoff's "Oster Fest," Tschaikowsky's "Italian Caprice," Richard Strauss' symphonic poem, "Zaratnusta," and Saint-Saens' symphonic poem, "Princess Jaune."

The sale of season tickets will be by auction, as usual, and will be held at Music Hall during next week. The prices of tickets will be precisely the same as in the past, $12 and $7.50 for the series of public rehearsals and for the series of concerts, according to the location of seats. The $12 season tickets for the public rehearsals will be sold Monday, September 27; the $7.50 tickets for the rehearsals on Tuesday, September 28. The $12 tickets for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold on Thursday, September 30, and the $7.50 tickets for the concerts on Friday, October 1. The sales will begin at 10 A. M. each day.

American Art Journal.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, SEPT. 25, 1897

Ten Symphony Concerts, 5 evening and 5 matinees, will be given by the Boston Symphony Society, Emil Paur, conductor, under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute, this season. Mme. Melba and Sig. Campanari will appear among the soloists.

THE BOSTON COMMERCIAL.

SEPTEMBER 25 1897.

The Sale of Tickets For Symphony Concerts and Rehearsals.

The sale of seats for the Symphony rehearsals will open at the Music Hall box office next Monday and will continue Tuesday, while tickets for the series of concerts will be sold on Thursday and Friday next.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be immediately resold.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, SEPT. 26, 1897.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The Auction Sale of Season Tickets Will be Held This Week—A Fine Prospectus for the Coming Season.

The sale of season tickets for the rehearsals and concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music hall begins tomorrow and continues through the week, and the price of tickets will be the same as heretofore—$12 and $7.50 for the series of public rehearsals, and for the series of concerts, according to the location of the seats.

The $12 season tickets for the public rehearsals will be sold at auction in Music hall, Sept. 27; the $7.50 tickets for rehearsals on Tuesday, Sept. 28; the $12 tickets for the Saturday evening concerts on Thursday, Sept. 30, and the $7 50 tickets for the concerts on Friday, Oct. 1.

The sales will begin each day at 10 a. m., and will be conducted by Auctioneer Jackson. Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. A very important detail is that the premium bid will be on each ticket. Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought or they will be resold. The seats open to competition will be shown on a large diagram and will be marked off as soon as sold.

The Symphony orchestra season promises to be one of the most prosperous and enjoyable this distinctly Bostonian institution has ever known. Conductor Paur has now established himself in public favor as an able director and satisfactory programme maker, and his announcements for this year include a carefully selected variety of ever welcome standard works and a great number of novelties which he considers worthy of presentation.

The list of solo artists is the best ever announced. It includes Melba, Mrs. Henschel, Rosenthal, Joseffy, Siloti, Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler, Miss Wienzkowska, Miss Olive Mead, Miss Titus, and Messrs. Bispham, Kneisel, Loeffler, Adamowski, Schnitzler, Schroder, Schulz and others. Mr. Siloti ond Miss Wienzkowska are pianists of distinction who have never been heard in these concerts. Miss Olive Mead is a young violinist, and Miss Titus is a débutante who is said to possess a voice of great beauty which gives promise of a brilliant career.

Some of the novelties to be presented are: Chabrier's "Espagna" and "Marche Joyeuse," Glazounow's "Poeme Lyrique," "Rimsky Korsakoff's "Oster Fest," Tschaikowsky's "Italian Caprice," Richard Strauss's symphonic poem, "Princess Jaune."

The orchestral numbers of the first four programmes will be:

1. Oct. 15-16—Brahms, Academic Overture; Beethoven, Symphony No. 7 in A major; Chabrier, "Espagna"; Glazounow, "Poeme Lyrique"; Wagner, "Kaisermarsch."

2. Oct. 22-23—Rimsky Korsakoff, "Oster Fest"; Schumann, Symphony No. 1 in B flat; Eschaikowsky, "Italian Caprice."

3. Oct. 29-30—Richard Strauss, symphony poem, "Zarathustra"; Brahms, Symphony No. 3 in F major; Weber-Weingartner, "Invitation to Dance."

4. Nov. 5-6—Haydn, Symphony No. 7 in C; Mozart, Serenade; Beethoven, overture, "Lenore," No. 2.

SATURDAY EVENING
Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, SEPT. 26.

The sales for the tickets for the Symphony concerts are arranged as follows:

The $12 seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Monday Sept. 27, at 10 A. M.; the $7.50 seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Tuesday, Sept. 28, at 10 A. M.; the $12 seats for the Concerts will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Thursday, Sept. 30, at 10 A. M.; the $7.50 seats for the Concerts will be sold in like manner, at the same place, on Friday, Oct. 1, at 10 A. M. Among the soloists who will appear during the season are Mme. Melba, Mrs. Henschel, Miss Wienzkowska, Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler, Mr. Rosenthal, Mr. Joseffy, Mr. Seloti, Mr. MacDowell and Mr. Kneisel. Several new works are promised during the season, which promises to be of unusual interest.

The Boston Traveler

PUBLISHED BY THE
BOSTON TRAVELER CO.,
TORREY E. WARDNER, President

MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 20, 1897.

THE SYMPHONY.

A Fine Prospectus for the Coming Season--Notable List of Soloists.

The season of that fine and distinctively Bostonian institution, the Symphony Orchestra, will begin October 15, and from all appearances it will be one of the most prosperous and enjoyable ever known. Conductor Paur has now firmly established himself in the public heart, and his great ability as a director and programme maker is more and more recognized. His announcements for this year cannot but be hailed with satisfaction by the music lovers of Boston. He will present a carefully selected variety of ever-welcome standard works, and has secured from the great number of novelties submitted to him for examination, such as appeal to him as being worthy.

The list of solo artists is the best ever announced. It includes Melba, Mrs. Henschel, Rosenthal, Joseffy, Siloti, Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler, Miss Wienzkowska, Miss Olive Mead, Miss Titus, and Messrs. Bispham, Kneisel, Loeffler, Adamowski, Schnitzler, Schroder, Schulz and others. Mr. Siloti and Miss Wienzkowska are pianists of distinction who have never been heard in these concerts. Miss Olive Mead is a young violinist, and Miss Titus is a debutante who is said to possess a voice of great beauty which gives promise of a brilliant career.

Some of the novelties to be presented are: Chabrier's "Espagna" and "Marche Joyeuse," Glazounow's "Poeme Lyrique," Rimsky Korsakoff's "Oster Fest," Tschaikowsky's "Italian Caprice," Richard Strauss's symphonic poem "Zarathustra," and Saint-Saens' symphonic poem "Princess Jaune."

The orchestral numbers of the first four programmes will be:

1. Oct. 15-16—Brahms, Academic Overture; Beethoven, Symphony No. 7 in A major; Chabrier, "Espagna"; Glazounow, "Poeme Lyrique"; Wagner, "Kaisermarsch."

2. Oct, 22-23—Rimsky Korsakoff, "Oster Fest"; Schumann, Symphony No. 1 in B flat; Eschaikowsky, "Italian Caprice."

3. Oct. 29-30—Richard Strauss, symphony poem "Zarathustra"; Brahms, Symphony No. 3 in F major; Weber-Weingartner, "Invitation to Dance."

4. Nov. 5-6—Haydn, Symphony No. 7 in C; Mozart, Serenade; Beethoven, overture, "Lenore," No. 2.

The sales of season tickets will be by auction, and will be held at Music Hall during the week beginning Sept. 27. Although no expense has been spared to keep the concerts up to the modern standard, the price of tickets will be the same as before, $12 and $7.50 for the series of public rehearsals, and for the series of concerts, according to the location of seats. The $12 season tickets for the public rehearsals will be sold at auction in Music Hall on Monday, Sept. 27; the $7.50 tickets for rehearsals on Tuesday, Sept. 28; the $12 tickets for the Saturday evening concerts on Thursday, Sept. 30, and the $7.50 tickets for the concerts on Friday, Oct. 1. The sales will begin each day at 10 A.M., and will be conducted by Auctioneer Jackson. Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. A very important detail is that the premium bid will be on each ticket. Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought or they will be resold. The seats open to competition will be shown on a large diagram and will be marked off as soon as sold.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.

THURSDAY MORNING, SEPT. 23, 1897.

MR. PAUR WILL STAY

The New Contract He Is Said to Have Signed.

It is understood among musicians of this city that Mr. Emil Paur, director of the Symphony orchestra, has signed a contract with Mr. H. L. Higginson, under which the former is to serve another five years' term at the head of the orchestra.

It is stated that, under this contract, if for any reason Mr. Higginson should decide to secure another director before the five years' term is up, Mr. Paur will receive a bonus of $10,000.

The news that the director is probably to remain in Boston does not come exactly as a surprise, but it is generally received with a good deal of satisfaction by local musicians.

When Mr. Paur came to Boston there existed two cliques among symphony audiences. One group might be called the Gericke adherents, while the other was apparently discontented that Mr. Nikisch was not to remain at the head of the orchestra.

During Mr. Paur's directorship these factions have entirely disappeared and both parties have apparently joined in a common sentiment of admiration over the striking success which the present director has achieved.

Boston Daily Globe.

THURSDAY, SEPT. 23, 1897.

Prodigal in attractions is the new season of the Boston symphony orchestra, and it is clearly to be seen that these concerts will fully maintain their popularity with the public. The auction sales of season tickets for the Friday afternoon rehearsals will be held at Music hall next Monday and Tuesday, and for the Saturday evening concerts Thursday and Friday of next week.

Boston Journal.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 24, 1897.

The announcements that have been made concerning this year's symphony concerts give unqualified satisfaction to patrons of this popular series. The programs promised and the number and distinction of the solo artists engaged lend great attractiveness to the scheme and will make the concerts more than ever the vogue. The auction sales of season tickets will be held at Music Hall on Monday, Tuesday, Thursday and Friday of next week.

Arlington Advocate

OFFICE
Fowle's Block, Mass. Avenue.

Published every Friday forenoon by
C. S. PARKER & SON,
Editors and Proprietors.

Subscription—$2. Single copies 5 cts.

Arlington, Sept. 24, 1897.

☞ The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Emil Paur conductor, will begin its new season on Oct. 15, and with occasional omissions to permit its usual visits to New York and other cities, will give concerts at Music Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of each week until April 30. The fine quality of the performances of this great organization have made these concerts famous, and they appeal to music lovers from all parts of New England. The list of distinguished solo artists engaged for the series includes Mme. Melba, Mrs. Henschel, Mrs. Titus, Miss Wienzkowska, Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler, Miss Olive Mead, Mr. Bispham, Mr. Rosenthal, Mr. Joseffy, Mr. Siloti, Mr. McDowell, Mr. Kneisel, Mr. Loeffler, Mr. Adamowski, Mr. Schnitzler, Mr. Schroeder and Mr. Schulz. The auction sales of season tickets will be held at Boston Music Hall on Monday, Tuesday, Thursday and Friday, Sept. 27, 28, 30 and Oct. 1.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, SEPT. 25, 1897.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The Boston Symphony orchestra will begin its seventeenth season October 15, under the leadership of Mr. Emil Paur. The season will include, as usual, twenty four public rehearsals on Friday afternoons, and twenty-four concerts on Saturday evenings.

The array of artists for this season is especially attractive. It includes Mme. Melba, Mrs. Henschel, Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield Zeisler, Mrs. Titus, a soprano, and a debutante of great promise; Miss Wienzkowska, the pianiste, who scored a marked success with the Kneisel Quartet in New York last season, and Miss Olive Mead, a talented pupil of Mr. Kneisel; Mr. Rosenthal, the eminent piano virtuoso; Mr. Bispham, who was one of the leading baritones of the Metropolitan opera company; Mr. Joseffy, of whom it is not necessary to speak; Mr. Siloti, a pianist, who makes his first visit to this country; Mr. E. A. MacDowell, Messrs. Kneisel, Loeffler, Adamowski, Schnitzler, Schroeder and Schulz.

Among the prominent novelties will be Chabrier's "Espagna" and "Marche Joyeuse," Glazounow's "Poeme Lyrique," Rimsky Korsakoff's "Oster Fest," Tschaikowsky's "Italian Caprice," Richard Strauss' symphonic poem, "Zaratnusta," and Saint-Saens' symphonic poem, "Princess Jaune."

The sale of season tickets will be by auction, as usual, and will be held at Music Hall during next week. The prices of tickets will be precisely the same as in the past, $12 and $7 50 for the series of public rehearsals and for the series of concerts, according to the location of seats. The $12 season tickets for the public rehearsals will be sold Monday, September 27; the $7 50 tickets for the rehearsals on Tuesday, September 28. The $12 tickets for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold on Thursday, September 30, and the $7.50 tickets for the concerts on Friday, October 1. The sales will begin at 10 A. M. each day.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.

SATURDAY MORNING, SEPT. 25, 1897.

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Emil Paur, conductor, will begin its new season on Oct. 15, and with occasional omissions to permit its usual visits to New York and other cities, will give concerts at Boston Music Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of each week until April 30.

The fine quality of the performances of this great organization have made these concerts famous and they appeal to music lovers from all parts of New England. The list of distinguished solo artists engaged for the series includes Mme. Melba, Mrs. Henschel, Mrs. Titus, Miss Wienzkowska, Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler, Miss Olive Mead, Mr. Bispham, Mr. Rosenthal, Mr. Joseffy, Mr. Siloti, Mr. MacDowell, Mr. Kneisel, Mr. Loeffler, Mr. Adamowski, Mr. Schnitzler, Mr. Schroeder and Mr. Schulz.

The auction sales of season tickets will be held at Boston Music Hall on Monday, Tuesday, Thursday and Friday, Sept. 27, 28, 30 and Oct. 1.

Boston Daily Globe.

SATURDAY, SEPT. 25, 1897.

Next Monday morning at 10 o'clock the sale of tickets for the 17th symphony season will open in Music hall.

MALDEN MIRROR
AND MESSENGER.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 25, 1897.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Emil Paur conductor, will begin its new season on October 15, and with occasional omissions to permit its usual visits to New York and other cities, will give concerts at Boston Music Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of each week until April 30. The fine quality of the performances of this great organization have made these concerts famous, and they appeal to music lovers from all parts of New England. The list of distinguished solo artists engaged for the series includes Mme. Melba, Mrs. Henschel, Mrs. Titus, Miss Wienzkowska, Mrs. Bloomfield-Reisler, Miss Olive Mead, Mr. Bispham, Mr. Rosenthal, Mr. Joseffy, Mr. Siloti, Mr. MacDowell, Mr. Kneisel, Mr. Leoffler, Mr. Aadmowski, Mr. Schnitzler, Mr. Schroeder, and Mr. Schulz. The auction sales of season tickets will be held at Boston Music Hall on Monday, Tuesday, Thursday and Friday, Sept. 27, 28, 30 and Oct. 1.

Boston Journal.

FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 24, 1897.

MR. PAUR'S CONTRACT.

Understood That Symphony Conductor Has Signed for Another Five Years.

It is understood among musicians that Mr. Emil Paur, director of the Symphony Orchestra, has signed a contract with Mr. H. L. Higginson, under which the former is to serve another five years' term at the head of the orchestra.

It is stated that under this contract, if for any reason Mr. Higginson should decide to secure another director before the five years' term is up, Mr. Paur will receive a bonus of $10,000.

N. Y. Times Sept. 26.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Emil Paur, conductor, will give concerts at the Metropolitan Opera House on Thursday evenings, Nov. 11, Dec. 16, Jan. 20, Feb. 17, and March 24. Mr. Joseffy will be the soloist at the first concert. Mme. Melba, Mme. Nordica, Mr. Kneisel, and Mr. Loeffler will also appear in the series. Less than twenty years ago Bostonians depended on the visits of New York organizations for their best orchestral concerts and listened to them with delight, owing to their superiority over the performances of the best local organizations. But time has changed all this, and for more than a decade Boston has provided its own high-class concerts, and the playing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been the standard of orchestral performances in America. New Yorkers are beginning to appreciate this orchestra and to look to it for the most finished and satisfying performances. The organization is maintained solely for concert performances, and the individual musicianship of its players and the care exercised in rehearsals for all its performances have placed it on a plane where few orchestras of the world can be compared to it.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, SEPT. 25, 1897.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The Boston Symphony orchestra will begin its seventeenth season October 15, under the leadership of Mr. Emil Paur. The season will include, as usual, twenty four public rehearsals on Friday afternoons, and twenty-four concerts on Saturday evenings.

The array of artists for this season is especially attractive. It includes Mme. Melba, Mrs. Henschel, Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield Zeisler, Mrs. Titus, a soprano, and a debutante of great promise; Miss Wienzkowska, the pianiste, who scored a marked success with the Kneisel Quartet in New York last season, and Miss Olive Mead, a talented pupil of Mr. Kneisel; Mr. Rosenthal, the eminent piano virtuoso; Mr. Bispham, who was one of the leading baritones of the Metropolitan opera company; Mr. Joseffy, of whom it is not necessary to speak; Mr. Siloti, a pianist, who makes his first visit to this country; Mr. E. A. MacDowell, Messrs. Kneisel, Loeffler, Adamowski, Schnitzler, Schroeder and Schulz.

Among the prominent novelties will be Chabrier's "Espagna" and "Marche Joyeuse," Glazounow's "Poeme Lyrique," Rimsky Korsakoff's "Oster Fest," Tschaikowsky's "Italian Caprice," Richard Strauss' symphonic poem, "Zaratnusta," and Saint-Saens' symphonic poem, "Princess Jaune."

The sale of season tickets will be by auction, as usual, and will be held at Music Hall during next week. The prices of tickets will be precisely the same as in the past, $12 and $7 50 for the series of public rehearsals and for the series of concerts, according to the location of seats. The $12 season tickets for the public rehearsals will be sold Monday, September 27; the $7 50 tickets for the rehearsals on Tuesday, September 28. The $12 tickets for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold on Thursday, September 30, and the $7.50 tickets for the concerts on Friday, October 1. The sales will begin at 10 A. M. each day.

American Art Journal.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, SEPT. 25, 1897

Ten Symphony Concerts, 5 evening and 5 matinees, will be given by the Boston Symphony Society, Emil Paur, conductor, under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute, this season. Mme. Melba and Sig. Campanari will appear among the soloists.

THE BOSTON COMMERCIAL.
SEPTEMBER 25 1897.

The Sale of Tickets For Symphony Concerts and Rehearsals.

The sale of seats for the Symphony rehearsals will open at the Music Hall box office next Monday and will continue Tuesday, while tickets for the series of concerts will be sold on Thursday and Friday next.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be immediately resold.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, SEPT. 26, 1897.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The Auction Sale of Season Tickets Will be Held This Week—A Fine Prospectus for the Coming Season.

The sale of season tickets for the rehearsals and concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music hall begins tomorrow and continues through the week, and the price of tickets will be the same as heretofore—$12 and $7.50 for the series of public rehearsals, and for the series of concerts, according to the location of the seats.

The $12 season tickets for the public rehearsals will be sold at auction in Music hall, Sept. 27; the $7.50 tickets for rehearsals on Tuesday, Sept. 28; the $12 tickets for the Saturday evening concerts on Thursday, Sept. 30, and the $7 50 tickets for the concerts on Friday, Oct. 1.

The sales will begin each day at 10 a. m., and will be conducted by Auctioneer Jackson. Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. A very important detail is that the premium bid will be on each ticket. Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought or they will be resold. The seats open to competition will be shown on a large diagram and will be marked off as soon as sold.

The Symphony orchestra season promises to be one of the most prosperous and enjoyable this distinctly Bostonian institution has ever known. Conductor Paur has now established himself in public favor as an able director and satisfactory programme maker, and his announcements for this year include a carefully selected variety of ever welcome standard works and a great number of novelties which he considers worthy of presentation.

The list of solo artists is the best ever announced. It includes Melba, Mrs. Henschel, Rosenthal, Joseffy, Siloti, Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler, Miss Wienzkowska, Miss Olive Mead, Miss Titus, and Messrs. Bispham, Kneisel, Loeffler, Adamowski, Schnitzler, Schroder, Schulz and others. Mr. Siloti ond Miss Wienzkowska are pianists of distinction who have never been heard in these concerts. Miss Olive Mead is a young violinist, and Miss Titus is a débutante who is said to possess a voice of great beauty which gives promise of a brilliant career.

Some of the novelties to be presented are: Chabrier's "Espagna" and "Marche Joyeuse," Glazounow's "Poeme Lyrique," "Rimsky Korsakoff's "Oster Fest," Tschaikowsky's "Italian Caprice," Richard Strauss's symphonic poem, "Princess Jaune."

The orchestral numbers of the first four programmes will be:

1. Oct. 15-16—Brahms, Academic Overture; Beethoven, Symphony No. 7 in A major; Chabrier, "Espagna"; Glazounow, "Poeme Lyrique"; Wagner, "Kaisermarsch."

2. Oct. 22-23—Rimsky Korsakoff, "Oster Fest"; Schumann, Symphony No. 1 in B flat; Eschaikowsky, "Italian Caprice."

3. Oct. 29-30—Richard Strauss, symphony poem, "Zarathustra"; Brahms, Symphony No. 3 in F major; Weber-Weingartner, "Invitation to Dance."

4. Nov. 5-6—Haydn, Symphony No. 7 in C; Mozart, Serenade; Beethoven, overture, "Lenore," No. 2.

SATURDAY EVENING
Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, SEPT. 26.

The sales for the tickets for the Symphony concerts are arranged as follows:

The $12 seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Monday Sept. 27, at 10 A. M.; the $7.50 seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Tuesday, Sept. 28, at 10 A. M.; the $12 seats for the Concerts will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Thursday, Sept. 30, at 10 A. M.; the $7.50 seats for the Concerts will be sold in like manner, at the same place, on Friday, Oct. 1, at 10 A. M. Among the soloists who will appear during the season are Mme. Melba, Mrs. Henschel, Miss Wienzkowska, Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler, Mr. Rosenthal, Mr. Joseffy, Mr. Seloti, Mr. MacDowell and Mr. Kneisel. Several new works are promised during the season, which promises to be of unusual interest.

[19]

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CII., NO. 88.

SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 26, 1897.

Mr. Paur and the Symphony Orchestra Leadership.

What He Says About His Contract as Conductor — The Annual Sales of Symphony Seats — "Wang" at the

EMIL PAUR AND THE SYMPHONY.

The report is current that Mr. Emil Paur has been asked by Mr. H. L. Higginson to retain his position as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra for five years longer. Mr. Paur was first engaged for a period of five years with the understanding that he was under contract for five years more, at the end of the first five years, unless his services were not longer desired. Mr. Paur ends his fifth season as conductor this winter.

When seen, yesterday, Mr. Paur said: "The published statement that Mr. Higginson has signified his desire that I should continue as conductor of the symphony for five years more is absolutely without foundation. I consider myself bound for five years more unless I am requested to withdraw. I have not yet been informed what are the wishes of the management."

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The most important musical announcement of the year is that of the annual auction sales of season tickets for the two series of concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The interest in these sales never relaxes, and probably never will as long as the acknowledged high standing of the orchestra is maintained. Tomorrow, Monday, morning, at 10 o'clock, in Music Hall, Auctioneer Jackson will begin the series of sales which occupy four days in the week. On Monday, the $12 seats for the 24 public rehearsals will be sold; on Tuesday, the $7.50 seats for the public rehearsals; on Thursday, the $12 seats for the 24 Saturday evening concerts, and on Friday, the $7.50 seats for the concerts. Each sale will begin at 10 o'clock and will continue without interruption throughout the day until all the tickets are sold. Only four seats will be sold on one bid, and one most important detail is that the premium bid is on each ticket. The list of soloists is a striking one, including Mme. Melba, Mrs. Henschel, Miss Wienzkowska, Mrs. Titus, Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler, Miss Olive Mead, Mr. Bispham, Mr. Rosenthal, Mr. Joseffy, Mr. Siloti, Mr. MacDowell, Mr. Kneisel, Mr. Loeffler, Mr. Adamowski, Mr. Schnitzler, Mr. Schroeder, and Mr. Schulz. The concerts have grown to be a permanent and potent element in the entertainment season. Every announcement made by the management has been fulfilled, except in case of illness, accident, or events beyond control.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 26, 1897.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The auction sales of season tickets at Music Hall this week for the Symphony rehearsals and concerts will begin tomorrow (Monday), when the $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold. The $7 50 rehearsal seats will be sold on Tuesday, and the $12 and $7 50 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold on Thursday and Friday respectively. The sales will begin each morning at 10 o'clock.

"A virtuoso orchestra," as the critic of the New York Sun called it last winter, is a title justly bestowed on the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Unlike nearly every other organization appealing to the musical public for support, the attractiveness of its performances rests upon the musicianship and ability of all its members and the perfection of its ensemble, and not upon the personality and talent of an individual or of a few stars. For perfection of detail its performances can only be compared to the dramatic performances of the Comédie Francaise, and, like that famous institution, the permanency of its success seems assured.

The announcements that have been published concerning Conductor Paur's programs for the approaching season have occasioned much favorable comment in musical circles, the list of solo artists engaged is particularly brilliant, and the opinion is general that the season of 1897-98 will be one of the most enjoyable in the history of the organization.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, SEPT. 26, 1897.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Everybody interested in good music watches with pleasant anticipation for the announcement of the two series of concerts by the Boston symphony orchestra. It is almost superfluous to attempt to define the tremendous hold the concerts of this organization have upon the musical public. Sixteen consecutive years of the nearest approach to perfect performances of any organization in this country is one explanation of the high standing of the orchestra.

Tomorrow morning, in Music hall, will begin the series of auction sales which will occupy four days in the week. Monday the $12 seats for the 24 public rehearsals will be sold; Tuesday the $7.50 seats for the rehearsals; Thursday the $12 seats for the 24 Saturday evening concerts, and Friday the $7.50 seats for the concerts. Each sale will begin at 10 o'clock, and will continue without interruption throughout the day until all the tickets are sold. Only four seats will be sold on each bid, and one most important detail is that the premium bid is on each ticket.

The list of soloists announced for the coming series is a striking one, including Mme Melba, Mrs Henschel, Miss Wienzkowska, Mrs Titus, Mrs Bloomfield-Zeisler, Miss Olive Mead, Mr Bispham, Mr Rosenthal, Mr Joseffy, Mr Siloti, Mr MacDowell, Mr Kneisel, Mr Loeffler, Mr Adamowski, Mr Schnitzler, Mr Schroeder and Mr Schulz.

BOSTON
HOME JOURNAL
A PAPER OF TO-DAY

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 25, 1897.

On Monday and Tuesday the rehearsal tickets for the Boston Symphony Orchestra rehearsals will be sold at auction in the usual way. Tne concert tickets will be sold Thursday and Friday of next week. Bids will be accepted in the regular order only, and not for choice, and no more than four are to be sold on a bid. The rehearsals begin Oct. 15 and the concerts Oct. 16. Mr. Emil Paur will conduct, and the list of soloists includes Mme. Melba, Mrs. Henschel, Miss Wienzkowska, Mrs. Titus, Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler, Miss Olive Mead, Messrs. Bispham, Rosenthal, Joseffy, Siloti, MacDowell, Kneisel, Loeffler, Adamowski, Schnitzler, Schroeder and Schulz.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, SEPT. 26, 1897.

THE NEXT SYMPHONY SEASON.

The time has returned for the annual sale of the Symphony season-ticket sale, which will take place under the customary conditions at Music Hall on the four advertised days of next week.

In many previous years it was not thought necessary to give the public any inkling of what music was to be provided and what soloists would be likely to appear; but Mr. Paur has instituted the excellent plan of setting out his first few programmes as an indication of his general scheme and as an encouragement to the patrons. This time he has given out four programmes complete in all but the selections which the soloists will add to them. An analysis shows that there are to be played Beethoven's seventh, Schumann's first, Brahms's third and Haydn's seventh symphonies; Beethoven's "Lenora No. 2" and Brahm's "Academic overtures," Wagner's "Kaisermarsch" and the orchestral version of Weber's "Invitation to the Dance." So much for what is known and standard; while there are to be novelties from the pens of Saint-Saens, Chabrier, Glazounow, Rimsky-Korsakoff and Richard Strauss. The solo list names Mme. Melba, Mrs. Henschel and Mr. Bispham among the vocalists, and Rosenthal, Joseffy, and some highly reputed strangers among the pianists, while the leading men of the orchestra will be heard in their due turns. Altogether the season ought to be a great one if it lives up to its promise.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, SEPTEMBER 26, 1897.
(Copyright, 1897, Post Publishing Company.)

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Tomorrow morning in Music Hall, at 10 o'clock, the "curtain raiser" of the musical season in Boston will be performed. Auctioneer Jackson will have the leading part, supported by a very numerous company of the public, many of whom have played their respective roles every season for several years past. The plot will be the $12 seats for the twenty-four Friday afternoon public rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a most attractive and interesting bill. The action will be spirited and continuous throughout the day.

On Tuesday will be sold the $7.50 seats for the rehearsals; on Thursday the $12 seats for the twenty-four Saturday evening concerts, and on Friday the $7.50 seats for the concerts. Each sale begins at 10 o'clock and continues without interruption until all the tickets are sold. Only four seats will be sold on one bid, and a most important detail is that the premium bid is on each ticket.

A most potent factor is the announcement of the appearance during the season of such great artists as Mme. Melba, Mrs. Henschel, Miss Wienzkowska, Mrs. Titus, Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler, Miss Olive Mead, Mr. Bispham, Mr. Rosenthal, Mr. Joseffy, Mr. Siloti, Mr. MacDowell, Mr. Kneisel, Mr. Loeffler, Mr. Adamowski, Mr. Schnitzler, Mr. Schroeder and Mr. Schulz.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.

MONDAY MORNING, SEPT. 27, 1897.

SYMPHONY TICKET SALES.

The auction sale of season tickets for the symphony rehearsals and concerts, a necessary preliminary to these entertainments, will begin at Music Hall this morning at 10 o'clock, when the $12 seats for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals will be sold.

The number of these seats is 1423, and although the usual lively demand is expected, it should be borne in mind that those attending the sale invariably have opportunities of securing some of them at merely nominal premiums.

Boston Journal.

TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 28, 1897.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

All the $12 season tickets for the Symphony rehearsals were sold at yesterday's auction, which was the most successful sale held in this city for many years. The $7 50 seats for the same series will be sold at Music Hall this morning. The tickets for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold on Thursday and Friday. The sales begin each morning at 10 o'clock.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.

TUESDAY MORNING, SEPT. 28, 1897.

SYMPHONY SEATS SOLD.

When Henry Jackson, auctioner for the sale of seats for rehearsal of Boston Symphony concerts, took his place on Music Hall platform yesterday morning he was greeted with gentle applause from all parts of the house.

Then the auctioneer began on the $12 seats for the rehearsals. The bidding was spirited, and the prices averaged very much higher than for several preceding seasons. The highest price for the first front rows was $41 premium.

When the advantageous midway of the hall was reached there was much rivalry, and it was evident that more than one person had quite set their hearts on sitting in just such a particular place, and that the agents had had orders to secure them at most any price. The highest price, $102 premium, was realized on four seats, centre aisle in K. Other seats nearby went for $90 premium, $80 premium, etc.

Morning buying was almost wholly by brokers.

There was a large convention of society people, music lovers, and music students that came and went, yet at all times the floor of the hall was well filled, and quite a number of people were in the first gallery.

In the afternoon the throng was still the same size as in the morning. Everybody was greatly interested in the struggle for centre aisle seats. Here Mr. Conley secured a great number of the best.

Mrs. J. L. Gardner will as usual have her concert seat in the gallery, and her favorite rehearsal seat on the floor.

Among those noted were Col. Blackwell, Mrs. Sybilla Crane, G. E. Farnsworth, Elmer Webster, J. H. Phillips, Walter Emery, G. H. Baker, Miss Griswold, Mrs. H. J. Sears, Mrs. F. E. Elliott.

The sales will be continued at Music Hall today, when the $7.50 seats will be offered. The tickets for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold on Thursday and Friday. The sales begin each day at 10 A. M.

Sept BOSTON POST, 28
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

BOSTON SYMPHONY SALE.

All the $12 season tickets for the Symphony rehearsals were sold at yesterday's auction, which was the most successful sale held in this city for many years. The $7.50 seats for the same series will be sold at Music Hall this morning. The tickets for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold on Thursday and Friday. The sales begin each morning at 10 o'clock.

Boston Transcript

TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 28, 1897

SYMPHONY TICKETS ARE EXPENSIVE.

Premium of $33 Paid for Each of Four Seats in the First Balcony.

At Music Hall this morning were sold the $7.50 seats for the symphony rehearsals, and the crowd of buyers and those who came out of curiosity was fully equal to that of yesterday. The sale started in with the fourth row under the balcony. The first bid was $1, but this was advanced rapidly up to $12.50. Several seats close by brought between $10 and $11.50, and then came a jump to $16 for a single seat. There was nothing else in this part of the hall that approached that in price, a large number of seats going for from $7 to $9.50, and also a lot for from $4.50 to $5.50.

The first three seats in the first balcony went for $24 premium, and then several close at hand went for $21, seat 41 being an exception and bringing $27. The highest price paid in the first baloony was $33 premium for each of four seats on the left-hand side of the hall. These were bought by a Back Bay speculator. The seat next to these sold for $32, but the average price in this vicinity was from $18 ot $20. Four seats in the second row brought $16, and another speculator paid $26 for two seats. Then came the sixth and seventh rows in the first balcony, over the clock, which averaged $12.50, although some lively bidding sent seat 408 up to $17. This was the highest price obtained for seats in this part of the hall. A lot of seats in the next to the rear row sold for about $10 to $11, although one seat in the rear row brought $12.50. The last seat sold was 504, and this brought $11.

The prices obtained thus far are considerable in advance of former years, and the managers naturally feel much pleased at the results. On Thursday morning, at ten o'clock, there will be sold the $12 seats for the concerts, and on Friday, at the same hour, the $7.50 seats will be disposed of.

Boston Herald.

MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 27, 1897.

SYMPHONY TICKET SALES.

The auction sales of season tickets for the Symphony rehearsals and concerts, a necessary preliminary to these fine entertainments, will begin at Music Hall this morning at 10 o'clock, when the $12 seats for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals will be sold. The number of these seats is 1423, and although the usual lively demand is expected it should be borne in mind that those attending the sale invariably have opportunities of securing some of them at merely nominal premiums.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 27, 1897.

PROSPERITY.

Symphony Ticket Sale Shows It's Here.

Four Seats in K Bring Each $102 Extra.

Premiums Average Far Ahead of Last Year.

The proof of prosperity is the abundant circulation of money. This is not taken from the Hon. W. J. Bryan or any other political maker of words. It is one of the current thoughts of Mr. Charles E. Ellis, manager of the Symphony concerts.

The Journal reporter is betraying no state secret when he writes that until this morning there was some uncertainty at Music Hall regarding the success of the sale of Symphony tickets. There had been many rumors—ordinary town-talk rumors—of prosperity; but rumors are not counted by the business agents of Maj. Higginson.

But now all the rumors have come true. Prosperity is here. The proof of it is the plenteousness of money, which, in turn, is shown by the high prices paid as premiums.

The sale today includes all the $12 rehearsal seats—the Friday afternoon seats. The competition, of course, is on the premium. Last year seats number 16 and 17 in row H sold at $87 premium. This was an advance of $7 beyond the highest premium coaxed forth or excited in '95.

Today seats numbered 14, 15, 16 and 17 in row K brought a premium of $102. That is to say, the price of attending the rehearsals will cost the occupants of these seats $456. The highest premium the Journal reporter remembers noting during the last four years was $92 each on two seats in the first balcony. The $92 premium was produced by a very sharp—it might be called bitter—competition.

Today, without any sharpness or bitterness whatever, it was not uncommon to hear the bids run up to $80. There were seats in row N, even, that brought $91 premium today. Last year this would have been regarded as extraordinary. Today the managers of the sale smile, rub their hands and say, "Prosperity did it."

There is no other explanation. No change in the conductorship is probable. Mr. Paur may not have signed his contract, but, nevertheless, he is announced as conductor. The personnel of the orchestra is practically the same as it was last year. The list of soloists is not remarkable for its powers of attraction. No advantages are offered this year that were not offered last. The only explanation of today's high prices left is the revival of business, the return of prosperity.

The plainness of this was heightened by the prominence of the ticket agents. They occupied an entire section of the front row; and they made a bid on everything good that happened along. It was one of these agents that paid the $102 premium on four seats in K. Some agent was concerned in every high bid.

Another sign of the widespread success of worldly things was the large attendance. When Auctioneer Jackson called for bids on seat No. 1 in A the floor was well filled. The bidding, moreover, never flagged. It was more than ever a business affair. Society, so far as its leaders go, seemed to have stayed at home; that is, in the country. This may have occasioned the prominence of the ticket agents. Mrs. Gardner, Mr. J. Montgomery Sears and other equally notable patrons of the Symphony concerts were represented. Formerly Mrs. Gardner was an alert attendant, choosing her seats and fixing her own price. So, to pursue the old road, it may be said that the general prosperity explains the large number of new faces and the old willingness of the veteran patrons to confide in the agents.

The start of the bidding foreshadowed nothing. The first seat in A brought $7. That was ordinary—just the same as in past years. But immediately afterward the premium ascended to $13, then to $15, then to $20 and $25 and $30. It rose and rose as the seats farther away from the stage were sold. The ends of the rows brought from $30 to $50. End seats in N sold for $41 premium. Many and many a bid started at $50, and stopped at $60 or $65. Some went up to $80, without creating much talk. It shocked those who were thinking of last year's prices. M No. 18 sold for $90—just one seat, which will cost some one (an agent got it) $102.

No one knows where the prices will stop.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CII., NO. 88.

SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 26, 1897.

Mr. Paur and the Symphony Orchestra Leadership.

What He Says About His Contract as Conductor — The Annual Sales of Symphony Seats — "Wang" at the

EMIL PAUR AND THE SYMPHONY.

The report is current that Mr. Emil Paur has been asked by Mr. H. L. Higginson to retain his position as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra for five years longer. Mr. Paur was first engaged for a period of five years with the understanding that he was under contract for five years more, at the end of the first five years, unless his services were not longer desired. Mr. Paur ends his fifth season as conductor this winter.

When seen, yesterday, Mr. Paur said: "The published statement that Mr. Higginson has signified his desire that I should continue as conductor of the symphony for five years more is absolutely without foundation. I consider myself bound for five years more unless I am requested to withdraw. I have not yet been informed what are the wishes of the management."

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The most important musical announcement of the year is that of the annual auction sales of season tickets for the two series of concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The interest in these sales never relaxes, and probably never will as long as the acknowledged high standing of the orchestra is maintained. Tomorrow, Monday, morning, at 10 o'clock, in Music Hall, Auctioneer Jackson will begin the series of sales which occupy four days in the week. On Monday, the $12 seats for the 24 public rehearsals will be sold; on Tuesday, the $7.50 seats for the public rehearsals; on Thursday, the $12 seats for the 24 Saturday evening concerts, and on Friday, the $7.50 seats for the concerts. Each sale will begin at 10 o'clock and will continue without interruption throughout the day until all the tickets are sold. Only four seats will be sold on one bid, and one most important detail is that the premium bid is on each ticket. The list of soloists is a striking one, including Mme. Melba, Mrs. Henschel, Miss Wienzkowska, Mrs. Titus, Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler, Miss Olive Mead, Mr. Bispham, Mr. Rosenthal, Mr. Joseffy, Mr. Siloti, Mr. MacDowell, Mr. Kneisel, Mr. Loeffler, Mr. Adamowski, Mr. Schnitzler, Mr. Schroeder, and Mr. Schulz. The concerts have grown to be a permanent and potent element in the entertainment season. Every announcement made by the management has been fulfilled, except in case of illness, accident, or events beyond control.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 26, 1897.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The auction sales of season tickets at Music Hall this week for the Symphony rehearsals and concerts will begin tomorrow (Monday), when the $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold. The $7 50 rehearsal seats will be sold on Tuesday, and the $12 and $7 50 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold on Thursday and Friday respectively. The sales will begin each morning at 10 o'clock.

"A virtuoso orchestra," as the critic of the New York Sun called it last winter, is a title justly bestowed on the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Unlike nearly every other organization appealing to the musical public for support, the attractiveness of its performances rests upon the musicianship and ability of all its members and the perfection of its ensemble, and not upon the personality and talent of an individual or of a few stars. For perfection of detail its performances can only be compared to the dramatic performances of the Comédie Francaise, and, like that famous institution, the permanency of its success seems assured.

The announcements that have been published concerning Conductor Paur's programs for the approaching season have occasioned much favorable comment in musical circles, the list of solo artists engaged is particularly brilliant, and the opinion is general that the season of 1897-98 will be one of the most enjoyable in the history of the organization.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, SEPT. 26, 1897.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Everybody interested in good music watches with pleasant anticipation for the announcement of the two series of concerts by the Boston symphony orchestra. It is almost superfluous to attempt to define the tremendous hold the concerts of this organization have upon the musical public. Sixteen consecutive years of the nearest approach to perfect performances of any organization in this country is one explanation of the high standing of the orchestra.

Tomorrow morning, in Music hall, will begin the series of auction sales which will occupy four days in the week. Monday the $12 seats for the 24 public rehearsals will be sold; Tuesday the $7.50 seats for the rehearsals; Thursday the $12 seats for the 24 Saturday evening concerts, and Friday the $7.50 seats for the concerts. Each sale will begin at 10 o'clock, and will continue without interruption throughout the day until all the tickets are sold. Only four seats will be sold on each bid, and one most important detail is that the premium bid is on each ticket.

The list of soloists announced for the coming series is a striking one, including Mme Melba, Mrs Henschel, Miss Wienzkowska, Mrs Titus, Mrs Bloomfield-Zeisler, Miss Olive Mead, Mr Bispham, Mr Rosenthal, Mr Joseffy, Mr Siloti, Mr MacDowell, Mr Kneisel, Mr Loeffler, Mr Adamowski, Mr Schnitzler, Mr Schroeder and Mr Schulz.

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL

A PAPER OF TO-DAY

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 25, 1897.

On Monday and Tuesday the rehearsal tickets for the Boston Symphony Orchestra rehearsals will be sold at auction in the usual way. Tne concert tickets will be sold Thursday and Friday of next week. Bids will be accepted in the regular order only, and not for choice, and no more than four are to be sold on a bid. The rehearsals begin Oct. 15 and the concerts Oct. 16. Mr. Emil Paur will conduct, and the list of soloists includes Mme. Melba, Mrs. Henschel, Miss Wienzkowska, Mrs. Titus, Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler, Miss Olive Mead, Messrs. Bispham, Rosenthal, Joseffy, Siloti, MacDowell, Kneisel, Loeffler, Adamowski, Schnitzler, Schroeder and Schulz.

Boston Journ

MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 27, 1897.

SYMPHONY TICKET SALES.

The auction sales of season tickets for the Symphony rehearsals and concerts, a necessary preliminary to these fine entertainments, will begin at Music Hall this morning at 10 o'clock, when the $12 seats for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals will be sold. The number of these seats is 1423, and although the usual lively demand is expected it should be borne in mind that those attending the sale invariably have opportunities of securing some of them at merely nominal premiums.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, SEPT. 26, 1897.

THE NEXT SYMPHONY SEASON.

The time has returned for the annual sale of the Symphony season-ticket sale, which will take place under the customary conditions at Music Hall on the four advertised days of next week.

In many previous years it was not thought necessary to give the public any inkling of what music was to be provided and what soloists would be likely to appear; but Mr. Paur has instituted the excellent plan of setting out his first few programmes as an indication of his general scheme and as an encouragement to the patrons. This time he has given out four programmes complete in all but the selections which the soloists will add to them. An analysis shows that there are to be played Beethoven's seventh, Schumann's first, Brahms's third and Haydn's seventh symphonies; Beethoven's "Lenora No. 2" and Brahm's "Academic overtures," Wagner's "Kaisermarsch" and the orchestral version of Weber's "Invitation to the Dance." So much for what is known and standard; while there are to be novelties from the pens of Saint-Saens, Chabrier, Glazounow, Rimsky-Korsakoff and Richard Strauss. The solo list names Mme. Melba, Mrs. Henschel and Mr. Bispham among the vocalists, and Rosenthal, Joseffy, and some highly reputed strangers among the pianists, while the leading men of the orchestra will be heard in their due turns. Altogether the season ought to be a great one if it lives up to its promise.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, SEPTEMBER 26, 1897.
(Copyright, 1897, Post Publishing Company.)

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Tomorrow morning in Music Hall, at 10 o'clock, the "curtain raiser" of the musical season in Boston will be performed. Auctioneer Jackson will have the leading part, supported by a very numerous company of the public, many of whom have played their respective roles every season for several years past. The plot will be the $12 seats for the twenty-four Friday afternoon public rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a most attractive and interesting bill. The action will be spirited and continuous throughout the day.

On Tuesday will be sold the $7.50 seats for the rehearsals; on Thursday the $12 seats for the twenty-four Saturday evening concerts, and on Friday the $7.50 seats for the concerts. Each sale begins at 10 o'clock and continues without interruption until all the tickets are sold. Only four seats will be sold on one bid, and a most important detail is that the premium bid is on each ticket.

A most potent factor is the announcement of the appearance during the season of such great artists as Mme. Melba, Mrs. Henschel, Miss Wienzkowska, Mrs. Titus, Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler, Miss Olive Mead, Mr. Bispham, Mr. Rosenthal, Mr. Joseffy, Mr. Siloti, Mr. MacDowell, Mr. Kneisel, Mr. Loeffler, Mr. Adamowski, Mr. Schnitzler, Mr. Schroeder and Mr. Schulz.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.

The Official Paper of the City.

MONDAY MORNING, SEPT. 27, 1897.

SYMPHONY TICKET SALES.

The auction sale of season tickets for the symphony rehearsals and concerts, a necessary preliminary to these entertainments, will begin at Music Hall this morning at 10 o'clock, when the $12 seats for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals will be sold.

The number of these seats is 1423, and although the usual lively demand is expected, it should be borne in mind that those attending the sale invariably have opportunities of securing some of them at merely nominal premiums.

Boston Journal.

TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 28, 1897.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

All the $12 season tickets for the Symphony rehearsals were sold at yesterday's auction, which was the most successful sale held in this city for many years. The $7 50 seats for the same series will be sold at Music Hall this morning. The tickets for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold on Thursday and Friday. The sales begin each morning at 10 o'clock.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.

The Official Paper of the City.

TUESDAY MORNING, SEPT. 28, 1897.

SYMPHONY SEATS SOLD.

When Henry Jackson, auctioner for the sale of seats for rehearsal of Boston Symphony concerts, took his place on Music Hall platform yesterday morning he was greeted with gentle applause from all parts of the house.

Then the auctioneer began on the $12 seats for the rehearsals. The bidding was spirited, and the prices averaged very much higher than for several preceding seasons. The highest price for the first front rows was $41 premium.

When the advantageous midway of the hall was reached there was much rivalry, and it was evident that more than one person had quite set their hearts on sitting in just such a particular place, and that the agents had had orders to secure them at most any price. The highest price, $102 premium, was realized on four seats, centre aisle in K. Other seats nearby went for $90 premium, $80 premium, etc.

Morning buying was almost wholly by brokers.

There was a large convention of society people, music lovers, and music students that came and went, yet at all times the floor of the hall was well filled, and quite a number of people were in the first gallery.

In the afternoon the throng was still the same size as in the morning. Everybody was greatly interested in the struggle for centre aisle seats. Here Mr. Conley secured a great number of the best.

Mrs. J. L. Gardner will as usual have her concert seat in the gallery, and her favorite rehearsal seat on the floor.

Among those noted were Col. Blackwell, Mrs. Sybilla Crane, G. E. Farnsworth, Elmer Webster, J. H. Phillips, Walter Emery, G. H. Baker, Miss Griswold, Mrs. H. J. Sears, Mrs. F. E. Elliott.

The sales will be continued at Music Hall today, when the $7.50 seats will be offered. The tickets for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold on Thursday and Friday. The sales begin each day at 10 A. M.

Sept BOSTON POST, 28

The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

BOSTON SYMPHONY SALE.

All the $12 season tickets for the Symphony rehearsals were sold at yesterday's auction, which was the most successful sale held in this city for many years. The $7.50 seats for the same series will be sold at Music Hall this morning. The tickets for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold on Thursday and Friday. The sales begin each morning at 10 o'clock.

Boston Transcript

TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 28, 1897

SYMPHONY TICKETS ARE EXPENSIVE.

Premium of $33 Paid for Each of Four Seats in the First Balcony.

At Music Hall this morning were sold the $7.50 seats for the symphony rehearsals, and the crowd of buyers and those who came out of curiosity was fully equal to that of yesterday. The sale started in with the fourth row under the balcony. The first bid was $1, but this was advanced rapidly up to $12.50. Several seats close by brought between $10 and $11.50, and then came a jump to $16 for a single seat. There was nothing else in this part of the hall that approached that in price, a large number of seats going for from $7 to $9.50, and also a lot for from $4.50 to $5.50.

The first three seats in the first balcony went for $24 premium, and then several close at hand went for $21, seat 41 being an exception and bringing $27. The highest price paid in the first balcony was $33 premium for each of four seats on the left-hand side of the hall. These were bought by a Back Bay speculator. The seat next to these sold for $32, but the average price in this vicinity was from $18 ot $20. Four seats in the second row brought $16, and another speculator paid $26 for two seats. Then came the sixth and seventh rows in the first balcony, over the clock, which averaged $12.50, although some lively bidding sent seat 403 up to $17. This was the highest price obtained for seats in this part of the hall. A lot of seats in the next to the rear row sold for about $10 to $11, although one seat in the rear row brought $12.50. The last seat sold was 504, and this brought $11.

The prices obtained thus far are considerable in advance of former years, and the managers naturally feel much pleased at the results. On Thursday morning, at ten o'clock, there will be sold the $12 seats for the concerts, and on Friday, at the same hour, the $7.50 seats will be disposed of.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 27, 1897.

PROSPERITY.

Symphony Ticket Sale Shows It's Here.

Four Seats in K Bring Each $102 Extra.

Premiums Average Far Ahead of Last Year.

The proof of prosperity is the abundant circulation of money. This is not taken from the Hon. W. J. Bryan or any other political maker of words. It is one of the current thoughts of Mr. Charles E. Ellis, manager of the Symphony concerts.

The Journal reporter is betraying no state secret when he writes that until this morning there was some uncertainty at Music Hall regarding the success of the sale of Symphony tickets. There had been many rumors—ordinary town-talk rumors—of prosperity; but rumors are not counted by the business agents of Maj. Higginson.

But now all the rumors have come true. Prosperity is here. The proof of it is the plenteousness of money, which, in turn, is shown by the high prices paid as premiums.

The sale today includes all the $12 rehearsal seats—the Friday afternoon seats. The competition, of course, is on the premium. Last year seats number 16 and 17 in row H sold at $87 premium. This was an advance of $7 beyond the highest premium coaxed forth or excited in '95.

Today seats numbered 14, 15, 16 and 17 in row K brought a premium of $102. That is to say, the price of attending the rehearsals will cost the occupants of these seats $456. The highest premium the Journal reporter remembers noting during the last four years was $92 each on two seats in the first balcony. The $92 premium was produced by a very sharp—it might be called bitter—competition.

Today, without any sharpness or bitterness whatever, it was not uncommon to hear the bids run up to $80. There were seats in row N, even, that brought $91 premium today. Last year this would have been regarded as extraordinary. Today the managers of the sale smile, rub their hands and say, "Prosperity did it."

There is no other explanation. No change in the conductorship is probable. Mr. Paur may not have signed his contract, but, nevertheless, he is announced as conductor. The personnel of the orchestra is practically the same as it was last year. The list of soloists is not remarkable for its powers of attraction. No advantages are offered this year that were not offered last. The only explanation of today's high prices left is the revival of business, the return of prosperity.

The plainness of this was heightened by the prominence of the ticket agents. They occupied an entire section of the front row; and they made a bid on everything good that happened along. It was one of these agents that paid the $102 premium on four seats in K. Some agent was concerned in every high bid.

Another sign of the widespread success of worldly things was the large attendance. When Auctioneer Jackson called for bids on seat No. 1 in A the floor was well filled. The bidding, moreover, never flagged. It was more than ever a business affair. Society, so far as its leaders go, seemed to have stayed at home; that is, in the country. This may have occasioned the prominence of the ticket agents. Mrs. Gardner, Mr. J. Montgomery Sears and other equally notable patrons of the Symphony concerts were represented. Formerly Mrs. Gardner was an alert attendant, choosing her seats and fixing her own price. So, to pursue the old road, it may be said that the general prosperity explains the large number of new faces and the old willingness of the veteran patrons to confide in the agents.

The start of the bidding foreshadowed nothing. The first seat in A brought $7. That was ordinary—just the same as in past years. But immediately afterward the premium ascended to $13, then to $15, then to $20 and $25 and $30. It rose and rose as the seats farther away from the stage were sold. The ends of the rows brought from $30 to $50. End seats in N sold for $41 premium. Many and many a bid started at $50, and stopped at $60 or $65. Some went up to $80, without creating much talk. It shocked those who were thinking of last year's prices. M No. 18 sold for $90—just one seat, which will cost some one (an agent got it) $102.

No one knows where the prices will stop.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CII, NO. 90.

TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 28, 1897.

HIGHEST PREMIUMS IN YEARS.

Big Prices at Auction of the $12 Symphony Seats.

One Sold at $102 and Connelly Was the Purchaser--Commission Men Very Much in Evidence--Society Folk Not Present in Usual Numbers--Few Seats Went Under $30.

The sale by auction of the $12 seats for the Friday afternoon Symphony orchestra rehearsals was begun at Music Hall yesterday.

There were several hundred people present, and they evinced a great interest in the bidding, but it was noticeable that most of the seats were bought by commission men.

Society leaders were not present in such force as is usually the case, although quite a number of prominent people were noticed in the hall during the morning.

The sale as a whole was something of a surprise because of the range of price . The premiums were higher than they have been for years, the highest of the morning being $102, which was the bid of Mr. Connelly of the Adams House ticket agency.

There were very few seats knocked down under $30. A $50 premium was quite common, and there were a number of $90 premiums paid.

Seats in the front row, it is true, brought, in some instances, little over $20, but the first four in the second row were sold for $46. In the third row the premiums ranged from $28 to $40. In the fourth row the premiums ranged well up in the thirties, and, in F, one seat was bid in at $50, and a number at over $40. In G two seats brought a premium of $48; four, $51; two, $58. In H. four went at $59, Mr. Herrick secured one at $87, and the bid for the next seat was $50. In I, one seat sold for $63, four for $62, and two for $90. In the next row most of the premiums exceeded $50, and one seat was disposed of for $69.

Mr. Herrick bought four at a premium of $102 in the centre of K, and two more seats were sold for $83. In L the prices continued high, and in M the biggest premium paid was $90.

The auction sales of tickets for the Symphony rehearsals will be continued in Music Hall today, when the $7.50 seats will be offered. The tickets for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold on Thursday and Friday. The sales begin each morning at 10 o'clock.

Boston Transcript

TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 28, 1897

SYMPHONY TICKETS ARE EXPENSIVE.

Premium of $33 Paid for Each of Four Seats in the First Balcony.

At Music Hall this morning were sold the $7.50 seats for the symphony rehearsals, and the crowd of buyers and those who came out of curiosity was fully equal to that of yesterday. The sale started in with the fourth row under the balcony. The first bid was $1, but this was advanced rapidly up to $12.50. Several seats close by brought between $10 and $11.50, and then came a jump to $16 for a single seat. There was nothing else in this part of the hall that approached that in price, a large number of seats going for from $7 to $9.50, and also a lot for from $4.50 to $5.50.

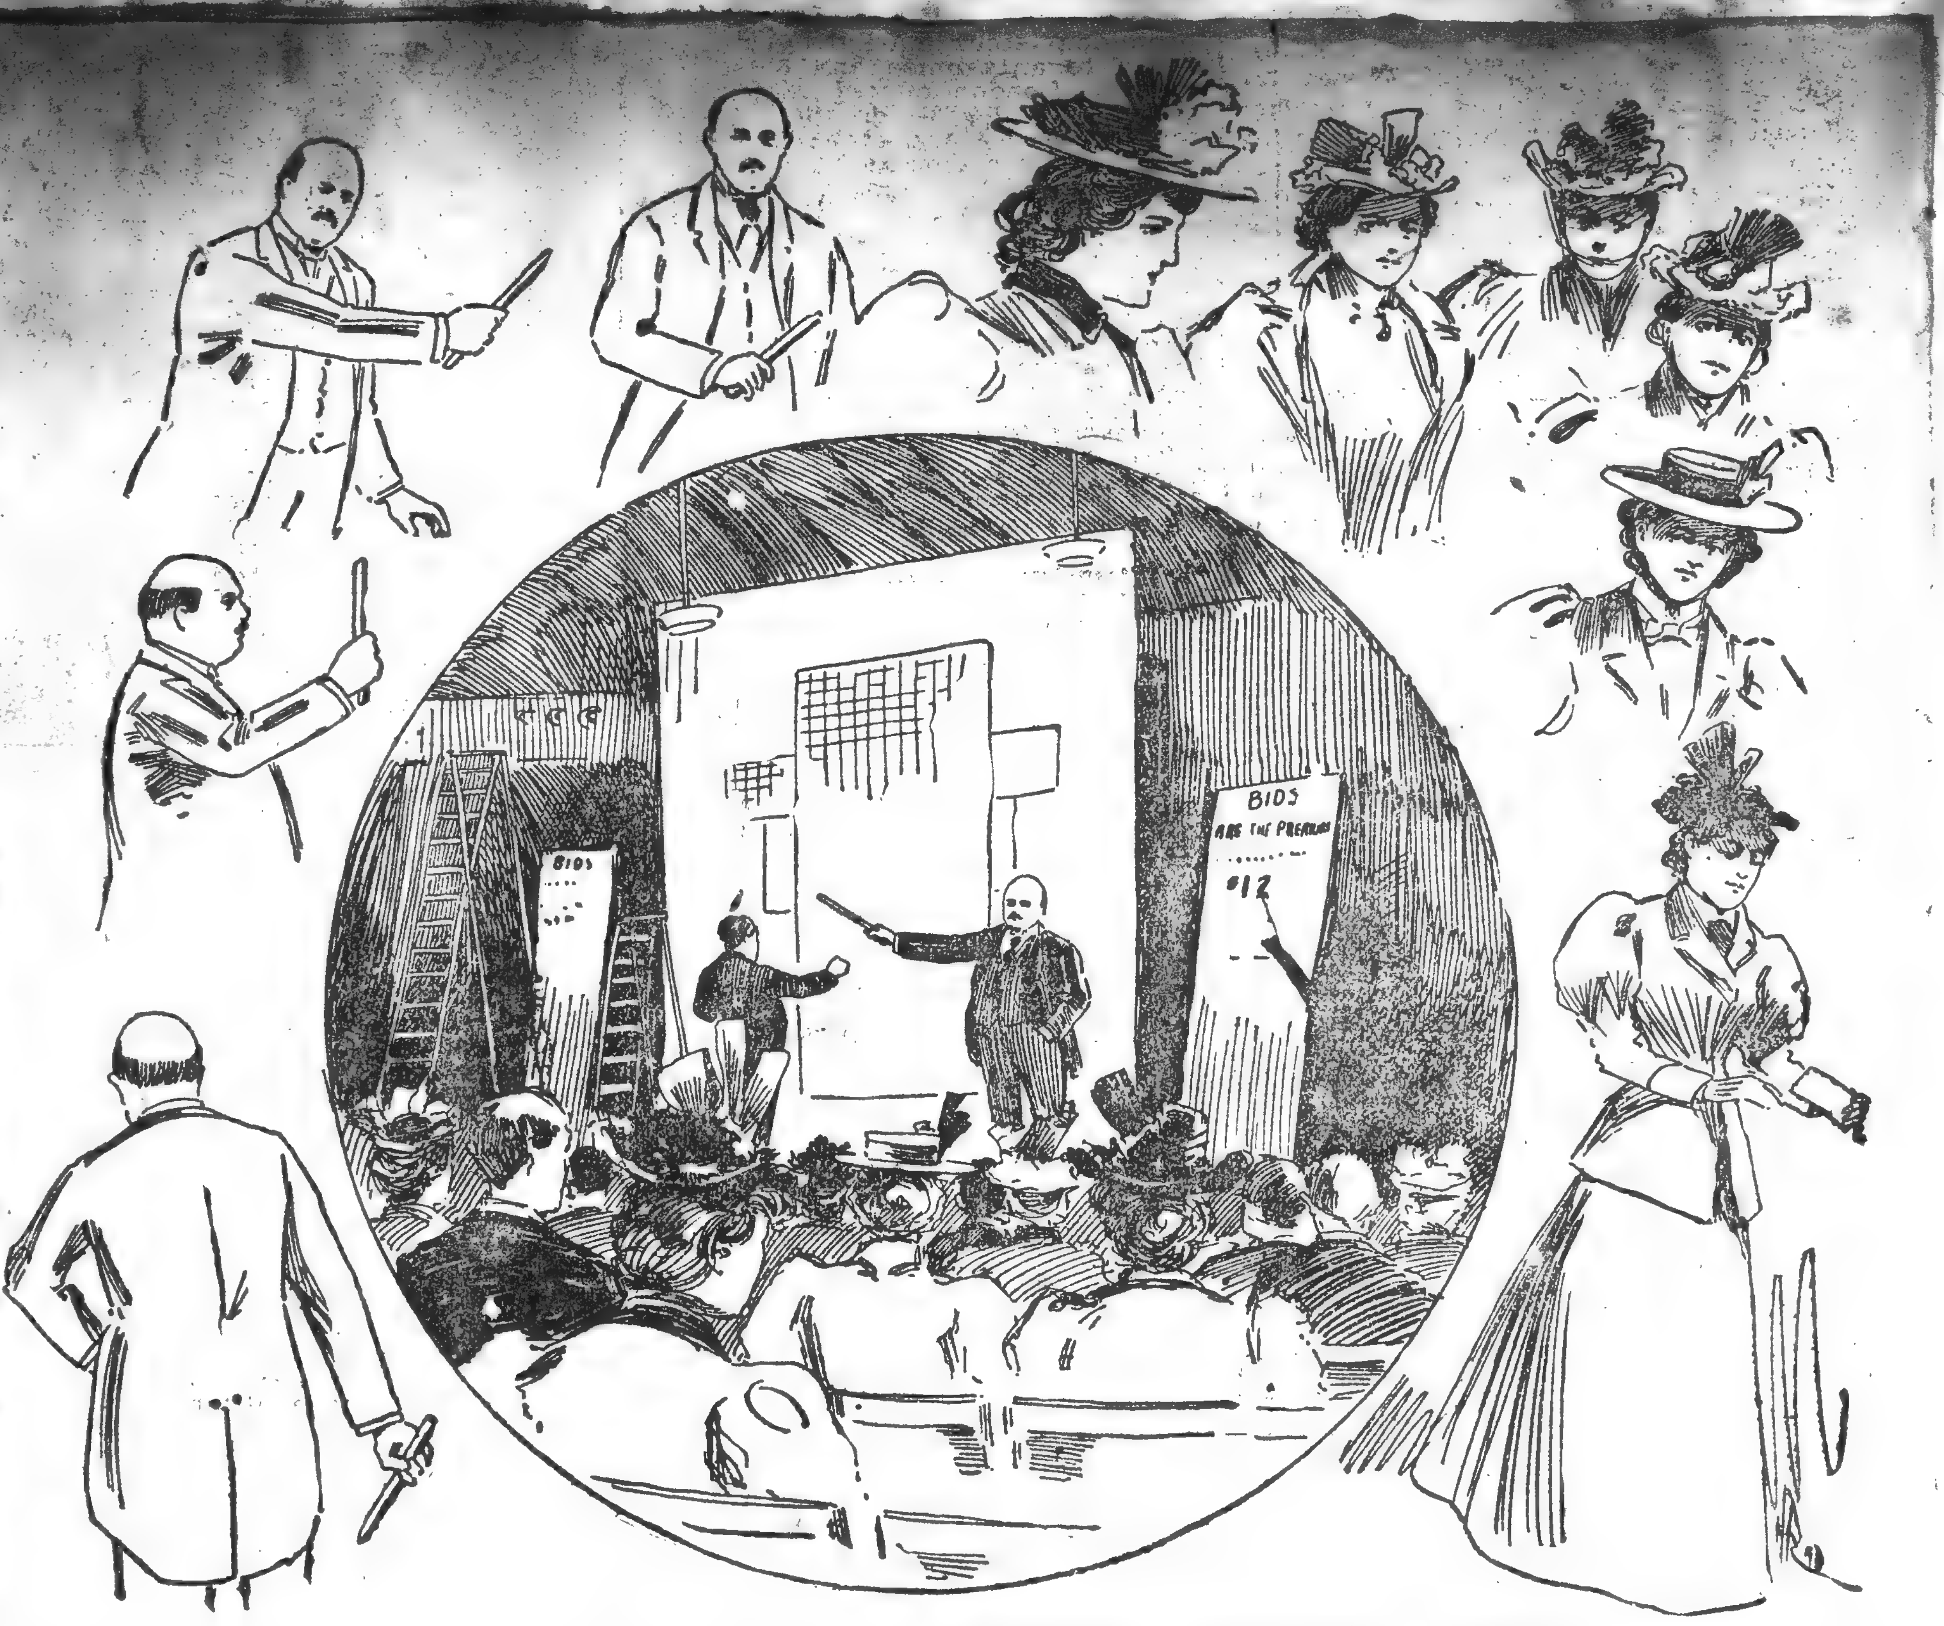
The first three seats in the first balcony went for $24 premium, and then several close at hand went for $21, seat 41 being an exception and bringing $27. The highest price paid in the first balcony was $33 premium for each of four seats on the left-hand side of the hall. These were bought by a Back Bay speculator. The seat next to these sold for $32, but the average price in this vicinity was from $18 ot $20. Four seats in the second row brought $16, and another speculator paid $26 for two seats. Then came the sixth and seventh rows in the first balcony, over the clock, which averaged $12.50, although some lively bidding sent seat 403 up to $17. This was the highest price obtained for seats in this part of the hall. A lot of seats in the next to the rear row sold for about $10 to $11, although one seat in the rear row brought $12.50. The last seat sold was 504, and this brought $11.

The prices obtained thus far are considerable in advance of former years, and the managers naturally feel much pleased at the results. On Thursday morning, at ten o'clock, there will be sold the $12 seats for the concerts, and on Friday, at the same hour, the $7.50 seats will be disposed of.

Boston Transcript

WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 29, 1897

....Apropos of the Symphony sales, the following bit of Emersonian wisdom is contributed, copied from a card fastened upon the desk of a lady who lived by the rules here set down: "To live content with small means, to seek elegance rather than luxury, refinement rather than fashion, to bear all cheerfully, do all bravely, to listen to stars and birds, to babes and sages, with open heart, to study hard, think quietly, act frankly, speak gently, in a word, to let the spiritual unbidden and unseen grow up through the common—this is to be my Symphony!"



AT THE AUCTION SALE OF SYMPHONY CONCERT TICKETS.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CII, NO. 91.

WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 29, 1897

THE CHATTERER.

It is exactly as I expected—the Symphony tickets come high. The predictions for a tremendous musical season are being verified by the opening sales of seats for those dearly prized concerts. Lucky they who can obtain their old places in the rush, but it may be observed that one season ticket now serves for two or three buyers. People have learned how to share the prize, and partnership in a single place is quite the rule. The intense musical patron will not miss a rehearsal or concert during the winter; but again, two out of town families will agree to divide the treats, and, accordingly, one season ticket is made to go a long way. There will be numerous attractions at the Symphonies this season, but our musical taste has been so improved by criticism that the noble work of the orchestra now gives as much pleasure as to hear some artist with big reputation sing or play. Fashion has set its seal on the band; the star is merely thrown in for the stray taste.

Music Hall looked actually gray and glum yesterday to those who had but lately viewed the magnificent new entrance to Keith's, and the contrast almost provoked laughter. Poor, shabby old Winter place entrance! What a familiar barrenness is yours! Despite the changes in this rejuvenated town, you remain the same barracks, saturated with associations and filled with battalions of ghosts! Oh, dear! I hope nothing will happen to Music Hall, for it is such a foil to the splendors a few blocks away, and then, too, some of us still love the dark, cold corridors, and wouldn't miss those draughty doors for the world!

Sept BOSTON POST, 30
The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

The auction sales of Symphony tickets will be continued this morning at Music Hall, when the $12 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold. The $7.50 seats for this series will be sold tomorrow.

Phil Shea, formerly treasurer of the Tremont Theatre, will be in advance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season.

Boston Journal.

WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 29, 1897.

SYMPHONY SALE.

Success Continues—Premiums on $7 50 Rehearsal Tickets Run About Twice as High as Last Year.

Music Hall was pretty thickly peopled Tuesday for it was the chance of the matinee girls. The offering was the low-priced seats for the Friday afternoon rehearsals; but the low price did not extend to the premium.

A rough estimate by a man who, in a business way, has attended all the sales of recent years, fixes the average premium of Tuesday at twice the price drawn out last year. It is a fact, too, that there was a drawing out last year. The bids came slow, very slow; and they stopped entirely before all the seats had been offered for sale.

Now, on Monday, every $12 seat was sold. By 1 yesterday every $7 50 rehearsal seat on the floor and in the first balcony had been sold. Last year whole rows on the floor were left unspoken for. Moreover, the premium paid on seats in the very last row, right back against the wall, under the balcony, was not less than $4 50. The average for the least desirable seats was $5. There was a briskness to the sale that just suited the auctioneer, who is an adept at extracting bids. There were 10 women to one man among the bidders, even counting the speculators, or ticket agents, who bunched themselves down front and raised their voices on almost every offering.

The premiums on the $7 50 seats on the floor ranged from $4 50 to $30. Last year $10 was looked upon as a fancy bid. The highest price reached last year on the floor was $13.

The best $7 50 seats in the first balcony brought a premium of about $20. The average extended from $19 to $23. Four seats half way down on the right brought each $33 premium. That beats the highest mark of last year by $9, and of '95 by $6. In fact, the highest premium of last year stands for the average of this year.

The sale of the $12 seats for the Saturday night concerts will begin on Thursday morning; the $7 50 concert seats will be sold on Friday.

Boston Journal.

THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 30, 1897.

SYMPHONY SALE.

$12 Concert Seats Sell a Little Higher Than They Did Last Year.

Today the $12 Saturday night Symphony concert seats are selling at Music Hall. The prices fell considerably below the high average set by the $12 rehearsal seats sold on Monday. They are just a trifle higher than the premiums of last year.

The bidding at first was slow. Probably many were scared by the prices got the first of the week. About $25 would be a good estimate of today's average. A few of the extreme end seats sold for less than $10. The premiums, as usual, rose as the centre was approached, and there seats went as high as $40 and $50. Seats numbered 18 and 19 in row I brought $53 premium, which was the highest of the day.

At times the bidding grew brisk, and, again, it was too slow for the auctioneer.

However, the sale is successful.

The Boston Traveler

PUBLISHED BY THE
BOSTON TRAVELER CO.,
TORREY E. WARDNER, President

THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 30, 1897.

THE SYMPHONY SALE.

Splendid Prices Obtained for the $12 Tickets for the Saturday Evening Concerts.

There was a goodly array of prosperous citizens, both men and women, in Music Hall this morning when Auctioneer Jackson called for bids on A 1, the first seat sold of the $12 Saturday evening locations for the coming Symphony season. Perhaps on the whole the truer music lovers were here, for the evening concerts are of the quieter sort, socially, and can always be heard at a less expenditure for premiums.

The first sale, that of A 1, was made at $4, whereas last year no bid could be obtained on that seat. Prices ranged as low as $1 in this row. In the centre of B $13.50 represented the highest figure. Choice places in C brought [illegible].50 and in D $19. Last year's comparison shows $13, $16.50 and $18 for the same seats. It will be seen that prices in that locality ranged only a trifle higher.

Bids increased handsomely as the rows included between E and M were disposed of. In the first named $27 was the high figure, while the best in I was $53. Once across the aisle that separates M from U the battle waxed very strong, and far higher premiums were obtained than ever before in that section. Centre seats ranged from $27 to $44 and bidding was hot and lively. In O $38 was best figure; in P $50 and in Q $60 the top notch of the day. All through the rear half of the hall prices were notably strong.

The front seats in the balcony brought the usual excellent prices. Altogether the day was a prosperous one for the management.

Boston Journal.

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 1, 1897.

SYMPHONY SALE.

$12 Concert Seats Sell a Little Higher Than They Did Last Year.

Thursday the $12 Saturday night Symphony concert seats are selling at phony concert seats were selling at bly below the high average set by the $12 rehearsal seats sold on Monday. They are just a trifle higher than the premiums of last year.

The bidding at first was slow. Probably many were scared by the prices got the first of the week. About $25 would be a good estimate of Thursday's average. A few of the extreme end seats sold for less than $10. The premiums, as usual, rose as the centre was approached, and there seats went as high as $40 and $50. Seats numbered 18 and 19 in row I brought $53 premium, which was the highest of the day.

At times the bidding grew brisk, and, again, it was too slow for the auctioneer.

However, the sale is successful.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 29, 1897.

Boston Symphony Dates.

THE seventeenth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Emil Paur director, begins in Boston Music Hall on Friday afternoon, October 15. The dates of the season are as follows:

Friday afternoon, October 15, Music Hall, Boston.
Saturday evening, October 16, Music Hall, Boston.
Friday afternoon, October 22, Music Hall, Boston.
Saturday evening, October 23, Music Hall, Boston.
Thursday afternoon, October 28, Sanders' Theatre, Cambridge.
Friday afternoon, October 29, Music Hall, Boston.
Saturday evening, October 30, Music Hall, Boston.
Wednesday evening, November 3, Infantry Hall, Providence.
Friday afternoon, November 5, Music Hall, Boston.
Saturday evening, November 6, Music Hall, Boston.

FIRST TRIP.

Monday evening, November 8, Academy of Music, Philadelphia.
Tuesday afternoon, November 9, ———, Washington.
Wednesday evening, November 10, Music Hall, Baltimore.
Thursday evening, November 11, Metropolitan Opera House, New York.
Friday afternoon, November 12, Academy of Music, Brooklyn.
Saturday evening, November 13. Academy of Music, Brooklyn.

Thursday evening, November 18, Sanders' Theatre, Cambridge.
Friday afternoon, November 19, Music Hall, Boston.
Saturday evening, November 20, Music Hall, Boston.
Friday afternoon, November 26, Music Hall, Boston.
Saturday evening, November 27, Music Hall, Boston.
Wednesday evening, December 1, Infantry Hall, Providence.
Friday afternoon, December 3, Music Hall, Boston.
Saturday evening, December 4, Music Hall, Boston.
Thursday evening, December 9, Sanders' Theatre, Cambridge.
Friday afternoon, December 10, Music Hall, Boston.
Saturday evening, December 11, Music Hall, Boston.

SECOND TRIP.

Monday evening, December 13, Academy of Music, Philadelphia.
Tuesday afternoon, December 14, ——— Washington.
Wednesday evening, December 15, Music Hall, Baltimore.
Thursday evening, December 16, Metropolitan Opera House, New York.
Friday afternoon, December 17, Academy of Music, Brooylyn.
Saturday evening, December 18, Academy of Music, Brooklyn.

Wednesday afternoon, December 22, Music Hall, Boston.
Thursday evening, December 23, Music Hall, Boston.
Wednesday evening, December 29, Infantry Hall, Providence.
Friday afternoon, December 31, Music Hall, Boston.
Saturday evening, January 1, Music Hall, Boston.
Thursday evening, January 6, Sanders' Theatre, Cambridge.
Friday afternoon, January 7, Music Hall, Boston.
Saturday evening, January 8, Music Hall, Boston.
Wednesday evening, January 12, Infantry Hall, Providence.
Friday afternoon, January 14, Music Hall, Boston.
Saturday evening, January 15, Music Hall, Boston.

THIRD TRIP.

Monday evening, January 17, Academy of Music, Philadelphia.
Tuesday afternoon, January 18, ———, Washington.
Wednesday evening, January 19, Music Hall, Baltimore.
Thursday evening, January 20, Metropolitan Opera House, New York.
Friday afternoon, January 21, Academy of Music, Brooklyn.
Saturday evening, January 22, Academy of Music, Brooklyn.

Thursday evening, January 27, Sanders' Theatre, Cambridge.
Friday afternoon, January 28, Music Hall, Boston.
Saturday evening, January 29, Music Hall, Boston.
Wednesday, February 2, Infantry Hall, Providence.
Friday afternoon, February 4, Music Hall, Boston.
Saturday evening, February 5, Music Hall, Boston.
Thursday evening, February 10, Sanders' Theatre, Cambridge.
Friday afternoon, February 11, Music Hall, Boston.
Saturday evening, February 12, Music Hall, Boston.

FOURTH TRIP.

Monday evening, February 14, Academy of Music, Philadelphia.
Tuesday afternoon, February 15, ———, Washington.
Wednesday evening, February 16, Music Hall, Baltimore.
Thursday evening, February 17, Metropolitan Opera House, New York.
Friday afternoon, February 18, Academy of Music, Brooklyn.
Saturday evening, February 19, Academy of Music, Brooklyn.
Thursday evening, February 24, Sanders' Theatre, Cambridge.
Friday afternoon, February 24, Music Hall, Boston.
Saturday evening, February 26, Music Hall, Boston.
Friday afternoon, March 4, Music Hall, Boston.
Saturday evening, March 5, Music Hall, Boston.
Wednesday evening, March 9, Infantry Hall, Providence.
Friday afternoon, March 11, Music Hall, Boston.
Saturday evening, March 12, Music Hall, Boston.
Thursday evening, March 17, Sanders' Theatre, Cambridge.
Friday afternoon, March 18, Music Hall, Boston.
Saturday evening, March 19, Music Hall, Boston.

FIFTH TRIP.

Monday evening, March 21, Academy of Music, Philadelphia.
Tuesday afternoon, March 22, ———, Washington.
Wednesday evening, March 23, Music Hall, Baltimore.
Thursday evening, March 24, Metropolitan Opera House, New York.
Friday afternoon, March 25, Academy of Music, Brooklyn.
Saturday evening, March 26, Academy of Music, Brooklyn.
Wednesday evening, March 30, Infantry Hall, Providence.
Friday afternoon, April 1, Music Hall, Boston.
Saturday evening, April 2, Music Hall, Boston.
Thursday evening, April 7, Sanders' Theatre, Cambridge.
Friday afternoon, April 8, Music Hall, Boston.
Saturday evening, April 9, Music Hall, Boston.
Friday afternoon, April 15, Music Hall, Boston.
Saturday evening, April 16, Music Hall, Boston,
Wednesday evening, April 20, Infantry Hall, Providence.
Friday afternoon, April 22, Music Hall, Boston.
Saturday evening, April 23, Music Hall, Boston.
Thursday evening, April 28, Sanders' Theatre, Cambridge.
Friday afternoon, April 29, Music Hall, Boston.
Saturday evening, April 30, Music Hall, Boston.

SOME OF THE SOLOISTS.

The following are the soloists engaged at the present time for these concerts. No doubt a number of changes will take place during the season and additional forces be added to these:

Melba, Mrs. Henschel, Miss Wienskowska, Mrs. Titus (a new American high soprano), Miss Gadski, Madame Blauvelt, Mme. Fannie Bloomfield Zeisler, Miss Olive Mead, violinist (pupil of Kneisel), Rosenthal, Joseffy, Siloti, MacDowell, Alberto Jonás, Ffrangcon-Davies, Bispham, Campanari, Joseph Staudigl, Kneisel, Loeffler, Adamowski, Schnitzler, Schroeder and Schulz, the latter six being members of the orchestra.

EMIL PAUR'S NEW FIVE YEAR CONTRACT.

BOSTON, September 23.—Emil Paur, director of the Symphony Orchestra, is said to have signed a contract to-day with Mr. H. L. Higginson to continue as director for that organization for five years. It is said that under this contract, if for any reason Mr. Higginson should decide to secure another director before the five years' term is up, Mr. Paur will receive a bonus of $10,000.

MR. PAUR has a five years' contract to conduct the Boston Symphony concerts and this contract ends with the close of the present season, 1897–8. Should Mr. Paur not be re-engaged for another term of five years a forfeit of $10,000 must be paid to him to counterbalance the loss of pension to which Mr. Paur would be entitled had he remained in Germany in the position (or its outgrowth) held by him formerly. It is impossible to state at this time whether Mr. Paur will conduct the Boston Symphony concerts after the season of 1897–8, although Boston papers state so definitely. The Traveller says:

> The news that Mr. Paur has signed a contract with Mr. Higginson by which he is to remain for five more years at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is received with great satisfaction by all varieties of music lovers. That the present conductor is the first to be re-engaged speaks volumes for the position he has won for himself in Boston. With no pyrotechnics, no posings, no society influences, no beauty, no languid grace, no imperial airs of the martinet. Mr. Paur has steadily improved in his art, and has quietly won the admiration and respect of everyone. That he is not a towering genius is recognized, but it is as fully recognized that he is a musician of rare taste and devotion, a drillmaster of kindly decision, and a leader of inspiration to his men. The present splendid condition of the orchestra shows that these qualities make for more than erratic brilliancy.

Mme. Gertrude Franklin's pupil, Mrs. Marian Titus, has been engaged for several concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and will be heard not only in Boston, but in out of town concerts. Mrs. Titus sings the aria from "The Magic Flute" in the original key.

The season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra begins on October 15. As usual there will be twenty-four concerts and twenty-four public rehearsals.

The Watertown Enterprise.

SEPTEMBER 24,

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Emil Paur, conductor, will begin its new season on October 15, and with occasional omissions to permit its usual visits to New York and other cities, will give concerts at Boston Music hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of each week until April 30. The fine quality of the performances of this great organization have made these concerts famous, and they appeal to music lovers from all parts of New England. The list of distinguished solo artists engaged for the series includes Mme. Melba, Mrs. Henschel, Mrs. Titus, Miss Wienzkowska, Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler, Miss Oliver Mead. Mr. Bispham, Mr. Rosenthal, Mr. Joseffy, Mr. Siloti. Mr. McDowell, Mr. Kneisel, Mr. Loeffler, Mr. Adamowski, Mr. Schnitzler, Mr. Schroeder, and Mr. Schulz. The auction sales of season tickets will be held at Boston Music hall on Monday, Tuesday, Thursday and Friday, Seplember 27, 28, 30 and October 1.

MONDAY, [illegible]

PREMIUM OF $102 FOR ONE SEAT.

Opening Sale of Seats for the Symphony Rehearsals Brings Out a Large Crowd —Prices Obtained Much Bettor Than Last Year.

Several hundred persons were gathered in Music Hall, this forenoon, to attend the opening sale of tickets for the Friday-afternoon rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Only the $12 seats were offered for sale today, and, as in previous years, Henry W. Jackson acted as auctioneer. It was announced that all bids were for premiums, which must be added to the regular box-office price of $12.

The sale opened with seat No. 1 in section A; the first bid was $8, and by easy stages this ran up to $14, which was $1 more than received for the first ticket sold last year. The next two seats went for $10, and then followed several for prices ranging from $8 to $9. Seat No. 7 brought out a little spirited bidding, and was sold for $15.

The first real excitement came when a seat in section C went for $40, and from then on the bidding was all that could be asked for, and must have been gratifying to the management, who admitted that the sales were better than those last year. As the auctioneer began to get near the seats in the middle of the hall, and especially at the end seats, the bidding began to increase, and the different speculators, who were out in full force, began to bid against each other. Seats 17 and 18 in section I brought out the first really lively bidding, and these two seats were sold for $90 premium on each.

The banner price paid was $102 for seat 14 in section K. This brought out some lively remarks by the auctioneer, and was especially amusing to the spectators, who watched rival ticket speculators bidding against each other. Seats 16 and 17 in section N brought $91 each, and it seemed as though there were hundreds of seats selling for $60 and $70 each. Of course there were single seats that occasionally would go for comparatively low figures, especially those seats on the sides, next the walls.

At ten o'clock tomorrow morning the $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold. The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold on Thursday morning, and the $7.50 seats for the concerts will be sold on Friday morning, all these sales beginning at 10 A. M.

Boston Transcript

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 1, 1897

FINAL SALE OF SYMPHONY TICKETS.

Large Attendance of Buyers of Tickets for the Evening Concerts.

Fully as many people were present at the final sale of Symphony tickets at Music Hall, today, as there have been at any of the previous ones. The tickets sold today were the $7.50 seats for the Saturday evening concerts. These were the seats on the floor under the balcony, wall seats around the balcony and the whole of the second balcony.

The first seat sold was 1151 under the balcony, which brought a premium of $5; the next few seats went for a little higher prices, 1160 bringing $8. A lot of seats then went for very low premiums, varying from 25 cents to $1.50, and quite a number, upon which no premiums were bid, were passed over.

In the first balcony the second row brought out some better prices, several seats selling for $12.50 advance, and a few for $15. The last row in the first balcony, the one over the clock, brought prices ranging from $6.50 to $9, while several seats in the same balcony, six rows back, went for from $5 to $7.

The first row in the second balcony started for $5.50 premium, but as the seats approached the centre the prices advanced, one seat bringing $18, which was the highest price paid this morning. There came a lot of seats which brought out very listless bidding and went for slight advances. The sale continues this afternoon, until all the seats have been offered at auction. Taking the entire sale, the prices are considerably in advance of last year.

Mrs. Marian Titus, a pupil of Gertrude Franklin, will sing at several of the symphony concerts this season in Boston and other cities.

The Boston Traveler

PUBLISHED BY THE
BOSTON TRAVELER CO.,
TORREY E. WARDNER, President

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 1, [illegible]

THE SYMPHONY SALE

Excellent Prices for the $7.50 Seats for the Saturday Evening Concerts.

The auction sale of $7.50 seats for the Saturday evening Symphony concerts was held in Music Hall today. Prices immeately proclaimed themselves as on a higher level than those of last year. The first seat in the sixth row from the rear, on the floor, brought $5 premium, as against $3.50 last season. In the centre they ran as high as $8. Toward the extreme rear bids went to $1, and several seats were passed over for lack of bids.

First side balcony seats brought $26 in the best position; last year $24 was high figure. From that point prices proceeded down to $5. In the centre balcony the premiums ranged from $7 to $3.50, the rear line closing strong around $5. Choice location in the side balcony, second flight, brought as high as $18.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.
NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 29, 1897.

Boston Symphony Dates.

THE seventeenth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Emil Paur director, begins in Boston Music Hall on Friday afternoon, October 15. The dates of the season are as follows :

Friday afternoon, October 15, Music Hall, Boston.
Saturday evening, October 16, Music Hall, Boston.
Friday afternoon, October 22, Music Hall, Boston.
Saturday evening, October 23, Music Hall, Boston.
Thursday afternoon, October 28, Sanders' Theatre, Cambridge.
Friday afternoon, October 29, Music Hall, Boston.
Saturday evening, October 30, Music Hall, Boston.
Wednesday evening, November 3, Infantry Hall, Providence.
Friday afternoon, November 5, Music Hall, Boston.
Saturday evening, November 6, Music Hall, Boston.

FIRST TRIP.

Monday evening, November 8, Academy of Music, Philadelphia.
Tuesday afternoon, November 9, ——, Washington.
Wednesday evening, November 10, Music Hall, Baltimore.
Thursday evening, November 11, Metropolitan Opera House, New York.
Friday afternoon, November 12, Academy of Music, Brooklyn.
Saturday evening, November 13, Academy of Music, Brooklyn.

Thursday evening, November 18, Sanders' Theatre, Cambridge.
Friday afternoon, November 19, Music Hall, Boston.
Saturday evening, November 20, Music Hall, Boston.
Friday afternoon, November 26, Music Hall, Boston.
Saturday evening, November 27, Music Hall, Boston.
Wednesday evening, December 1, Infantry Hall, Providence.
Friday afternoon, December 3, Music Hall, Boston.
Saturday evening, December 4, Music Hall, Boston.
Thursday evening, December 9, Sanders' Theatre, Cambridge.
Friday afternoon, December 10, Music Hall, Boston.
Saturday evening, December 11, Music Hall, Boston.

SECOND TRIP.

Monday evening, December 13, Academy of Music, Philadelphia.
Tuesday afternoon, December 14, —— Washington.
Wednesday evening, December 15, Music Hall, Baltimore.
Thursday evening, December 16, Metropolitan Opera House, New York.
Friday afternoon, December 17, Academy of Music, Brooylyn.
Saturday evening, December 18, Academy of Music, Brooklyn.

Wednesday afternoon, December 22, Music Hall, Boston.
Thursday evening, December 23, Music Hall, Boston.
Wednesday evening, December 29, Infantry Hall, Providence.
Friday afternoon, December 31, Music Hall, Boston.
Saturday evening, January 1, Music Hall, Boston.
Thursday evening, January 6, Sanders' Theatre, Cambridge.
Friday afternoon, January 7, Music Hall, Boston.
Saturday evening, January 8, Music Hall, Boston.
Wednesday evening, January 12, Infantry Hall, Providence.
Friday afternoon, January 14, Music Hall, Boston.
Saturday evening, January 15, Music Hall, Boston.

THIRD TRIP.

Monday evening, January 17, Academy of Music, Philadelphia.
Tuesday afternoon, January 18, ——, Washington.
Wednesday evening, January 19, Music Hall, Baltimore.
Thursday evening, January 20, Metropolitan Opera House, New York.
Friday afternoon, January 21, Academy of Music, Brooklyn.
Saturday evening, January 22, Academy of Music, Brooklyn.

Thursday evening, January 27, Sanders' Theatre, Cambridge.
Friday afternoon, January 28, Music Hall, Boston.
Saturday evening, January 29, Music Hall, Boston.
Wednesday, February 2, Infantry Hall, Providence.
Friday afternoon, February 4, Music Hall, Boston.
Saturday evening, February 5, Music Hall, Boston.
Thursday evening, February 10, Sanders' Theatre, Cambridge.
Friday afternoon, February 11, Music Hall, Boston.
Saturday evening, February 12, Music Hall, Boston.

FOURTH TRIP.

Monday evening, February 14, Academy of Music, Philadelphia.
Tuesday afternoon, February 15, ——, Washington.
Wednesday evening, February 16, Music Hall, Baltimore.
Thursday evening, February 17, Metropolitan Opera House, New York.
Friday afternoon, February 18, Academy of Music, Brooklyn.
Saturday evening, February 19, Academy of Music, Brooklyn.
Thursday evening, February 24, Sanders' Theatre, Cambridge.
Friday afternoon, February 24, Music Hall, Boston.
Saturday evening, February 26, Music Hall, Boston.
Friday afternoon, March 4, Music Hall, Boston.
Saturday evening, March 5, Music Hall, Boston.
Wednesday evening, March 9, Infantry Hall, Providence.
Friday afternoon, March 11, Music Hall, Boston.
Saturday evening, March 12, Music Hall, Boston.
Thursday evening, March 17, Sanders' Theatre, Cambridge.
Friday afternoon, March 18, Music Hall, Boston.
Saturday evening, March 19, Music Hall, Boston.

FIFTH TRIP.

Monday evening, March 21, Academy of Music, Phila delphia.
Tuesday afternoon, March 22, ——, Washington.
Wednesday evening, March 23, Music Hall, Baltimore.
Thursday evening, March 24, Metropolitan Opera House, New York.
Friday afternoon, March 25, Academy of Music, Brooklyn,
Saturday evening, March 26, Academy of Music, Brooklyn.
Wednesday evening, March 30, Infantry Hall, Providence.
Friday afternoon, April 1, Music Hall, Boston.
Saturday evening, April 2, Music Hall, Boston.
Thursday evening, April 7, Sanders' Theatre, Cambridge.
Friday afternoon, April 8, Music Hall, Boston.
Saturday evening, April 9, Music Hall, Boston.
Friday afternoon, April 15, Music Hall, Boston.
Saturday evening, April 16, Music Hall, Boston,
Wednesday evening, April 20, Infantry Hall, Providence.
Friday afternoon, April 22, Music Hall, Boston.
Saturday evening, April 23, Music Hall, Boston.
Thursday evening, April 28, Sanders' Theatre, Cambridge.
Friday afternoon, April 29, Music Hall, Boston.
Saturday evening, April 30, Music Hall, Boston.

SOME OF THE SOLOISTS.

The following are the soloists engaged at the present time for these concerts. No doubt a number of changes will take place during the season and additional forces be added to these:

Melba, Mrs. Henschel, Miss Wienskowska, Mrs. Titus (a new American high soprano), Miss Gadski, Madame Blauvelt, Mme. Fannie Bloomfield Zeisler, Miss Olive Mead, violinist (pupil of Kneisel), Rosenthal, Joseffy, Siloti, MacDowell, Alberto Jonás, Ffrangcon-Davies, Bispham, Campanari, Joseph Staudigl, Kneisel, Loeffler, Adamowski, Schnitzler, Schroeder and Schulz, the latter six being members of the orchestra.

EMIL PAUR'S NEW FIVE YEAR CONTRACT.

BOSTON, September 23.—Emil Paur, director of the Symphony Orchestra, is said to have signed a contract to-day with Mr. H. L. Higginson to continue as director for that organization for five years. It is said that under this contract, if for any reason Mr. Higginson should decide to secure another director before the five years' term is up, Mr. Paur will receive a bonus of $10,000.

MR. PAUR has a five years' contract to conduct the Boston Symphony concerts and this contract ends with the close of the present season, 1897–8. Should Mr. Paur not be re-engaged for another term of five years a forfeit of $10,000 must be paid to him to counterbalance the loss of pension to which Mr. Paur would be entitled had he remained in Germany in the position (or its outgrowth) held by him formerly. It is impossible to state at this time whether Mr. Paur will conduct the Boston Symphony concerts after the season of 1897–8, although Boston papers state so definitely. The Traveller says:

> The news that Mr. Paur has signed a contract with Mr. Higginson by which he is to remain for five more years at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchstra is received with great satisfaction by all varieties of music lovers. That the present conductor is the first to be re-engaged speaks volumes for the position he has won for himself in Boston. With no pyrotechnics, no posings, no society influences, no beauty, no languid grace, no imperial airs of the martinet. Mr. Paur has steadily improved in his art, and has quietly won the admiration and respect of everyone. That he is not a towering genius is recognized, but it is as fully recognized that he is a musician of rare taste and devotion, a drillmaster of kindly decision, and a leader of inspiration to his men. The present splendid condition of the orchestra shows that these qualities make for more than erratic brilliancy.

Mme. Gertrude Franklin's pupil, Mrs. Marian Titus, has been engaged for several concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and will be heard not only in Boston, but in out of town concerts. Mrs. Titus sings the aria from "The Magic Flute" in the original key.

The season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra begins on October 15. As usual there will be twenty-four concerts and twenty-four public rehearsals.

The Watertown Enterprise.
SEPTEMBER 24,

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Emil Paur, conductor, will begin its new season on October 15, and with occasional omissions to permit its usual visits to New York and other cities, will give concerts at Boston Music hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of each week until April 30. The fine quality of the performances of this great organization have made these concerts famous, and they appeal to music lovers from all parts of New England. The list of distinguished solo artists engaged for the series includes Mme. Melba, Mrs. Henschel, Mrs. Titus, Miss Wienzkowska, Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler, Miss Oliver Mead, Mr. Bispham, Mr. Rosenthal, Mr. Joseffy, Mr. Siloti, Mr. McDowell, Mr. Kneisel, Mr. Loeffler, Mr. Adamowski, Mr. Schnitzler, Mr. Schroeder, and Mr. Schulz. The auction sales of season tickets will be held at Boston Music hall on Monday, Tuesday, Thursday and Friday, Seplember 27, 28, 30 and October 1.

[illegible]
MONDAY, SEPTEMB[illegible] 1897.

PREMIUM OF $102 FOR ONE SEAT.

Opening Sale of Seats for the Symphony Rehearsals Brings Out a Large Crowd —Prices Obtained Much Bettor Than Last Year.

Several hundred persons were gathered in Music Hall, this forenoon, to attend the opening sale of tickets for the Friday-afternoon rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Only the $12 seats were offered for sale today, and, as in previous years, Henry W. Jackson acted as auctioneer. It was announced that all bids were for premiums, which must be added to the regular box-office price of $12.

The sale opened with seat No. 1 in section A; the first bid was $3, and by easy stages this ran up to $14, which was $1 more than received for the first ticket sold last year. The next two seats went for $10, and then followed several for prices ranging from $8 to $9. Seat No. 7 brought out a little spirited bidding, and was sold for $15.

The first real excitement came when a seat in section C went for $40, and from then on the bidding was all that could be asked for, and must have been gratifying to the management, who admitted that the sales were better than those last year. As the auctioneer began to get near the seats in the middle of the hall, and especially at the end seats, the bidding began to increase, and the different speculators, who were out in full force, began to bid against each other. Seats 17 and 18 in section I brought out the first really lively bidding, and these two seats were sold for $90 premium on each.

The banner price paid was $102 for seat 14 in section K. This brought out some lively remarks by the auctioneer, and was especially amusing to the spectators, who watched rival ticket speculators bidding against each other. Seats 16 and 17 in section N brought $91 each, and it seemed as though there were hundreds of seats selling for $60 and $70 each. Of course there were single seats that occasionally would go for comparatively low figures, especially those seats on the sides, next the walls.

At ten o'clock tomorrow morning the $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold. The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold on Thursday morning, and the $7.50 seats for the concerts will be sold on Friday morning, all these sales beginning at 10 A. M.

Boston Transcript
FRIDAY, OCTOBER 1, 1897

FINAL SALE OF SYMPHONY TICKETS.

Large Attendance of Buyers of Tickets for the Evening Concerts.

Fully as many people were present at the final sale of Symphony tickets at Music Hall, today, as there have been at any of the previous ones. The tickets sold today were the $7.50 seats for the Saturday evening concerts. These were the seats on the floor under the balcony, wall seats around the balcony and the whole of the second balcony.

The first seat sold was 1151 under the balcony, which brought a premium of $5; the next few seats went for a little higher prices, 1160 bringing $8. A lot of seats then went for very low premiums, varying from 25 cents to $1.50, and quite a number, upon which no premiums were bid, were passed over.

In the first balcony the second row brought out some better prices, several seats selling for $12.50 advance, and a few for $15. The last row in the first balcony, the one over the clock, brought prices ranging from $6.50 to $9, while several seats in the same balcony, six rows back, went for from $5 to $7.

The first row in the second balcony started for $5.50 premium, but as the seats approached the centre the prices advanced, one seat bringing $18, which was the highest price paid this morning. Then came a lot of seats which brought out very listless bidding and went for slight advances. The sale continues this afternoon, until all the seats have been offered at auction. Taking the entire sale, the prices are considerably in advance of last year.

Mrs. Marian Titus, a pupil of Gertrude Franklin, will sing at several of the symphony concerts this season in Boston and other cities.

The Boston Traveler
PUBLISHED BY THE
BOSTON TRAVELER CO.,
TORREY E. WARDNER, President
FRIDAY, OCTOBER 1, 1897.

THE SYMPHONY SALE

Excellent Prices for the $7.50 Seats for the Saturday Evening Concerts.

The auction sale of $7.50 seats for the Saturday evening Symphony concerts was held in Music Hall today. Prices immeately proclaimed themselves as on a higher level than those of last year. The first seat in the sixth row from the rear, on the floor, brought $5 premium, as against $3.50 last season. In the centre they ran as high as $8. Toward the extreme rear bids went to $1, and several seats were passed over for lack of bids.

First side balcony seats brought $26 in the best position; last year $24 was high figure. From that point prices proceeded down to $5. In the centre balcony the premiums ranged from $7 to $3.50, the rear line closing strong around $5. Choice location in the side balcony, second flight, brought as high as $18.

[illegible]

[illegible]BER 1 1897.

THE SYMPHONY SALE.

[illegible] last day for sale of seats for the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened this morning with the usual large attendance. Bidding was brisk. The sale was for the [illegible] seats for Saturday evening concerts. Prices ran slightly ahead of last year. The first seat on the floor sold for $5 premium, as against $3.50 last year. From this the prices ran up to $8. First seat in balcony, the famous 103, sold for $26 premium, as against $24 last year; $10 was the next [illegible] price received in the balcony. From [illegible] prices ran down to $5 and $6.

BOSTON POST,

2

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

SYMPHONY TICKET SALE.

Fully as many people were present at the final sale of Symphony tickets at Music Hall yesterday as there have been at any of the previous ones. The tickets sold were the $7.50 seats for the Saturday evening concerts.

The first seat sold was 1151 under the balcony, which brought a premium of $5; the next few seats went for a little higher prices, 1160 bringing $8. A lot of seats then went for very low premiums, varying from 25 cents to $1.50.

Several seats in the second balcony sold for $12.50 advance, and a few for $15. The last row in the first balcony, the one over the clock, brought prices ranging from $6.50 to $9, while several seats in the same balcony, six rows back, went for from $5 to $7.

Taking the entire sale, the prices are considerably in advance of last year.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CII., NO. 95.

SUNDAY, OCTOBER 3, 1897.

Those fortunate persons, musically inclined, who have sometimes attended the Sanders Theatre Symphony concerts and enjoyed the exceptional acoustic properties of that hall have no doubt often wished that they might enjoy chamber music in the same place. This winter there is an opportunity offered them to gratify that desire. Ten chamber concerts supplementary to a course of lectures to students by Prof. John K. Paine on "Chamber Music" will be given during the coming winter at Sanders Theatre. Such well known artists as the Kneisel quartet, the Adamowski quartet, Mr. Baermann, Mr. Joseffy will appear, and, no doubt, the many music lovers of Boston, as well as those resident in Cambridge, will be only too glad to hear such music in such surroundings. These concerts, while illustrating the same subject, are entirely distinct from the lectures by Prof. Paine.

There was a large gathering of society people, music lovers and music students at the Symphony sale on Monday morning. Mrs. John L. Gardner will, as has been her custom for years, have her concert seat in the gallery and favorite rehearsal seat on the floor. Other well known faces noted there during the week were Mr. R. M. Cushing, Miss Cushing, Mrs. B. J. Lang, Mr. Clayton Johns, Mr. and Mrs. Eliot Hubbard, Mr. Lorthrop Thorndike, Mr. James Ricketson, Mr. Pelham Dodd, Mrs. B. F. Nourse, Miss Jordan, Mrs. A. H. Latham, Mr. B. F. Redfern, Mrs. Max Heinrich and Mr. Arthur Pickering.

The sale of seats for the Symphony concerts this season has been remarkably successful. In fact, the premiums paid have been largely in advance of the prices given in some years. The first public rehearsal will take place Friday afternoon, the 15th inst., and the first concert on the evening of Saturday, the 16th. The programme announced is: Academic overture, Brahms; Symphony No. 7, Beethoven; Espagne, Chabrier; Poem Lyrique, Glazounoff, and Kaisermarsch, Wagner.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, OCTOBER 3, 1897.

SYMPHONY SALE'S RECORD.

Perhaps it was the Best Ever Held—Surely Rivaled by Only [illegible]

It is a matter of doubt whether the Symphony sale that has just finished or the sale that preceded the first season of the conductorship of Mr. Nikisch, was the more successful. Mr. Charles E. Ellis, the manager of the orchestra, himself is in doubt. He said to a Journal reporter yesterday:

"I don't know whether this last or a former sale was the better. Of course I couldn't give you any figures. The sale just over was unexpectedly successful. The premiums were high; yet, when you consider the low first price set on the tickets, there was nothing exorbitant about the sale. An average premium was $25, which, on a $12 ticket, brings the whole up to $37. There are 24 concerts. That means a trifle more than a dollar and a half a concert, which, taking into account the excellence of the orchestra and the attraction of the soloists, is not too much. I think any one will admit that."

SATURDAY EVENING Gazette

ESTABLISHED 1813.

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, OCT. 3.

The sale of the tickets for the Symphony rehearsals and concerts has been unusually brisk this year, and the prices bid have been much above the average of last year. Choice seats were eagerly sought for at high figures, and most of the so-called "speculation" purchases were legitimate bids for patrons.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, OCT. 3, 1897.

The Symphony season will begin in Music hall Friday afternoon, Oct 15, the program for the rehearsal and the Saturday evening concert being Brahm's academic overture, Beethoven's seventh symphony, "Espagna," "Chabrier; Glazounow's lyric poem, and Wagner's "Kaisermarsch."

Boston Transcript

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 7, 1897

Despite the talk, much of it foolish, of New York's want of a "permanent orchestra," says the New York Tribune, the metropolis will hear more orchestral music this season than either Boston or Chicago, with their series of twenty-four evenings and the same number of afternoons. The Philharmonic Society will give 16 concerts, including the Friday public rehearsals; the Symphony Society, 10; the Boston Symphony Orchestra, 15 (including Brooklyn); and the Thomas Orchestra of Chicago, 8 (also including Brooklyn, or, to speak in the language of 1898, the borough of Kings). The dates of the Philharmonic rehearsals and concerts are Nov. 12 and 13, Dec. 10 and 11, Jan. 7 and 8 and 28 and 29, Feb. 18 and 19, March 4 and 5 and 18 and 19, and April 1 and 2. The Symphony Society's dates, also for afternoons and evenings, though there is a trifling irregularity in the the spirit of his parody and that of some succession, are Nov. 5 and 6 and 25 and 26, Jan. 21 and 22, Feb. 11 and 12, and April 7 and 9. Melba, Ysaye, Bispham, Antoinette Trebelli and Marteau will be among the solo attractions. The afternoon concerts of the Boston Symphany Orchestra in Brooklyn will not be public rehearsals, but have independent programmes. The dates are as follows: Nov. 12 and 13, Dec. 17 and 18, Jan. 21 and 22, Feb. 18 and 19 and March 25 and 26. The probable dates of Mr. Thomas's concerts in the Metropolitan Opera House will be evenings of March 1, 9 and 14; afternoons of March 12, 16 and 19. The Brooklyn dates are March 2 and 11. There will also be Sunday-night concerts at the Metropolitan Opera House and a subscription series at the Astoria Hotel, under the direction of Mr. Seidl. The dates of the Boston Orchestra at the Metropolitan Opera House will be Nov. 11, Dec. 16, Jan. 20, Feb. 17 and March 24. Mr. Joseffy will be the solo performer at the first concert, and Mmes. Melba and Nordica, Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Loeffler the performers at the others. The soloists at the Thomas concerts will be Ysaye, Nordica, Rosenthal and Gerardy.

Boston Journal.

WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 6, 1897.

WAS SATISFACTORY.

Mr. Higginson So Characterizes Sale of Symphony Seats.

Mr. Henry L. Higginson says that the sale of Symphony seats just closed was satisfactory. The premiums realized show a decided improvement over last year, but were not by any means large enough to make this sale a record breaker. The receipts will not be sufficient to meet expenses and this has been the case for 15 of the 16 years of the Symphony's existence.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 6, 1897.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.—At the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York, Joseffy will be the soloist—an additional reason for attending that concert, if any were needed. Among the other soloists who have been engaged to appear later are Madame Melba, Madame Nordica, Mme. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler, Rosenthal, Siloti, Alberto Jonás, and Ffrangcon-Davies. The orchestral novelties will be a symphony in E minor by Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, Tschaikowsky's "Italian Caprice," three movements from the symphonic suite "Scheherazade," by Rimsky-Korsakoff; the suite "Les Erinnyes," written for the Orange festival by Jules Massenet; Chabrier's symphonic poem, "Espagna," and Richard Strauss' "Thus Spake Zarathustra."

The concerts will be given at the Metropolitan Opera House, November 11, December 16, January 20, February 17 and March 24, and will remain under the direction of Mr. Emil Paur.

Oct 1st

Musical Record

Devoted exclusively to the World of Music

453 to 463 Washington Street, Boston, Mass.

MUSICAL RECORD

The seventeenth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin October sixteenth. The following symphonies will be played:

Beethoven—Nos. 2, 3, 5, 6, 7, and three movements of the 9th.
Berlioz—Symphonie fantastique.
Mrs. Beach—Gaelic.
Brahms—Nos. 2, 3.
Dvorák—No. 5.
Haydn—No. 7.
Liszt—Faust.
Mendelssohn—No. 3.
Mozart—G Minor.
Paine—Spring.
Raff—Im Walde.
Schumann—Nos. 1, 4.
Tschaikowsky—Nos. 5, 6.

These overtures, symphonic poems, and miscellaneous pieces will be played:

Auber—Overtures to "Part du Diable," and "Domino Noir."
Bach—Pastorale.
Berlioz—Overture "Roman Carnival," and scenes from "Damnation of Faust."
Bizet—Suite "L'Arlésienne."
Brahms—Academic overture, serenade.
Beethoven—Overture "Leonore" No. 2, "Egmont," "Fidelio."
Chabrier—Entr'acte from "Gwendoline."
Dvorák—"Carnival" overture.
Grieg—Two Norwegian melodies.
Liszt—Hungarian rhapsody.
MacDowell—Symphonic poem.
Mendelssohn—Overtures "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage" and "Ruy Blas."
Meyerbeer—Overture "Struensee."
Mozart—Overtures "Magic Flute" and "Marriage of Figaro."
Rubinstein—Ballet music, "The Demon."
Saint-Saëns—"Omphale's Spinning Wheel."
Smetana—Symphonic poem.
Svendsen—Carnival.
Tschaikowsky—"Francesca da Rimini," "Romeo and Juliet."
Weber—Overture, "Euryanthe."
Weber-Weingartner—"Invitation to the Dance."

And there will be several pieces by Wagner, as well as pieces by Volkmann, Reinecke, Kern, and others.

The novelties announced will be by Chabrier, Glazounoff, Rimsky-Korsakoff, Richard Strauss, Humperdinck and Saint-Saëns, Tschaikowsky.

The programs of the first four concerts will be as follows:

I.—Oct. 15, 16.

Academic overture	Brahms
Symphony No. 7	Beethoven
Espagne	Chabrier
Poème lyrique	Glazounoff
Kaisermarsch	Wagner

II.—Oct. 22, 23.

Easter Festival	Rimsky-Korsakoff
Symphony No. 1	Schumann
Italian Caprice	Tschaikowsky

III.—Oct. 29, 30.

"Thus Spake Zarathusthra"	Richard Strauss
Symphony No. 3	Brahms
Invitation to the Dance	Weber-Weingartner

IV.—Nov. 5, 6.

Symphony No. 7	Haydn
Serenade	Mozart
Overture Leonore No. 2	Beethoven

The list of soloists will include Melba, Mrs. Henschel, Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler, Mrs. Titus, Miss Olive Mead, Messrs. Rosenthal, Joseffy, Siloti, MacDowell, Bispham, Kneisel, Loeffler, Adamowski, Schnitzler, Schroeder, Schulz. Mrs. Titus is a soprano of Boston. Miss Mead is a violinist who has studied with Mr. Kneisel. Alexander Siloti is one of the most distinguished pianists in Europe. He was born, Oct. 10, 1863, at Charkow, South Russia. He studied at the Moscow Conservatory from 1875 to 1881 under Swereff, Nicolas Rubinstein, Tschaikowsky, and Hubert; from '83 to '86 under Liszt. He made his début in 1880 at Moscow in a concert given by the Music Society. His appearance in 1883 at Leipsic in a concert of the Tonkünstler Versammlung provoked stormy applause. Since then he has given concerts throughout Europe.

American Art Journal.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, OCT. 9, 1897.

Mr. Emil Paur has been re-engaged for five years as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This gifted musician and sympathetic conductor has brought the orchestra up to a higher standard than ever, and has conquered a proud position in the minds of cultivated musicians who have the welfare of the Symphony standard at heart.

Emil Paur will bring forth the following works in the course of five concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Metropolitan Opera House: Beethoven's Symphony No. 3 ("Eroica") and three movements from the Beethoven Symphony No. 9; Brahms Symphony No. 3, in F major; Dvorak, Symphony "From the New World"; Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, Symphony in E minor ("Gaelic"), op. 32; Tschaikowsky, Italian Caprice; Rimsky-Korsakow, three movements from the Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade"; Massenet, Suite, "Les Errinyes"; Chabrier, Symphonic Poem, "Espagna"; Richard Strauss, Symphonic Poem, "Also spracht Zarathustra"; Volkmann, Serenade for String Orchestra, No. 3, in D minor; Weber-Weingartner, "Invitation to Dance"; Beethoven, Overture, "Lenore, No. 3"; Berlioz, Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini"; Brahms, "Academic" Overture; several Wagner excerpts.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, OCT. 10, 1897.

Symphony Season Begins This Week.

The musical season will begin in Boston this week, for the opening of the Boston Symphony orchestra concerts will take place next Friday afternoon, and that event is regarded as the sign that music will have sway in town until about the first of May. The matchless organization, with Mr Paur as conductor, will begin its new season Oct 15, and with occasional omissions to permit its usual visits to New York and other cities, will give concerts at Boston Music hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of each week until April 30.

The fine quality of the performances of this great organization have made these concerts famous, and they appeal to music lovers from all parts of New England. The list of distinguished solo artists engaged for the series includes Mme Melba, Mrs Henschel, Mrs Titus, Miss Wienzkowska, Mrs Bloomfield-Zeisler, Miss Olive Mead, Mr Bispham, Mr Rosenthal, Mr Joseffy, Mr Siloti, Mr MacDowell, Mr Kneisel, Mr Loeffler, Mr Adamowski, Mr Schnitzler, Mr Schroeder and Mr Schulz.

This week's program will comprise Brahms' academic overture, Beethoven's seventh symphony, "Espagna," Chabrier; Glazounow's lyric poem and Wagner's "Kaisermarsch."

Philadelphia Inquirer

SUNDAY - - - - - OCTOBER 10, 1897

FORTY PAGES

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Twelve years ago the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first performance in this city and the standard established by this now famous organization at that time has been maintained ever since. The preliminary announcement of the annual series of concerts by the orchestra at the Academy of Music practically sounds the key note of the musical season. It is easy to understand the tremendous hold this orchestra has upon the public everywhere, when one remembers that the personnel has remained practically unchanged for the past ten years. The very best artists, not only in this country, but in Europe, have been secured, and in every detail the founder of this superb body of musicians has spared no expense in the direction of a perfect ensemble. These concerts have grown to be a permanent and potent element in the entertainment season, and the interest in them will never relax as long as the acknowledged high standard of the orchestra is maintained. The dates for the coming series are Monday evenings, November 8, December 13, January 17, February 14 and March 21. Mr. Emil Paur will again conduct the orchestra. The programs for the entire series have already been prepared, and include, among other selections, the Haydn Symphony No. 7, the Raff Symphony "In Walde;" the Schumann Symphony No. 4, the Symphony No. 5 and three movements from the ninth symphony of Beethoven. The overtures will include the "Academic" of Brahms, "Euryanthe" of Weber, the "Leonore No. 3" of Beethoven and the "Carlo Broschi" of Auber. Among the novelties are Chabrier's "Espagna," Tschaikowsky's "Italian Caprice," a new suite by Massenet and Weber's "Invitation to the Dance," orchestrated in a most novel and brilliant manner by Weingartner.

The soloists include Mme. Lilian Blauvelt, Mr. David Bispham and Mr. Rafael Joseffy, each an artist of the highest rank and in every way worthy to appear with this organization. Mr. C. M. Loeffler, one of the most talented of the first violins of the orchestra, and also a composer of marked ability, will be heard. The sale of season tickets for the coming season in Philadelphia will open on Monday morning, October 18, at 1221 Chestnut street.

BOSTON EVENING RECORD.

OCTOBER 1 1897.

THE SYMPHONY SALE.

The last day for sale of seats for the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened this morning, with the usual large attendance. Bidding was brisk. The sale was for the $7.50 seats for Saturday evening concerts. Prices ran slightly ahead of last year. The first seat on the floor sold for $5 premium, as against $3.50 last year. From this the prices ran up to $8. First seat in balcony, the famous 103, sold for $26 premium, as against $24 last year; $10 was the next best price received in the balcony. From that prices ran down to $5 and $6.

Oct 2

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SYMPHONY TICKET SALE.

Fully as many people were present at the final sale of Symphony tickets at Music Hall yesterday as there have been at any of the previous ones. The tickets sold were the $7.50 seats for the Saturday evening concerts.

The first seat sold was 1151 under the balcony, which brought a premium of $5; the next few seats went for a little higher prices, 1160 bringing [illegible]. A lot of seats then went for very low premiums, varying from 25 cents to $1.50.

Several seats in the second balcony sold for $12.50 advance, and a few for $15. The last row in the first balcony, the one over the clock, brought prices ranging from $6.50 to $9, while several seats in the same balcony, six rows back, went for from $5 to $7.

Taking the entire sale, the prices are considerably in advance of last year.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CII., NO. 95.

SUNDAY, OCTOBER 3, 1897.

Those fortunate persons, musically inclined, who have sometimes attended the Sanders Theatre Symphony concerts and enjoyed the exceptional acoustic properties of that hall have no doubt often wished that they might enjoy chamber music in the same place. This winter there is an opportunity offered them to gratify that desire. Ten chamber concerts supplementary to a course of lectures to students by Prof. John K. Paine on "Chamber Music" will be given during the coming winter at Sanders Theatre. Such well known artists as the Kneisel quartet, the Adamowski quartet, Mr. Baermann, Mr. Joseffy will appear, and, no doubt, the many music lovers of Boston, as well as those resident in Cambridge, will be only too glad to hear such music in such surroundings. These concerts, while illustrating the same subject, are entirely distinct from the lectures by Prof. Paine.

There was a large gathering of society people, music lovers and music students at the Symphony sale on Monday morning. Mrs. John L. Gardner will, as has been her custom for years, have her concert seat in the gallery and favorite rehearsal seat on the floor. Other well known faces noted there during the week were Mr. R. M. Cushing, Miss Cushing, Mrs. B. J. Lang, Mr. Clayton Johns, Mr. and Mrs. Eliot Hubbard, Mr. Lorthrop Thorndike, Mr. James Ricketson, Mr. Pelham Dodd, Mrs. B. F. Nourse, Miss Jordan, Mrs. A. H. Latham, Mr. B. F. Redfern, Mrs. Max Heinrich and Mr. Arthur Pickering.

The sale of seats for the Symphony concerts this season has been remarkably successful. In fact, the premiums paid have been largely in advance of the prices given in some years. The first public rehearsal will take place Friday afternoon, the 15th inst., and the first concert on the evening of Saturday, the 16th. The programme announced is: Academic overture, Brahms; Symphony No. 7, Beethoven; Espagne, Chabrier; Poem Lyrique, Glazounoff, and Kaisermarsch, Wagner.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, OCTOBER 3, 1897.

SYMPHONY SALE'S RECORD.

Perhaps it was the Best Ever Held—Surely Rivaled by Only

It is a matter of doubt whether the Symphony sale that has just finished or the sale that preceded the first season of the conductorship of Mr. Nikisch, was the more successful. Mr. Charles E. Ellis, the manager of the orchestra, himself is in doubt He said to a Journal reporter yesterday:

"I don't know whether this last or a former sale was the better. Of course I couldn't give you any figures. The sale just over was unexpectedly successful. The premiums were high; yet, when you consider the low first price set on the tickets, there was nothing exorbitant about the sale. An average premium was $25, which, on a $12 ticket, brings the whole up to $37. There are 24 concerts. That means a trifle more than a dollar and a half a concert, which, taking into account the excellence of the orchestra and the attraction of the soloists, is not too much. I think any one will admit that."

SATURDAY EVENING Gazette

ESTABLISHED 1813.

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, OCT. 3.

The sale of the tickets for the Symphony rehearsals and concerts has been unusually brisk this year, and the prices bid have been much above the average of last year. Choice seats were eagerly sought for at high figures, and most of the so-called "speculation" purchases were legitimate bids for patrons.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, OCT. 3, 1897.

The Symphony season will begin in Music hall Friday afternoon, Oct 15, the program for the rehearsal and the Saturday evening concert being Brahm's academic overture, Beethoven's seventh symphony, "Espagna," "Chabrier; Glazounow's lyric poem, and Wagner's "Kaisermarsch."

Boston Transcript

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 7, 1897

Despite the talk, much of it foolish, of New York's want of a "permanent orchestra," says the New York Tribune, the metropolis will hear more orchestral music this season than either Boston or Chicago, with their series of twenty-four evenings and the same number of afternoons. The Philharmonic Society will give 16 concerts, including the Friday public rehearsals; the Symphony Society, 10; the Boston Symphony Orchestra, 15 (including Brooklyn); and the Thomas Orchestra of Chicago, 8 (also including Brooklyn, or, to speak in the language of 1898, the borough of Kings). The dates of the Philharmonic rehearsals and concerts are Nov. 12 and 13, Dec. 10 and 11, Jan. 7 and 8 and 28 and 29, Feb. 18 and 19, March 4 and 5 and 18 and 19, and April 1 and 2. The Symphony Society's dates, also for afternoons and evenings, though there is a trifling irregularity in the the spirit of his parody and that of some succession, are Nov. 5 and 6 and 25 and 26, Jan. 21 and 22, Feb. 11 and 12, and April 7 and 9. Melba, Ysaye, Bispham, Antoinette Trebelli and Marteau will be among the solo attractions. The afternoon concerts of the Boston Symphany Orchestra in Brooklyn will not be public rehearsals, but have independent programmes. The dates are as follows: Nov. 12 and 13, Dec. 17 and 18, Jan. 21 and 22, Feb. 18 and 19 and March 25 and 26. The probable dates of Mr. Thomas's concerts in the Metropolitan Opera House will be evenings of March 1, 9 and 14; afternoons of March 12, 16 and 19. The Brooklyn dates are March 2 and 11. There will also be Sunday-night concerts at the Metropolitan Opera House and a subscription series at the Astoria Hotel, under the direction of Mr. Seidl. The dates of the Boston Orchestra at the Metropolitan Opera House will be Nov. 11, Dec. 16, Jan. 20, Feb. 17 and March 24. Mr. Joseffy will be the solo performer at the first concert, and Mmes. Melba and Nordica, Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Loeffler the performers at the others. The soloists at the Thomas concerts will be Ysaye, Nordica, Rosenthal and Gerardy.

Boston Journal.

WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 6, 1897.

WAS SATISFACTORY.

Mr. Higginson So Characterizes Sale of Symphony Seats.

Mr. Henry L. Higginson says that the sale of Symphony seats just closed was satisfactory. The premiums realized show a decided improvement over last year, but were not by any means large enough to make this sale a record breaker. The receipts will not be sufficient to meet expenses and this has been the case for 15 of the 16 years of the Symphony's existence.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 6, 1897.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.—At the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York, Joseffy will be the soloist—an additional reason for attending that concert, if any were needed. Among the other soloists who have been engaged to appear later are Madame Melba, Madame Nordica, Mme. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler, Rosenthal, Siloti, Alberto Jonás, and Ffrangcon-Davies. The orchestral novelties will be a symphony in E minor by Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, Tschaikowsky's "Italian Caprice," three movements from the symphonic suite "Scheherazade," by Rimsky-Korsakoff; the suite "Les Erinnyes," written for the Orange festival by Jules Massenet; Chabrier's symphonic poem, "Espagna," and Richard Strauss' "Thus Spake Zarathustra."

The concerts will be given at the Metropolitan Opera House, November 11, December 16, January 20, February 17 and March 24, and will remain under the direction of Mr. Emil Paur.

Oct 1.

Musical Record

Devoted exclusively to the World of Music

453 to 463 Washington Street, Boston, Mass.

MUSICAL RECORD

The seventeenth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin October sixteenth. The following symphonies will be played:

Beethoven—Nos. 2, 3, 5, 6, 7, and three movements of the 9th.
Berlioz—Symphonie fantastique.
Mrs. Beach—Gaelic.
Brahms—Nos. 2, 3.
Dvorák—No. 5.
Haydn—No. 7.
Liszt—Faust.
Mendelssohn—No. 3.
Mozart—G Minor.
Paine—Spring.
Raff—Im Walde.
Schumann—Nos. 1, 4.
Tschaikowsky—Nos. 5, 6.

These overtures, symphonic poems, and miscellaneous pieces will be played:

Auber—Overtures to "Part du Diable," and "Domino Noir."
Bach—Pastorale.
Berlioz—Overture "Roman Carnival," and scenes from "Damnation of Faust."
Bizet—Suite "L'Arlésienne."
Brahms—Academic overture, serenade.
Beethoven—Overture "Leonore" No. 2, "Egmont," "Fidelio."
Chabrier—Entr'acte from "Gwendoline."
Dvorák—"Carnival" overture.
Grieg—Two Norwegian melodies.
Liszt—Hungarian rhapsody.
MacDowell—Symphonic poem.
Mendelssohn—Overtures "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage" and "Ruy Blas."
Meyerbeer—Overture "Struensee."
Mozart—Overtures "Magic Flute" and "Marriage of Figaro."
Rubinstein—Ballet music, "The Demon."
Saint-Saëns—"Omphale's Spinning Wheel."
Smetana—Symphonic poem.
Svendsen—Carnival.
Tschaikowsky—"Francesca da Rimini," "Romeo and Juliet."
Weber—Overture, "Euryanthe."
Weber-Weingartner—"Invitation to the Dance."

And there will be several pieces by Wagner, as well as pieces by Volkmann, Reinecke, Kern, and others.

The novelties announced will be by Chabrier, Glazounoff, Rimsky-Korsakoff, Richard Strauss, Humperdinck and Saint-Saëns, Tschaikowsky.

The programs of the first four concerts will be as follows:

I.—OCT. 15, 16.

Academic overture	Brahms
Symphony No. 7	Beethoven
Espagne	Chabrier
Poème lyrique	Glazounoff
Kaisermarsch	Wagner

II.—OCT. 22, 23.

Easter Festival	Rimsky-Korsakoff
Symphony No. 1	Schumann
Italian Caprice	Tschaikowsky

III.—OCT. 29, 30.

"Thus Spake Zarathusthra"	Richard Strauss
Symphony No. 3	Brahms
Invitation to the Dance	Weber-Weingartner

IV.—NOV. 5, 6.

Symphony No. 7	Haydn
Serenade	Mozart
Overture Leonore No. 2	Beethoven

The list of soloists will include Melba, Mrs. Henschel, Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler, Mrs. Titus, Miss Olive Mead, Messrs. Rosenthal, Joseffy, Siloti, MacDowell, Bispham, Kneisel, Loeffler, Adamowski, Schnitzler, Schroeder, Schulz. Mrs. Titus is a soprano of Boston. Miss Mead is a violinist who has studied with Mr. Kneisel. Alexander Siloti is one of the most distinguished pianists in Europe. He was born, Oct. 10, 1863, at Charkow, South Russia. He studied at the Moscow Conservatory from 1875 to 1881 under Swereff, Nicolas Rubinstein, Tschaikowsky, and Hubert; from '83 to '86 under Liszt. He made his début in 1880 at Moscow in a concert given by the Music Society. His appearance in 1883 at Leipsic in a concert of the Tonkünstler Versammlung provoked stormy applause. Since then he has given concerts throughout Europe.

American Art Journal.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, OCT. 9, 1897.

Mr. Emil Paur has been re engaged for five years as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This gifted musician and sympathetic conductor has brought the orchestra up to a higher standard than ever, and has conquered a proud position in the minds of cultivated musicians who have the welfare of the Symphony standard at heart.

Emil Paur will bring forth the following works in the course of five concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Metropolitan Opera House: Beethoven's Symphony No. 3 ("Eroica") and three movements from the Beethoven Symphony No. 9; Brahms Symphony No. 3, in F major; Dvorak, Symphony "From the New World"; Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, Symphony in E minor ("Gaelic"), op. 32; Tschaikowsky, Italian Caprice; Rimsky-Korsakow, three movements from the Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade"; Massenet, Suite, "Les Errinyes"; Chabrier, Symphonic Poem, "Espagna"; Richard Strauss, Symphonic Poem, "Also spracht Zarathustra"; Volkmann, Serenade for String Orchestra, No. 3, in D minor; Weber-Weingartner, "Invitation to Dance"; Beethoven, Overture, "Lenore, No. 3"; Berlioz, Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini"; Brahms, "Academic" Overture; several Wagner excerpts.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, OCT. 10, 1897.

Symphony Season Begins This Week.

The musical season will begin in Boston this week, for the opening of the Boston Symphony orchestra concerts will take place next Friday afternoon, and that event is regarded as the sign that music will have sway in town until about the first of May. The matchless organization, with Mr Paur as conductor, will begin its new season Oct 15, and with occasional omissions to permit its usual visits to New York and other cities, will give concerts at Boston Music hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of each week until April 30.

The fine quality of the performances of this great organization have made these concerts famous, and they appeal to music lovers from all parts of New England. The list of distinguished solo artists engaged for the series includes Mme Melba, Mrs Henschel, Mrs Titus, Miss Wienzkowska, Mrs Bloomfield-Zeisler, Miss Olive Mead, Mr Bispham, Mr Rosenthal, Mr Joseffy, Mr Siloti, Mr MacDowell, Mr Kneisel, Mr Loeffler, Mr Adamowski, Mr Schnitzler, Mr Schroeder and Mr Schulz.

This week's program will comprise Brahms' academic overture, Beethoven's seventh symphony, "Espagna," Chabrier; Glazounow's lyric poem and Wagner's "Kaisermarsch."

Philadelphia Inquirer

SUNDAY - - - - - OCTOBER 10, 1897

FORTY PAGES

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Twelve years ago the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first performance in this city and the standard established by this now famous organization at that time has been maintained ever since. The preliminary announcement of the annual series of concerts by the orchestra at the Academy of Music practically sounds the key note of the musical season. It is easy to understand the tremendous hold this orchestra has upon the public everywhere, when one remembers that the personnel has remained practically unchanged for the past ten years. The very best artists, not only in this country, but in Europe, have been secured, and in every detail the founder of this superb body of musicians has spared no expense in the direction of a perfect ensemble. These concerts have grown to be a permanent and potent element in the entertainment season, and the interest in them will never relax as long as the acknowledged high standard of the orchestra is maintained. The dates for the coming series are Monday evenings, November 8, December 13, January 17, February 14 and March 21. Mr. Emil Paur will again conduct the orchestra. The programs for the entire series have already been prepared, and include, among other selections, the Haydn Symphony No. 7, the Raff Symphony "In Walde;" the Schumann Symphony No. 4, the Symphony No. 5 and three movements from the ninth symphony of Beethoven. The overtures will include the "Academic" of Brahms, "Euryanthe" of Weber, the "Leonore No. 3" of Beethoven and the "Carlo Broschi" of Auber. Among the novelties are Chabrier's "Espagna," Tschaikowsky's "Italian Caprice," a new suite by Massenet and Weber's "Invitation to the Dance," orchestrated in a most novel and brilliant manner by Weingartner.

The soloists include Mme. Lilian Blauvelt, Mr. David Bispham and Mr. Rafael Joseffy, each an artist of the highest rank and in every way worthy to appear with this organization. Mr. C. M. Loeffler, one of the most talented of the first violins of the orchestra, and also a composer of marked ability, will be heard. The sale of season tickets for the coming season in Philadelphia will open on Monday morning, October 18, at 1221 Chestnut street.

[23]

SUNDAY, OCTOBER 10, 1897.

THE WORLD OF MUSIC.

Opera, Symphony Orchestra and Band—Notes by the Way.

With Sousa's Band concerts but two weeks and the opening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra but two weeks after that leading up to the beginning of the opera season late in November, the musical season of 1897-98 assumes definiteness. What Sousa is and what the Boston orchestra in their respective fields, we all know well. What the opera will be, judging from the repertoire and the roll of artists, is exceedingly promising, so the musical outlook is bright, although at present no notable soloists are booked for early concerts. As the Damrosch and Ellis management are the only ones who will give grand opera in this country this season and as the Philadelphia season is to be the chief concern of the company, good results should flow from the new management. New properties are promised, new scenery, good voices, the Academy has been completely decorated in the new tints, and as the Philadelphia subscribers and guarantors take a deep personal interest in the success of the season it is likely to be a great improvement over that of last year. The artists are beginning to arrive, and the company will soon be at work on rehearsals in order to have things in shipshape for the opening night. Among the novelties of the season will be the appearance of Melba in several entirely new roles, one of them being "Aida." After her illness of last Winter the great singer fully recovered her health, and this Summer in London and elsewhere in Europe she was received with renewed delight. Her most recent success was at the Donizetti Festival at Pergamo, in commemoration of the 200th anniversary of that great composer's death, and was one of the most pronounced of her career, her appearance having been greeted with indescribable enthusiasm.

For sixteen years the Boston Symphony Orchestra has given in Music Hall, Boston, two separate series of twenty-four public rehearsals on Friday afternoons and twenty-four concerts on Saturday evenings. Nearly every season the orchestra, omitting its Boston concerts, has made monthly trips of a week's duration to New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore and Providence. During seven years Western trips were made, as far as St. Paul. As a result of all these performances the opening concert of the Boston season on Friday, October 15, will be the 1500th performance and the 801st performance in Boston. The thirteenth season in Philadelphia will begin at the Academy of Music, as usual, on Monday evening, November 8. The remaining dates will be December 13, January 17, February 14 and March 21. Mr. Emil Paur will conduct the orchestra, the personnel of which remains the same, practically, as in the past ten years. Conductor Paur has already prepared the programme for the entire season, which include, among other selections, the Haydn Symphony, No. 7, the Raff Symphony, "Im Walde;" the Schumann Symphony, No. 4, the Symphony No. 5, and three movements from the ninth Symphony of Beethoven. The overtures will include the "Academic" of Brahms, "Euryanthe" of Weber, the "Leonore No. 3" of Beethoven, and the "Carlo Broschi" of Auber. The novelties will include Chabrier's "Espagna," Tschaikowsky's "Italian Caprice," a new suite by Massenet, and Weber's "Invitation to the Dance," orchestrated in a most novel and brilliant manner by Weingartner. One programme, as usual, will be devoted to the works of Wagner.

Among the soloists are Mme. Lillian Blauvelt, Mr. David Bispham and Mr. Rafael Joseffy, all of them prime favorites in Philadelphia, and too well known to need further exploiting here. Mr. C M. Loeffler, who not only ranks as one of the most talented of the first violins in the orchestra, but who has also achieved marked success as a composer, will also be heard. Some ten years ago the demand for season tickets to the Boston concerts became so great that the sales were conducted by auction. The four days' auction sales for the coming season, recently completed, have been the most successful of any in the past five years. This is regarded as indicating a most prosperous musical season throughout the country. The sale of season tickets for the Philadelphia concerts will begin on Monday morning, October 18, at Fischer's music store, 1221 Chestnut Street.

The Evening Bulletin

Published daily, except Sunday, at No. 612 CHESTNUT STREET, Philadelphia, by
THE BULLETIN COMPANY
WILLIAM L. McLEAN, President.

"THE EVENING BULLETIN" is served to subscribers in Philadelphia and Camden at the rate of 6 cents a week, payable to the carrier. By mail anywhere in the United States or Canada, postage free, at rate of 25 cents a month.

(Entered at the Post-office in Philadelphia as second-class matter.)

Advertisements from fifteen cents to one dollar per line.

Telephones

Publication Office.........44-75
Editorial Rooms.........44-79

Saturday, October 9, 1897.

The programme for the seventeenth annual Philadelphia season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has just been announced. As usual, five concerts are to be given at the Academy of Music, under the direction of Mr. Emil Paur, on Monday evenings, as follows: November 8, December 13, January 17, February 14 and March 21, beginning at 8.15 precisely. The list of works announced for performance includes Beethoven's fifth symphony in C minor and the three instrumental movements from his ninth; Schumann's Symphony, No. 4, in D minor; Hayn's Symphony, No. 7, and Raff's Symphony, "Im Walde," and the overtures, Beethoven's "Leonora," No. 3; Berlioz's "Benvenuto Cellini;" Weber's "Euryanthe," Braham's "Academie" and Auber's "Carlo Broschi." Among the soloists will be Mme. Lillian Blauvelt, Mr. Rafael Joseffy, Mr. David Bispham and Mr. C. A. Loeffler. The sale of tickets will open on Monday morning, October 18, at 1221 Chestnut st.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY

PUBLICATION OFFICE—The Times Building, Chestnut and Eighth Streets.
MECHANICAL DEPARTMENT—The Times New Building, Sansom Street, above Eighth.
NEW YORK OFFICE—150 Nassau Street. Room 1609.

THE DAILY TIMES is served by carriers in this city and surrounding towns for Six Cents a week. By mail, Three Dollars a year; per month, Twenty-five Cents.
THE SUNDAY TIMES—Five Cents per copy; Two Dollars a year; Twenty Cents per month, by mail.
THE DAILY AND SUNDAY TIMES—Five Dollars a year; Forty-five Cents per month, by mail.
THE TIMES, Philadelphia.

PHILADELPHIA, OCTOBER 10, 1897.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The Dates and Features of Its Coming Concerts in This City.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the usual five performances at the Academy of Music this season on Monday evenings, November 8, December 13, January 17, February 14 and March 21. Emil Paur will again conduct the orchestra, which will be of the same number and membership as last year. To this personnel, practically unchanged for the past ten years, is largely due the established reputation of the orchestra. Another prominent factor is the enormous total of 1,500 performances which have been given by the orchestra since its organization in 1881. Although Boston is its home, its concerts here are a recognized Philadelphia institution, and the majority of its patrons in this city have attended the concerts from the very beginning.

The programmes for the entire series have already been prepared by Conductor Paur, and include, among other selection, the Haydn Symphony No. 7, the Raff Symphony "Im Walde," the Schumann Symphony No. 4, the Symphony No. 5 and three movements from the 9th Symphony of Beethoven. The overtures will include the "Academic" of Brahms, "Euryanthe" of Weber, the "Leonore No. 3" of Beethoven, and the "Carlo Broschi" of Auber. The novelties will include Chabrier's "Espagna," Tschaikowsky's "Italian Caprice," a new suite by Massenet, and Weber's "Invitation to the Dance," orchestrated in a novel and brilliant manner by Weingartner. One programme, as usual, will be devoted to the works of Wagner.

The soloists include Mme. Lillian Blauvelt, David Bispham and Rafael Joseffy, each an artist of the highest rank and in every way worthy to appear with this organization. C. M. Loeffler, one of the most talented of the first violins in the orchestra, and also a composer of ability, will be heard. The sale of season tickets for the Philadelphia concerts will begin on Monday morning, October 18, at Fischer's music store.

NORTH AMERICAN
PHILADELPHIA,
RDAY, OCTOBER 9,

THE OPENING MUSICAL SEASON

Notes of the Philadelphia Operatic and Concert Programme.

Arrangements of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—Sousa's Band Coming Soon—Latest Successes of Two Operatic Stars.

The programme for the seventeenth annual Philadelphia season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has just been announced. As usual, five concerts are to be given at the Academy of Music under the direction of Mr. Emil Paur, on Monday evenings, as follows: November 8, December 13, January 17, February 14 and March 21, beginning at 8.15 precisely. The list of works announced for performance includes Beethoven's fifth Symphony in C minor and the three instrumental movements from his ninth; Schumann's Symphony, No. 4, in D minor; Haydn's Symphony, No. 7, and Raff's Symphony, "Im Walde," and the overtures, Beethoven's "Leonora," No. 3; Berlioz's "Benvenuto Cellini;" Weber's "Euryanthe," Braham's "Academic" and Auber's "Carlo Broschi." Among the soloists will be Mme. Lillian Blauvelt, Mr. Rafael Joseffy, Mr. David Bispham and Mr. C. A. Loeffler. The sale of tickets will open on Monday morning, October 18, at 1221 Chestnut street.

Mme. Melba's latest great success was at the Donizetti festival

---

Boston Journal.

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 15, 1897.

Mr. C. M. Loeffler, the celebrated violinist and composer, wrote this last summer at Medfield a symphonic poem, entitled "The Death of Tintigales," in which two violas d'amore are introduced as solo instruments. This beautiful instrument has been neglected strangely by composers of this century, and the solo for it that serves as an accompaniment to Raoul's romance in "The Huguenots," is almost always played on an ordinary viola. Mr. Paur, who is much interested in the work of Mr. Loeffler, will produce this symphonic poem, inspired by Maeterlinck's tragic play for marionettes, at a Symphony concert this season, when the violas d'amore will be played by Mr. Kneisel and the very talented composer.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CII., NO. 107.

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 15, 1897.

What a throng will take possession of Hamilton place today! The first rehearsal and the opening of the musical season always bring the town into line, and fairly launches the music lover on a sea of concerts. Many season ticket holders are still away in the country, but there are proxies for them, while the ardent constant Symphony patron is sure to make a trip to Boston, if only to hear the initial programme, and to be sure that Mr. Paur is all there.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 13, 1897.

The program for the first afternoon's rehearsal and Saturday evening's Symphony Orchestra concert will be:

Academic Overture	Brahms
Symphony No. 7	Beethoven
Symphonic Poem, Espagna	Chabrier
Poeme Lyrique	Glazounow
Kaiser Marsch	Wagner

Mr. Van Veachton Rogers, harp soloist, is a member the Lyceum Stars, as well as several other concert combinations.

Balto. Herald
Oct. 16

The most important musical announcement of the year is that of the annual sale of season tickets for the series of concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall.

The interest in this sale never relaxes, and probably never will as long as the acknowledged high standing of the orchestra is maintained. These concerts have grown to be a permanent and potent element in the entertainment season. Every announcement made by the management has been fulfilled, except in case of illness, accident or events beyond control. No matter what the attraction, the same scale of prices has always been maintained. There will be the usual five performances on Wednesday evenings, November 10, December 15, January 19, February 16 and March 23.

Mr. Emil Paur will again conduct the orchestra, which will be of the same number and membership as last year. To this personnel, practically unchanged for the past 10 years, is largely due the established reputation of the orchestra. Another prominent factor is the enormous total of 1,500 performances which have been given by the orchestra since its founding in 1881. Although Boston is the home of the orchestra, every city visited takes a just pride in the glory of the organization, and the loyal support received everywhere is one of the strongest proofs of its integrity. It is a matter of especial pride with the Boston Symphony Orchestra that the majority of its patrons in this city have attended the concerts from the very beginning.

The programmes for the entire series have already been prepared by Conductor Paur, and include, among other selections, Brahms' Symphony No. 3; Raff's Symphony, "Im Walde;" Dvorak's Symphony, "From the New World;" the Symphony No. 3 of Beethoven, and three movements from the Ninth Symphony, by the same composer. The overtures are the "Benvenuto Cellini," of Berlioz; the Tschaikowsky overture, "1812." The novelties include the "Espagna" of Chabrier, Tschaikowsky's "Italian Caprice," a new suite by Massenet, three movements from a suite by Rimsky Korsakoff and the "Invitation to Dance" of Weber, with a novel and brilliant orchestration by Weingartner.

The soloists are: Mme. Lillian Blauvelt, Mr. David Bispham, Mr. Franz Kneisel and Mr. C. M. Loeffler. An evening will be devoted to selections from Wagner, as usual.

The sale of season tickets will begin at Albert's, on Monday morning, October 18.

Oct 10
Balt. American

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Everybody interested in good music watches with pleasant anticipation for the announcement of the series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In Boston the annual four days' auction sales of season tickets for the two series of twenty-four public rehearsals on Friday afternoons and twenty-four concerts on Saturday evenings are regarded as the keynote of the musical season.

The Baltimore season will include five concerts at Music Hall, as usual, on Wednesday evenings, November 10, December 15, January 19, February 16 and March 23. The programs for the entire series have already been prepared by Conductor Paur, and will include, among other selections, Brahm's Symphony No. 3, Raff's Symphony, "Im Walde"; Dvorak's Symphony, "From the New World"; the Symphony No. 3, of Beethoven, and three movements from the Ninth Symphony by the same composer. The overtures are the "Benvenuto Cellini," of Berlioz, and the Tschaikowsky Overture, "1812." The novelties include the "Espagna," of Chabrier; Tschaikowsky's "Italian Caprice," a new suite, by Massenet; three movements from a suite by Rimsky Korsakoff, and the "Invitation to Dance" of Weber, with a novel and brilliant orchestration by Weingartner. As usual, one program will be devoted entirely to selections from the works of Wagner.

The soloists are Mme. Lillian Blauvelt, Mr. David Bispham, Mr. Franz Kneisel and Mr. C. M. Loeffler.

Providence, Rhode Island

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 1

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The famous Boston Symphony Orchestra which has done more to advance the interests of music in the large cities of the East than any other agency, and which has been a potent factor in educating the average music lover to appreciate the best in the divine art, will give eight concerts in this city during the fast approaching season. This is more than the city ever enjoyed before and the announcement is hailed with joy by the ever increasing friends of this splendid organization. The increase in the number of concerts is in response to the expressed wish of the patrons of high class music in this city and vicinity, for it is known that when a Symphony concert is given here, nearby towns send a generous number to swell the audience that always comfortably fills Infantry Hall. During the season many of the great lyric artists and renowned instrumentalists will appear with the orchestra, and if all signs do not fail this will be the most noteworthy season of the sixteen, during which this great organization has annually visited us. The auction sale of season tickets will take place on Monday morning, Oct. 25, at 9 o'clock, and the price will be $7 each.

The Boston Traveler

PUBLISHED BY THE
BOSTON TRAVELER CO.,
TORREY E. WARDNER, President

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 16, 1897.

THE SYMPHONY ONCE MORE

Genuine Opening of Boston's Music Season.

BROOKE'S BAND TOMORROW

A Real Music Journal in Town at Last.

NOTES ON PERSONS AND THINGS

The official and only genuine opening of the musical season in Boston for 1897-8 occurs with this week's Symphony concerts in Music Hall. The usual gay crush of matinee devotees, brilliant in new coats and bonnets, and bubbling over with the long pent-up enthusiasm over the resurrection of the art divine, enlivened the big auditorium yesterday afternoon, while tonight the more pronounced and famous apostles of Dame Musica will throng to their shrine in reverent mood. The programme is:

Academic Overture	Brahms
Symphony, No. 7	Beethoven
Espagna	Chabrier
Poeme Lyrique	Glazounow
Kaiser March	Wagner

Certainly the sticklers for variety ought to smile with satisfaction at that menu. From the calm classicism, though genial warmth of the Brahms overture to the fine (some doubt it) frenzy of the Wagner march, is a long stride, and the gap is partly filled with a practically unknown quantity in the person of Glazounow. He may be expected to be peppery.

It is trite to say that everything promises a most excellent Symphony season, but surely no such all-around favoring circumstances were ever known in the history of the organization. Once more, all praise to Mr. Higginson.

Boston Transcript

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 16, 1897

Mr. C. M. Loeffler, well-known as a composer of decided merit and also for many years a prominent member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has recently finished a musical work destined to enhance his already brilliant reputation. This new composition is a symphonic poem for orchestra and two violas d'amour obbligato, entitled, "The Death of Tintagiles," after M. Maeterlinck's drama, "La Mort de Tintagiles." Mr. Paur is exceedingly interested in this work, and promises its production at one of the symphony concerts of the present season.

[24]

The Press

SUNDAY, OCTOBER 10, 1897.

THE WORLD OF MUSIC.

Opera, Symphony Orchestra and Band—Notes by the Way.

With Sousa's Band concerts but two weeks and the opening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra but two weeks after that leading up to the beginning of the opera season late in November, the musical season of 1897-98 assumes definiteness. What Sousa is and what the Boston orchestra in their respective fields, we all know well. What the opera will be, judging from the repertoire and the roll of artists, is exceedingly promising, so the musical outlook is bright, although at present no notable soloists are booked for early concerts. As the Damrosch and Ellis management are the only ones who will give grand opera in this country this season and as the Philadelphia season is to be the chief concern of the company, good results should flow from the new management. New properties are promised, new scenery, good voices, the Academy has been completely decorated in the new tints, and as the Philadelphia subscribers and guarantors take a deep personal interest in the success of the season it is likely to be a great improvement over that of last year. The artists are beginning to arrive, and the company will soon be at work on rehearsals in order to have things in shipshape for the opening night. Among the novelties of the season will be the appearance of Melba in several entirely new roles, one of them being "Aida." After her illness of last Winter the great singer fully recovered her health, and this Summer in London and elsewhere in Europe she was received with renewed delight. Her most recent success was at the Donizetti Festival at Pergamo, in commemoration of the 200th anniversary of that great composer's death, and was one of the most pronounced of her career, her appearance having been greeted with indescribable enthusiasm.

For sixteen years the Boston Symphony Orchestra has given in Music Hall, Boston, two separate series of twenty-four public rehearsals on Friday afternoons and twenty-four concerts on Saturday evenings. Nearly every season the orchestra, omitting its Boston concerts, has made monthly trips of a week's duration to New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore and Providence. During seven years Western trips were made, as far as St. Paul. As a result of all these performances the opening concert of the Boston season on Friday, October 15, will be the 1500th performance and the 801st performance in Boston. The thirteenth season in Philadelphia will begin at the Academy of Music, as usual, on Monday evening, November 8. The remaining dates will be December 13, January 17, February 14 and March 21. Mr. Emil Paur will conduct the orchestra, the personnel of which remains the same, practically, as in the past ten years. Conductor Paur has already prepared the programme for the entire season, which include, among other selections, the Haydn Symphony, No. 7, the Raff Symphony, "Im Walde;" the Schumann Symphony, No. 4, the Symphony No. 5, and three movements from the ninth Symphony of Beethoven. The overtures will include the "Academic" of Brahms, "Euryanthe" of Weber, the "Leonore No. 3" of Beethoven, and the "Carlo Broschi" of Auber. The novelties will include Chabrier's "Espagna," Tschaikowsky's "Italian Caprice," a new suite by Massenet, and Weber's "Invitation to the Dance," orchestrated in a most novel and brilliant manner by Weingartner. One programme, as usual, will be devoted to the works of Wagner.

Among the soloists are Mme. Lillian Blauvelt, Mr. David Bispham and Mr. Rafael Joseffy, all of them prime favorites in Philadelphia, and too well known to need further exploiting here. Mr. C M. Loeffler, who not only ranks as one of the most talented of the first violins in the orchestra, but who has also achieved marked success as a composer, will also be heard. Some ten years ago the demand for season tickets to the Boston concerts became so great that the sales were conducted by auction. The four days' auction sales for the coming season, recently completed, have been the most successful of any in the past five years. This is regarded as indicating a most prosperous musical season throughout the country. The sale of season tickets for the Philadelphia concerts will begin on Monday morning, October 18, at Fischer's music store, 1221 Chestnut Street.

The Evening Bulletin

Published daily, except Sunday, at No. 612
CHESTNUT STREET, Philadelphia, by
THE BULLETIN COMPANY
WILLIAM L. McLEAN, President.

"THE EVENING BULLETIN" is served to subscribers in Philadelphia and Camden at the rate of 6 cents a week, payable to the carrier. By mail anywhere in the United States or Canada, postage free, at rate of 25 cents a month.

(Entered at the Post-office in Philadelphia as second-class matter.)

Advertisements from fifteen cents to one dollar per line.

Telephones
Publication Office........ 44-75
Editorial Rooms.......... 44-79

Saturday, October 9, 1897.

The programme for the seventeenth annual Philadelphia season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has just been announced. As usual, five concerts are to be given at the Academy of Music, under the direction of Mr. Emil Paur, on Monday evenings, as follows: November 8, December 13, January 17, February 14 and March 21, beginning at 8.15 precisely. The list of works announced for performance includes Beethoven's fifth symphony in C minor and the three instrumental movements from his ninth; Schumann's Symphony, No. 4, in D minor; Hayn's Symphony, No. 7, and Raff's Symphony, "Im Walde," and the overtures, Beethoven's "Leonora," No. 3; Berlioz's "Benvenuto Cellini;" Weber's "Euryanthe," Braham's "Academie" and Auber's "Carlo Broschi." Among the soloists will be Mme. Lillian Blauvelt, Mr. Rafael Joseffy, Mr. David Bispham and Mr. C. A. Loeffler. The sale of tickets will open on Monday morning, October 18, at 1221 Chestnut st.

The Times

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY

PUBLICATION OFFICE—The Times Building, Chestnut and Eighth Streets.
MECHANICAL DEPARTMENT—The Times New Building, Sansom Street, above Eighth.
NEW YORK OFFICE—150 Nassau Street. Room 1609.

THE DAILY TIMES is served by carriers in this city and surrounding towns for Six Cents a week, By mail, Three Dollars a year; per month, Twenty-five Cents.
THE SUNDAY TIMES—Five Cents per copy; Two Dollars a year; Twenty Cents per month, by mail.
THE DAILY AND SUNDAY TIMES—Five Dollars a year; Forty-five Cents per month, by mail.
THE TIMES, Philadelphia.

PHILADELPHIA, OCTOBER 10, 1897.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The Dates and Features of Its Coming Concerts in This City.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the usual five performances at the Academy of Music this season on Monday evenings, November 8, December 13, January 17, February 14 and March 21. Emil Paur will again conduct the orchestra, which will be of the same number and membership as last year. To this personnel, practically unchanged for the past ten years, is largely due the established reputation of the orchestra. Another prominent factor is the enormous total of 1,500 performances which have been given by the orchestra since its organization in 1881. Although Boston is its home, its concerts here are a recognized Philadelphia institution, and the majority of its patrons in this city have attended the concerts from the very beginning.

The programmes for the entire series have already been prepared by Conductor Paur, and include, among other selection, the Haydn Symphony No. 7, the Raff Symphony "Im Walde," the Schumann Symphony No. 4, the Symphony No. 5 and three movements from the 9th Symphony of Beethoven. The overtures will include the "Academic" of Brahms, "Euryanthe" of Weber, the "Leonore No. 3" of Beethoven, and the "Carlo Broschi" of Auber. The novelties will include Chabrier's "Espagna," Tschaikowsky's "Italian Caprice," a new suite by Massenet, and Weber's "Invitation to the Dance," orchestrated in a novel and brilliant manner by Weingartner. One programme, as usual, will be devoted to the works of Wagner.

The soloists include Mme. Lillian Blauvelt, David Bispham and Rafael Joseffy, each an artist of the highest rank and in every way worthy to appear with this organization. C. M. Loeffler, one of the most talented of the first violins in the orchestra, and also a composer of ability, will be heard. The sale of season tickets for the Philadelphia concerts will begin on Monday morning, October 18, at Fischer's music store.

NORTH AMERICAN
PHILADELPHIA,
RDAY, OCTOBER 9,

THE OPENING MUSICAL SEASON

Notes of the Philadelphia Operatic and Concert Programme.

Arrangements of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—Sousa's Band Coming Soon—Latest Successes of Two Operatic Stars.

The programme for the seventeenth annual Philadelphia season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has just been announced. As usual, five concerts are to be given at the Academy of Music under the direction of Mr. Emil Paur, on Monday evenings, as follows: November 8, December 13, January 17, February 14 and March 21, beginning at 8.15 precisely. The list of works announced for performance includes Beethoven's fifth Symphony in C minor and the three instrumental movements from his ninth; Schumann's Symphony, No. 4, in D minor; Haydn's Symphony, No. 7, and Raff's Symphony, "Im Walde," and the overtures, Beethoven's "Leonora," No. 3; Berlioz's "Benvenuto Cellini;" Weber's "Euryanthe," Braham's "Academic" and Auber's "Carlo Broschi." Among the soloists will be Mme. Lillian Blauvelt, Mr. Rafael Joseffy, Mr. David Bispham and Mr. C. A. Loeffler. The sale of tickets will open on Monday morning, October 18, at 1221 Chestnut street.

Mme. Melba's latest great success was at the Donizetti festival

---

Boston Journal.

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 15, 1897.

Mr. C. M. Loeffler, the celebrated violinist and composer, wrote this last summer at Medfield a symphonic poem, entitled "The Death of Tintigales," in which two violas d'amore are introduced as solo instruments. This beautiful instrument has been neglected strangely by composers of this century, and the solo for it that serves as an accompaniment to Raoul's romance in "The Huguenots," is almost always played on an ordinary viola. Mr. Paur, who is much interested in the work of Mr. Loeffler, will produce this symphonic poem, inspired by Maeterlinck's tragic play for marionettes, at a Symphony concert this season, when the violas d'amore will be played by Mr. Kneisel and the very talented composer.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CII., NO. 107.

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 15, 1897.

What a throng will take possession of Hamilton place today! The first rehearsal and the opening of the musical season always bring the town into line, and fairly launches the music lover on a sea of concerts. Many season ticket holders are still away in the country, but there are proxies for them, while the ardent constant Symphony patron is sure to make a trip to Boston, if only to hear the initial programme, and to be sure that Mr. Paur is all there.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 13, 1897.

The program for the first afternoon's rehearsal and Saturday evening's Symphony Orchestra concert will be:

	Brahm
Academic Overture	Beethoven
Symphony No. 7	Chabrier
Symphonic Poem, Espagna	Glazounow
Poeme Lyrique	Wagner
Kaiser Marsch

Mr. Van Veachton Rogers, harp soloist, is a member the Lyceum Stars, as well as several other concert combinations.

Balto. Herald
Oct. 16

The most important musical announcement of the year is that of the annual sale of season tickets for the series of concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall.

The interest in this sale never relaxes, and probably never will as long as the acknowledged high standing of the orchestra is maintained. These concerts have grown to be a permanent and potent element in the entertainment season. Every announcement made by the management has been fulfilled, except in case of illness, accident or events beyond control. No matter what the attraction, the same scale of prices has always been maintained. There will be the usual five performances on Wednesday evenings, November 10, December 15, January 19, February 16 and March 23.

Mr. Emil Paur will again conduct the orchestra, which will be of the same number and membership as last year. To this personnel, practically unchanged for the past 10 years, is largely due the established reputation of the orchestra. Another prominent factor is the enormous total of 1,500 performances which have been given by the orchestra since its founding in 1881. Although Boston is the home of the orchestra, every city visited takes a just pride in the glory of the organization, and the loyal support received everywhere is one of the strongest proofs of its integrity. It is a matter of especial pride with the Boston Symphony Orchestra that the majority of its patrons in this city have attended the concerts from the very beginning.

The programmes for the entire series have already been prepared by Conductor Paur, and include, among other selections, Brahms' Symphony No. 3; Raff's Symphony, "Im Walde;" Dvorak's Symphony, "From the New World;" the Symphony No. 3 of Beethoven, and three movements from the Ninth Symphony, by the same composer. The overtures are the "Benvenuto Cellini," of Berlioz; the Tschaikowsky overture, "1812." The novelties include the "Espagna" of Chabrier, Tschaikowsky's "Italian Caprice," a new suite by Massenet, three movements from a suite by Rimsky Korsakoff and the "Invitation to Dance" of Weber, with a novel and brilliant orchestration by Weingartner.

The soloists are: Mme. Lillian Blauvelt, Mr. David Bispham, Mr. Franz Kneisel and Mr. C. M. Loeffler. An evening will be devoted to selections from Wagner, as usual.

The sale of season tickets will begin at Albert's, on Monday morning, October 18.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Everybody interested in good music watches with pleasant anticipation for the announcement of the series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In Boston the annual four days' auction sales of season tickets for the two series of twenty-four public rehearsals on Friday afternoons and twenty-four concerts on Saturday evenings are regarded as the keynote of the musical season.

The Baltimore season will include five concerts at Music Hall, as usual, on Wednesday evenings, November 10, December 15, January 19, February 16 and March 23. The programs for the entire series have already been prepared by Conductor Paur, and will include, among other selections, Brahm's Symphony No. 3, Raff's Symphony, "Im Walde"; Dvorak's Symphony, "From the New World"; the Symphony No. 3, of Beethoven, and three movements from the Ninth Symphony by the same composer. The overtures are the "Benvenuto Cellini," of Berlioz, and the Tschaikowsky Overture, "1812." The novelties include the "Espagna," of Chabrier; Tschaikowsky's "Italian Caprice," a new suite, by Massenet; three movements from a suite by Rimsky Korsakoff, and the "Invitation to Dance" of Weber, with a novel and brilliant orchestration by Weingartner. As usual, one program will be devoted entirely to selections from the works of Wagner.

The soloists are Mme. Lillian Blauvelt, Mr. David Bispham, Mr. Franz Kneisel and Mr. C. M. Loeffler.

THE NEWS.
DAILY AND WEEKLY.
Providence, Rhode Island.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 16, 1897.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The famous Boston Symphony Orchestra which has done more to advance the interests of music in the large cities of the East than any other agency, and which has been a potent factor in educating the average music lover to appreciate the best in the divine art, will give eight concerts in this city during the fast approaching season. This is more than the city ever enjoyed before and the announcement is hailed with joy by the ever increasing friends of this splendid organization. The increase in the number of concerts is in response to the expressed wish of the patrons of high class music in this city and vicinity, for be it known that when a Symphony concert is given here, nearby towns send a generous number to swell the audience that always comfortably fills Infantry Hall. During the season many of the great lyric artists and renowned instrumentalists will appear with the orchestra, and if all signs do not fail this will be the most noteworthy season of the sixteen, during which this great organization has annually visited us. The auction sale of season tickets will take place on Monday morning, Oct. 25, at 9 o'clock, and the price will be $7 each.

The Boston Traveler

PUBLISHED BY THE
BOSTON TRAVELER CO.,
TORREY E. WARDNER, President

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 16, 1897.

THE SYMPHONY ONCE MORE

Genuine Opening of Boston's Music Season.

BROOKE'S BAND TOMORROW

A Real Music Journal in Town at Last.

NOTES ON PERSONS AND THINGS

The official and only genuine opening of the musical season in Boston for 1897-8 occurs with this week's Symphony concerts in Music Hall. The usual gay crush of matinee devotees, brilliant in new coats and bonnets, and bubbling over with the long pent-up enthusiasm over the resurrection of the art divine, enlivened the big auditorium yesterday afternoon, while tonight the more pronounced and famous apostles of Dame Musica will throng to their shrine in reverent mood. The programme is:

Academic Overture	Brahms
Symphony, No. 7	Beethoven
Espagna	Chabrier
Poeme Lyrique	Glazounow
Kaiser March	Wagner

Certainly the sticklers for variety ought to smile with satisfaction at that menu. From the calm classicism, though genial warmth of the Brahms overture to the fine (some doubt it) frenzy of the Wagner march, is a long stride, and the gap is partly filled with a practically unknown quantity in the person of Glazounow. He may be expected to be peppery.

It is trite to say that everything promises a most excellent Symphony season, but surely no such all-around favoring circumstances were ever known in the history of the organization. Once more, all praise to Mr. Higginson..

Boston Transcript

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 16, 1897

Mr. C. M. Loeffler, well-known as a composer of decided merit and also for many years a prominent member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has recently finished a musical work destined to enhance his already brilliant reputation. This new composition is a symphonic poem for orchestra and two violas d'amour obbligato, entitled, "The Death of Tintagiles," after M. Maeterlinck's drama, "La Mort de Tintagiles." Mr. Paur is exceedingly interested in this work, and promises its production at one of the symphony concerts of the present season.

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL.
PUBLISHED BY THE
PROVIDENCE JOURNAL COMPANY

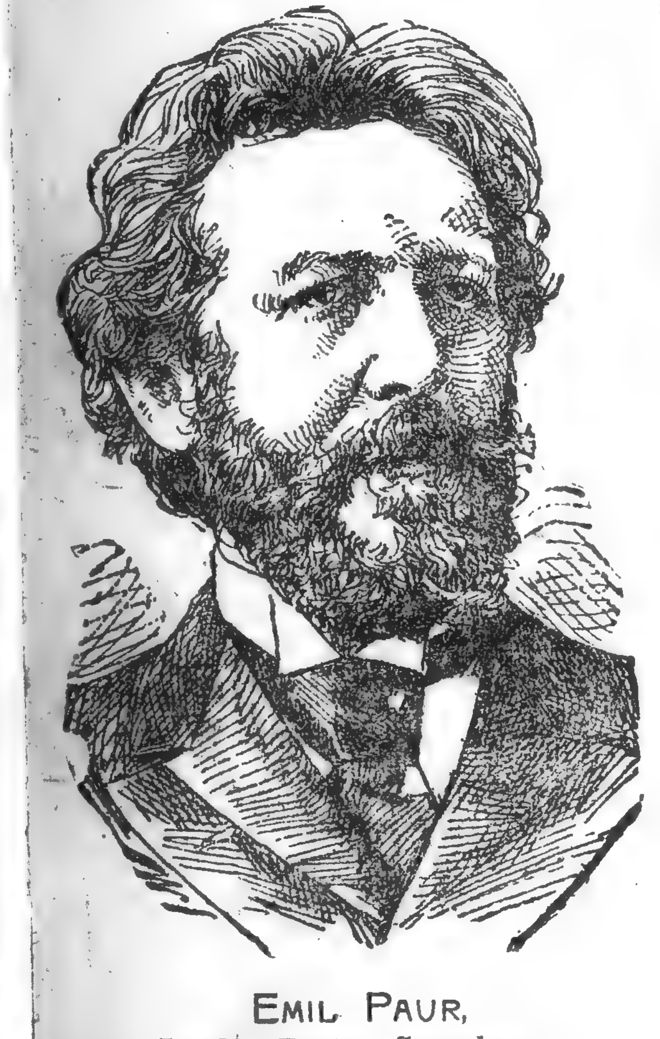
SUNDAY, OCTOBER 17, 1897.

Symphony Orchestra.

For fifteen consecutive seasons the Boston Symphony Orchestra has given to the patrons of the best in music in Providence and vicinity a series of concerts, which will compare favorably with any similar series in the world. A total of over 1500 concerts of essentially uniform merit is an unbroken record which no other orchestra in any quarter of the globe can show in the same length of time. One explanation of this record is the practically unchanged personnel of the orchestra in the past ten years. To perfect this personnel the best artists in Europe and at home have been secured, and to-day the Boston Symphony Orchestra has an established name and reputation in every European capital. No conductor has returned to Europe with a record dimmed by his sojourn here; on the contrary, to have directed the Boston Orchestra has been a distinct and added honor to each of conductor Paur's three predecessors.

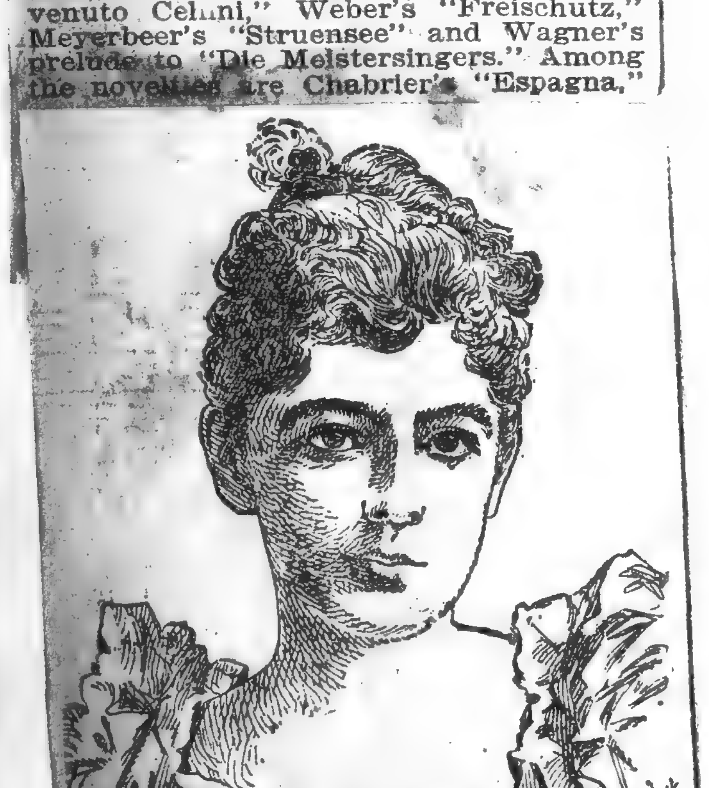
The orchestra will be, as usual, under the direction of Mr. Emil Paur. It seems almost superfluous to reiterate that the same high standard of the past decade will be maintained. An esprit du corps exists in the ranks of this organization, which insures strenuous effort in the direction of perfect ensemble. The result is shown in the general sentiment of satisfaction and approval which prevails after each performance. Exceptions may be taken now and then to some slight variation from the general rule of excellent performance, but the audiences as a whole, and among them many a patron from the very beginning of the concerts, enjoy to the fullest extent the work of as skilled a body of musicians as can be found either abroad or at home.

One important feature of the coming season in Providence, which will undoubtedly be welcomed by every lover of the best in music, is the increase in the number of concerts to be given from six to eight performances. Wednesday evenings have been chosen, as usual, and the dates are Nov. 3, Dec. 1 and 29, Jan. 12, Feb. 2, March 9 and 30 and April 20. The concerts will begin at 8 o'clock precisely, and, following the established rule of this organization, the doors will be closed during the performance of the first number, in deference to the great majority of patrons who are promptly in their seats.



EMIL PAUR,
Leader Boston Symphony.

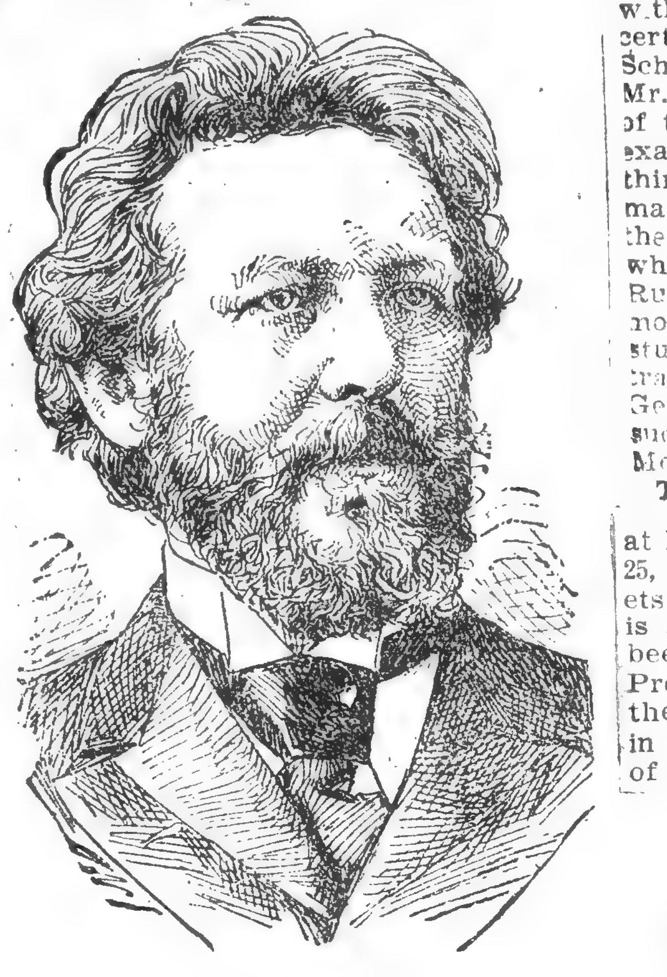
The list of works to be performed includes the Symphony No. 5 and three movements from the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven, the Schumann Symphony No. 1, Haydn Symphony No. 7, Raff Symphony, Im Walde," Brahms Symphony No. 3 and Dvorak Symphony "From the New World." The overtures are Beethoven's "Leonore" No. 3, Mendelssohn's "Ruy Blas," Berlioz's "Benvenuto Cellini," Weber's "Freischutz," Meyerbeer's "Struensee" and Wagner's prelude to "Die Meistersingers." Among the novelties are Chabrier's "Espagna,"



LILLIAN BLAUVELT,
Boston Symphony.

The Telegram

SUNDAY, OCTOBER 17, 1897.



EMIL PAUR,
Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Nov. 3 is the date fixed for the first performance of the coming season of the Boston Symphony orchestra, whose monthly concerts in Infantry hall on Wednesday evenings, will once more be one of the leading features of the musical year. No organization enjoys greater favor with the public, and its constantly growing popularity is a tribute to its proficiency in its art. The arrangements now completed for these concerts leave nothing to be desired, and subscribers will enjoy all the attractive features for which they have become famous.

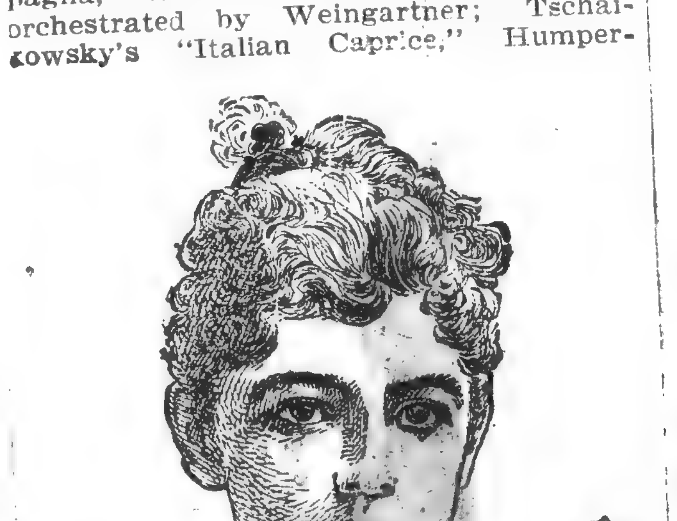
To ask that the orchestra itself shall be any better is almost unreasonable, Conductor Paur will strive to raise the standard of performance even higher than before. "A virtuoso orchestra," as the critic of the New York Sun called it last winter, is a title justly bestowed on the Boston Symphony orchestra. Unlike nearly every other organization appealing to the musical public for support, the attractiveness of its performances rests upon the musicianship and ability of all its members, and the perfection of its ensemble, and not upon the personality and talent of an individual, or of a few stars. For perfection of detail its performances can only be compared to the dramatic performances of the Comedie Francaise, and, like that famous institution, the permanency of its success seems assured.

It is worthy of comment, in connection with the concerts in this city, that, with the exception of one season, Providence has enjoyed the visit of this now famous organization every year since its inception in 1881. One most important feature, which will undoubtedly be welcomed by every lover of the best in music, is the increase in the number of concerts to be given from six to eight performances. Wednesday evenings have been chosen, as usual, and the dates are Nov. 3, Dec. 2 and 29, Jan. 12, Feb. 2, March 9 and 30 and April 20. The concerts will begin at 8 o'clock precisely, and, following the established rule of this organization, the doors will be closed during the performance of the first number, in deference to the great majority of patrons who are promptly in their seats. The opening concert on Wednesday evening, Nov. 3, will be the 1,507th performance of the orchestra, and the fiftyeighth in Providence. This enormous number of performances, and a personnel practically unchanged in the past ten years, will go very far toward explaining the marvelous ensemble of the orchestra.

Conductor Paur, desirous of making his fifth season memorable, has made the arrangement of the programs the care of his summer days. He will present a carefully variety of ever-welcome standard works, and has secured from the great number of novelties submitted to him for examination such as appeal to him as being worthy. The list of works to be performed includes the Symphony No. 5 and three movements from the 9th Symphony of Beethoven, the Schumann Symphony No. 1, Haydn Symphony No. 7, Raff Symphony "Im Walde,' Brahm Symphony No. 3 and Dvorak Symphony "From the New World." The overtures are: Beethoven's "Leonore" No. 3, Mendelssohn's "Ruy Blas," "Berlioz' "Benvenuto Cellini," Weber's "Freischutz," Meyerbeer's "Struensee," and Wagner's prelude to "Die Meistersinger." Among the novelties are Chabier's "Espagna," Weber's "Invitation to Dance," orchestrated by Weingartner; Tschaikowsky's "Italian Caprice," Humperdinck's overture to "Hansel and Gretel," Grieg's "Three Norwegian Melodies," and two movements from a suite by Rimsky Korsakoff. By very general request, the Symphony No. 6, "Pathetique," by Tschaikowsky, which made such a profound impression last season, will be played. As usual, one program will be devoted entirely to the works of Wagner.

The soloists are: Mme. Gadski, who scored a marked and instantaneous success at her first appearance in this city with the orchestra last season; Miss Lillian Blauvelt and Miss Gertrude May Stein, both artists in every way qualified to appear with this organization; Mr. Rafael Joseffy, an established favorite in this city; Mr. George W. Proctor, a pianist with marked success in the Boston concerts of the orchestra last year; Mr. Schnitzler, one of the first violins, and Mr. Alwin Schroeder, the first violoncellist of the orchestra. A newcomer is Mr. Alexander Siloti, a Russian pianist, about thirty-five years of age, who won the marked distinction of the gold medal at the Imperial Conservatory in Moscow, where he studied first under the Nicolas Rubinstein, and later under the more famous Anton Rubinstein. He afterwards studied with Franz Liszt, and later on traveled with great success throughout Germany. He also conducted some very succesful concerts in St. Petersburg and Moscow.

The sale of season tickets will be held at Infantry hall on Monday morning, Oct. 25, at 9 o'clock. The price of season tickets for the eight concerts will be $7, which is almost exactly the same rate as has been charged in the past six concerts. Program books with descriptive notes on the works to be performed will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.



MADAME LILLIAN BLAUVELT

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, OCT. 17, 1897.

First Symphony Concert of the Season.

Many signs of friendliness were manifested toward Mr Emil Paur and the artists who follow his baton at the opening rehearsal and concert of the 17th season of the Boston symphony orchestra. The attendance, as a matter of course, was very large, and the conductor's reappearance on the Music hall platform proved the signal for a round of generous applause.

If Mr Paur's opening program, as well as that which his musicians are to present this week, can be taken as indicating his course during the season just begun, there will be no lack of new offerings, and there will be observable also a marked readiness to relieve the heavier selections in his repertory by lighter, but by no means unmeritorious numbers. Severe classicists might frown upon a tendency to pass from grave to gay, from lively to severe, in the making of programs for a symphony concert, but there can be no doubt that the great majority of Mr Paur's audiences from week to week would accord it hearty indorsement.

Brahms' academic festival overture, often heard but always welcome, gave the orchestra its first hearing of the season. It was interpreted sympathetically and forcefully.

The symphony was Beethoven's seventh in A major—a work familiar indeed to lovers of the great master, but invariably listened to with delight when adequately performed. From the opening movement to that whirlwind of dance music, the allegro con brio, Mr Paur's players acquitted themselves well, showing always a keen appreciation of the symphony's many beauties and rare skill in setting them forth.

Chabrier's dashing and singularly effective rhapsody, "Spain," was heard for the first time at these concerts. It is possible that some old conservatives in Mr Paur's audience may have pished and psha'd at the piece, and pronounced it unworthy a place in a symphony program, though perhaps to be tolerated at a "Pop" concert. Assuredly, however, the multitude did not hold to any such opinion. The masterly and brilliant use of typical Spanish jota and fandango dance themes, enlisting as it did two harps, triangle, tambourine, as well as many other instruments, was a delight in the line of unique orchestral effect. Its performance, though the fantasy abounds in technical difficulties, was wellnigh flawless, and the rhapsody gained round after round of plaudits.

The words "first time" followed the mention of Glazowaoff's lyric poem for orchestra, the fourth offering on the program. While there may possibly be room for differences of opinion as the precise kind of longing which the young Russian has sought to set forth, there can be no doubt that his work has been done in true musicianly fashion. The orchestra's interpretation did full justice to its pastoral and unexciting rhythms.

Wagner's grandiose "Emperor's March" is undeniably noisy at times. It is also at moments undeniably effective, particularly in the manner in which the "Ein fest Burg," is introduced, and in the sounding simulation of triumph which brings the work to a close. The presentation was excellent, but imagine if you can even a crack German regiment trying to keep step to such an erratic march.

The program for this week's concerts is as follows: "Oster Fest" (first time), Rimsky-Korsakoff; concerto for violin (first time), Gernsheim, Mr I. Schnitzler soloist; Schumann's symphony No. 1; "Italian Caprice" (first time), Tchaikovsky.

Boston Journal

SUNDAY, OCTOBER 17, 1897.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Chabrier's "Espana" and Glazounow's "Poeme Lyrique" Played for the First Time at These Concerts.

The program for the first Symphony concert of the 17th season, Mr. Emil Paur, conductor, was as follows:

Academic Festival Overture, op. 80	Brahms
Symphony No. 7, in A major	Beethoven
Rhapsody for orchestra, "Espana" (First time at these concerts.)	Chabrier
Lyric Poem for orchestra, op. 12 (First time in Boston.)	Glazounow
The Emperor's March, in B-flat major	Wagner

Chabrier's "Espana" was played for the first time in Boston at a concert of the Philharmonic Orchestra, led by Mr. Listemann, Jan. 14, 1892. At that time the piece was over eight years old. Our novelties are late, very late in arriving. The brilliant rhapsody was heard in several American cities and many times before it was allowed to delight a Boston audience.

Chabrier had visited Spain before he wrote this dazzling rhapsody. Whether he was thus inspired to write it, is a question of no material moment. Auber's "Masaniello" is alive with Neapolitan vitality and glowing with Italian color, and yet the composer never crossed the frontier, a man loath to stray from his beloved boulevards.

A man of receptive mind may visit Spain and carry away a controlling, haunting idea that is not musical. Thus Mr. Beatty-Kingston wrote of little save garlic, laziness and dirt; while our old friend Maj. Muldoon always began his one story of amatory adventure with, "When I was on the Peninsula with Sir Arthur, I became acquainted with a condesa, which is Spanish for Countess."

What amazing go, what brilliance in this fascinating piece! The staidest matron in the hall felt like footing a fandango, and it would not have been surprising if couples had formed for the jota, with its "whirl round and chassez, and nautch-wallah-ing," to quote from the program-book, which in turn quotes from Major Campion. I doubt if there was one sour-faced person in the audience while this rhapsody was a-playing. Do I hear some one say in a whisper, "But this is not dignified enough for a Symphony concert; the themes are nothing but dance-tunes?" Yes, and what dance-tunes! And how brilliantly, how daringly, how musically treated! As for that, dear sir or madam, symphonies themselves are a development of the old suite, which was built upon dance tunes from Allemande to Gigue. The effect of this gorgeous apotheosis of the jota was instantaneous and irresistible. The temperature in the hall was trying to players and listeners. The Academic overture was heard respectfully; the symphony was applauded decorously; there was much fanning, shifting in seat, stifled yawning. But the first measures of the Rhapsody made the audience sit up straight. Heat, foul air, discomfort, were forgotten. Even blood relatives looked kindly at each other. The applause that followed the final chord was hearty, prolonged and, best of all, honest. Let us hear this Rhapsody again; Mr. Paur, and read it with even more abandon. The jota is a fiery dance; Chabrier was a passionate fellow, if he was ventripotent; give the freest rein to the orchestra.

Let me add to Mr. Apthorp's interesting article on Chabrier in the program-book by stating that the one act of "Briséïs," the opera left unfinished by this composer of great talent, if not genius, was performed for the first time at a Lamoureux concert in Paris, the 31st of last January. The opera has been published by Enoch in most sumptuous form.

* * *

I have written at length about Alexander Glazounow, his life, his compositions, and the performances of them in this country and in Europe, in another column of this morning's Journal.

Perhaps Mr. Paur was wise in choosing one of Glazounow's earlier works—op. 12—which was played at Cincinnati by Mr. Van der Stucken's orchestra in 1895—for the introduction of this remarkable composer. I do not believe it is among his stronger or more characteristic pieces. Mr. Thomas, who has already brought out three of Glazounow's works in Chicago, and proposes to play five more this season, has not seen fit to include the "Poème lyrique" among them.

Two symphonies, Nos. 4 and 5, certainly deserve a hearing. The first has been performed with great success at symphony concerts in Cologne, Dresden, Hamburg, Mayence, Amsterdam, London, Magdeburg, Geneva. The fifth has been played twice in London.

Perhaps Mr. Paur may say, "But they are too Russian." Yes, but let us know what these Russians are doing. There was a time when Tschaikowsky was considered "too Russian," although the radical Russian school regarded him as "too cosmopolitan."

"Poème lyrique" is not a piece of great pretensions; but it was melodious without vulgarity; often saved from commonplace by an ingenious harmonic twist; broad and sweeping in theme and treatment; decidedly individual; orchestrally beautiful.

The program-book states that the Academic Festival Overture was written by Brahms in 1881. If this statement is true, it must have been composed hurriedly in the first week of January of that year, for it was performed early in the month at Breslau and Leipsic. It was not liked at first—even in Vienna—Dr. Deiters to the contrary notwithstanding. And, however you may admire the architecture of the work, the decoration must strike you as dry and frigid.

* * *

There have been more inspired performances of the 7th symphony in Music Hall. I make all due allowance for the discouraging temperature and the fact that it was the first concert of the season. Mr. Paur was inclined to coquette with the straightforward themes of the first movement; but the finale was given with great spirit. The conductor was greeted warmly when he took his place.

Philip Hale.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Paur, conductor, will give ten concerts in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, Thursday evenings, Oct. 28, Nov. 18, Dec. 9, Jan. 6, 27, Feb. 10, 24, March 17, April 7, 28. The soloists will be Mrs. Szumowska, Mrs. Titus, Miss Wood, Messrs. Frangcon-Davies, Siloti, Jonas, Kneisel, Loeffler and others. Subscription tickets with reserved seats will be for sale at the University Book Store Saturday morning, Oct. 23, at 8 o'clock.

* * *

BOSTON DAILY
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, OCT. 18, 1897.

ening of the 17th Season of the Symphony Orchestra.

The 17th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra began in Music Hall on Saturday evening in a temperature so hot and stifling that one almost expected to find the tables and bottled coolness of the "Pop" concerts in evidence; but the audience seemed impervious to any action of the thermometer and was not only of large size but stayed to the very end.

Naturally, however, the close and humid atmosphere had a little effect on the string tones of the orchestra, which, in the symphony especially, sounded less fiery than usual.

Mr. Paur received a cordial welcome, and at once proceeded to earn it by a brilliant reading of the quaint "Academic Overture" by Brahms. The three college songs on which the work is founded were given with excellent balance and the German "Upidee" ("Was kommt dort von der Hoch") was as jovial as heart could wish. The work is a splendid tribute to the utility of the folk-song in classical construction.

Robert Franz once wrote to the reviewer: "I believe that our art began with the lyric forms, and will end with them;" and Brahms, as well as Beethoven, has built many an instrumental work around a song melody. When will some American composer venture a College Overture with "The Lone Fish Ball" as its central thought? It would be no bolder than Brahms's procedure in the present instance.

In this, as in the finale of the symphony which followed, there were a few slight evidences of the summer vacation, but the standard was still the highest to be found in American orchestral work.

We are not of those who try to find a kinship between Beethoven's seventh symphony (played on this occasion) and his preceding ("Pastoral") symphony. The seventh is in some respects the strongest work of the first eight symphonies, the Pastoral is the weakest of the whole nine. There were a few points of dalliance with the chief theme in the first movement which sounded unfamiliar to us. Mr. Paur did not take up this theme "Vivace" at once, but seemed to extend the spirit of the slow introduction into the first movement, growing gradually quicker, so that the lively tempo was only reached when the subordinate theme began. The effect was better at its first appearance than when the theme came back at the repetition of the exposition. The coda was very finely performed.

This ending of the first movement is typical of Beethoven, who makes of his codas (very often) a second development, now however, chiefly in the key of the composition; Beethoven's codas, coming as an appendix to the completed musical form, are often as important as a woman's postscript at the end of a letter.

The slow movement, the gem of the work, with its ever-present rhythm of a dactyl and a spondee, was splendidly read and performed. It is not an andante nor is it an allegretto (it is marked the latter), but something between. Beethoven worried a good deal about the tempo-mark to this movement, changing it three or four times; he desired to picture brooding rather than sorrow, melancholy rather than poignant grief, in this part of this symphony. and the director caught the subtle distinction perfectly.

The symphony, great as it is, is decidedly stronger in its first two movements than in its last two. The scherzo has its striking points, notably the organ point (with auxiliary note) of the horns, but its extra repetition of the trio, a form which Beethoven used also in his fourth symphony and in one of his string quartettes, is against the spirit of the present age, which is impatient of all unnecessary repetition in music, and the final rondo not only repeats itself, after the manner of rondos, but has no thematic material which is comparable to the nobility of the thoughts of the second, or the vigor of the ideas of the first movement.

The finale was taken at a speed that would have made Star Pointer envious; spite of the heat the players managed to sustain the pace, and the audience sat, in the words of Kingsley (altered to the occasion):—

> "Watching the white mists steaming
> From Viol, and Flute, and Horn."

Now some garlic was added to the banquet in the shape of a stirring composition by Chabrier, an orchestral rhapsody entitled "Espana." It was a work that thrilled and excited after the manner of Bizet, because it had something characteristic to say and said it in an unconventional and imperious manner. Let who will shout "Vulgar!" or "Below the dignity of the concerts!" it was true music, it caused the greatest enthusiasm of the evening, and the reviewer felt in heartiest accord with the popular verdict.

Chabrier handles the orchestra, at times, as if it were a mighty guitar, and all the caprice of a solo is present. Naturally with such a work it is "aut Caesar aut nullus," it must be perfect or fail altogether; it was perfect on this occasion and showed the technique of the orchestra, and their surety in most capricious tempi, in a praiseworthy manner.

One may remember, in this connection, that although many composers produce the guitar effects on orchestra, the guitar itself is tabooed in modern scores, being too thin and shallow toned to produce any effect with the orchestra. Rossini has used the instrument as an accompaniment in "The Barber of Seville," Mozart has used the mandoline as an obbligato in the serenade in "Don Giovanni," but nowadays even these touches are given to the violins played "pizzicato." Schumann, in his D minor symphony (No. 4) tried the effect of a guitar as an accompaniment to a Romanza, and gave it up as a hopeless task, altering his score afterwards to banish the ineligible instrument.

Chabrier, by the use of two harps, and pizzicato effects on the string, gives jota and fandango with appropriate color, especially when it is remembered that the dance instrument of Spain is not the guitar as we have it, but usually a much larger instrument of the same family, called the "bandurria."

There were other striking effects in Chabrier's work, especially a difficult theme given by the bassoon with amazinb rapidity and commendable surety, and some very surprising effects on bass tube and trombones, also finely played.

Mr. Paur is evidently going to give us plenty of the Muscovite, for there was one Russian composition on Saturday's programme and two more are promised for next Saturday. New Russia has taken for its motto—"Para Domoi" ("Let us go Home!")—meaning that the Russians are tired of imitating occidental civilization, and desire to return frankly to their more barbaric, natural types. This will be bad for material progress, but excellent for music, which is often evolved from slavery,

But the "Poeme Lyrique" by Glazounow did not present this return to the ancestors in any marked degree; instead of saying "Let us go Home," it seemed to say "Let us to go Paris!" for it gave all the grace and sentiment, or sentimentality, of the warehouse of Delibes, Massenet & Co. The true melancholy of the Russian is seven shades darker than the despair of anybody else, but this composition did not go any deeper than the polite "Je suis desolee" of Gallic suavity.

Amends were immediately made, however, for Wagner's "Kaiser Marsch" followed. The great master's marches are the weakest product of his muse, yet the "Huldigungsmarsch" and this work, give a sufficiently majestic picture, and the employment of the theme of Luther's great chorale—"A strong castle is our Lord"—as the outcry of united Germany, is a noble touch, much more in keeping with its subject than if "Die Wacht am Rhein" had been introduced.

And Wagner treats the theme of this lofty hymn with becoming dignity, with mighty harmonics and ponderous orchestration; if one compares Mendelssohn's introduction of this same chorale, in his "Reformation Symphony," sweetly tootled out on the flute, one becomes the more appreciative of Wagner's power in this part of his march.

But the work has its inflated moments also, and one wearies of the bombastic crescendi that swell to the verge of bursting, one tires of watching anxiously whether the kettle-drummer is going to succeed in smashing through the parchment of his instrument; it becomes too much akin to the music played by the Chinese during a solar eclipse, when they try to scare away the dragon who is eating up the sun.

With this gentle zephyr of music the concert closed and the heroic auditors went forth to seek for remedies for concussion of the brain.

Louis C. Elson.

Boston Courier.
SUNDAY MORNING, OCT. 17, 1897.

THE FIRST SYMPHONY, PROFESSOR PAINE'S CONCERTS, ETC.

Brahms's "Academic Festival" overture was an excellent choice for the beginning of the new season of Symphony concerts, and undoubtedly one more interesting to the majority of hearers than Beethoven's "Dedication of the House," which so often occupies such a position of leadership. For it has the nobility and solidity which represent that great work is to follow the assembling to which it calls, while its merrier strains intimate that amid much that is magisterial there is yet place for the student's gay animation and levity of spirit. It was finely played, and followed at once by Beethoven's seventh symphony, than which none of all the series is more welcome for the genial joy, tempered melancholy and brimming vitality it portrays and conveys. It also was well read along standard lines and there was notably fine control of all means in the development of the longer crescendo passages, as well as in the clearness of the individual sallies.

The chief novelty of the programme came next, in the "Espana" of Chabrier, the originality, force and splendor of whose "Gwendoline" music have already made great impression upon the Symphony audiences. It is a fantasia in which all the enthusiasm, ardor, coquetry and fancy of dancing Spain seem to be condensed. Its rhythms are based chiefly upon two dance measures—the Jota and the Malaguena; but in its play it seems to catch the spirit of all forms and moods and movements. The harp, the castanets and the tambourine accent the step, and the strings of the orchestra are often so struck that they sound like the sweeping of a vast guitar. The pace sways as the hearts of the dancers beat fast or slow, and there is at times a wild burst of trombones and trumpets or a dull heavy drum-beat to intensify the action. The energy and spring are intense, and there are also flashes of bright fancy and moments of languorous relaxation. The score is very full, requiring extra brasses, the bass tuba and a second harp; therefore it is complicated and exacting in every respect. In some earlier seasons, it would have been rash to expect a perfect performance in the first concert; but these four years of steady association and hard work have brought fine fruit for Mr. Paur and his men, and the delivery was splendid and exciting.

A "Lyric Poem for Orchestra," succeeded, being a novelty from the pen of a representative of Young Russia, Alexander Glazounoff, It is a composition of interesting and pleasant nature, which begins gently and soothingly, later swells tempestuously for a moment, and then subsides into its early calm. It made no marked impression for power or originality; but its early quietude was restful after the fervid "Espana," and being well played, was well received.

A stirring version of Wagner's "Kaisermarsch" ended the programme.

A few new faces—mainly in the wind choir—were observed; but the majority of the familiar personalities and all the old favorites were in their places. Miss Shaw was the extra harpist.

This is the next programme: Rimsky-Korsakoff, "Oster Fest," (first time); Gernsheim, Concerto for violin, (first time); Schumann, Symphony No. 1; Tchaikowsky, "Italian Caprice," (first time). Soloist, Mr. Schnitzler,

---

DAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CII, NO. 109.
SUNDAY, OCTOBER 17, 1897.

SYMPHONY SEASON OPENS.

First Concert Attracts a Very Large Attendance.

Director Paur Receives a Cordial Greeting from the Audience—Members of the Orchestra Are Practically the Same as Last Season—A Fine Programme Presented.

The 17th season of the Boston Symphony orchestra began in Music Hall last evening with the following programme:

Academic overture	Brahms
Symphony, No. 7	Beethoven
Espagna	Chabrier
Poeme Lyrique	Glazounow
Kaiser March	Wagner

The attendance was, of course, large, every seat in the balconies being filled, and there were only a few empty places below. The depressing state of the weather added to the close air in the auditorium, was not wholly favorable to the enjoyment of the music, but the audience was not lacking in enthusiasm.

Mr. Paur was welcomed with marked cordiality and prolonged applause, on his first appearance. The personnel of the orchestra is substantially the same as last season, no change having been made in any of the principal artists, and its playing was wholly up to its best standard, the long vacation having in no wise impaired its splendid efficiency, as was amply manifested in its brilliant and solid performance of the Brahms overture, with which the concert began.

The symphony was finely read by Mr. Paur, and without any attempt in the direction of unfamiliar effects in regard to time and color, except perhaps in the finale, which was taken at a somewhat faster pace than usual and with something more of rhythmic emphasis, but in neither direction to the detriment of the music. It was tremendous in spirit and almost overwhelming in effect. On the whole, the performance of this movement may be ranked among the most stirring and most convincing that it has ever received in Music Hall.

For some reason or other the rest of the symphony, though admirably read and perfectly played, seemed to have grown tame. Brilliant as it undoubtedly is, it sounded thin and, if it be not heresy to write the word, garrulous. Can it be that it is growing old; that the richness of modern orchestration and the excesses of modern harmony are beginning to have a baneful influence on the ear, and are dulling it to the purer and less bombastic methods of the past? Dreadful as the thought may be, it appeared as if a bass tuba was unaccountably absent now and then. So much for putting one's self in the way of having one's ear vulgarized. Perhaps, after all, this impression may be laid at the door of the discomforting weather.

There was, however, no lack of bass tuba in the Chabrier selection, which was heard for the first time at these concerts on this occasion. It has noise enough and to spare, but it has also an amplitude of melody in the form of catchy Spanish dance tunes that are treated with great ingenuity, brilliancy and effect. The orchestration is fairly astonishing in its originality, its richness and its novel combinations. Now and then it is almost bewildering in its variety of color and its restless search for violent contrasts of light and shade. The work has an immense swing of rhythm, and is thoroughly interesting in its way. To say that it has not a slight tinge of vulgarity would be to say too much, but its impetuous dash, its fiery climaxes and its vigorously marked individuality impart to it a fascination that is irresistible. It was magnificently played, and aroused a tempest of plaudits that tended in the direction of a rapturous encore, which was, of course, refused.

The selection by Glazounow was given for the first time here. In common with so much of latter day music, it has a minimum of fundamental idea and a maximum of development. A slight theme, graceful and pleasing in itself, is smothered in an excess of orchestration and disguised in an elaboration of extremely ugly harmonic devices. Here and there the discords are ear-tearing to an almost painful extent. It is probably very skilful and very daring, but it is nevertheless crassly unmusical.

The orchestration is ingeniously clever at times, but at other times it is far from clear, especially in one noisy episode, which, on a first hearing, is utterly barren of meaning owing to the blare of brass and the polyphony run wild that are its principal characteristics. If this sort of music is to prevail it will not be long before the iconoclastic Wagner will take on the aspect of an old-fashioned melodist, wedded to form, and quaintly simple in his harmonies and orchestration. Coming as it did after the dazzlingly brilliant Chabrier selection, it fell somewhat flat on the audience, despite the care and skill with which it was rendered.

The programme for the next concert is: Oster Fest, Korsakoff, first time; concerto for violin, Gernsheim, first time; symphony, No. 1, Schumann; Italian caprice, Tshaikowsky. Mr. I. Schnitzler is the soloist.

SATURDAY EVENING
Gazette
ESTABLISHED 1813.
BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, OCT. 1

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The first concert of the Symphony Orchestra last night attracted the usual first night audience of music lovers, and everybody settled down comfortably to the conviction that there could now be no mistake that the much looked-for musical season had really commenced. The programme was studied with much interest, and its first item aroused smiling recognition, as of an old friend who, by his past services, had proved that he could always be relied on in an emergency to fill a gap at the hospitable musical table. Recognition turned to delighted and unexpected surprise as a novelty appeared, and the audience settled down still more comfortably and made up its mind as surprises did not turn up every week to enjoy the luxury to the full. When Mr. Paur appeared the silent and suppressed delight broke out into generous applause, and this was succeeded by the hushed expectation of epicures waiting for the well-known dishes served up in the highest style of art.

The programme was:

Academic overture	Brahm
Symphony No. 7	Beethoven
Espagna	Chabrier
Poeme Lyrique	Glazounow
Kaiser March	Wagner

The Beethoven symphony was, of course, finely played by Mr. Paur and his orchestra, but for some reason or other it sounded just a trifle weak, perhaps because modern ears require the stimulation of noise made brassy and persistent.

The Chabrier "Rhapsody," played for the first time at these concerts, is a brilliant piece of work, written as in a frenzy and gorgeous with color that castanets and tambourine indicated belonged to Spain. One listened as to a dance of madmen, and after the strain on the nerves was over, wondered why so much ado had been made on so small a matter. It was an impressionist picture, rich in glowing color, laid on with a palette knife. The Glazounoff "Poeme" is modern, containing the fragment of an idea that is repeated to the point of weariness. On first hearing it is dreary and altogether inadequate, monotonous and fiercely Russian.

The programme for the next concert is: Rimsky-Korsakoff, "Oster Fest" (first time); Gernsheim, concerto for violin (first time); Schumann, Symphony No. 1; Tchaikovsky, "Italian Caprice" (first time). Soloist, Mr. I. Schnitzler.

THE BOSTON TIMES
BOSTON, SUNDAY, OCT. 17, 1897.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Emil Paur, conductor, will give ten concerts in Sanders theatre, Cambridge, on Thursday evenings, Oct. 28, Nov. 18, Dec. 9, Jan. 6, Jan. 27, Feb. 10, Feb. 24, March 17, April 7, April 28, at 7 45 o'clock. The solo artists will be Mr. Frangeon Davies, Mrs. Titus, Miss Wood, Mme. Szumowska, Mr. Siloti, Mr. Jonas, Mr. Kneisel, Mr. Loffler, and others to be announced. A limited number of seats have been reserved for college officers and invited guests, but the rest of the subscription tickets for the series will be placed on sale next Saturday morning at the University Book store.

Miss Adah Campbell Hussey sang last Wednesday evening at the Old Cambridge Baptist church, and as usual her efforts gave great pleasure.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra began last week, in Music hall and it was hard to realize that four months had elapsed since the last of these concerts, for the regular attendants were in their accustomed seats. and there was no impression of novelty at the opening of the season of '96 and '97.

The Symphony concerts are decidedly a Boston institution and while they are under the management of Mr. C. A. Ellis, with Mr. F. R. Comee they will ever attract large audiances of the leaders in social and musical and artistic walks of life and hold the present reputable position in the world of music.

Mr. Emil Paur, the conductor, was warmly welcomed, and the programme was a delight from beginning to end.

Mr. I. Schnitzler will be the soloist at this week's concert and Friday afternoon rehearsal and the programme will be:

Rimsky-Korsakoff (First time.)	Oster Fest
Gernsheim (First time.)	Concerto for Violin
Schumann	Symphony No. 1
Tchaikovsky (First time.)	Italian Caprice

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, OCT. 18, 1897.

Opening of the 17th Season of the Symphony Orchestra.

The 17th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra began in Music Hall on Saturday evening in a temperature so hot and stifling that one almost expected to find the tables and bottled coolness of the "Pop" concerts in evidence; but the audience seemed impervious to any action of the thermometer and was not only of large size but stayed to the very end.

Naturally, however, the close and humid atmosphere had a little effect on the string tones of the orchestra, which, in the symphony especially, sounded less fiery than usual.

Mr. Paur received a cordial welcome, and at once proceeded to earn it by a brilliant reading of the quaint "Academic Overture" by Brahms. The three college songs on which the work is founded were given with excellent balance and the German "Upidee" ("Was kommt dort von der Hoch") was as jovial as heart could wish. The work is a splendid tribute to the utility of the folk-song in classical construction.

Robert Franz once wrote to the reviewer: "I believe that our art began with the lyric forms, and will end with them;" and Brahms, as well as Beethoven, has built many an instrumental work around a song melody. When will some American composer venture a College Overture with "The Lone Fish Ball" as its central thought? It would be no bolder than Brahms's procedure in the present instance.

In this, as in the finale of the symphony which followed, there were a few slight evidences of the summer vacation, but the standard was still the highest to be found in American orchestral work.

We are not of those who try to find a kinship between Beethoven's seventh symphony (played on this occasion) and his preceding ("Pastoral") symphony. The seventh is in some respects the strongest work of the first eight symphonies, the Pastoral is the weakest of the whole nine. There were a few points of dalliance with the chief theme in the first movement which sounded unfamiliar to us. Mr. Paur did not take up this theme "Vivace" at once, but seemed to extend the spirit of the slow introduction into the first movement, growing gradually quicker, so that the lively tempo was only reached when the subordinate theme began. The effect was better at its first appearance than when the theme came back at the repetition of the exposition. The coda was very finely performed.

This ending of the first movement is typical of Beethoven, who makes of his codas (very often) a second development, now however, chiefly in the key of the composition; Beethoven's codas, coming as an appendix to the completed musical form, are often as important as a woman's postscript at the end of a letter.

The slow movement, the gem of the work, with its ever-present rhythm of a dactyl and a spondee, was splendidly read and performed. It is not an andante nor is it an allegretto (it is marked the latter), but something between. Beethoven worried a good deal about the tempo-mark to this movement, changing it three or four times; he desired to picture brooding rather than sorrow, melancholy rather than poignant grief, in this part of this symphony. and the director caught the subtle distinction perfectly.

The symphony, great as it is, is decidedly stronger in its first two movements than in its last two. The scherzo has its striking points, notably the organ point (with auxiliary note) of the horns, but its extra repetition of the trio, a form which Beethoven used also in his fourth symphony and in one of his string quartettes, is against the spirit of the present age, which is impatient of all unnecessary repetition in music, and the final rondo not only repeats itself, after the manner of rondos, but has no thematic material which is comparable to the nobility of the thoughts of the second, or the vigor of the ideas of the first movement.

The finale was taken at a speed that would have made Star Pointer envious; spite of the heat the players managed to sustain the pace, and the audience sat, in the words of Kingsley (altered to the occasion):—

> "Watching the white mists steaming
> From Viol, and Flute, and Horn."

Now some garlic was added to the banquet in the shape of a stirring composition by Chabrier, an orchestral rhapsody entitled "Espana." It was a work that thrilled and excited after the manner of Bizet, because it had something characteristic to say and said it in an unconventional and imperious manner. Let who will shout "Vulgar!" or "Below the dignity of the concerts!" it was true music, it caused the greatest enthusiasm of the evening, and the reviewer felt in heartiest accord with the popular verdict.

Chabrier handles the orchestra, at times, as if it were a mighty guitar, and all the caprice of a solo is present. Naturally with such a work it is "aut Caesar aut nullus," it must be perfect or fail altogether; it was perfect on this occasion and showed the technique of the orchestra, and their surety in most capricious tempi, in a praiseworthy manner.

One may remember, in this connection, that although many composers produce the guitar effects on orchestra, the guitar itself is tabooed in modern scores, being too thin and shallow toned to produce any effect with the orchestra. Rossini has used the instrument as an accompaniment in "The Barber of Seville," Mozart has used the mandoline as an obbligato in the serenade in "Don Giovanni," but nowadays even these touches are given to the violins played "pizzicato." Schumann, in his D minor symphony (No. 4) tried the effect of a guitar as an accompaniment to a Romanza, and gave it up as a hopeless task, altering his score afterwards to banish the ineligible instrument.

Chabrier, by the use of two harps, and pizzicato effects on the string, gives jota and fandango with appropriate color, especially when it is remembered that the dance instrument of Spain is not the guitar as we have it, but usually a much larger instrument of the same family, called the "bandurria."

There were other striking effects in Chabrier's work, especially a difficult theme given by the bassoon with amazinb rapidity and commendable surety, and some very surprising effects on bass tube and trombones, also finely played.

Mr. Paur is evidently going to give us plenty of the Muscovite, for there was one Russian composition on Saturday's programme and two more are promised for next Saturday. New Russia has taken for its motto—"Para Domoi" ("Let us go Home!")—meaning that the Russians are tired of imitating occidental civilization, and desire to return frankly to their more barbaric, natural types. This will be bad for material progress, but excellent for music, which is often evolved from slavery, oppression and barbarism.

But the "Poeme Lyrique" by Glazounoff did not present this return to the ancestors in any marked degree; instead of saying "Let us go Home," it seemed to say "Let us to go Paris!" for it gave all the grace and sentiment, or sentimentality, of the warehouse of Delibes, Massenet & Co. The true melancholy of the Russian is seven shades darker than the despair of anybody else, but this composition did not go any deeper than the polite "Je suis desolee" of Gallic suavity.

Amends were immediately made, however, for Wagner's "Kaiser Marsch" followed. The great master's marches are the weakest product of his muse, yet the "Huldigungsmarsch" and this work, give a sufficiently majestic picture, and the employment of the theme of Luther's great chorale—"A strong castle is our Lord"—as the outcry of united Germany, is a noble touch, much more in keeping with its subject than if "Die Wacht am Rhein" had been introduced.

And Wagner treats the theme of this lofty hymn with becoming dignity, with mighty harmonics and ponderous orchestration; if one compares Mendelssohn's introduction of this same chorale, in his "Reformation Symphony," sweetly tootled out on the flute, one becomes the more appreciative of Wagner's power in this part of his march.

But the work has its inflated moments also, and one wearies of the bombastic crescendi that swell to the verge of bursting, one tires of watching anxiously whether the kettle-drummer is going to succeed in smashing through the parchment of his instrument; it becomes too much akin to the music played by the Chinese during a solar eclipse, when they try to scare away the dragon who is eating up the sun.

With this gentle zephyr of music the concert closed and the heroic auditors went forth to seek for remedies for concussion of the brain.

Louis C. Elson.

Boston Courier.
SUNDAY MORNING, OCT. 17, 1897.

THE FIRST SYMPHONY, PROFESSOR PAINE'S CONCERTS, ETC.

Brahms's "Academic Festival" overture was an excellent choice for the beginning of the new season of Symphony concerts, and undoubtedly one more interesting to the majority of hearers than Beethoven's "Dedication of the House," which so often occupies such a position of leadership. For it has the nobility and solidity which represent that great work is to follow the assembling to which it calls, while its merrier strains intimate that amid much that is magisterial there is yet place for the student's gay animation and levity of spirit. It was finely played, and followed at once by Beethoven's seventh symphony, than which none of all the series is more welcome for the genial joy, tempered melancholy and brimming vitality it portrays and conveys. It also was well read along standard lines and there was notably fine control of all means in the development of the longer crescendo passages, as well as in the clearness of the individual sallies.

The chief novelty of the programme came next, in the "Espana" of Chabrier, the originality, force and splendor of whose "Gwendoline" music have already made great impression upon the Symphony audiences. It is a fantasia in which all the enthusiasm, ardor, coquetry and fancy of dancing Spain seem to be condensed. Its rhythms are based chiefly upon two dance measures—the Jota and the Malaguena; but in its play it seems to catch the spirit of all forms and moods and movements. The harp, the castanets and the tambourine accent the step, and the strings of the orchestra are often so struck that they sound like the sweeping of a vast guitar. The pace sways as the hearts of the dancers beat fast or slow, and there is at times a wild burst of trombones and trumpets or a dull heavy drum-beat to intensify the action. The energy and spring are intense, and there are also flashes of bright fancy and moments of languorous relaxation. The score is very full, requiring extra brasses, the bass tuba and a second harp; therefore it is complicated and exacting in every respect. In some earlier seasons, it would have been rash to expect a perfect performance in the first concert; but these four years of steady association and hard work have brought fine fruit for Mr. Paur and his men, and the delivery was splendid and exciting.

A "Lyric Poem for Orchestra," succeeded, being a novelty from the pen of a representative of Young Russia, Alexander Glazounoff, It is a composition of interesting and pleasant nature, which begins gently and soothingly, later swells tempestuously for a moment, and then subsides into its early calm. It made no marked impression for power or originality; but. its early quietude was restful after the fervid "Espana," and being well played, was well received.

A stirring version of Wagner's "Kaisermarsch" ended the programme.

A few new faces—mainly in the wind choir—were observed; but the majority of the familiar personalities and all the old favorites were in their places. Miss Shaw was the extra harpist.

This is the next programme: Rimsky-Korsakoff, "Oster Fest," (first time); Gernsheim, Concerto for violin, (first time); Schumann, Symphony No. 1; Tchaikowsky, "Italian Caprice," (first time). Soloist, Mr. Schnitzler.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CII., NO. 109.
SUNDAY, OCTOBER 17, 1897.

SYMPHONY SEASON OPENS.

First Concert Attracts a Very Large Attendance.

Director Paur Receives a Cordial Greeting from the Audience—Members of the Orchestra Are Practically the Same as Last Season—A Fine Programme Presented.

The 17th season of the Boston Symphony orchestra began in Music Hall last evening with the following programme:

Academic overture	Brahms
Symphony, No. 7	Beethoven
Espagna	Chabrier
Poeme Lyrique	Glazounow
Kaiser March	Wagner

The attendance was, of course, large, every seat in the balconies being filled, and there were only a few empty places below. The depressing state of the weather added to the close air in the auditorium, was not wholly favorable to the enjoyment of the music, but the audience was not lacking in enthusiasm.

Mr. Paur was welcomed with marked cordiality and prolonged applause, on his first appearance. The personnel of the orchestra is substantially the same as last season, no change having been made in any of the principal artists, and its playing was wholly up to its best standard, the long vacation having in no wise impaired its splendid efficiency, as was amply manifested in its brilliant and solid performance of the Brahms overture, with which the concert began.

The symphony was finely read by Mr. Paur, and without any attempt in the direction of unfamiliar effects in regard to time and color, except perhaps in the finale, which was taken at a somewhat faster pace than usual and with something more of rhythmic emphasis, but in neither direction to the detriment of the music. It was tremendous in spirit and almost overwhelming in effect. On the whole, the performance of this movement may be ranked among the most stirring and most convincing that it has ever received in Music Hall.

For some reason or other the rest of the symphony, though admirably read and perfectly played, seemed to have grown tame. Brilliant as it undoubtedly is, it sounded thin and, if it be not heresy to write the word, garrulous. Can it be that it is growing old; that the richness of modern orchestration and the excesses of modern harmony are beginning to have a baneful influence on the ear, and are dulling it to the purer and less bombastic methods of the past? Dreadful as the thought may be, it appeared as if a bass tuba was unaccountably absent now and then. So much for putting one's self in the way of having one's ear vulgarized. Perhaps, after all, this impression may be laid at the door of the discomforting weather.

There was, however, no lack of bass tuba in the Chabrier selection, which was heard for the first time at these concerts on this occasion. It has noise enough and to spare, but it has also an amplitude of melody in the form of catchy Spanish dance tunes that are treated with great ingenuity, brilliancy and effect. The orchestration is fairly astonishing in its originality, its richness and its novel combinations. Now and then it is almost bewildering in its variety of color and its restless search for violent contrasts of light and shade. The work has an immense swing of rhythm, and is thoroughly interesting in its way. To say that it has not a slight tinge of vulgarity would be to say too much, but its impetuous dash, its fiery climaxes and its vigorously marked individuality impart to it a fascination that is irresistible. It was magnificently played, and aroused a tempest of plaudits that tended in the direction of a rapturous encore, which was, of course, refused.

The selection by Glazounow was given for the first time here. In common with so much of latter day music, it has a minimum of fundamental idea and a maximum of development. A slight theme, graceful and pleasing in itself, is smothered in an excess of orchestration and disguised in an elaboration of extremely ugly harmonic devices. Here and there the discords are ear-tearing to an almost painful extent. It is probably very skilful and very daring, but it is nevertheless crassly unmusical.

The orchestration is ingeniously clever at times, but at other times it is far from clear, especially in one noisy episode, which, on a first hearing, is utterly barren of meaning owing to the blare of brass and the polyphony run wild that are its principal characteristics. If this sort of music is to prevail it will not be long before the iconoclastic Wagner will take on the aspect of an old-fashioned melodist, wedded to form, and quaintly simple in his harmonies and orchestration. Coming as it did after the dazzlingly brilliant Chabrier selection, it fell somewhat flat on the audience, despite the care and skill with which it was rendered.

The programme for the next concert is: Oster Fest, Korsakoff, first time; concerto for violin, Gernsheim, first time; symphony, No. 1, Schumann; Italian caprice, Tshaikowsky. Mr. I. Schnitzler is the soloist.

SATURDAY EVENING
Gazette
ESTABLISHED 1813.
BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, OCT. 17.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The first concert of the Symphony Orchestra last night attracted the usual first night audience of music lovers, and everybody settled down comfortably to the conviction that there could now be no mistake that the much looked-for musical season had really commenced. The programme was studied with much interest, and its first item aroused smiling recognition, as of an old friend who, by his past services, had proved that he could always be relied on in an emergency to fill a gap at the hospitable musical table. Recognition turned to delighted and unexpected surprise as a novelty appeared, and the audience settled down still more comfortably and made up its mind as surprises did not turn up every week to enjoy the luxury to the full. When Mr. Paur appeared the silent and suppressed delight broke out into generous applause, and this was succeeded by the hushed expectation of epicures waiting for the well-known dishes served up in the highest style of art.

The programme was:

Academic overture	Brahm
Symphony No. 7	Beethoven
Espagna	Chabrier
Poeme Lyrique	Glazounow
Kaiser March	Wagner

The Beethoven symphony was, of course, finely played by Mr. Paur and his orchestra, but for some reason or other it sounded just a trifle weak, perhaps because modern ears require the stimulation of noise made brassy and persistent.

The Chabrier "Rhapsody," played for the first time at these concerts, is a brilliant piece of work, written as in a frenzy and gorgeous with color that castanets and tambourine indicated belonged to Spain. One listened as to a dance of madmen, and after the strain on the nerves was over, wondered why so much ado had been made on so small a matter. It was an impressionist picture, rich in glowing color, laid on with a palette knife. The Glazounoff "Poeme" is modern, containing the fragment of an idea that is repeated to the point of weariness. On first hearing it is dreary and altogether inadequate, monotonous and fiercely Russian.

The programme for the next concert is: Rimsky-Korsakoff, "Oster Fest" (first time); Gernsheim, concerto for violin (first time); Schumann, Symphony No. 1; Tchaikovsky, "Italian Caprice" (first time). Soloist, Mr. I. Schnitzler.

THE BOSTON TIMES
BOSTON, SUNDAY, OCT. 17, 1897.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Emil Paur, conductor, will give ten concerts in Sanders theatre, Cambridge, on Thursday evenings, Oct. 28, Nov. 18, Dec. 9, Jan. 6, Jan. 27, Feb. 10, Feb. 24, March 17, April 7, April 28, at 7 45 o'clock. The solo artists will be Mr. Frangeon Davies, Mrs. Titus, Miss Wood, Mme. Szumowska, Mr. Siloti, Mr. Jonas, Mr. Kneisel, Mr. Loffler, and others to be announced. A limited number of seats have been reserved for college officers and invited guests, but the rest of the subscription tickets for the series will be placed on sale next Saturday morning at the University Book store.

Miss Adah Campbell Hussey sang last Wednesday evening at the Old Cambridge Baptist church, and as usual her efforts gave great pleasure.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra began last week, in Music hall and it was hard to realize that four months had elapsed since the last of these concerts, for the regular attendants were in their accustomed seats. and there was no impression of novelty at the opening of the season of '96 and '97.

The Symphony concerts are decidedly a Boston institution and while they are under the management of Mr. C. A. Ellis, with Mr. F. R. Comee they will ever attract large audiances of the leaders in social and musical and artistic walks of life and hold the present reputable position in the world of music.

Mr. Emil Paur, the conductor, was warmly welcomed, and the programme was a delight from beginning to end.

Mr. I. Schnitzler will be the soloist at this week's concert and Friday afternoon rehearsal and the programme will be:

Rimsky-Korsakoff	Oster Fest
(First time.)
Gernsheim	Concerto for Violin
(First time)
Schumann	Symphony No. 1
Tchaikovsky	Italian Caprice
(First time.)

…ive Democratic Paper
…EW ENGLAND.

…, 1897, Post Publishing Co.
…RNING, OCTOBER 17, 1897.

…MPHONY CONCERTS.

…of the Seventeenth Season in …sic Hall Last Evening.

…oston Symphony Orchestra be-
…eventeenth series of concerts in
…ll last evening and there was
…l large audience, although the …y high temperature kept away
…votees who dispense with the
…f seats. Mr. Paur's desk was
…ted with a huge bunch of red
…white chrysanthemums tied with
…atin ribbon, and when the popu-
…ader made his appearance he was …heartily welcomed.

…Paur has followed the same general
…ribution of his forces this season as
…past, although there were two
…stationed near the first violins in-
…d of at the rear as heretofore, prob-
…because these instruments played
…ortant part in one of the numbers.
…rogramme was a varied one, pre-
… a pleasing diversion of light and
…the former relieving the tedium of …tter. Brahms's academic overture is
…s pleasing, introducing as it does
…mber of college themes, developed
…mbellished. The heavy food of the
…ing was Beethoven's Seventh Sym-
…which was admirably handled,
…the third movement.

…ing this, like a dainty liqueur af-
…arty repast, was the "Espana"
…by Chabrier, new at these con-
…t which jumped into immediate
…rity. It treats in a most delightful
…r several familiar themes of the
…anish type, with suggestions of cas-
…ets, tambourines, dark eyes and gleam-
[illegible] That it served its purpose was evident, for everybody woke up and applauded vigorously.

A lyric poem by Glazounoff, heard here for the first time, and Wagner's stately and impressive "Emperor's March" concluded the entertaining programme.

Next Saturday evening I. Schnitzler, violinist, will be the first soloist of the season and will be heard in Gernsheim's concerto, a new composition here. Schumann's "First Symphony," Reinsky-Korsakoff's "Oster-Fest" and Tchaikowsky's "Italian Caprice," both novelties in this city.

Herald Oct 17

With the mercury in the eighties, it was difficult to believe that with the first Symphony rehearsal Friday afternoon the musical season had begun. Young girls and women in cotton and silk blouses, India silk gowns, and some of even thinner texture, with flower and plumed hats made the crowded Music Hall look more like a mid-summer New York roof garden than a Symphony rehearsal in the middle of October. So great was the heat that a fan was moving in almost every one's hand and the doors were all open into the corridors where all the standing room was occupied. But so keen was the interest in this always notable first occasion, nobody seemed to be annoyed by the unusual conditions, and evidently forgot their discomfort as soon as the music began. Mr. Paur was received with immense enthusiasm, considering so goodly a portion of his welcomers were ladies, and the faces in the orchestra were all familiar—no new comers. They seemed full of enthusiasm after their vacation, and were evidently as glad to get back to their popular leader as the audience was to see and hear them. Although some seats were vacant and some occupied by the friends of the subscribers many familiar faces were seen.

A few in the crowd noted were Mrs. Montgomery Sears, Mr. and Mrs. C. P. Curtis, with Mr. and Mrs. Henry L. Higginson, Mr. and Mrs. Augustus Gardner in Mrs. J. L. Gardner's seats, Mrs. Henry C. Weston, Mrs. Fiske Warren, Mr. Eugene Greenleaf, Mrs. Arthur Whiting, Mr. and Mrs. Andrew Wheelwright, Mrs. Jackson, Mr. Eben Jordan, Mr. Isidore Braggiotti, Mr. Philip Sears, Mr. John D. Williams, Mrs. William French and her daughter, Mrs. Charles R. Hayden, Mr. and Mrs. Elliot Pratt, Miss Abby Hunt, Mrs. B. F. Nourse, Miss Faulkner, Mrs. John Osborn, Mrs. John Carter, Miss Fanny Bigelow, Mrs. George P. Sanger, Miss Jessie Kimball, Mrs. Howard Ticknor, Mrs. Phinehas Adams, Mrs. J. B. Forsyth and Mme. Helen Hopekirk.

Mrs. Sears looked cool and picturesque in gray and old rose foulard with much lace on the bodice. Her black hat was covered with feathers. Mrs. Fiske Warren had on a peculiar blouse of mouse gray and white silk, and a round, black hat, with shaded gray wings. There was an absence of the bright coloring one is accustomed to see in her costumes, and it was all the more becoming on that account. Mrs. Weston wore a handsome gown of black and white foulard, the yoke on the bodice done in white lace appliqued over green. Her small, black bonnet had green and white aigrettes on it.

PUBLISHED BY THE TIMES PUBLISHING COMPANY. ESTABLISHED 1885.
TELEPHONE CALL 4733.

Subscription Prices.

One Year	$3.00
Six Months	1.50

MEMBER OF ASSOCIATED PRESS.

TUESDAY, OCTOBER 19, 1897.

BEST OF CONCERTS

They Will Begin November 3 at Providence.

This Organization Meets With Constantly Growing Popularity.

The Entertainments Will Be a Feature of the Musical Year.

November 3 is the date fixed for the first performance of the coming season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, whose monthly concerts in Infantry Hall, Providence, on Wednesday evenings will once more be the principal feature of the musical year. No organization enjoys greater favor with the public, and its constantly growing popularity is a tribute to its proficiency in its art. The arrangements now completed for these concerts leave nothing to be desired and subscribers will enjoy all the attractive features for which they have become famous.

To ask that the orchestra itself shall be any better is almost unreasonable, yet Conductor Paur will strive to raise the standard of performance even higher than before. "A virtuoso orchestra," as the critic of the New York Sun called it last winter, is a title justly bestowed on the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Unlike nearly every other organization appealing to the musical public for support, the attractiveness of its performances rests upon the musicianship and ability of all its members and the perfection of its ensemble, and not upon the personality and talent of an individual or of a few stars. For perfection of detail its performances can only be compared to the dramatic performances of the Comedie Francaise, and, like that famous institution, the permanency of its success seems assured.

It is worthy of comment in connection with the concerts in Providence that, with the exception of one season, Providence has enjoyed the visits of this now famous organization every year since its inception in 1881. One most important feature, which will undoubtedly be welcomed by every lover of the best in music, is the increase in the number of concerts to be given from six to eight performances. Wednesday evenings have been chosen, as usual, and the dates are November 3, December 2 and 29, January 12, February 2, March 9 and 30, and April 20. The concerts will begin at 8 o'clock precisely, and, following the established rule of this organization, the doors will be closed during the performance of the first number, in deference to the great majority of patrons who are promptly in their seats. The opening concert on Wednesday evening, November 3, will be the 1,507th performance of the orchestra, and the 58th in Providence. This enormous number of performances, and a personnel practically unchanged in the past ten years, will go very far toward explaining the marvelous ensemble of the orchestra.

Conductor Paur, desirous of making his fifth season memorable, has made the arrangement of the programmes the care of his summer days. He will present a carefully selected variety of ever-welcome standard works, and has secured from the great number of novelties submitted to him for examination such as appeal to him as being worthy.

The list of works to be performed includes: The Symphony No. 5 and three movements from the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven, the Schumann Symphony No. 1, Haydn Symphony No. 7, Raff Symphony "I'm Walde," Braum Symphony No. 3, and Dvorak Symphony "From the New World." The overtures are: Beethoven's "Leonore" No. 3, Mendelssohn's "Ruy Blas," Berlioz' "Benvenuto Cellini," Weber's "Freischutz," Meyerbeer's "Struensee," and Wagner's prelude to "Die Meistersinger." Among the novelties are Chabrier's "Espagna," Weber's "Invitation to Dance," orchestrated by Weingartner, Tschaikowsky's "Italian Caprice," Humperdinck's overture to "Hansel and Gretel," Grieg's "Three Norwegian Melodies," and two movements from a Suite by Rimsky Korsakoff. By very general request, the Symphony No. 6, "Pathetique," by Tschaikowsky, which made such a profound impression last season, will be played. As usual, one programme will be devoted entirely to the works of Wagner.

The soloists [illegible] Mme. [illegible], who scored a mar[illegible] [illegible] success at her fir[illegible] appearance in Providence with the Orchestra last season; Mme. Lillian Blauvelt and Miss Gertrude May Stein, both artists in every way qualified to appear with this organization; Mr. Rafael Joseffy, an established favorite in Providence; Mr. George W. Proctor, a pianist appearing with marked success in the Boston concerts of the orchestra last year; Mr. Schnitzler, one of the first violins, and Mr. Alwin Schroeder, the first violoncellist of the orchestra. A newcomer is Mr. Alexander Siloti, a Russian pianist about 35 years of age who won the marked distinction of the gold medal at the Imperial Conservatory in Moscow, where he studied first under Nicolas Rubinstein and later under the more famous Anton Rubinstein. He afterwards studied with Franz Liszt and later on travelled with great success throughout Germany. He also conducted some very successful concerts in St. Petersburg and Moscow.

The sale of season tickets will be held at Infantry Hall on Monday morning October 25, at 9 o'clock. The price of season tickets for the eight concerts will be $7, which is almost exactly the same rate as has been charged in the past for six concerts. Programme books with descriptive notes on the works to be performed will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.

Sunday Post.

16

Will readers kindly send items for this department to Marion Howard, Society Editor, Boston Post? All communications must be signed to insure insertion, and reach this office not later than Friday night.

A week of superb weather, barring autumnal crispness and the light showers of Tuesday, has kept hundreds from returning to their town houses, still the residences along Commonwealth avenue and elsewhere show signs of life in the preparations for the early possession by their owners. Another week brings the society world within sight of the winter season, and the real commencement came on Friday afternoon, when Hamilton place presented a scene of animation. It was the first Symphony rehearsal and the first meeting of the clans after a summer's separation. And how they did pour into that famous little thoroughfare! One scarcely realized that it was an October day when one is supposed to be done up in furs and felt, for the buds and belles and matrons came tripping along in summer array principally.

It was a jolly sort of a meeting place, and the exchange of greetings and reminiscences was amusing to witness. Some were so prolonged as to cause a shut-out during the first number, and one Beacon street debutante exclaimed: "Dear me, and I wanted to welcome that delightful Mr. Paur!"

Who were there? With every seat occupied, space forbids an extended list. Mrs. Montgomery Sears was one of the early arrivals, looking remarkably well in a pretty taffeta silk of lavender and white and a small black straw toque. Miss Gertrude Rice, handsome and erect, looked like a picture in a red and white changeable silk bodice, black skirt and large black hat. Then along came Pauline Shaw in a tailor-made gown and black hat bristling with wings. Noted in the entering throng were: Mrs. George Baty Blake, Mrs. J. H. Beal, Mrs. Charles H. Greenleaf, Dr. H. F. Sears, Mr. Henry Haynie, Mrs. Frederick Warren, Mrs. Grant Walker, Miss Minnie Ames, Miss Martha Dana, Dr. Bigelow, Mr. and Mrs. Charles P. Curtis, Mrs. I. B. Rich, Mrs. George A. Alden, Mrs. Herbert Ames, Mrs. H. Hadlock, Mrs. J. S. Cabot, Mrs. Bayard Thayer, Mrs. Arthur Hunnewell, Mrs. Parker Bremer, Miss Corinna Shattuck, Mrs. W. W. Allen, Mrs. B. F. Bates, the Misses Edmands, Mrs. George H. Hood, Mrs. Fitz, Mrs. C. U. Thomas, Mrs. S. B. Field, Mrs. Nathaniel Head, Mrs. Jere Williams, Mrs. C. Leslie Wead, Mrs. Theodore P. Gooding, Miss Lillian Shuman and Mrs. Lizzie Whipple Pierce.

The Representative Democratic Pap…
Oct OF NEW ENGLAND. 17

I was present at the opening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall last Saturday evening, and with some hundreds of others listened to Beethoven's seventh symphony. There was an unusual number of very young girls, and I noticed the rapturous expression on many of their faces, and I marvelled at the cause. Near me sat B. E. Woolf, the eminent musical critic and playwright, but there was no dreamy look on his features. So I read his critique with much interest, and learned that he was not etherealized. He says: "Brilliant as it undoubtedly is, it sounded thin, and, if it be not heresy to write the word, garrulous. Can it be that it is growing old? That the richness of modern orchestration and the excesses of modern harmony are beginning to have a baneful influence on the ear and are dulling it to the purer and less bombastic methods of the past!"

* * *

I am sorry that the gentleman even apologized for his opinion, which, if the truth were known, is shared by every true lover of music. I once asked a musician what there was in Beethoven's symphonies to cause ecstacy, and after a long time dodging the question he was obliged to admit that the chief enjoyment was experienced by a trained performer, who delighted in the intricacies of theme development, the arrangement of harmonic effects and other features beyond the grasp of the layman. Is it any wonder that the average listener gapes behind his programme during the performance of such a number?

* * *

And speaking of music, I saw two little tots on Leverett street yesterday dancing to the sound of a street piano. Every movement of their lithe bodies and the tap of their tiny feet was in perfect time, and their countenances were indicative of thorough happiness. There was masterful mingling of tonics and mediantes, but to them every note meant something which was pleasant.

* * *

Boston Transcript

TUESDAY, OCTOBER 19, 1897

THE USE AND ABUSE OF THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

To the Editor of the Transcript:

The use is to educate the masses of course. The twenty-five-cent seats give all classes a chance to hear admirably, for these seats are just as good as any for that purpose.

Only yesterday I saw this privilege abused by some of those entering the hall. The doors open at 1.30 P. M. I arrived at 12.45 and with others took my place in two long lines to get into the top gallery. As I stood there I noticed a number of men and women standing at the side of the lines nearest the ticket office. They were awaiting a chance to push into the line out of turn. It was actually done in some instances. An officer should be placed there by the management to enforce order. Besides this it shows a great abuse of Colonel Higginson's generosity in making it possible for all to hear this wonderful music, to do this way. Appreciation would be better shown by a quiet, orderly manner of taking the worst if the best does not fall to one's lot every time. The seats are all good, and even the stairs at the sides of the orchestra were given up yesterday for that purpose.

CAROLINE MATHER LATHROP.
Boston, Oct. 16.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, OCT. 23, 1897.

THE CAMBRIDGE SYMPHONIES.

While our Boston symphony concerts are everything that is desirable, there are many who prefer a shorter course, not being able to give twenty-four evenings to a single course of lectures. For such people there is balm in Gilead—or rather in Cambridge. Because, for several years now, the Sanders Theatre course has been just as popular a feature as the Music Hall symphonies.

This season, ten concerts are announced in the Cambridge course at Sanders Theatre, as follows: Thursday evenings, October 28, November 18, December 9, January 6, January 27, February 10, February 24, March 17, April 7 and April 28.

Among the solo artists to appear are Mr. Ffrangcon Davies, Mrs. Titus, Miss Wood, Madame Szumowska, Mr. Siloti, Mr. Jonas, Mr. Kneisel, Mr. Loeffler and others.

Those who have been disappointed in getting what they desired in Boston, as well as all Cambridge people, will be glad to know that subscription tickets, with reserved seats for the series of ten concerts, $7.50, are on sale at the University book store, this Saturday morning, October 23, at 8 o'clock.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

(Copyright, 1897, Post Publishing Co.)
SUNDAY MORNING, OCTOBER 17, 1897.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Opening of the Seventeenth Season in Music Hall Last Evening.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its seventeenth series of concerts in Music Hall last evening and there was the usual large audience, although the abnormally high temperature kept away many devotees who dispense with the luxury of seats. Mr. Paur's desk was ornamented with a huge bunch of red and white chrysanthemums tied with white satin ribbon, and when the popular leader made his appearance he was most heartily welcomed.

Mr. Paur has followed the same general distribution of his forces this season as in the past, although there were two harps stationed near the first violins instead of at the rear as heretofore, probably because these instruments played an important part in one of the numbers.

The programme was a varied one, presenting a pleasing diversion of light and shade, the former relieving the tedium of the latter. Brahms's academic overture is always pleasing, introducing as it does a number of college themes, developed and embellished. The heavy food of the evening was Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, which was admirably handled, notably the third movement.

Following this, like a dainty liqueur after a hearty repast, was the "Espana" rhapsody by Chabrier, new at these concerts, but which jumped into immediate popularity. It treats in a most delightful manner several familiar themes of the Spanish type, with suggestions of castanets, tambourines, dark eyes and gleaming ankles. That it served its purpose was evident, for everybody woke up and applauded vigorously.

A lyric poem by Glazounoff, heard here for the first time, and Wagner's stately and impressive "Emperor's March" concluded the entertaining programme.

Next Saturday evening I. Schnitzler, violinist, will be the first soloist of the season and will be heard in Gernsheim's concerto, a new composition here. Schumann's "First Symphony," Reinsky-Korsakoff's "Oster-Fest" and Tchaikowsky's "Italian Caprice," both novelties in this city.

Herald Oct 17

With the mercury in the eighties, it was difficult to believe that with the first Symphony rehearsal Friday afternoon the musical season had begun. Young girls and women in cotton and silk blouses, India silk gowns, and some of even thinner texture, with flower and plumed hats made the crowded Music Hall look more like a mid-summer New York roof garden than a Symphony rehearsal in the middle of October. So great was the heat that a fan was moving in almost every one's hand and the doors were all open into the corridors where all the standing room was occupied. But so keen was the interest in this always notable first occasion, nobody seemed to be annoyed by the unusual conditions, and evidently forgot their discomfort as soon as the music began. Mr. Paur was received with immense enthusiasm, considering so goodly a portion of his welcomers were ladies, and the faces in the orchestra were all familiar—no new comers. They seemed full of enthusiasm after their vacation, and were evidently as glad to get back to their popular leader as the audience was to see and hear them. Although some seats were vacant and some occupied by the friends of the subscribers many familiar faces were seen.

A few in the crowd noted were Mrs. Montgomery Sears, Mr. and Mrs. C. P. Curtis, with Mr. and Mrs. Henry L. Higginson, Mr. and Mrs. Augustus Gardner in Mrs. J. L. Gardner's seats, Mrs. Henry C. Weston, Mrs. Fiske Warren, Mr. Eugene Greenleaf, Mrs. Arthur Whiting, Mr. and Mrs. Andrew Wheelwright, Mrs. Jackson, Mr. Eben Jordan, Mr. Isidore Braggiotti, Mr. Philip Sears, Mr. John D. Williams, Mrs. William French and her daughter, Mrs. Charles R. Hayden, Mr. and Mrs. Elliot Pratt, Miss Abby Hunt, Mrs. B. F. Nourse, Miss Faulkner, Mrs. John Osborn, Mrs. John Carter, Miss Fanny Bigelow, Mrs. George P. Sanger, Miss Jessie Kimball, Mrs. Howard Ticknor, Mrs. Phinehas Adams, Mrs. J. B. Forsyth and Mme. Helen Hopekirk.

Mrs. Sears looked cool and picturesque in gray and old rose foulard with much lace on the bodice. Her black hat was covered with feathers. Mrs. Fiske Warren had on a peculiar blouse of mouse gray and white silk, and a round, black hat, with shaded gray wings. There was an absence of the bright coloring one is accustomed to see in her costumes, and it was all the more becoming on that account. Mrs. Weston wore a handsome gown of black and white foulard, the yoke on the bodice done in white lace appliqued over green. Her small, black bonnet had green and white aigrettes on it.

The Evening Times

PUBLISHED BY THE TIMES PUBLISHING COMPANY. ESTABLISHED 1885.
TELEPHONE CALL 4733.

Subscription Prices.

One Year.............................. $3.00
Six Months............................ 1.50

MEMBER OF ASSOCIATED PRESS.

TUESDAY, OCTOBER 19, 1897.

BEST OF CONCERTS

They Will Begin November 3 at Providence.

This Organization Meets With Constantly Growing Popularity.

The Entertainments Will Be a Feature of the Musical Year.

November 3 is the ate fixed for the first performance of the coming season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, whose monthly concerts in Infantry Hall, Providence, on Wednesday evenings will once more be the principal feature of the musical year. No organization enjoys greater favor with the public, and its constantly growing popularity is a tribute to its proficiency in its art. The arrangements now completed for these concerts leave nothing to be desired and subscribers will enjoy all the attractive features for which they have become famous.

To ask that the orchestra itself shall be any better is almost unreasonable, yet Conductor Paur will strive to raise the standard of performance even higher than before. "A virtuoso orchestra," as the critic of the New York Sun called it last winter, is a title justly bestowed on the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Unlike nearly every other organization appealing to the musical public for support, the attractiveness of its performances rests upon the musicianship and ability of all its members and the perfection of its ensemble, and not upon the personality and talent of an individual or of a few stars. For perfection of detail its performances can only be compared to the dramatic performances of the Comedie Francaise, and, like that famous institution, the permanency of its success seems assured.

It is worthy of comment in connection with the concerts in Providence that, with the exception of one season, Providence has enjoyed the visits of this now famous organization every year since its inception in 1881. One most important feature, which will undoubtedly be welcomed by every lover of the best in music, is the increase in the number of concerts to be given from six to eight performances. Wednesday evenings have been chosen, as usual, and the dates are November 3, December 2 and 29, January 12, February 2, March 9 and 30, and April 20. The concerts will begin at 8 o'clock precisely, and, following the established rule of this organization, the doors will be closed during the performance of the first number, in deference to the great majority of patrons who are promptly in their seats. The opening concert on Wednesday evening, November 3, will be the 1,507th performance of the orchestra, and the 58th in Providence. This enormous number of performances, and a personnel practically unchanged in the past ten years, will go very far toward explaining the marvelous ensemble of the orchestra.

Conductor Paur, desirous of making his fifth season memorable, has made the arrangement of the programmes the care of his summer days. He will present a carefully selected variety of ever-welcome standard works, and has secured from the great number of novelties submitted to him for examination such as appeal to him as being worthy.

The list of works to be performed includes: The Symphony No. 5 and three movements from the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven, the Schumann Symphony No. 1, Haydn Symphony No. 7, Raff Symphony "I'm Walde," Brahm Symphony No. 3, and Dvorak Symphony "From the New World." The overtures are: Beethoven's "Leonore" No. 3, Mendelssohn's "Ruy Blas," Berlioz' "Benvenuto Cellini," Weber's "Freischutz," Meyerbeer's "Struensee," and Wagner's prelude to "Die Meistersinger." Among the novelties are Chabrier's "Espagna," Weber's "Invitation to Dance," orchestrated by Weingartner, Tschaikowsky's "Italian Caprice," Humperdinck's overture to "Hansel and Gretel," Grieg's "Three Norwegian Melodies," and two movements from a Suite by Rimsky Korsakoff. By very general request, the Symphony No. 6, "Pathetique," by Tschaikowsky, which made such a profound impression last season, will be played. As usual, one programme will be devoted entirely to the works of Wagner.

The soloists are: Mme. Gadski, who scored a marked and instantaneous success at her first appearance in Providence with the Orchestra last season; Mme. Lillian Blauvelt and Miss Gertrude May Stein, both artists in every way qualified to appear with this organization; Mr. Rafael Joseffy, an established favorite in Providence; Mr. George W. Proctor, a pianist appearing with marked success in the Boston concerts of the orchestra last year; Mr. Schnitzler, one of the first violins, and Mr. Alwin Schroeder, the first violoncellist of the orchestra. A newcomer is Mr. Alexander Siloti, a Russian pianist about 35 years of age who won the marked distinction of the gold medal at the Imperial Conservatory in Moscow, where he studied first under Nicolas Rubinstein and later under the more famous Anton Rubinstein. He afterwards studied with Franz Liszt, and later on travelled with great success throughout Germany. He also conducted some very successful concerts in St. Petersburg and Moscow.

The sale of season tickets will be held at Infantry Hall on Monday morning October 25, at 9 o'clock. The price of season tickets for the eight concerts will be $7, which is almost exactly the same rate as has been charged in the past for six concerts. Programme books with descriptive notes on the works to be performed will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.

Sunday Post.

16

Will readers kindly send items for this department to Marion Howard, Society Editor, Boston Post? All communications must be signed to insure insertion, and reach this office not later than Friday night.

A week of superb weather, barring autumnal crispness and the light showers of Tuesday, has kept hundreds from returning to their town houses, still the residences along Commonwealth avenue and elsewhere show signs of life in the preparations for the early possession by their owners. Another week brings the society world within sight of the winter season, and the real commencement came on Friday afternoon, when Hamilton place presented a scene of animation. It was the first Symphony rehearsal and the first meeting of the clans after a summer's separation. And how they did pour into that famous little thoroughfare! One scarcely realized that it was an October day when one is supposed to be done up in furs and felt, for the buds and belles and matrons came tripping along in summer array principally.

It was a jolly sort of a meeting place, and the exchange of greetings and reminiscences was amusing to witness. Some were so prolonged as to cause a shut-out during the first number, and one Beacon street debutante exclaimed: "Dear me, and I wanted to welcome that delightful Mr. Paur!"

Who were there? With every seat occupied, space forbids an extended list. Mrs. Montgomery Sears was one of the early arrivals, looking remarkably well in a pretty taffeta silk of lavender and white and a small black straw toque. Miss Gertrude Rice, handsome and erect, looked like a picture in a red and white changeable silk bodice, black skirt and large black hat. Then along came Pauline Shaw in a tailor-made gown and black hat bristling with wings. Noted in the entering throng were: Mrs. George Baty Blake, Mrs. J. H. Beal, Mrs. Charles H. Greenleaf, Dr. H. F. Sears, Mr. Henry Haynie, Mrs. Frederick Warren, Mrs. Grant Walker, Miss Minnie Ames, Miss Martha Dana, Dr. Bigelow, Mr. and Mrs. Charles P. Curtis, Mrs. I. B. Rich, Mrs. George A. Alden, Mrs. Herbert Ames, Mrs. H. Hadlock, Mrs. J. S. Cabot, Mrs. Bayard Thayer, Mrs. Arthur Hunnewell, Mrs. Parker Bremer, Miss Corinna Shattuck, Mrs. W. W. Allen, Mrs. B. F. Bates, the Misses Edmands, Mrs. George H. Hood, Mrs. Fitz, Mrs. C. U. Thomas, Mrs. S. B. Field, Mrs. Nathaniel Head, Mrs. Jere Williams, Mrs. C. Leslie Wead, Mrs. Theodore P. Gooding, Miss Lillian Shuman and Mrs. Lizzie Whipple Pierce.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
Oct OF NEW ENGLAND. 19

I was present at the opening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall last Saturday evening, and with some hundreds of others listened to Beethoven's seventh symphony. There was an unusual number of very young girls, and I noticed the rapturous expression on many of their faces, and I marvelled at the cause. Near me sat B. E. Woolf, the eminent musical critic and playwright, but there was no dreamy look on his features. So I read his critique with much interest, and learned that he was not etherealized. He says: "Brilliant as it undoubtedly is, it sounded thin, and, if it be not heresy to write the word, garrulous. Can it be that it is growing old? That the richness of modern orchestration and the excesses of modern harmony are beginning to have a baneful influence on the ear and are dulling it to the purer and less bombastic methods of the past!"

* * *

I am sorry that the gentleman even apologized for his opinion, which, if the truth were known, is shared by every true lover of music. I once asked a musician what there was in Beethoven's symphonies to cause ecstacy, and after a long time dodging the question he was obliged to admit that the chief enjoyment was experienced by a trained performer, who delighted in the intricacies of theme development, the arrangement of harmonic effects and other features beyond the grasp of the layman. Is it any wonder that the average listener gapes behind his programme during the performance of such a number?

* * *

And speaking of music, I saw two little tots on Leverett street yesterday dancing to the sound of a street piano. Every movement of their lithe bodies and the tap of their tiny feet was in perfect time, and their countenances were indicative of thorough happiness. There was masterful mingling of tonics and mediantes, but to them every note meant something which was pleasant.

* * *

Boston Transcript

TUESDAY, OCTOBER 19, 1897

THE USE AND ABUSE OF THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

To the Editor of the Transcript:

The use is to educate the masses of course. The twenty-five-cent seats give all classes a chance to hear admirably, for these seats are just as good as any for that purpose.

Only yesterday I saw this privilege abused by some of those entering the hall. The doors open at 1.30 P. M. I arrived at 12.45 and with others took my place in two long lines to get into the top gallery. As I stood there I noticed a number of men and women standing at the side of the lines nearest the ticket office. They were awaiting a chance to push into the line out of turn. It was actually done in some instances. An officer should be placed there by the management to enforce order. Besides this it shows a great abuse of Colonel Higginson's generosity in making it possible for all to hear this wonderful music, to do this way. Appreciation would be better shown by a quiet, orderly manner of taking the worst if the best does not fall to one's lot every time. The seats are all good, and even the stairs at the sides of the orchestra were given up yesterday for that purpose.

CAROLINE MATHER LATHROP.
Boston, Oct. 16.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, OCT. 23, 1897.

THE CAMBRIDGE SYMPHONIES.

While our Boston symphony concerts are everything that is desirable, there are many who prefer a shorter course, not being able to give twenty-four evenings to a single course of lectures. For such people there is balm in Gilead—or rather in Cambridge. Because, for several years now, the Sanders Theatre course has been just as popular a feature as the Music Hall symphonies.

This season, ten concerts are announced in the Cambridge course at Sanders Theatre, as follows: Thursday evenings, October 28, November 18, December 9, January 6, January 27, February 10, February 24, March 17, April 7 and April 28.

Among the solo artists to appear are Mr. Ffrangcon Davies, Mrs. Titus, Miss Wood, Madame Szumowska Mr. Siloti, Mr. Jonas, Mr. Kneisel, Mr. Loeffler and others.

Those who have been disappointed in getting what they desired in Boston, as well as all Cambridge people, will be glad to know that subscription tickets, with reserved seats for the series of ten concerts, $7.50, are on sale at the University book store, this Saturday morning, October 23, at 8 o'clock.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, OCTOBER 18, 1897

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Symphony Orchestra began this, its seventeenth season, Mr. Emil Paur, conductor, in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, the programme being as follows:

Brahms: Akademische Fest-Ouverture, opus 80.
Beethoven: Symphony No. 7, in A major, opus 92.
Chabrier: Rhapsody for Orchestra, "España."
(First time at these concerts.)
Glazounoff: Poème Lyrique for Orchestra, opus 1.
(First time in Boston.)
Wagner: Kaisermarsch in B-flat major.

Brahms's admirable overture was played with a perfection of detail and ensemble that left nothing to be desired. The work seems to be one of our orchestra's particular pets; they play it with enthusiasm. What a wonderful piece of writing it is, too! The more one hears it, the more one is impressed with the real inspiration Brahms drew from his curious task of piecing together scraps of students' songs to make a well-developed composition. The task itself was no easy one, perhaps one of the most difficult imaginable. Simple little ditties like the ones from which the composer got his thematic material are, in general, very recalcitrant against dismemberment; they are so complete in themselves, each phrase in them flows so easily, naturally, well-nigh inevitably into the next following one, that any dissection seems almost necessarily a wanton mutilation. Yet Brahms has cut some of these students' songs to bits with complete nonchalance, but so skilfully that one has no sense of there being any unnatural mutilation; his development of the phrase follows so convincingly upon the phrase itself that the phrase seems actually to have been made for his development of it. The overture does not seem in the least like patchwork, but develops itself from beginning to end as naturally and coherently as if the themes had been Brahms's own. The performance was received with acclamations, it put everyone into good humor; it left one just in the mood for listening to Beethoven's great seventh.

Here, however, came a disappointment. The introductory Poco sostenuto was excellently well played: with firmness, decision, and fine vigor of accent. But the Vivace went tamely; there was little accent, little fire, and the rhythm was so laboriously bedevilled and tortured that this, one of the most vivaciously rhythmic movements in all music, seemed to have no particular rhythm at all. The Allegretto, too, went but tamely. True, the major second theme was very beautifully phrased, with a freedom and disinvoltura that gave it all the charm of a vocal melody, sung by an Italian master, with all the rhythmic beating left to the accompaniment. Strange, though, that that wonderful cadence where the flute switches the melody off into C major should have been given with an avoidance of effectiveness that seemed almost intentional. The playing of the Scherzo lacked life and go; the wondrous Trio sounded crippled and cataleptic. Only in the Finale did the orchestra seem really to wake up; this movement was superbly played: with all due clearness, fire, humor, and force of rhythmic accent.

Chabrier's "Espana" made good all the fine things we had heard of it from France. The piece shows the typical Frenchman at his best. What a fund of vivacity, rhythmic life, gayety, even of mad-cap humor there is in it. Humor! and in a Frenchman? Yes, Chabrier here shows an occasional touch of something that is more than esprit, that is genuine, wholesome humor: take the way the trombones and horns stretch out the phrase at times—as if to play a sly trick upon the dancers and trip them up over an extra beat—if that is not humor, what is? But, if humor peeps through the score at moments, charactersistically French esprit sparkles all over it; the instrumentation is a marvel; what gorgeous, flashing coloring, rich as richness itself, but never heavy nor cloying, always bright, gay, buoyant. Here is music that, as Nietzsche says, "appeals to the heels." You mentally dance, skip, and caper to it; it makes you want to toss up your hat and shout. The orchestra played it wonderfully; nothing could have been more inspiriting than their performance of the score. And one wonders why they showed just the qualities that were, for the most part, lacking in their playing of the Beethoven symphony. The one work is no more vivacious dance-music—in an ideal sense—than the other; rhythmic vivacity, rhythmic pertinacity mark both about equally; yet the first three movements of the symphony were played as if the element of rhythmic lilt were foreign to the music, whereas the performance of the other was the very apotheosis of rhythm.

Why Glazounoff's Poème lyrique was put upon the programme is a mystery. Of the composer and his works we, in this country, know little as yet, next to nothing, in fact. Though, since the concert, a friend has written to us that Glazounoff was born in 1865, was educated at the Realnaya Gymnasium at St. Petersburg, finishing his course there in 1884, and studied music under Balakireff and Rimsky-Korsakoff. A quartet of his made a striking success in 1882; he has also written symphonies and one or more overtures on Greek themes. He is mentioned by Albert Soubies (not César Cui) as a composer of the new Russian school "with a future before him." The first performance in a city of a work by a new and unknown composer is generally supposed to be a sort of introduction to him, a fair sample of his style and tendencies. If this Poème lyrique is a fair sample of Glazounoff, we are much mistaken; if it were, he would have no "future before him," least of all in Russia and as a new-school man. If the flimsy little piece had been signed "Lysberg," no one would have detected the forgery.

The concert closed with a funereal parody on Wagner's Kaisermarsch, which tried to make up in noise what it lacked in rhythmic force. That was a sort of "Breitmachen" that came perilously near to a "sich breitmachen." The Kaisermarsch is no frog, that it should puff itself out so tremendously.

The audience was large, only a few unoccupied seats being noticeable, and very enthusiastic; when Mr. Paur stepped up to the conductor's desk, he was greeted with hand-clapping loud and long.

The next programme is: Rimsky-Korsakoff, "La Grande Paque Russe," overture on themes of the Russian Church, opus 36 (first time); "Gernsheim," concerto for violin (first time); Schumann symphony No. 1, in B-flat major, opus 38; Tchaikovsky, "Italian Caprice" (first time). Mr. I. Schnitzler will be the violinist.

The Boston Traveler

PUBLISHED BY THE
BOSTON TRAVELER CO.,
TORREY E. WARDNER, President

MONDAY, OCTOBER 18, 1897.

THE SYMPHONY.

Opening of the Seventeenth Season With Brilliancy and Success.

Seventeenth season. Boston Symphony Orchestra; rst concert. The programme:

Academic overture	Brahms
Symphony, No. 7	Beethoven
Espagna	Chabrier
Poeme Lyrique	Glazounow
Kaiser March	Wagner

The welcome to Mr. Paur and his associates was hearty and warm—to say as war mas the interior weather of Music Hall is to use convincing comparison; the new season opened auspiciously, and so smoothly that one would never have suspected a summer vacation from anything in the work of the orchestra. The ensemble was at all times superb, the tone-volume as fine as ever, and the general expression full of charm and power.

The one overwhelming success was made by the Chabrier "Espagna," that marvelous tour de force of modern orchestration. We thought we had heard it at the "Pop" concerts; it was all a mistake. Nothing so overwhelming, so exciting, so wildly fascinating has ever been heard in Music Hall. From the rst brilliant bar to the last splendid crash there was not an inattentive ear in the house. Its playing was an innovation—the long wanted innovation—and Mr. Paur has our hearty thanks for making it. And we may say en passant that the "Espagna" was read with astonishing brilliancy and played with the utmost perfection. Now for more of just this sort of musical seasoning.

The other novelty, the Lyric Poem for orchestra by Alexander Glazounow, the young and rather inconspicuous Russian composer, makes no very marked impression because it has no very exceptional individuality. It flows along, rather generally, scarcely suggesting much that is Russian, and never stirring the pulses by any great musical thought. It is elegiac in part, and in part suggests a love song for orchestra. It has a finished performance.

The genial Brahms overture, with its old-world college airs so skilfully treated, went delightfully, and the Seventh symphony was admirably read. Wagner's Kaiser march grows less interesting as time goes by. Already we detect more bombast in its make-up than formerly.

W. D. QUINT.

The Evening Times

MEMBER OF ASSOCIATED PRESS.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 23, 1897.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Monday morning at 9 o'clock at Infantry Hall, Providence, there will be offered for sale season tickets for the 16th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Providence. Every season but one since the founding of the orchestra in 1881, Providence has been visited by this organization, a record enjoyed by only one other city, Cambridge, Mass. Interest in these concerts has never relaxed and probably never will as long as the same high standard is maintained. Each season the concerts have gained in attendance here and at present the audiences are of a size in keeping with the reputation of the orchestra. It is a matter of very general satisfaction that the number of concerts has been increased from six to eight, all on Wednesday evenings, as usual. As an evidence of the hold which these concerts have upon the public, each year, very early in the season, the management are in receipt of inquiries as to the prospective dates of the orchestra, that there may be no conflict with social functions and other projected entertainments.

Although there has grown to be a very strong sentiment that the orchestra, rather than the soloist, is the attraction, still in deference to a great variety of tastes, a most excellent list of artists has been engaged, including for vocalists Mme. Gadski, Mme. Lillian Blauvelt and Miss Gertrude May Stein; for pianists, Mr. Rafael Joseffy, Mr. Siloti and Mr. George Proctor; and for instrumentalists Mr. I. Schnitzler, violinist, and Mr. Alwin Schroeder, violincellist, the last two being members of the orchestra.

Conductor Paur has prepared a very attractive series of programmes which will be announced in due season. The price of the season tickets for the eight concerts has been fixed at $7, which is almost exactly the same rate as has been charged for six concerts. Present indications point to one of the most successful seasons ever known in Providence.

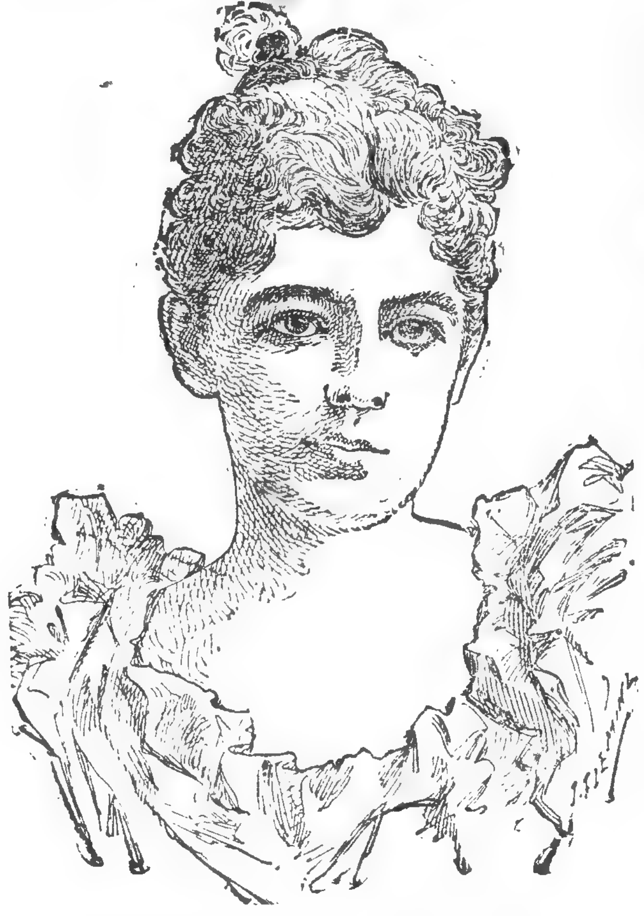
THE NEWS.

DAILY AND WEEKLY.
Providence, Rhode Island.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 23, 1897.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

For the sixteenth time the Boston Symphony Orchestra announces its annual series of concerts at Infantry Hall. It required but a few seasons for this organization to establish itself firmly in the favor of the musical public, and the unfailing popularity that it has since enjoyed is world famous. This popularity is not confined to the city of its birth, but is equally marked in New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, Providence and wherever the orchestra is known. The same policy that has brought success in the past is to be followed during the season of 1897-98, which has just opened in Boston.



MME. LILLIAN BLAUVELT.

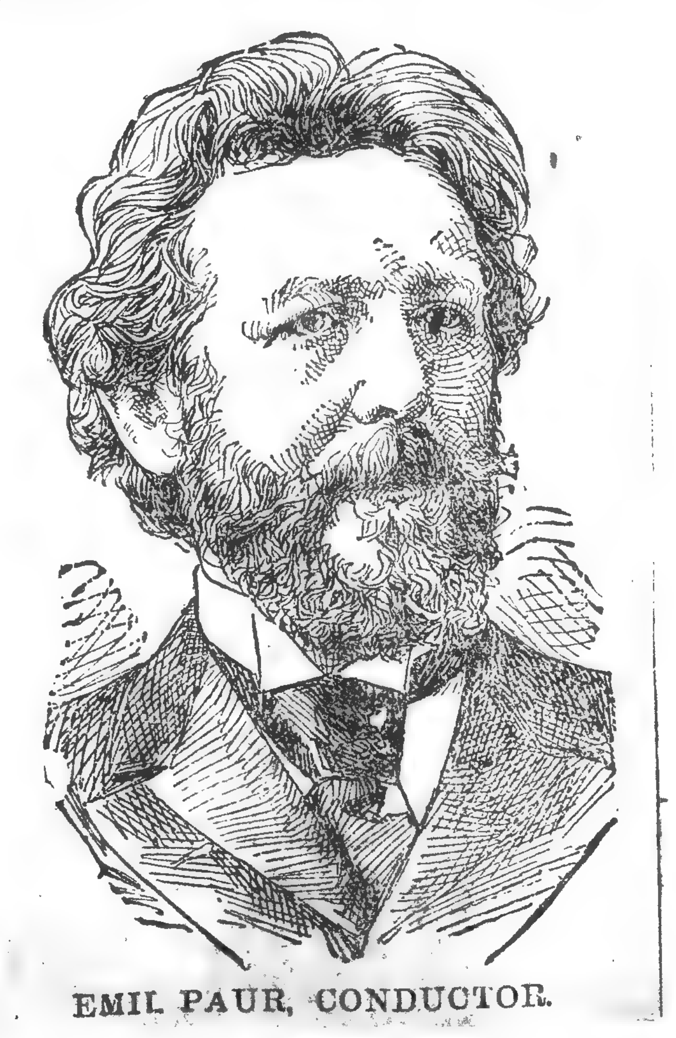
It is worthy of comment in connection with the concerts in this city, that, with the exception of one season, Providence has enjoyed the visits of this now famous organization every year since its inception in 1881. One most important feature, which will undoubtedly be welcomed by every lover of the best of music, is the increase in the number of concerts to be given from six to eight performances. Wednesday evenings have been chosen, as in the past, and the dates are Nov. 3, Dec. 1 and 29, Jan. 12, Feb. 2, March 9 and 30, and April 20. The concerts will begin at 8 o'clock precisely, and following the established rule of this organization, the doors will be closed during the performance of the first number, in deference to the great majority of patrons who are promptly in their seats. The opening concert on Wednesday evening, Nov. 3, will be the 1507th performance of the orchestra, and the 58th in Providence. This enormous number of performaces, and a personnel practically unchanged in the past 10 years, will go very far toward explaining the marvelous ensemble of the orchestra, which will be, as usual, under the leadership of Mr. Emil Paur.

Few organizations, if any, can show a record of continuous success equal to that of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The list of works to be performed includes: The Symphony, No. 5 and three movements from the 9th Symphony of Beethoven, the Schimann Symphony, No. 1, Haydn Symphony, No. 7, Raff Symphony "Im Walde," Brahm Symphony, No. 3, and Duvorak Symphony "From the New World." The overtures are: Beethoven's "Leonore," No. 3; Mendelssohns "Ruy Blas;" Berlioz' "Benvenuto Cellini," Weber's "Freischutz;" Meyerbeer's "Struensee," and Wagner's prelude to "Die Meistersinger." Among the novelties are Chabrier's "Espagna," Weber's "Invitation to Dance" orchestrated by Weingartner, Tschaikowsky's "Italian Caprice," Humperdinck's overture to "Hansel and Gretel," Greig's "Three Norwegian Melodies," and two movements from a Suite by Rimsky Korsakoff. By very general request, the Symphony, No. 6, "Pathetique" by Tschaikowsky, which made such a profound impression last season, will be played. As usual, one program will be devoted entirely to the works of Wagner.

The soloists are Mme. Gadski, who scored a marked and instantaneous success at her first appearance in this city with the orchestra last season; Mme. Lillian Blauvelt and Miss Gertrude May Stein, both artists in every way qualified to appear with this organization; Mr. Rafael Joseffy, an established favorite in this city; Mr. George W. Proctor, a pianist appearing with marked success in Boston concerts of the orchestra last year; Mr. Schnitzler, one of the first violins, and Mr. Alwin Schroder, the first violoncellist of the orchestra. A newcomer is Mr. Alexander Siloti, a Russian pianist about thirty-five years of age, who won the marked distinction of the gold medal at the Imperial Conservatory in Moscow, where he studied, first under Nicolas Rubinstein and later under the more famous Anton Rubinstein. He afterward studied with Franz Liszt and later on traveled with great success throughout Germany. He also conducted some very successful concerts in St. Petersburg and Moscow.

The sale of season tickets will be held at Infantry hall on Monday morning, Oct. 25, at nine o'clock. The price of season tickets for the eight concerts will be $7, which is almost exactly the same rate as has been charged for the past six concerts. Program books with descriptive notes on the works to be performed will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.

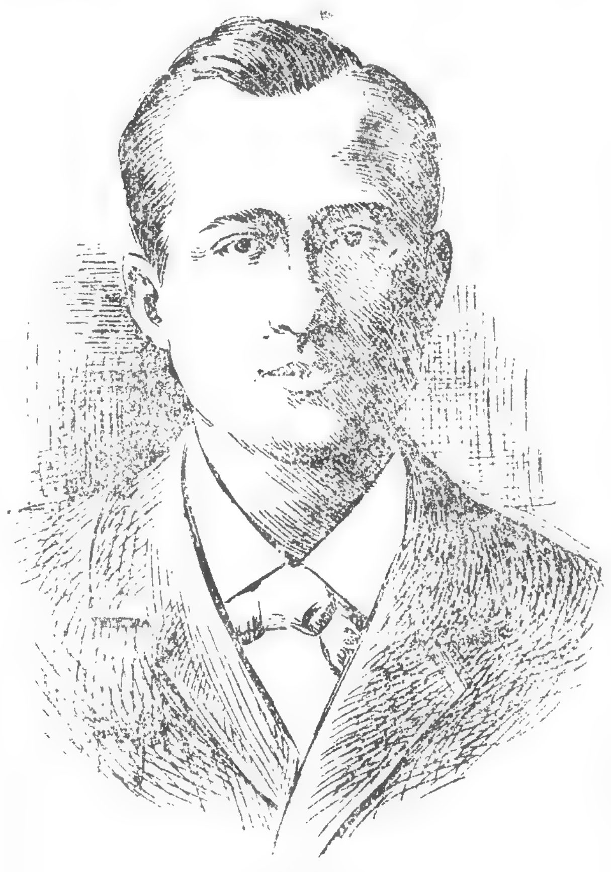


EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.

THE PROVIDENCE
SUNDAY JOURNAL.
OCTOBER 24, 1897.

Symphony Orchestra.

TO-MORROW morning at 9 o'clock at Infantry Hall, there will be offered for sale season tickets for the 16th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Providence. Every season but one since the founding of the orchestra, in 1881, Providence has been visited by this organization, a record enjoyed by only one other city, Cambridge, Mass. Interest in these concerts has never relaxed and probably never will, as long as the same high standard is maintained. Each season the concerts have gained in attendance here and at present the audiences are of a size in keeping with the reputation of the orchestra. It is a matter of general satisfaction that the number of concerts has been increased from six to eight, all on Wednesday evenings, as usual. As an evidence of the hold which these concerts have upon the public, very early in the season, the management is in receipt of inquiries as to the prospective dates of the orchestra, that there may be no conflict with social functions and other projected entertainments.



SILOTI,
Boston Symphony.

Although there has grown to be a very strong sentiment that the orchestra, rather than the soloist, is the attraction, still in deference to a great variety of tastes, an excellent list of artists has been engaged, including for vocalists Mme. Gadski, Mme. Lillian Blauvelt and Miss Gertrude May Stein; for pianists, Mr. Rafael Joseffy, Mr. Siloti and Mr. George Proctor, and for instrumentalists Mr. I. Schnitzler, violinist, and Mr. Alwin Schroeder, violoncellist, the last two being members of the orchestra.

Conductor Paur has prepared a very attractive series of programmes which will be announced in due season. The price of the season tickets for the eight concerts has been fixed at almost exactly the rate previously charged for six concerts. Present indications point to one of the most successful seasons ever known in Providence.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.
NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 20, 1897.

The first Symphony concert of the seventeenth season, Mr. Emil Pauer conductor, was given last evening in Music Hall. The program was as follows:

Academic Festival Overture....................Brahms
Symphony No. 7, in A major....................Beethoven
Rhapsody for orchestra, "España"..............Chabrier
(First time at these concerts.)
Lyric poem for orchestra, op. 2...............Glazounow
(First time in Boston.)
The Emperor's March, in B flat major..........Wagner

* * *

Mr. Paur introduced Mr. Glazounow to a Boston audience by playing the "Poème Lyrique," which I cannot believe is one of the composer's most characteristic works; not because it bears a comparatively early opus number, but I do not find in it the fierce qualities that are said to distinguish his chief compositions. The Poème is dedicated to Stcherbatcheff, whose exquisite, barbaric, haunting, sometimes inconsequential, often irresistible piano pieces are so strangely neglected by pianists in this country. (And Stcherbatcheff has written songs, orchestral pieces, that surely deserve a hearing). Mr. Huneker appreciates him. He wrote of him in Mlle. New York two years ago: "He is a musical Gogol who would create another Taras Bulba if he dared, yet contents himself writing small, dangerous things for the piano. Who eats of his music is made mad, as are the devourers of mandrake. Bitter-sweet is it with rhythms that lull you and poison you. A valse of his that I tasted made my brain whirl. In my arms I held a bewitching creature with a false, red mouth, and our dance was vertiginous. Chromatic nightmares murdered our love, and then I knew that Stcherbatcheff is to be feared."

This "Poème" is an andantino based on two melodies, which are developed freely. It is scored for an orchestra that includes three trombones, one base tuba, one harp. The spontaneity of the themes is indisputable, and whenever there is a suspicion of a tumble into the commonplace, the suggestion of an exotic tonality or an ingenious harmonic twist or some fortunate orchestral expression saves the composer from reproach. There is an individuality to this music, as well as sweeping breadth and sureness in treatment, but I wish to know Glazounow in his wilder, more outrages moods. Is he "too Russian" in his later works? This charge has been made. You remember, however, that there was a time when Tschaikowsky was considered "too Russian" by our concert-goers—Tschaikowsky who is accused by the young ultra-Russians of cosmopolitanism.

* * *

The soloist of the second concert will be Mr. Schnitzler, who will play Gernsheim's concerto. Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Russian Easter Festival" will be played for the first time in this city. In November the soloists will be Miss Gertrude May Stein and Mr. Jonás.

* * *

Mr. C. M. Loeffler wrote this summer a symphonic poem, entitled "La Mort de Tintagiles," in which he tries to tell in musical speech the impression made on him by Maeterlinck's remarkable "little drama for Marionettes." This symphonic poem will be produced by Mr. Paur at a concert here this season. I hope you, too, will know it. Mr. Loeffler is a man of too fine, too fastidious taste to write mere program music in the vulgar meaning of the term. There are of course typical themes. Thus you may find the first pages suggestive of the storm, "the spasms of the sky and the shatter of the sea," the wretched night through which Ygraine goes to the sick castle, holding the child Tintagiles by the hand. "Ta première nuit sera mauvaise, Tintagiles." Another theme may recall the very old and very feeable warrior Aglovale, who, looking at his sword, hears again the din of battle, the thunder of the captains and the shouting. And when you listen to the two violas d' amore, to be played by Mr. Kneisel and the composer, there will be the apparition of Tintagiles, the child doomed from his birth.

For Mr. Loeffler has introduced two of these instruments, seraphic instruments, beloved by the pure minded Chrétien Urhan, lauded by the restless, hysterical, bitter Berlioz.

* * *

Mr. Loeffler has also set "By the Rivers of Babylon" to music. He has written it for alto solo, female chorus (four parts), with orchestra of the usual strings, two flutes, two clarinets, two bassoons, two horns, two kettle drums, harp, two violas d'amore and a viol da gamba. He uses the words of the psalm as far as "If I prefer not Jerusalem above my chief joy," after which he introduces these words from other psalms, "Turn again our captivity as the streams in the South," "They that sow in tears shall reap in joy"; then there is a long solo for viol da gamba, which brings the end.

This rare master of orchestration in days when so many score brilliantly will play to you in New York this season his own Divertimento, for violin and orchestra. Now that I am in statistical vein, I add a list of the compositions by Mr. Loeffler that have been played in this town.

Suite for violin and orchestra, "Les Veillées de l'Ukraine," Symphony concert, November 21, 1891.

Fantastic Concerto for 'cello and orchestra, Mr. Schroeder at a Symphony concert, February 3, 1894.

Divertimento, violin and orchestra, in A minor, Symphony concert, January 5, 1895; January 9. 1897.

Cadenza for Brahms' violin concerto, played by Mr. Kneisel, Symphony concert, February 13, 1897.

String quartet, A minor, two movements (Adamowski Quartet), April 12, 1892.

Sextuor, two violins, two violas, two 'cellos (Kneisel Quartet concert), February 27, 1893.

Quintet in one movement for three violins, viola and 'cello (Kneisel Quartet), Febuary 18, 1895.

Octet for two violins, viola, 'cello, two clarinets, harp and double bass (Kneisel Quartet), February 15, 1897.

Mr. Loeffler has also written music for songs by Baudelaire and Verlaine, with piano accompaniment and viola obligato, and two or three of these songs have been scored by him for full orchestra.

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Journal.
SUNDAY, OCTOBER 24, 1897.

SECOND SYMPHONY.

Novelties by Tschaikowsy, Rimsky-Korsakoff and Gernsheim Played Last Night in Music Hall.

The program of the second Symphony concert was as follows:

"La Grande Paque Russe"..Rimsky-Korsakoff
Concerto for violin in D major.......Gernsheim
Symphony No. 1, B-flat major.......Schumann
Capriccio Italien.................. Tchaikowsky

The overture was written by Rimsky-Korsakoff in memory of Borodine and Modeste Moussorgski. The former died in 1887, the latter in 1881. Rimsky-Korsakoff was very fond of these men, whom he met with Balakireff and Cui at the house of Dargomijski. In 1870 he roomed with Moussorgski; and they worked together not only in the same chamber, but during the same hours.

Rimsky-Korsakoff orchestrated these pieces by Moussorgski: The polonaise from "Boris Godounof"; the Intermezzo which exists also in Moussorgski's orchestral version and in piano form; "La nuit sur le Mont Chauve"; and he put the finishing orchestral touches to "Khovantchina."

The first mention of this overture I find is that of the performance in manuscript at a Popular concert in Brussels, April 13, 1890, when it was conducted by the composer. Built upon themes of the Russian church, themes that are of poignant meaning to the faithful, the work no doubt is more effective when played to a Russian audience. We foreigners are obliged to regard it simply as music, and the chief feeling awakened is that of surprise, which is at times akin to curiosity and the desire to know "what is coming next." I do not believe that all the contents of the overture were brought fully into the light. The second trombone solo, for instance, a recitative accompanied by six divided 'cellos and two double-basses, is marked "a plena voce;" but the player was gentle, very gentle, and inclined to sentimental warbling. There are some interesting effects of instrumentation, but when you take away the themes themselves with their sombre dignity and the ecclesiastical cadences in the harmony, the rest seems thin and perfunctory.

⁂

Mr. Schnitzler is a violinist of many excellent parts, although last night his intonation was not always faultless; but why in the world did he choose the conventional, manufactured, and dull concerto by Gernsheim. What a waste of time in memorizing and in performance! Mr. Schnitzler possibly shortened his life by some minutes if not hours by the labor he bestowed on this concerto. I am glad the audience applauded him heartily, for he is a violinist of genuine ability, even when he deliberately hangs a millstone to his fiddle-bow.

The program book contained some startling statements. It informed us that Mr. Schnitzler played this concerto at Rotterdam in 1857 or 1858 under the composer's direction. Either Mr. Schnitzler has visited the fountain of youth, or he has an admirable make-up, or the program-book is mistaken; for surely Mr. Schnitzler does not look so old.

Furthermore as this concerto is opus 42, and Gernsheim was born in 1839, he had written at least 42 pieces by the time he was 18 or 19—a fertility that is truly rabbit-like.

And again we read that Gernsheim went to Rotterdam in 1874. This grows worse and worse. It is safer to say that there is some mistake—perhaps a typographical error.

⁂

Tschaikowsky's Italian Caprice was first played in London in 1885. Thomas conducted it in Chicago as early as 1893, and it was probably played before that in New York. We did not miss much here by the delay. There are evidences galore of the composer's orchestral cunning, and the melodies are characteristic, but there is a very strong dash of the vulgarity that is found in many orchestral pieces of his early period, and is suspected even in some later and greater works.

⁂

The B flat major symphony of Schumann is fast getting threadbare, and its orchestral dress is dusty. The scherzo, with its reminiscence of a Schubert song and portions of the finale are worth hearing, but the freshness is gone from the first movement and the larghetto is now without authoritative beauty. The Schumann of genius is the composer of certain piano pieces, certain songs and the D minor symphony.

Philip Hale.

The first of the Boston Symphony concerts in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, will be given Thursday evening. The program will include: Brahms's Tragic Overture; Aria from "Pearl of Brazil," Beethoven's 7th Symphony, recitative and aria "Non parentar" from "Magic Flute;" Chabrier's Rhapsody "Espana." Mrs. Marian Titus will be the singer.

The program of the Symphony rehearsal and concert Friday afternoon and Saturday evening will be as follows: Richard Strauss, symphonic poem, "Also Spracht Zarathustra;" F. David, aria, "La Perle du Bresil;" Brahms's symphony No. 3; Mozart, recitative and aria, "Non parentar," from "The Magic Flute;" Weber, "Invitation to the Dance," aranged for orchestra by Weingartner. Mrs. Titus will be the singer.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CII. NO. 116.
SUNDAY, OCTOBER 24, 1897.

SECOND SYMPHONY CONCERT

Mr. Schnitzler, as Soloist, Wins More Praise.

First Concert Performance Here of Several Russian Compositions—They Are Well Received, but Some of Them Prove a Trifle Tedious to Unaccustomed Ears.

The programme for the second concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, in Music Hall, last evening, was:

"The Russian Easter," op. 36............ Rimsky-Korsakoff
Concerto for violin, op. 42.........Gernsheim
Symphony No. 1, B-flat............Schumann
Italian Capriccio, op. 45.........Tschaikowsky

The soloist was Mr. I. Schnitzler. All of the selections except the symphony had the first concert performance here on this occasion. The Korsakoff overture is founded on Russian church themes, which are both imposing and impressive, and are no doubt full of moment to Russians who are familiar with them, and would be naturally interested in hearing them treated in the varied instrumental forms in which they are here presented. To others they cannot prove so attractive on a first hearing, or, perhaps, even on frequent hearing, for in themselves they are dry, harsh and formal.

The worth of the work lies wholly in the orchestration, which is rich, massive and brilliant, and abounding in fire. Unfortunately there is no color, or perhaps it would be bettter to say that there is too much color of one kind, resulting in a monotony of effect that at last becomes oppressive. The scoring is in the extreme modern vein, and has an excess of modern hysteria. The themes are not so much developed as buried under a load of instrumentation, which is made to rise superior to the motives with which it deals. The treatment is clever and ingenious enough, but there is little in it all to excite pleasing emotions or to rivet the attention. It goes on its way ably, but uninterestingly. In fact, it is hand-made and hard-made music, in which the skill and industry of the composer are more apparent than is anything resembling inspiration, except it be in the direction of displaying technique.

The Tschaikowsky capriccio is a singular work, thoroughly but vulgarly Italian in the character of its themes. The opening part, with its flowing mournful subject, accompanied by a persistent and highly effective pulsation of the wind instruments, is strong in dignity, and has much of that earnestness and impressiveness that are to be found in the composer's "Pathetic" symphony, but the rest is fantastically wild, often commonplace, and suggesting something of a frenzied pot-pourri. The orchestration is wonderfully brilliant and original, and remarkably diversified in its elaborate novel effects. It is unlike anything else by the composer that has hitherto been heard here, and despite its queer tunefulness, its tremendous spirit, its novelty and its effectiveness, it can scarcely be considered worthy of him. Following, as it did, so closely on Rhabrier's "Espagna" it afforded an interesting view of how two masters worked out plans similar in their general design, and it must be admitted that in grace, local color, piquancy and clarity the superiority was with the Frenchman. Both this and the other Russian selection abound in difficulties, but such things are of little moment to the orchestra, and another proof of the fact was given in the splendid performances that were given to the two compositions.

Mr. Paur, who is always felicitous in his reading of Schumann, gave a strong and exceptionally fine interpretation of the Symphony, and the orchestra was also at its best in its rendering of the work.

The Gernsheim concerto is exceedingly melodious, but it is long spun out, and is almost tiresomely elegiac in character. There is little difference in style between the opening movement and the andante that follows. In fact, there is no change of rhythmic effect, and scarcely of tempo. It is admirably written for the solo instrument, and affords the player ample opportunities for the display of his skill; while the orchestration is always discreet and charming; but it is hardly more than excellent Kapelmeister music, carefully made, elegantly polished and unimpeachable in point of taste, though without any noteworthy distinction beyond this. How few violin concertos of the many hundreds that have been written that hit the mark. After Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Brahms, Goldmark and Bruch, there is scarcely anything of lasting value.

Mr. Schnitzler again showed how estimable a player he is, in his performance of the solo part. His full, round and pure tone, his free and firm bowing, his facile technique and his grace of style were all in evidence. He gave an admirable reading of the work, and if he did not succeed in disguising its monotony the fault was that of the composer. He was lustily applauded, and won two hearty and deserved recalls. By the way, according to the programme book, it appears that the concerto was first given in public about 1857 or 1858 in Rotterdam, when Mr. Schnitzler played it from the manuscript under the composer's direction. Gernsheim was born in 1839, and if the statement given be true, he had composed the work when he was 19 years old. As it is marked opus 42, he must have labored industriously up to that early age. There is some mistake, of course, for he was not made director at Rotterdam until 1874.

The programme for the next concert is: Symphony No. 3, Brahms; aria, "Non paventar," from "The Magic Flute," Mozart; "Thus Spake Zarathustra," Richard Strauss; aria, "La Perle du Bresil," F. David, and Weingartner's arrangement of Weber's "Invitation to the Dance." The soloist is to be Mrs. Marian Titus.

The first concert in the series to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, will take place on Thursday evening next. The programme is: Magic overture, Brahms; air, "La Perle des Bresil," Felicien David; symphony, in A, Beethoven; air, "Non Paventar," from "The Magic Flute," Mozart, and "Espana," Chabrier. The soloist is to be Mrs. Marian Titus.

Boston Courier.
SUNDAY MORNING, OCT. 24, 1897.

THE SECOND SYMPHONY CONCERT, ETC.

In the Russian church Easter is a festival far more solemn, splendid and significant than it is wont to be among Protestants. It is made to express faith in immortality, belief in the mysterious wonders of resurrection and new life, and pious jubilation in the glorious gift of salvation. All classes of people rejoice together and the greeting of the day is exchanged between all who come into relationship, from the imperial household to the humblest family of the faithful. The church has its peculiar ceremonies, charged with deep symbolic meaning, its gleaming vestments and its magnificent music. It is the spirit of that time which gives cause and life to Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Russian Easter" overture, which had its first hearing in Boston at the second Symphony concert. There would be little use—and probably little sense—in attempting to trace each of the several phases of this composition to some special influence, even if one were sufficiently familiar with the ritual and doctrine of the church whence the themes are drawn to make such an attempt possible. It is enough perhaps to say that the overture seems to indicate the approach and the arrival of the sacred day. It has a long slow introduction, in which both sadness and majesty are suggested in the single phrases which come from the solo violin, the 'cello or the flute, hinting of solitary gloom, of mysterious sounds heard faintly from afar, and of calm, deep power. Then follows the allegro, in hasty agitation, contrasted with a reassuring theme of gentler flow, and then the burst of jubilee with its brilliant instrumentation, its roar of drum, and its cymbals crashing like bells. The work is striking and impressive, too, particularly for the listener who has a sympathy for the religious sentiment and enthusiasm which it represents. It sounds sometimes strange and almost wild, but it keeps safely aloof from the extremes to which its composer has been known to go. The reading was altogether befitting.

Gornsheim is a composer of whom Boston knows little beyond what it has heard of him in the cantata "Salem is," sung on several occasions by the Apollo. From that one would imagine that his disposition was toward the martial, the resonant and the sumptuous, fond of a glittering orchestration and eager to excite the hearer. But his violin concerto in D major, opus 42, which was introduced by Mr. Schnitzler, (who has played it abroad under the composer's direction, said the programme book), is of classic manner, refined and reserved in style and having its solo part sustained by an ample and varied but not demonstrative orchestral score. Its opening and closing allegros have neither haste nor heat; indeed the former seems almost like an allegretto, but in the latter the rondo form, especially in the final development, leads up to vigorous speed. The intervening andante is melancholy in cast and eloquent in expression. There is enough technical difficulty in the work to put the player on his mettle, but not enough to make it a mere virtuoso's choice. Mr. Schnitzler, who has sometimes been impetuous and assertive to the detriment of finer qualities of style, played it delightfully, giving all due warmth to the andante and animation to the other movements, with clearness for the ornate passages and mastery in the cadenzas. His performance was so gratifyingly good that he was several times recalled.

There was yet a third novelty on the programme in the last number, which was Tschaikowsky's "Italian Caprice." Exactly what national cause dictated the title, does not quite appear, although there are approaches to Italian feeling, if not to any distinct Italian form, in the pastoral atmosphere of some portions, the easy melodiousness, the ingenuous cornet duets, and in the whirling, bustling dance measures of the finale. On the other hand there is no reason why it should not be called Italian, and the composer doubtless had fancies and dreams of Italy which as so expressed had much meaning for him. It requires the enlarged modern orchestra with harp, tambourine, bells and triangle. It is full of moods and changes, and yet it holds firm in many of them to one reiterated accentual figure spoken abruptly and at wide intervals by the brass choir. The finale hangs fire a little and is so much extended and protracted that when the expected conclusion comes at last, it falls short of the full anticipated effect. The playing was superb.

Schumann's first was the symphony, which was so well read that every movement was much applauded.

Thus stands the next programme: Richard Strauss, Symphonic Poem, "Also spracht Zarathustra"; F. David, Aria, "La Perle du Bresil"; Brahms, Symphony No. 3; Mozart, Recitative and Aria, "Non paventar," from "The Magic Flute"; Weber, "Invitation to the Dance." arranged for orchestra by Felix Weingartner. Soloist, Mrs. Marian Titus.

[29]

THE MUSICAL COURIER.
NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 20, 1897.

The first Symphony concert of the seventeenth season, Mr. Emil Pauer conductor, was given last evening in Music Hall. The program was as follows:

Academic Festival Overture	Brahms
Symphony No. 7, in A major	Beethoven
Rhapsody for orchestra, "España" (First time at these concerts.)	Chabrier
Lyric poem for orchestra, op. 2 (First time in Boston.)	Glazounow
The Emperor's March, in B flat major	Wagner

* * *

Mr. Paur introduced Mr. Glazounow to a Boston audience by playing the "Poème Lyrique," which I cannot believe is one of the composer's most characteristic works; not because it bears a comparatively early opus number, but I do not find in it the fierce qualities that are said to distinguish his chief compositions. The Poème is dedicated to Stcherbatcheff, whose exquisite, barbaric, haunting, sometimes inconsequential, often irresistible piano pieces are so strangely neglected by pianists in this country. (And Stcherbatcheff has written songs, orchestral pieces, that surely deserve a hearing). Mr. Huneker appreciates him. He wrote of him in Mlle. New York two years ago: "He is a musical Gogol who would create another Taras Bulba if he dared, yet contents himself writing small, dangerous things for the piano. Who eats of his music is made mad, as are the devourers of mandrake. Bitter-sweet is it with rhythms that lull you and poison you. A valse of his that I tasted made my brain whirl. In my arms I held a bewitching creature with a false, red mouth, and our dance was vertiginous. Chromatic nightmares murdered our love, and then I knew that Stcherbatcheff is to be feared."

This "Poème" is an andantino based on two melodies, which are developed freely. It is scored for an orchestra that includes three trombones, one base tuba, one harp. The spontaneity of the themes is indisputable, and whenever there is a suspicion of a tumble into the commonplace, the suggestion of an exotic tonality or an ingenious harmonic twist or some fortunate orchestral expression saves the composer from reproach. There is an individuality to this music, as well as sweeping breadth and sureness in treatment, but I wish to know Glazounow in his wilder, more outrages moods. Is he "too Russian" in his later works? This charge has been made. You remember, however, that there was a time when Tschaikowsky was considered "too Russian" by our concert-goers—Tschaikowsky who is accused by the young ultra-Russians of cosmopolitanism.

* * *

The soloist of the second concert will be Mr. Schnitzler, who will play Gernsheim's concerto. Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Russian Easter Festival" will be played for the first time in this city. In November the soloists will be Miss Gertrude May Stein and Mr. Jonás.

* * *

Mr. C. M. Loeffler wrote this summer a symphonic poem, entitled "La Mort de Tintagiles," in which he tries to tell in musical speech the impression made on him by Maeterlinck's remarkable "little drama for Marionettes." This symphonic poem will be produced by Mr. Paur at a concert here this season. I hope you, too, will know it. Mr. Loeffler is a man of too fine, too fastidious taste to write mere program music in the vulgar meaning of the term. There are of course typical themes. Thus you may find the first pages suggestive of the storm, "the spasms of the sky and the shatter of the sea," the wretched night through which Ygraine goes to the sick castle, holding the child Tintagiles by the hand. "Ta première nuit sera mauvaise, Tintagiles." Another theme may recall the very old and very feeable warrior Aglovale, who, looking at his sword, hears again the din of battle, the thunder of the captains and the shouting. And when you listen to the two violas d' amore, to be played by Mr. Kneisel and the composer, there will be the apparition of Tintagiles, the child doomed from his birth.

For Mr. Loeffler has introduced two of these instruments, seraphic instruments, beloved by the pure minded Chrétien Urhan, lauded by the restless, hysterical, bitter Berlioz.

* * *

Mr. Loeffler has also set "By the Rivers of Babylon" to music. He has written it for alto solo, female chorus (four parts), with orchestra of the usual strings, two flutes, two clarinets, two bassoons, two horns, two kettle drums, harp, two violas d'amore and a viol da gamba. He uses the words of the psalm as far as "If I prefer not Jerusalem above my chief joy," after which he introduces these words from other psalms, "Turn again our captivity as the streams in the South," "They that sow in tears shall reap in joy"; then there is a long solo for viol da gamba, which brings the end.

This rare master of orchestration in days when so many score brilliantly will play to you in New York this season his own Divertimento, for violin and orchestra. Now that I am in statistical vein, I add a list of the compositions by Mr. Loeffler that have been played in this town.

Suite for violin and orchestra, "Les Veillées de l'Ukraine," Symphony concert, November 21, 1891.

Fantastic Concerto for 'cello and orchestra, Mr. Schroeder at a Symphony concert, February 3, 1894.

Divertimento, violin and orchestra, in A minor, Symphony concert, January 5, 1895; January 9. 1897.

Cadenza for Brahms' violin concerto, played by Mr. Kneisel, Symphony concert, February 13, 1897.

String quartet, A minor, two movements (Adamowski Quartet), April 12, 1892.

Sextuor, two violins, two violas, two 'cellos (Kneisel Quartet concert), February 27, 1893.

Quintet in one movement for three violins, viola and 'cello (Kneisel Quartet), Febuary 18, 1895.

Octet for two violins, viola, 'cello, two clarinets, harp and double bass (Kneisel Quartet), February 15, 1897.

Mr. Loeffler has also written music for songs by Baudelaire and Verlaine, with piano accompaniment and viola obligato, and two or three of these songs have been scored by him for full orchestra.

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Journal.
SUNDAY, OCTOBER 24, 1897.

SECOND SYMPHONY.

Novelties by Tschaikowsy, Rimsky-Korsakoff and Gernsheim Played Last Night in Music Hall.

The program of the second Symphony concert was as follows:

"La Grande Paque Russe"	Rimsky-Korsakoff
Concerto for violin in D major	Gernsheim
Symphony No. 1, B-flat major	Schumann
Capriccio Italien	Tchaikowsky

The overture was written by Rimsky-Korsakoff in memory of Borodine and Modeste Moussorgski. The former died in 1887, the latter in 1881. Rimsky-Korsakoff was very fond of these men, whom he met with Balakireff and Cui at the house of Dargomijski. In 1870 he roomed with Moussorgski; and they worked together not only in the same chamber, but during the same hours.

Rimsky-Korsakoff orchestrated these pieces by Moussorgski: The polonaise from "Boris Godounof"; the Intermezzo which exists also in Moussorgski's orchestral version and in piano form; "La nuit sur le Mont Chauve"; and he put the finishing orchestral touches to "Khovantchina."

The first mention of this overture I find is that of the performance in manuscript at a Popular concert in Brussels, April 13, 1890, when it was conducted by the composer. Built upon themes of the Russian church, themes that are of poignant meaning to the faithful, the work no doubt is more effective when played to a Russian audience. We foreigners are obliged to regard it simply as music, and the chief feeling awakened is that of surprise, which is at times akin to curiosity and the desire to know "what is coming next." I do not believe that all the contents of the overture were brought fully into the light. The second trombone solo, for instance, a recitative accompanied by six divided 'cellos and two double-basses, is marked "a piena voce;" but the player was gentle, very gentle, and inclined to sentimental warbling. There are some interesting effects of instrumentation, but when you take away the themes themselves with their sombre dignity and the ecclesiastical cadences in the harmony, the rest seems thin and perfunctory.

⁂

Mr. Schnitzler is a violinist of many excellent parts, although last night his intonation was not always faultless; but why in the world did he choose the conventional, manufactured, and dull concerto by Gernsheim. What a waste of time in memorizing and in performance! Mr. Schnitzler possibly shortened his life by some minutes if not hours by the labor he bestowed on this concerto. I am glad the audience applauded him heartily, for he is a violinist of genuine ability, even when he deliberately hangs a millstone to his fiddle-bow.

The program book contained some startling statements. It informed us that Mr. Schnitzler played this concerto at Rotterdam in 1857 or 1858 under the composer's direction. Either Mr. Schnitzler has visited the fountain of youth, or he has an admirable make-up, or the program-book is mistaken; for surely Mr. Schnitzler does not look so old.

Furthermore as this concerto is opus 42, and Gernsheim was born in 1839, he had written at least 42 pieces by the time he was 18 or 19—a fertility that is truly rabbit-like.

And again we read that Gernsheim went to Rotterdam in 1874. This grows worse and worse. It is safer to say that there is some mistake—perhaps a typographical error.

⁂

Tschaikowsky's Italian Caprice was first played in London in 1885. Thomas conducted it in Chicago as early as 1893, and it was probably played before that in New York. We did not miss much here by the delay. There are evidences galore of the composer's orchestral cunning, and the melodies are characteristic, but there is a very strong dash of the vulgarity that is found in many orchestral pieces of his early period, and is suspected even in some later and greater works.

⁂

The B flat major symphony of Schumann is fast getting threadbare, and its orchestral dress is dusty. The scherzo, with its reminiscence of a Schubert song and portions of the finale are worth hearing, but the freshness is gone from the first movement and the larghetto is now without authoritative beauty. The Schumann of genius is the composer of certain piano pieces, certain songs and the D minor symphony.

Philip Hale.

The first of the Boston Symphony concerts in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, will be given Thursday evening. The program will include: Brahms's Tragic Overture; Aria from "Pearl of Brazil," Beethoven's 7th Symphony, recitative and aria "Non parentar" from "Magic Flute;" Chabrier's Rhapsody "Espana." Mrs. Marian Titus will be the singer.

The program of the Symphony rehearsal and concert Friday afternoon and Saturday evening will be as follows: Richard Strauss, symphonic poem, "Also Spracht Zarathustra;" F. David, aria, "La Perle du Bresil;" Brahms's symphony No. 3; Mozart, recitative and aria, "Non parentar," from "The Magic Flute;" Weber, "Invitation to the Dance," aranged for orchestra by Weingartner. Mrs. Titus will be the singer.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CII, NO. 116.
SUNDAY, OCTOBER 24, 1897.

SECOND SYMPHONY CONCERT

Mr. Schnitzler, as Soloist, Wins More Praise.

First Concert Performance Here of Several Russian Compositions—They Are Well Received, but Some of Them Prove a Trifle Tedious to Unaccustomed Ears.

The programme for the second concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, in Music Hall, last evening, was:

"The Russian Easter," op. 36	Rimsky-Korsakoff
Concerto for violin, op. 42	Gernsheim
Symphony No. 1, B-flat	Schumann
Italian Capriccio, op. 45	Tschaikowsky

The soloist was Mr. I. Schnitzler. All of the selections except the symphony had the first concert performance here on this occasion. The Korsakoff overture is founded on Russian church themes, which are both imposing and impressive, and are no doubt full of moment to Russians who are familiar with them, and would be naturally interested in hearing them treated in the varied instrumental forms in which they are here presented. To others they cannot prove so attractive on a first hearing, or, perhaps, even on frequent hearing, for in themselves they are dry, harsh and formal.

The worth of the work lies wholly in the orchestration, which is rich, massive and brilliant, and abounding in fire. Unfortunately there is no color, or perhaps it would be bettter to say that there is too much color of one kind, resulting in a monotony of effect that at last becomes oppressive. The scoring is in the extreme modern vein, and has an excess of modern hysteria. The themes are not so much developed as buried under a load of instrumentation, which is made to rise superior to the motives with which it deals. The treatment is clever and ingenious enough, but there is little in it all to excite pleasing emotions or to rivet the attention. It goes on its way ably, but uninterestingly. In fact, it is hand-made and hard-made music, in which the skill and industry of the composer are more apparent than is anything resembling inspiration, except it be in the direction of displaying technique.

The Tschaikowsky capriccio is a singular work, thoroughly but vulgarly Italian in the character of its themes. The opening part, with its flowing mournful subject, accompanied by a persistent and highly effective pulsation of the wind instruments, is strong in dignity, and has much of that earnestness and impressiveness that are to be found in the composer's "Pathetic" symphony, but the rest is fantastically wild, often commonplace, and suggesting something of a frenzied pot-pourri. The orchestration is wonderfully brilliant and original, and remarkably diversified in its elaborate novel effects. It is unlike anything else by the composer that has hitherto been heard here, and despite its queer tunefulness, its tremendous spirit, its novelty and its effectiveness, it can scarcely be considered worthy of him. Following, as it did, so closely on Rhabrier's "Espagna" it afforded an interesting view of how two masters worked out plans similar in their general design, and it must be admitted that in grace, local color, piquancy and clarity the superiority was with the Frenchman. Both this and the other Russian selection abound in difficulties, but such things are of little moment to the orchestra, and another proof of the fact was given in the splendid performances that were given to the two compositions.

Mr. Paur, who is always felicitous in his reading of Schumann, gave a strong and exceptionally fine interpretation of the Symphony, and the orchestra was also at its best in its rendering of the work.

The Gernsheim concerto is exceedingly melodious, but it is long spun out, and is almost tiresomely elegiac in character. There is little difference in style between the opening movement and the andante that follows. In fact, there is no change of rhythmic effect, and scarcely of tempo. It is admirably written for the solo instrument, and affords the player ample opportunities for the display of his skill; while the orchestration is always discreet and charming; but it is hardly more than excellent Kapelmeister music, carefully made, elegantly polished and unimpeachable in point of taste, though without any noteworthy distinction beyond this. How few violin concertos of the many hundreds that have been written that hit the mark. After Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Brahms, Goldmark and Bruch, there is scarcely anything of lasting value.

Mr. Schnitzler again showed how estimable a player he is, in his performance of the solo part. His full, round and pure tone, his free and firm bowing, his facile technique and his grace of style were all in evidence. He gave an admirable reading of the work, and if he did not succeed in disguising its monotony the fault was that of the composer. He was lustily applauded, and won two hearty and deserved recalls. By the way, according to the programme book, it appears that the concerto was first given in public about 1857 or 1858 in Rotterdam, when Mr. Schnitzler played it from the manuscript under the composer's direction. Gernsheim was born in 1839, and if the statement given be true, he had composed the work when he was 19 years old. As it is marked opus 42, he must have labored industriously up to that early age. There is some mistake, of course, for he was not made director at Rotterdam until 1874.

The programme for the next concert is: Symphony No. 3, Brahms; aria, "Non paventar," from "The Magic Flute," Mozart; "Thus Spake Zarathustra," Richard Strauss; aria, "La Perle du Bresil," F. David, and Weingartner's arrangement of Weber's "Invitation to the Dance." The soloist is to be Mrs. Marian Titus.

The first concert in the series to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, will take place on Thursday evening next. The programme is: Magic overture, Brahms; air, "La Perle des Bresil," Felicien David; symphony, in A, Beethoven; air, "Non Paventar," from "The Magic Flute," Mozart, and "Espana," Chabrier. The soloist is to be Mrs. Marian Titus.

Boston Courier.
SUNDAY MORNING, OCT. 24, 1897.

THE SECOND SYMPHONY CONCERT, ETC.

In the Russian church Easter is a festival far more solemn, splendid and significant than it is wont to be among Protestants. It is made to express faith in immortality, belief in the mysterious wonders of resurrection and new life, and pious jubilation in the glorious gift of salvation. All classes of people rejoice together and the greeting of the day is exchanged between all who come into relationship, from the imperial household to the humblest family of the faithful. The church has its peculiar ceremonies, charged with deep symbolic meaning, its gleaming vestments and its magnificent music. It is the spirit of that time which gives cause and life to Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Russian Easter" overture, which had its first hearing in Boston at the second Symphony concert. There would be little use—and probably little sense—in attempting to trace each of the several phases of this composition to some special influence, even if one were sufficiently familiar with the ritual and doctrine of the church whence the themes are drawn to make such an attempt possible. It is enough perhaps to say that the overture seems to indicate the approach and the arrival of the sacred day. It has a long slow introduction, in which both sadness and majesty are suggested in the single phrases which come from the solo violin, the 'cello or the flute, hinting of solitary gloom, of mysterious sounds heard faintly from afar, and of calm, deep power. Then follows the allegro, in hasty agitation, contrasted with a reassuring theme of gentler flow, and then the burst of jubilee with its brilliant instrumentation, its roar of drum, and its cymbals crashing like bells. The work is striking and impressive, too, particularly for the listener who has a sympathy for the religious sentiment and enthusiasm which it represents. It sounds sometimes strange and almost wild, but it keeps safely aloof from the extremes to which its composer has been known to go. The reading was altogether befitting.

Gornsheim is a composer of whom Boston knows little beyond what it has heard of him in the cantata "Salem is," sung on several occasions by the Apollo. From that one would imagine that his disposition was toward the martial, the resonant and the sumptuous, fond of a glittering orchestration and eager to excite the hearer. But his violin concerto in D major, opus 42, which was introduced by Mr. Schnitzler, (who has played it abroad under the composer's direction, said the programme book), is of classic manner, refined and reserved in style and having its solo part sustained by an ample and varied but not demonstrative orchestral score. Its opening and closing allegros have neither haste nor heat; indeed the former seems almost like an allegretto, but in the latter the rondo form, especially in the final development, leads up to vigorous speed. The intervening andante is melancholy in cast and eloquent in expression. There is enough technical difficulty in the work to put the player on his mettle, but not enough to make it a mere virtuoso's choice. Mr. Schnitzler, who has sometimes been impetuous and assertive to the detriment of finer qualities of style, played it delightfully, giving all due warmth to the andante and animation to the other movements, with clearness for the ornate passages and mastery in the cadenzas. His performance was so gratifyingly good that he was several times recalled.

There was yet a third novelty on the programme in the last number, which was Tschaikowsky's "Italian Caprice." Exactly what national cause dictated the title, does not quite appear, although there are approaches to Italian feeling, if not to any distinct Italian form, in the pastoral atmosphere of some portions, the easy melodiousness, the ingenuous cornet duets, and in the whirling, bustling dance measures of the finale. On the other hand there is no reason why it should not be called Italian, and the composer doubtless had fancies and dreams of Italy which as so expressed had much meaning for him. It requires the enlarged modern orchestra with harp, tambourine, bells and triangle. It is full of moods and changes, and yet it holds firm in many of them to one reiterated accentual figure spoken abruptly and at wide intervals by the brass choir. The finale hangs fire a little and is so much extended and protracted that when the expected conclusion comes at last, it falls short of the full anticipated effect. The playing was superb.

Schumann's first was the symphony, which was so well read that every movement was much ap-applauded.

Thus stands the next programme: Richard Strauss, Symphonic Poem, "Also sprachi Zarathustra"; F. David, Aria, "La Perle du Bresil"; Brahms, Symphony No. 3; Mozart, Recitative and Aria, "Non paventar," from "The Magic Flute"; Weber, "Invitation to the Dance." arranged for orchestra by Felix Weingartner. Soloist, Mrs. Marian Titus.

[illegible] DAILY [illegible]
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.

MONDAY MORNING, OCT. 25, 1897.

The Symphony Concert Began and Ended With Russian Music.

The concert of Saturday evening began and ended with works by Russian composers, although the first one dealt in Caviare and the second in Maccaroni. The first work on the programme was "The Great Russian Easter," an overture by Rimsky-Korsakoff. The work was thoroughly representative of "Young Russia" in music, for it is dedicated to the memory of Moussorgsky and Borodin, so that a whole triumvirate may be regarded as represented in its tones. It is founded on Russian religious themes, and as these are the offspring of Byzantine music, the flavor was an unusual one throughout.

There was a certain solemnity of trombone passages that recalled the fact that the ponderous church choir basses are often in evidence in the music of the Greek church as performed in Russia. No one who has ever heard the powerful Russian basses will ever forget them, and it is a point that scientists have not yet sufficiently investigated, this peculiar distribution of voices among especial nations of the earth, the high tenors of Spain, the rich altos of France, the sopranos of America, the basses which predominate in Russia.

The overture was decidedly "Caviare to the general," perhaps even to the especial. There were strange antiphonal responses between the trombones and the strings, there were short sketches of strict counterpoint followed by most sensuous harmonic phrases which assimilated about as well as mustard on Charlotte Russe. Nothing seemed sustained or carried through to its legitimate conclusion, even the counterpoint coming in hiccoughs; altogether a thing of shreds and patches, bizarre and striking, but not in any way beautiful.

Startling and portentous pauses ushered in a final din of percussive instruments, from Glockenspeil to Gong, that seemed to suggest a prosperous Smithy rather than a church. It was a proper thing to hear this work—once, for it presented a new school in a very marked fashion, and one can at least congratulate Russia that it is not becoming a mere copy of Wagner as "Young Germany" is in its latter-day music. The end of the overture was of the noisiest description and gave a tone-picture of wild festivity—with a good deal of Vodka.

Then the pendulum swung to the other side and Mr. Schnitzler appeared in the most conventional of violin concertos. It was the concerto in D major, by Gernsheim, as proper a piece as was ever arrayed in dresscoat, white tie and kid gloves, respectable "Kapellmeister-musik" if ever there was any. Coldly classic from first to last, it would have been too much to demand a display of any passion on the part of the excellent violinist.

It was abundantly sufficient and entirely in keeping with the character of the composition that Mr. Schnitzler gave it with musicianly clearness and with an intelligent regard for the balance of its eminently Chesterfieldian themes. It remained an unfortunate choice at the best, and that the violinist made a success was rather in spite of, than because of, anything that Gernsheim had to say. Two recalls, which were well deserved, testified to the public appreciation of the excellent artist.

Schumann's best symphony, the B flat, came like pure October sunshine after the gaslights of a drawing-room. Never did it seem to make a better effect. This was partially because it was finely read and superbly played, but partially also because the other compositions were artificial or insincere. The symphony was a product of that happy time when Schumann had won Clara Wieck, when the tumults of his agitated life had temporarily subsided.

This composer was the opposite of Schubert in the fact that he wrote best when he was happiest, (Schubert said that the public always seemed to love those compositions best which he wrote when most miserable) and Schumann's joyous days of 1840-1 brought forth the best groups of German "lieder" in existence, and the best symphony after Beethoven. Mendelssohn's symphonies, which once overshadowed Schumann's. have faded out a little, but Schumann's seem to grow more glorious with repeated hearing.

Perhaps the Larghetto is less effective in the modern concert-room than it was in its own generation; it is a close relative to the slow movement of Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony, and the Rondo effects, even with variations, are not the best to conjure with in this age of suggestions and impressions, this epoch which disdains repetitions in music; but the strange foreshadowing of the Scherzo by the few measures given by trombones and bassoons at the close of the movement is a touch of highest genius.

The Scherzo, the first with a double trio, is full of contrasts. Here Schumann proves himself the great master of syncopation, and the performance of its capricious and tricksy effects was masterly.

The finale showed our orchestra at its ante-vacation standard, and strings, flutes, horns, all in turn demand ecstatic praise.

Another Russian brought up the rearguard; Tschaikowsky's "Italian Caprice" ended the concert. Tschaikowsky has had no more success than Richard Strauss in catching up the Italian mode of expression. Although he has endeavored to become intensely, even brutally, Italian in his themes, the impression left is that of a foreigner speaking an alien tongue with the utmost care, precision and clearness, yet failing to convince the auditor that he was born to the language.

This is more than a mere matter of themes; Strauss took the most rollicking of Neapolitan themes, "Funicolo-Funicola," and managed to present it as if it had been composed in a German conservatory; Tschaikowsky revels it Italian themes from street ditties to Tarantellas yet only inflates them into (must we say it?) vulgarity.

Now the melodies of some of the Italian cities sound cheap the moment that they are magnified or intensified beyond what they were intended to be, but let "Santa Lucia" (or even "Funicoli") be tossed off with its appropriate surroundings, with its due simplicity, its unpretentious directness, and it straightway acquires the power of the folk-song, and no one dreams of demanding its passport before admitting it into the realms of true music. It is not so when simple and delightful melodies cross the frontier with Saratoga trunks in the shape of trombones, piccolo, glockenspiel, bass tuba, and other "impedimenta" too numerous to catalogue.

The work became a study in orchestration, the Pifferrari effects being imitated in the course of its measures, quite successfully. The orchestra gave it with all due attention to its details, the trumpets and other brasses blowing to the point of [illegible], oboe and flute having much brilliant work to do, as is often the case in the orchestral works of this Russian tone-[illegible]. But at the end of it all one feels [illegible] is Jacob's voice, but the [illegible] hands of Esau. The themes [illegible] is Tschaikowsky.

Louis C. Elson.

[illegible]

SUNDAY, OCT. 24, 1897.

Second Symphony Concert.

Mr Paur presented three novelties at last week's symphony concerts, the overture on themes of the Russian church, by Nicolai Rimsky-Korsakoff; Gernsheim's violin concerto in D major, and an Italian capriccio, by Tchaikovsky. The program was completed by Schumann's first symphony. Mr P. Schnitzler was the violin soloist. The Russian overture, although ecclesiastic in motif, is more strongly suggestive of a military anthem than one of a religious character. The simplicity of the introduction is quickly lost in the full and extended development of the orchestration, which is prolific in highly colored passage work and forte effects, introducing the whole band, the brass contingent being specially prominent.

The composer has utilized the harp in a peculiar way at times, a series of sweeping runs forming a background for the flute or clarinet. A trombone recitative accompanied by the heavier string section is also another odd combination, although its effectiveness is not to be denied. The work of the brasses was admirable throughout, notably so in the tumultuous apotheosis which was given with grand effect, and the theme, the second one, allotted to the violins and violas, was exquisitely brought out. The composition, as a whole, appeared to be of a martial type of rejoicing, rather than in the spirit in which church music is understood in this country.

Mr Schnitzler played the solo violin part of the Gernsheim concerto in a conscientious manner, although in some of the higher passage phrases his fingering was faulty and his tones not true to the pitch. The cadenza of the first movement was generally good. The second movement was given with commendable breadth of tone and the elaborations were smoothly shown. The slow tempo of this movement evidently deprives it of interest for the average auditor, the finale, or more rapid part of the concerto, eliciting the greater applause. The key is constantly changing in this portion of the work, and the soloist and orchestra performed these difficult demands without a perceptible break. Mr Schnitzler was warmly applauded for his performance.

Tchaikovsky's Italian capriccio is a characteristic composition filled with musical surprises and strange harmonic combinations. Fantastic to a high degree it is, but it lacks the buoyancy and jollity which one naturally associates with a festivity of an Italian character and as a "tone picture" it does not typify the land of the lazzaroni or his merrymaking. There was a strange rhythmic accompaniment of four notes given to the heavy strings which ran nearly through the whole piece, accentuating the peculiarities of the curious orchestration, and several of the developments were worked out in the oddest fashion by this composer who revels in strange musical combinations. It is sufficient to say that the orchestra performed its work skilfully and evidently in the spirit of the Russian writer.

Schumann's grand first symphony, magnificently interpreted by the orchestra, was the most enjoyable of the four numbers on the program. Perhaps special mention is deserved by the violins for the charming rendering of the romanza in the second part and the dance theme of the finale, but the whole performance was of the highest order, and general praise is due, rather than any commendation for special work.

This week's program will be as follows: Symphonic poem, "Also Spracht Zarathustra," Richard Strauss; aria, "La Pere du Bresil," F. David; symphony No. 3, Brahms; recitative and aria, "Non Parentar," from "The Magic Flute," Mozart; "Invitation to the Dance," Weber, arranged for orchestra by Felix Weingartner. Mrs Marion Titus will be the soloist.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, OCTOBER 24, 1897.
(Copyright, 1897, Post Publishing Co.)

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

At the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall, these compositions new to the musical public of this city were performed. These were Rimsky Korsakoff's overture, "The Russian Easter," Op. 36; concerto for violin in D major, Op. 42, of Frederick Gernsheim, and the "Italian Capriccio," for orchestra, Op. 45, of Tschaikowsky. These, together with Schumann's first symphony in B flat major, constituted the programme. Mr. Isadore Schnitzler was the soloist. The overture by Rimsky Korsakoff was composed in 1888, and is built up on themes of the Russian church. Its general character is ecclesiastical, though the Russian idea of church music is not much like ours. In many ways it suggests his "Symphonic Suite," played here last spring, as the instrumentation is very highly colored at times, in the manner noticeable in the former work.

It is quite effective all through, and, like the "Symphonic Suite," should be heard several times to understand fully.

This caprice is fanciful, like much that Tschaikowsky has written. Commencing with a slow introduction, there is a fine development of themes leading to the allegro moderato. This last is followed by a rushing saltarello, worked up with immense vivacity, ending with a prestissimo—a quiet eect. The Gernsheim concerto for violin, although heard at this concert for the first time here, was originally produced as far back as 1857. The composer is still living, in Berlin, and is a well-known pianist, as well as a composer. There was a symphony of his played at these concerts some years ago, and the Apollo Club has sung his "Salamis" several times. His other works are still unknown here. His violin concerto seems to be a highly interesting composition, and should be heard again. The solo playing of Mr. Schnitzler was in the highest degree artistic, and fully merited the numerous recalls that he received at the close of his performance. Schumann's Symphony in B flat is admired by many more than any of his others, and it has always been a success since its first performance in 1841. It is in truth a glorious symphony every way. The orchestra played it as near perfection as could well be, and in the Italian Caprice better ensemble could hardly be imagined. The accompaniment in the concerto was also very effective.

For the net concert, a symphonic poem by Richard Strauss is promised, also Brahm's third symphony and the "Invitation to the Dance" of Weber—Weingartner's arrangement. Mrs. Marian Titus will be the soloist in arias by Mozart and F. David.

Gazette

ESTABLISHED 1813.

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, OCT. 24.

Symphony Concert.

The second concert of the Symphony Orchestra was given in Music Hall last night. The programme was:

Overture, Oster Fest, op. 36. .Rimsky-Korsakoff
(First time.)
Concerto for violin..................Gernsheim
(First time.)
Symphony No. 1.......................Schumann
Italian Caprice, op. 45...........Tschaikowsky
Soloist, Mr. I. Schnitzler.
(First time.)

The overture is an interesting and characteristic work, but it dwells on one theme with a persistence that leads to monotony, and the ornamentation is overweighty and developed in a spirit that is opposed to the simplicity and deep fervor of the theme. There is overmuch noise in place of real passion and a brilliancy that results from a large volume of sound, intelligently produced and directed. The work is wild and impressive, but not convincing.

The concerto is refined, graceful and musicianly; artistic in taste and charming in development. but the tone color is pitched too low, and is maintained for too long a time. The different movements merge into one another without contrast; hardly without change of idea, and with unvarying sameness of hue. The ideas are prettily conceived, but they are not large, and a shepherd might have piped them monotonously through a long, misty midsummer day. The impression produced by the work is that of undue length and monotony of color. It was played with rare taste by Mr. Schnitzler with largeness of style and of tone, with unaffected feeling and sincerity, and with faultless technique; in a word, it was the interpretation of an artist.

The Tschaikowsky Caprice is a charming work, bright, genial and hearty, rich in color, brilliant in treatment and dashed in with the boldest, most daring and most sure hand—the hand of a master. There is no trouble in following the ideas of this master, even in his wildest moments, and he is always impressive. The caprice is as characteristic as are this master's larger and more important works; it is genial, vivacious and sparkling; a toy, perhaps, but dazzling as a multitude of small jewels, flashing in the sunlight.

The work of the orchestra was unexceptionable, and Mr. Paur was in his happiest mood in his interpretation of the Schumann symphony.

The programme for the third concert is: Richard Strauss, Symphonic Poem, "Also Sprach Zarathustra;" F. David, aria, "La Perle du Bresil;" Brahms, Symphony No. 3; Mozart, recitative and aria, "Non Paventar," from "The Magic Flute;" Weber, "Invitation to the Dance," arranged for orchestra by Felix Weingartner. Soloist, Mrs. Marian Titus.

SUNDAY TELEGRAM,
PROVIDENCE, OCTOBER 24

Tomorrow morning at 9 o'clock, at Infantry hall, the season tickets for the 16th season of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Providence will be offered for sale. Cambridge, Mass., and Providence are the only two cities in this country which have been visited by the orchestra every season but one since its founding in 1881. The personnel of the orchestra will be practically unchanged, and the same high standard of performance will be maintained. The attendance has increased each year and it is a matter of great pride with this organization that hundreds of its patrons have attended the concerts from the beginning. The announcement that the concerts will be increased from six to eight has given very general satisfaction.

The largest auction sales in Boston in the past five years, another most phenomenal sale in Philadelphia, a marked increase in the season ticket sale in New York, all point to one of the most successful seasons ever known in the history of the orchestra.

Notwithstanding the fact that a great many of the patrons of these concerts have grown to regard the orchestra as the attraction, rather than the soloist, still in deference to a great variety of tastes, a most excellent list of solo artists has been engaged, including for vocalists Mme. Gadski, Mme. Lillian Blauvelt, and Miss Gertrude May Stein; for pianists, Mr. Rafael Joseffy, Mr. Siloti and Mr. George Proctor; and for instrumentalists, Mr. I. Schnitzler, violinist, and Mr. Alwin Schroeder, violincellist, the last two being members of the orchestra.

Conductor Paur has prepared a very attractive series of programs, which will be announced in due time. The price of the season tickets for the eight concerts (which will, as usual, be held on Wednesday evenings) has been fixed at $7, which is almost exactly the same rate as has been charged in the past for six concerts. Present indications point to one of the most successful seasons ever known in Providence.

Boston Journal.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 28, 1897.

MUSIC NOTES.

The first of the Boston Symphony concerts in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, will be given this evening. The program will include: Brahms's Tragic Overture, Aria from "Pearl of Brazil," Beethoven's 7th Symphony, recitative and aria "Non parentar" from "Magic Flute," Chabrier's Rhapsody "Espana." Mrs. Marian Titus will be the singer.

The program of the Symphony rehearsal and concert in Music Hall Friday and Saturday will be as follows: "Also spracht Zarathustra," R. Strauss; Aria from "Pearl of Brazil"; Brahms's Symphony No. 3; recitative and aria "Non parentar," from "Magic Flute"; "Invitation to the Dance," Weber-Weingartner. Mrs. Titus will be the singer.

[illegible]

BOSTON, SUNDAY, OCT. 24, 1897.

Mr. I. Schnitzler was the soloist at last week's rehearsal and concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra. The programme was:

"The Russian Easter," overture on themes of the Russian church, op. 36 (first time in Boston)..............................Nicolai Rimsky-Korsakoff
Concerto for violin, in D-major, op. 42 (first time in Boston) ....Friedrich Gernsheim
Symphony No. 1, in B-flat major, op. 38.......................Robert Schumann
Italian Capriccio, for orchestra, op. 45 (first time in Boston) ..Peter Tchaikovsky

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Symphony concerts are well under way, and as popular as ever.

The third rehearsal and concert will take place next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Mrs. Marian Titus will be the soloist and the programme will be:

Symphonic Poem, "Also spracht Zarathustra" ....Richard Strauss
Aria, "La Perle du Bresil"............F. David
Symphony No. 3..........................Brahms
Recitative and Aria, "Non parenta" from.. "The Magic Plute"....................Mozart
"Invitation to the Dance".... ....Weber
(Arranged for orchestra by Felix Weingartner.)

The Boston Traveler
PUBLISHED BY THE
BOSTON TRAVELER CO.,
TORREY E. WARDNER, President

MONDAY, OCTOBER 25, 1897.

THE SYMPHONY.

A New Work by Rimsky-Korsakoff. Mr. Schnitzler as the Soloist.

Seventeenth season Boston Symphony Orchestra; second concert. Mr. Isadore Schnitzler, soloist. The programme:

"La Grande Paque Russe".. .... Rimsky-Korsakoff
Concerto for violin in D major...... Gernsheim
Symphony No. 1, B-flat major..Schumann
Capriccio Italien... ....Tchaikowsky

There were two Russians on the programme of the second concert, each a powerful representative of his school. The difference between Rimsky-Korsakoff and Tschaikowsky was accentuated by the fact that the selection from the former is essentially Slavonic even in its meaning and application, while in the "Italian" caprice Tschaikowsky deliberately went to the weakest of all sources for inspiration. The "Easter Festival" overture that opened the programme has about as little meaning to us as a composition with "Duke Street" as its theme would have in St. Petersburg. Judging it as absolute music, we find a series of stern ecclesiastical themes, ornately orchestrated and having moments of great grandeur and impressiveness. But it is long-winded, turgid and verbose. Its only value to a Boston audience is as an object lesson.

The Tschaikowsky caprice, spite of the frank commonplaceness of its melodic material, is much more interesting and enjoyable. The composer said to himself: "I will go to Italy for my tunes, but I will show the Italian gentlemen what can be done with them." And he gives us fine and strong treatment of the sugary themes, orchestration of brilliancy and warmth, and a characteristic richness of harmonic detail that excuse certain faults of taste. The piece was played with admirable fire and beauty.

Mr. Schnitzler played the Gernsheim concerto with ability; it was not worthy of him or his efforts, however, for a tamer, more smugly respectable, watery tuneful work for the violin has not been heard here for many a day. Mr. Schnitzler lent to it the advantages of a pure tone and an admirable expressiveness, but he could not make it a thing of interest.

The splendid Schumann symphony in B flat went with stirring brilliancy through and through. Mr. Paur is especially happy in his readings of this master. The finale was a marvel of ebulliant joy and the delight of life.

The programme for this week is: Richard Strauss, symphonic poem, "Also Spracht Zarathustra"; F. David, aria, "La Perle du Bresil"; Brahms' symphony No. 3; Mozart, recitative and aria, "Non parentar," from "The Magic Flute"; Weber, "Invitation to the Dance," arranged for orchestra by Weingartner. Mrs. Titus will be the singer.

W. D. QUINT.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, OCT. 25, 1897.

The Symphony Concert Began and Ended With Russian Music.

The concert of Saturday evening began and ended with works by Russian composers, although the first one dealt in Caviare and the second in Maccaroni. The first work on the programme was "The Great Russian Easter," an overture by Rimsky-Korsakoff. The work was thoroughly representative of "Young Russia" in music, for it is dedicated to the memory of Moussorgsky and Borodin, so that a whole triumvirate may be regarded as represented in its tones. It is founded on Russian religious themes, and as these are the offspring of Byzantine music, the flavor was an unusual one throughout.

There was a certain solemnity of trombone passages that recalled the fact that the ponderous church choir basses are often in evidence in the music of the Greek church as performed in Russia. No one who has ever heard the powerful Russian basses will ever forget them, and it is a point that scientists have not yet sufficiently investigated, this peculiar distribution of voices among especial nations of the earth, the high tenors of Spain, the rich altos of France, the sopranos of America, the basses which predominate in Russia.

The overture was decidedly "Caviare to the general," perhaps even to the especial. There were strange antiphonal responses between the trombones and the strings, there were short sketches of strict counterpoint followed by most sensuous harmonic phrases which assimilated about as well as mustard on Charlotte Russe. Nothing seemed sustained or carried through to its legitimate conclusion, even the counterpoint coming in hiccoughs; altogether a thing of shreds and patches, bizarre and striking, but not in any way beautiful.

Startling and portentous pauses ushered in a final din of percussive instruments, from Glockenspeil to Gong, that seemed to suggest a prosperous Smithy rather than a church. It was a proper thing to hear this work—once, for it presented a new school in a very marked fashion, and one can at least congratulate Russia that it is not becoming a mere copy of Wagner as "Young Germany" is in its latter-day music. The end of the overture was of the noisiest description and gave a tone-picture of wild festivity—with a good deal of Vodka.

Then the pendulum swung to the other side and Mr. Schnitzler appeared in the most conventional of violin concertos. It was the concerto in D major, by Gernsheim, as proper a piece as was ever arrayed in dresscoat, white tie and kid gloves, respectable "Kapellmeister-musik" if ever there was any. Coldly classic from first to last, it would have been too much to demand a display of any passion on the part of the excellent violinist.

It was abundantly sufficient and entirely in keeping with the character of the composition that Mr. Schnitzler gave it with musicianly clearness and with an intelligent regard for the balance of its eminently Chesterfieldian themes. It remained an unfortunate choice at the best, and that the violinist made a success was rather in spite of, than because of, anything that Gernsheim had to say. Two recalls, which were well deserved, testified to the public appreciation of the excellent artist.

Schumann's best symphony, the B flat, came like pure October sunshine after the gaslights of a drawing-room. Never did it seem to make a better effect. This was partially because it was finely read and superbly played, but partially also because the other compositions were artificial or insincere. The symphony was a product of that happy time when Schumann had won Clara Wieck, when the tumults of his agitated life had temporarily subsided.

This composer was the opposite of Schubert in the fact that he wrote best when he was happiest, (Schubert said that the public always seemed to love those compositions best which he wrote when most miserable) and Schumann's joyous days of 1840-1 brought forth the best groups of German "lieder" in existence, and the best symphony after Beethoven. Mendelssohn's symphonies, which once overshadowed Schumann's. have faded out a little, but Schumann's seem to grow more glorious with repeated hearing.

Perhaps the Larghetto is less effective in the modern concert-room than it was in its own generation; it is a close relative to the slow movement of Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony, and the Rondo effects, even with variations, are not the best to conjure with in this age of suggestions and impressions, this epoch which disdains repetitions in music; but the strange foreshadowing of the Scherzo by the few measures given by trombones and bassoons at the close of the movement is a touch of highest genius.

The Scherzo, the first with a double trio, is full of contrasts. Here Schumann proves himself the great master of syncopation, and the performance of its capricious and tricksy effects was masterly.

The finale showed our orchestra at its ante-vacation standard, and strings, flutes, horns, all in turn demand ecstatic praise.

Another Russian brought up the rearguard; Tschaikowsky's "Italian Caprice" ended the concert. Tschaikowsky has had no more success than Richard Strauss in catching up the Italian mode of expression. Although he has endeavored to become intensely, even brutally, Italian in his themes, the impression left is that of a foreigner speaking an alien tongue with the utmost care, precision and clearness, yet failing to convince the auditor that he was born to the language.

This is more than a mere matter of themes; Strauss took the most rollicking of Neapolitan themes, "Funicolo-Funicola," and managed to present it as if it had been composed in a German conservatory; Tschaikowsky revels it Italian themes from street ditties to Tarantellas yet only inflates them into (must we say it?) vulgarity.

Now the melodies of some of the Italian cities sound cheap the moment that they are magnified or intensified beyond what they were intended to be, but let "Santa Lucia" (or even "Funicoli") be tossed off with its appropriate surroundings, with its due simplicity, its unpretentious directness, and it straightway acquires the power of the folk-song, and no one dreams of demanding its passport before admitting it into the realms of true music. It is not so when simple and delightful melodies cross the frontier with Saratoga trunks in the shape of trombones, piccolo, glockenspiel, bass tuba, and other "impedimenta" too numerous to catalogue.

The work became a study in orchestration, the Pifferrari effects being imitated in the course of its measures, quite successfully. The orchestra gave it with all due attention to its details, the trumpets and other brasses blowing to the point of bursting, oboe and flute having much brilliant work to do, as is often the case in the orchestral works of this Russian tone-colorist. But at the end of it all one feels that the voice is Jacob's voice, but the hands are the hands of Esau. The themes are Italian but the treatment is Tschaikowsky.

Louis C. Elson.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, OCT. 24, 1897.

Second Symphony Concert.

Mr Paur presented three novelties at last week's symphony concerts, the overture on themes of the Russian church, by Nicolai Rimsky-Korsakoff; Gernsheim's violin concerto in D major, and an Italian capriccio, by Tchaikovsky. The program was completed by Schumann's first symphony. Mr P. Schnitzler was the violin soloist. The Russian overture, although ecclesiastic in motif, is more strongly suggestive of a military anthem than one of a religious character. The simplicity of the introduction is quickly lost in the full and extended development of the orchestration, which is prolific in highly colored passage work and forte effects, introducing the whole band, the brass contingent being specially prominent.

The composer has utilized the harp in a peculiar way at times, a series of sweeping runs forming a background for the flute or clarinet. A trombone recitative accompanied by the heavier string section is also another odd combination, although its effectiveness is not to be denied. The work of the brasses was admirable throughout, notably so in the tumultuous apotheosis which was given with grand effect, and the theme, the second one, allotted to the violins and violas, was exquisitely brought out. The composition, as a whole, appeared to be of a martial type of rejoicing, rather than in the spirit in which church music is understood in this country.

Mr Schnitzler played the solo violin part of the Gernsheim concerto in a conscientious manner, although in some of the higher passage phrases his fingering was faulty and his tones not true to the pitch. The cadenza of the first movement was generally good. The second movement was given with commendable breadth of tone and the elaborations were smoothly shown. The slow tempo of this movement evidently deprives it of interest for the average auditor, the finale, or more rapid part of the concerto, eliciting the greater applause. The key is constantly changing in this portion of the work, and the soloist and orchestra performed these difficult demands without a perceptible break. Mr Schnitzler was warmly applauded for his performance.

Tchaikovsky's Italian capriccio is a characteristic composition filled with musical surprises and strange harmonic combinations. Fantastic to a high degree it is, but it lacks the buoyancy and jollity which one naturally associates with a festivity of an Italian character and as a "tone picture" it does not typify the land of the lazzaroni or his merrymaking. There was a strange rhythmic accompaniment of four notes given to the heavy strings which ran nearly through the whole piece, accentuating the peculiarities of the curious orchestration, and several of the developments were worked out in the oddest fashion by this composer who revels in strange musical combinations. It is sufficient to say that the orchestra performed its work skilfully and evidently in the spirit of the Russian writer.

Schumann's grand first symphony, magnificently interpreted by the orchestra, was the most enjoyable of the four numbers on the program. Perhaps special mention is deserved by the violins for the charming rendering of the romanza in the second part and the dance theme of the finale, but the whole performance was of the highest order, and general praise is due, rather than any commendation for special work.

This week's program will be as follows: Symphonic poem, "Also Spracht Zarathustra," Richard Strauss; aria, "La Pere du Bresil," F. David; symphony No. 3, Brahms; recitative and aria, "Non Parentar," from "The Magic Flute," Mozart; "Invitation to the Dance," Weber, arranged for orchestra by Felix Weingartner. Mrs Marion Titus will be the soloist.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.
SUNDAY MORNING, OCTOBER 24, 1897.
(Copyright, 1897, Post Publishing Co.)

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

At the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall, three compositions new to the musical public of this city were performed. These were Rimsky Korsakoff's overture, "The Russian Easter," Op. 36; concerto for violin in D major, Op. 42, of Frederick Gernsheim, and the "Italian Capriccio," for orchestra, Op. 45, of Tschaikowsky. These, together with Schumann's first symphony in B flat major, constituted the programme. Mr. Isadore Schnitzler was the soloist. The overture by Rimsky Korsakoff was composed in 1888, and is built up on themes of the Russian church. Its general character is ecclesiastical, though the Russian idea of church music is not much like ours. In many ways it suggests his "Symphonic Suite," played here last spring, as the instrumentation is very highly colored at times, in the manner noticeable in the former work.

It is quite effective all through, and, like the "Symphonic Suite," should be heard several times to understand fully.

This caprice is fanciful, like much that Tschaikowsky has written. Commencing with a slow introduction, there is a fine development of themes leading to the allegro moderato. This last is followed by a rushing saltarello, worked up with immense vivacity, ending with a prestissimo—a quiet eect. The Gernsheim concerto for violin, although heard at this concert for the first time here, was originally produced as far back as 1857. The composer is still living, in Berlin, and is a well-known pianist, as well as a composer. There was a symphony of his played at these concerts some years ago, and the Apollo Club has sung his "Salamis" several times. His other works are still unknown here. His violin concerto seems to be a highly interesting composition, and should be heard again. The solo playing of Mr. Schnitzler was in the highest degree artistic, and fully merited the numerous recalls that he received at the close of his performance. Schumann's Symphony in B flat is admired by many more than any of his others, and it has always been a success since its first performance in 1841. It is in truth a glorious symphony every way. The orchestra played it as near perfection as could well be, and in the Italian Caprice better ensemble could hardly be imagined. The accompaniment in the concerto was also very effective.

For the net concert, a symphonic poem by Richard Strauss is promised, also Brahm's third symphony and the "Invitation to the Dance" of Weber—Weingartner's arrangement. Mrs. Marian Titus will be the soloist in arias by Mozart and F. David.

Gazette
ESTABLISHED 1813.
BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, OCT. 24.

Symphony Concert.

The second concert of the Symphony Orchestra was given in Music Hall last night. The programme was:

Overture, Oster Fest, op. 36..Rimsky-Korsakoff
(First time.)
Concerto for violin..................Gernsheim
(First time.)
Symphony No. 1.....................Schumann
Italian Caprice, op. 45..........Tschaikowsky
Soloist, Mr. I. Schnitzler.
(First time.)

The overture is an interesting and characteristic work, but it dwells on one theme with a persistence that leads to monotony, and the ornamentation is overweighty and developed in a spirit that is opposed to the simplicity and deep fervor of the theme. There is overmuch noise in place of real passion and a brilliancy that results from a large volume of sound, intelligently produced and directed. The work is wild and impressive, but not convincing.

The concerto is refined, graceful and musicianly; artistic in taste and charming in development. but the tone color is pitched too low, and is maintained for too long a time. The different movements merge into one another without contrast; hardly without change of idea, and with unvarying sameness of hue. The ideas are prettily conceived, but they are not large, and a shepherd might have piped them monotonously through a long, misty midsummer day. The impression produced by the work is that of undue length and monotony of color. It was played with rare taste by Mr. Schnitzler with largeness of style and of tone, with unaffected feeling and sincerity, and with faultless technique; in a word, it was the interpretation of an artist.

The Tschaikowsky Caprice is a charming work, bright, genial and hearty, rich in color, brilliant in treatment and dashed in with the boldest, most daring and most sure hand—the hand of a master. There is no trouble in following the ideas of this master, even in his wildest moments, and he is always impressive. The caprice is as characteristic as are this master's larger and more important works; it is genial, vivacious and sparkling; a toy, perhaps, but dazzling as a multitude of small jewels, flashing in the sunlight.

The work of the orchestra was unexceptionable, and Mr. Paur was in his happiest mood in his interpretation of the Schumann symphony.

The programme for the third concert is: Richard Strauss, Symphonic Poem, "Also Sprach Zarathustra;" F. David, aria, "La Perle du Bresil;" Brahms, Symphony No. 3; Mozart, recitative and aria, "Non Paventar," from "The Magic Flute;" Weber, "Invitation to the Dance," arranged for orchestra by Felix Weingartner. Soloist, Mrs. Marian Titus.

SUNDAY TELEGRAM,
PROVIDENCE, OCTOBER 24

Tomorrow morning at 9 o'clock, at Infantry hall, the season tickets for the 16th season of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Providence will be offered for sale. Cambridge, Mass., and Providence are the only two cities in this country which have been visited by the orchestra every season but one since its founding in 1881. The personnel of the orchestra will be practically unchanged, and the same high standard of performance will be maintained. The attendance has increased each year and it is a matter of great pride with this organization that hundreds of its patrons have attended the concerts from the beginning. The announcement that the concerts will be increased from six to eight has given very general satisfaction.

The largest auction sales in Boston in the past five years, another most phenomenal sale in Philadelphia, a marked increase in the season ticket sale in New York, all point to one of the most successful seasons ever known in the history of the orchestra.

Notwithstanding the fact that a great many of the patrons of these concerts have grown to regard the orchestra as the attraction, rather than the soloist, still in deference to a great variety of tastes, a most excellent list of solo artists has been engaged, including for vocalists Mme. Gadski, Mme. Lillian Blauvelt, and Miss Gertrude May Stein; for pianists, Mr. Rafael Joseffy, Mr. Siloti and Mr. George Proctor; and for instrumentalists, Mr. I. Schnitzler, violinist, and Mr. Alwin Schroeder, violincellist, the last two being members of the orchestra.

Conductor Paur has prepared a very attractive series of programs, which will be announced in due time. The price of the season tickets for the eight concerts (which will, as usual, be held on Wednesday evenings) has been fixed at $7, which is almost exactly the same rate as has been charged in the past for six concerts. Present indications point to one of the most successful seasons ever known in Providence.

Boston Journal.
THURSDAY, OCTOBER 28, 1897.

MUSIC NOTES.

The first of the Boston Symphony concerts in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, will be given this evening. The program will include: Brahms's Tragic Overture, Aria from "Pearl of Brazil," Beethoven's 7th Symphony, recitative and aria "Non parentar" from "Magic Flute," Chabrier's Rhapsody "Espana." Mrs. Marian Titus will be the singer.

The program of the Symphony rehearsal and concert in Music Hall Friday and Saturday will be as follows: "Also spracht Zarathustra," R. Strauss; Aria from "Pearl of Brazil"; Brahms's Symphony No. 3; recitative and aria "Non parentar," from "Magic Flute"; "Invitation to the Dance," Weber-Weingartner. Mrs. Titus will be the singer.

THE BOSTON TIMES
BOSTON, SUNDAY, OCT. 24, 1897.

Mr. I. Schnitzler was the soloist at last week's rehearsal and concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra. The programme was:

"The Russian Easter," overture on themes of the Russian church, op. 36 (first time in Boston)...... ....Nicolai Rimsky-Korsakoff
Concerto for violin, in D-major, op. 42 (first time in Boston) ....Friedrich Gernsheim
Symphony No. 1, in B-flat major, op. 38......................Robert Schumann
Italian Capriccio, for orchestra, op. 45 (first time in Boston) ..Peter Tchaikovsky

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Symphony concerts are well under way, and as popular as ever.

The third rehearsal and concert will take place next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Mrs. Marian Titus will be the soloist and the programme will be:

Symphonic Poem, "Also spracht Zarathustra" ....Richard Strauss
Aria, "La Perle du Bresil"............F. David
Symphony No. 3 ....Brahms
Recitative and Aria, "Non parenta" from.. "The Magic Flute"..................Mozart
"Invitation to the Dance"...................Weber
(Arranged for orchestra by Felix Weingartner.)

The Boston Traveler
PUBLISHED BY THE
BOSTON TRAVELER CO.,
TORREY E. WARDNER, President
MONDAY, OCTOBER 25, 1897.

THE SYMPHONY.

A New Work by Rimsky-Korsakoff. Mr. Schnitzler as the Soloist.

Seventeenth season Boston Symphony Orchestra; second concert. Mr. Isadore Schnitzler, soloist. The programme:

"La Grande Paque Russe".. .... Rimsky-Korsakoff
Concerto for violin in D major....... Gernsheim
Symphony No. 1, B-flat major..Schumann
Capriccio Italien.... ....Tchaikowsky

There were two Russians on the programme of the second concert, each a powerful representative of his school. The difference between Rimsky-Korsakoff and Tschaikowsky was accentuated by the fact that the selection from the former is essentially Slavonic even in its meaning and application, while in the "Italian" caprice Tschaikowsky deliberately went to the weakest of all sources for inspiration. The "Easter Festival" overture that opened the programme has about as little meaning to us as a composition with "Duke Street" as its theme would have in St. Petersburg. Judging it as absolute music, we find a series of stern ecclesiastical themes, ornately orchestrated and having moments of great grandeur and impressiveness. But it is long-winded, turgid and verbose. Its only value to a Boston audience is as an object lesson.

The Tschaikowsky caprice, spite of the frank commonplaceness of its melodic material, is much more interesting and enjoyable. The composer said to himself: "I will go to Italy for my tunes, but I will show the Italian gentlemen what can be done with them." And he gives us fine and strong treatment of the sugary themes, orchestration of brilliancy and warmth, and a characteristic richness of harmonic detail that excuse certain faults of taste. The piece was played with admirable fire and beauty.

Mr. Schnitzler played the Gernsheim concerto with ability; it was not worthy of him or his efforts, however, for a tamer, more smugly-respectable, watery-tuneful work for the violin has not been heard here for many a day. Mr. Schnitzler lent to it the advantages of a pure tone and an admirable expressiveness, but he could not make it a thing of interest.

The splendid Schumann symphony in B flat went with stirring brilliancy through and through. Mr. Paur is especially happy in his readings of this master. The finale was a marvel of ebullient joy and the delight of life.

The programme for this week is: Richard Strauss, symphonic poem, "Also Spracht Zarathustra"; F. David, aria, "La Perle du Bresil"; Brahms' symphony No. 3; Mozart, recitative and aria, "Non parentar," from "The Magic Flute"; Weber, "Invitation to the Dance," arranged for orchestra by Weingartner. Mrs. Titus will be the singer.

W. D. QUINT.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 27, 1897.

The program of the Second Symphony Concert (October 23) was as follows:

La Grande Pâque Russe. Overture on Themes of the Russian Church, op. 36..........Rimsky-Korsakoff
(First time in Boston.)
Concerto for violin, in D major, op. 42..........Gernsheim
(First time in Boston)
Symphony No. 1, in B flat major..........Schumann
Capriccio Italien for orchestra, op. 45..........Tschaikowsky
(First time in Boston.)

Mr. Schnitzler was the solo violinist—a fiddler of many excellent parts, although I have heard him play better than he played last night. But oh, the dreary concerto! For the life of me I do not see how he memorized it; for one theme sounds like another, and not one is recognizable ten minutes after it has left the stage.

The first thing by Gernsheim I ever heard was his "Salamis" for male voices. Indeed, I once conducted it—for I, too, have been in Arcadia, and I, too, have read withering criticism the morning after a performance. Shake, Mr. Lang! Touchez-la! as our Canadian friends say—or should say. This is a small, a petty world; so let each one of us mind the business of all the rest.

Perhaps you remember "Salamis"—"Crown ye the vessel with Persia's proud gold!" &c., not to mention this delightfully singable line: "For the rout and the ruin of Hellas' fierce foes." Then there is a baritone solo in it—tranquillo—with an upward leap of a tenth, and the poor devil of a conductor stands there perspiring and wondering whether Mr. Jones will get the high F. Speaking of baritones, I came across a note to-day—a note of warning to such men as Hans Breur, et al., who climb from baritone to tenor, following the illustrious example of Baron de Reszké—or is it now Prince Jean? "Johann Aloys Mieksch (1765—1845) was a celebrated singer and teacher who spent the greater part of his life in Dresden. When young he attempted to change his voice from baritone to tenor. The experiment brought on inflammation of the lungs, and he nearly died." But let us wander back to Gernsheim's concerto. It was written, I believe, in Rotterdam, or possibly it was finished in Rotterdam. You know what an important part the canal plays in Maeterlinck's recipe for "A New Shudder." He prefers it to a procession of nuns, a hospital with sick folk looking out of the windows, a dead swan, or the song of departing sailors. I think this concerto must have been inspired by the sight of, and by familiarity, acquaintanceship with a canal.

I gaze upon a city—a city new and strange;
Down many a watery vista my fancy takes a range;
Tum tum ti-ti-ti-tumty; tum, di-di do-di-gam;
Row dow-di-dow di-dowdy; am I at Rotterdam!

And this is more than I remember of the Gernsheim concerto for violin with orchestra, op. 42.

* * *

To me—and I think to many—the overture by Rimsky-Korsakoff was a disappointment. Has it ever been played in New York? If so, when?

The first performance I find noted was that at a Popular Concert in Brussels in the spring of 1890, when the composer conducted; from manuscript, the reviewer stated at the time. It must have been played before that in Russia. It was written in memory of Alexander Borodin and Modeste Moussorgski, who were very dear to Rimsky-Korsakoff. Borodin died in 1887, suddenly, at a social gathering. Moussorgski died in the Nicolas military hospital in 1881, at the age of forty-two years. And now I should like to digress for two or three pages concerning Moussorgski, whose music, alas, is known to so very few in this country; but it is more decent to wait until Mr. Huneker is through with Tschaikowsky. One Russian at a time!

Should you not like to hear Rimsky-Korsakoff's—what a name! it suggests fierce whiskers stained with vodka!—orchestration of Moussorgski's intermezzo, which exists also in the composer's orchestral as well as piano version. In the winter of 1861, on his mother's land, Moussorgski saw serfs crossing, through the snow, a feast day with bright sun. They stumbled and fell and again ploughed their way. But in a path walked gaily young girls, singing and laughing. Thus was the intermezzo suggested.

Moussorgski and Rimsky-Korsakoff were room-mates in 1870. They worked in the same chamber, they worked at the same time. In many ways while Moussorgski was alive and after his death his friend showed his devotion.

This overture has a program. "Let God arise, let His enemies be scattered," &c., from Psalm LXVIII., in the King James Bible. Then the verses from Mark, beginning "And when the Sabbath was past," and then these sentences: "And the joyful tidings were spread abroad all over the world, and they who hated Him fled before Him, vanishing like smoke.

"'Resurrexit!' sing the choirs of Angels in heaven, to the sound of the Archangels' trumpets and the fluttering of the wings of the Seraphim. 'Resurrexit!' sing the priests in the temples, in the midst of clouds of incense, by the light of innumerable candles, to the chiming of triumphant bells."

The orchestra includes bass-tuba, three kettledrums, glockenspiel, triangle, cymbals, bass drum, gong, harp. The composer indicates the number of strings: First violins, 20-12; second violins, 18-10; violas, 14-8; 'celli, 12-8; double basses, 10-6.

This overture is built on ecclesiastical melodies that are fraught with poignant association to the faithful. To us foreigners they are without special significance. They are simply tunes of sombre dignity. Without this personal recognition the piece appears singular rather than truly and musically effective, and much of the development seems labored. The piece was a piece d'occasion in a certain sense, and however loyal the composer was to the memory of his friends he has written music of higher flight and more universal interest.

* * *

Nor should there be regret here because Tschaikowsky's caprice was not played at an earlier date. There are passages that are needlessly and ineffectively vulgar; not with the vulgarity of a great, all-embracing nature, but with a cheap flavor that makes one remember regretfully the true and the great Tschaikowsky.

* * *

So, too, the genius Schumann is the composer of certain piano pieces, certain songs, the D minor concerto, not the maker of the B flat major symphony, which might well be put on the shelf for a time.

* * *

The first of the Harvard University chamber concerts was given by the Kneisel Quartet in Sanders' Theatre the 19th. The program includes Haydn's quartet, op. 76, in G major; Mozart's C major quartet, and Beethoven's E flat major quartet, op. 74. These masterpieces of their kind were played of course with exquisite quality of tone and rare musical intelligence.

* * *

Smith and De Koven's "Highwayman" will be produced in Boston the 25th.

PHILIP HALE.

THE BOSTON

SATURDAY EVENING Gazette

ESTABLISHED 1813.

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, OCT. 31.

The Symphony Concert.

The Symphony Orchestra gave its third concert of the season last night in Music Hall. The programme was:

Symphony No. 3, F major, op. 90..........Brahms
Recitative and aria from "The Magic Flute"..........Mozart
Symphonic poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," op. 30..........Richard Strauss
Bird Song from "La Perle du Bresil"..........David
Invitation to the Dance..........Weber
(Orchestrated by Felix Weingartner.)
Soloist, Mrs. Marian Titus.

Interest naturally centered in the Strauss work, which was heard for the first time in Boston, and it produced an effect that it is not easy to forget. Just what the composer intended aside from displaying his wonderful skill in orchestration, it is difficult to say, even with the inspired Nietzsche as a guide. At first one is tempted to believe that Strauss intended a huge joke in the ponderous German manner, gathered together fragments from Liszt, Bellini, Beethoven, Mozart and Wagner, and wove them together with the richest and noisiest orchestration. But, in the first place a joke of this kind is too costly, and in the next place it is only just to Strauss to believe that he woul dnot punish his audience unless he were in his most serious mood.

To work out his ideas the composer has used all known species of instruments except the mouth organ and the xylophone, and the mass of sound that he produces is overwhelming. It is impossible not to be affected by the huge billowy waves of sound that sweep down on the ear and temporarily deafen it. The effect can hardly be called aesthetic, for it is produced by the number of instruments employed, the victory is won by the largeness of the army and not by the strategy of the general. The genius of Strauss is merciless; it possesses huge lungs and stands close to one's ear and bellows. On the art side it may be noted that a climax is never reached, for it is anticipated at the start. When a man is awakened by an entire city tumbling about his ears, the blowing up of a single building by nitroglycerine passes unnoticed. So after the first tremendous shock to the nerves one is prepared to note the poverty of the composer's ideas, his triviality when he attempts to invent a melody, of which defect the cheap vulgar waltz theme is an example, and the debt that he owes to other composers. Another objection might be urged, and that is, the poem is deficient in "values;" the color is laid on with a prodigal hand, the high flights are dazzling, the shadows are of the blackest, but there are no subtle intermediate tones leading from the one to the other. The effect is produced by the abruptest contrast, by opposing piannissimo to fortissimo effects, the faintest whisper followed by the loudest and shrillest shriek. The composer plays the part of the howling dervish, he whirls madly about until he becomes hysterical, and then he bellows. And yet there are logicalness and sequence of ideas, such as they are, and the rarest knowledge of orchestral effect, which is always masterful, but not always judiciously used, as when, for example it swamps the violin solo, and masks the themes generally. To make the lion roar when the nightingale is singing may show skill, but it is not wisdom. That some of the weak thin themes lose nothing by being hidden beneath the richest ornamentation is, perhaps not a thing of which to complain, except on principle. The work was faultlessly read and played, and it is worth hearing. It is a strong, but not a vital work, for it says nothing new, and wins its way by the strength of sound and not by strength of imagination or of ideas.

The programme for the fourth concert includes a Haydn symphony, Beethoven's "Leonore, No. 2" overture, four movements from Serenade No. 7 of Mozart, and a Schumann overture, scherzo, and finale. Mr. Franz Kneisel will be the soloist.

A curious blunder may be here mentioned. In his programme book Mr. Apthorp writes: "The name Zarathustra is of Nietzsche's invention; it is a fanciful variant of Zoroaster." Mr. Apthorp has imitated master Dogberry to perfection, but it is a pity that he should have written himself down in this way in a symphony programme. Both the assertions made in his brief line are incorrect, as every schoolboy knows.

MON[illegible] 25, 1897

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The second symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, brought the following programme:

Rimsky-Korsakoff: "La Grande Pâque Russe," Overture on themes from the Russian Church, opus 36.
(First time in Boston.)
Gernsheim: Concerto for Violin, in D major, opus 42.
(First time in Boston.)
Schumann: Symphony No. 1, in B-flat major, opus 38.
Tchaikovsky: Capriccio Italien, for Orchestra, opus 45.
(First time in Boston.)
Mr. Ignaz Schnitzler was the violinist.

Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture on liturgical cantus firmi of the Russian Church is a curious work; in it the greatest simplicity of plan goes hand in hand with a wondrous elaboration of quasi-ornamental details. Much of its impressiveness must be lost upon the un-Russian listener, who not only has no hallowing associations with the church tunes that constitute its thematic material, but is also unfamiliar with their musical idiom. And there can be little doubt that the composer relied upon the listener's associations with these melodies as an element of imputed impressiveness in his composition even more implicitly and, so to speak, ingenuously than is usual in such cases; for he has been apparently at small pains to invest his work with much specifically musical interest; the overture harps on these themes, progressively emphasizes and glorifies them rather than devolops them musically. To the American listener these old church tunes are neither beautiful nor impressive in themselves; their vague tonality may at times impart a certain character of impersonality and remoteness to them which is not without its poetic suggestiveness; but, as thematic material for an extended composition they seem weak and ineffectual. Moreover, there is a chance resemblance in one oft-recurring phrase to the familiar old "Au clair de la lune," which tends rather to provoke a smile. But, after eliminating the impressiveness that should come from old association, and the distinct musical appeal of the tunes to Russian ears, we find that the composer's glowing picturesqueness of treatment and the vigor of his enthusiasm still remain. The work is a vivid tone-picture of Easter rejoicing, full of gladsome shouting, ringing of bells, incense clouds and sunshine. The thing is carried through with unflagging energy of purpose; more radiant orchestral coloring we do not know. Even though it be but a half-understood message in a foreign tongue, we can catch its import and be uplifted by it. Save for one or two questionable interpretations of expression marks, the performance was superb.

The first movement of the Schumann symphony suffered from certain vagaries of rhythm and a general lack of vital accent; the Scherzo went tamely. But the slow movement and the finale went admirably well.

Tchaikovsky's Italian Capriccio, an early work of apparently no great importance, was given for the first time in Boston at this concert; but did we really hear it last Saturday evening? The present writer has his doubts. Tchaikovsky, notably in his younger days, had his faults galore, his strident wildnesses, trivialties, vulgarities, unkempt Cossack barbarisms; but he had dash and go, was not in the habit of leaving bare simplicity unhelped by sophistication when he felt that simplicity itself could hit the mark. That there is something of trivial vulgarity in this capriccio need not be denied; but the score seems overbrimming with life and dash, and the impression one gets from reading it is that the thing is really quite a devil of a piece. It is full of Italian vim, with now and then a touch of wild Slavic savagery. It was played with Prussian drill-sergeant accuracy, and made a dismal impression. We think it can be made to sound very differently; the painful goose-step has nothing to do with the saltarello.

Mr. Schnitzler played the Gernsheim concerto very beautifully, indeed. By the way, the statement in the programme books that he first played the work in Rotterdam "about 1857 or 1858" should be corrected to "about 1877 or 1878." No stretching of politeness can make the work worth playing at this late date; it has a respectable home-baked flavor, as of the work of a man of strict academic training, who wanted to show that he was above being bound hand and foot by school precedent, but had nothing unprecedented to say. It reminds one of his decent symphony. Ah! the sadness of these hand-me-downs that violinists exhibit to us from time to time. How eloquent they are of there being nothing else in the shop! They cannot compete with the old, threadbare articles at the second-hand dealer's around the corner. True, they are only shopworn and still have the nap on them; but, oh! the cut and the style! Of Mr. Schnitzler's playing, however, one can speak with admiring emphasis; he played like a consummate violinist, with appealing beauty of tone, elegance of phrasing and nimble virtuosity. He was applauded as he deserved.

And now one faint, ineffectual wail about the astonishing programme. Three novelties to one familiar work; five new movements to four well-known ones! What living biped can enjoy such a concert?

The next programme is: Richard Strauss, symphonic poem, "Also sprach Zarathustra" (first time); Félicien David, aria from "La Perle du Brésil"; Brahms's symphony, No. 3, in F major, opus 90; Mozart, recitative and aria, "Non Paventar," from "Il Flauto Magico"; Weber, "Aufforderung zum Tanz," opus 86, scored by Weingartner. Mrs. Marion Titus will be the singer.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 27, 1897.

The program of the Second Symphony Concert (October 23) was as follows:

La Grande Pâque Russe. Overture on Themes of the Russian Church, op. 36............................Rimsky-Korsakoff
(First time in Boston.)
Concerto for violin, in D major, op. 42......................Gernsheim
(First time in Boston)
Symphony No. 1, in B flat major............................Schumann
Capriccio Italien for orchestra, op. 45.................Tschaikowsky
(First time in Boston.)

Mr. Schnitzler was the solo violinist—a fiddler of many excellent parts, although I have heard him play better than he played last night. But oh, the dreary concerto! For the life of me I do not see how he memorized it; for one theme sounds like another, and not one is recognizable ten minutes after it has left the stage.

The first thing by Gernsheim I ever heard was his "Salamis" for male voices. Indeed, I once conducted it—for I, too, have been in Arcadia, and I, too, have read withering criticism the morning after a performance. Shake, Mr. Lang! Touchez-la! as our Canadian friends say—or should say. This is a small, a petty world; so let each one of us mind the business of all the rest.

Perhaps you remember "Salamis"—"Crown ye the vessel with Persia's proud gold!" &c., not to mention this delightfully singable line: "For the rout and the ruin of Hellas' fierce foes." Then there is a baritone solo in it—tranquillo—with an upward leap of a tenth, and the poor devil of a conductor stands there perspiring and wondering whether Mr. Jones will get the high F. Speaking of baritones, I came across a note to-day—a note of warning to such men as Hans Breur, et al., who climb from baritone to tenor, following the illustrious example of Baron de Reszké—or is it now Prince Jean? "Johann Aloys Mieksch (1765—1845) was a celebrated singer and teacher who spent the greater part of his life in Dresden. When young he attempted to change his voice from baritone to tenor. The experiment brought on inflammation of the lungs, and he nearly died." But let us wander back to Gernsheim's concerto. It was written, I believe, in Rotterdam, or possibly it was finished in Rotterdam. You know what an important part the canal plays in Maeterlinck's recipe for "A New Shudder." He prefers it to a procession of nuns, a hospital with sick folk looking out of the windows, a dead swan, or the song of departing sailors. I think this concerto must have been inspired by the sight of, and by familiarity, acquaintanceship with a canal.

I gaze upon a city—a city new and strange;
Down many a watery vista my fancy takes a range;
Tum tum ti-ti-ti-tumty; tum, di-di do-di-gam;
Row dow-di-dow di-dowdy; am I at Rotterdam!

And this is more than I remember of the Gernsheim concerto for violin with orchestra, op. 42.

* * *

To me—and I think to many—the overture by Rimsky-Korsakoff was a disappointment. Has it ever been played in New York? If so, when?

The first performance I find noted was that at a Popular Concert in Brussels in the spring of 1890, when the composer conducted from manuscript, the reviewer stated at the time. It must have been played before that in Russia. It was written in memory of Alexander Borodin and Modeste Moussorgski, who were very dear to Rimsky-Korsakoff. Borodin died in 1887, suddenly, at a social gathering. Moussorgski died in the Nicolas military hospital in 1881, at the age of forty-two years. And now I should like to digress for two or three pages concerning Moussorgski, whose music, alas, is known to so very few in this country; but it is more decent to wait until Mr. Huneker is through with Tschaikowsky. One Russian at a time!

Should you not like to hear Rimsky-Korsakoff's—what a name! it suggests fierce whiskers stained with vodka!—orchestration of Moussorgski's intermezzo, which exists also in the composer's orchestral as well as piano version. In the winter of 1861, on his mother's land, Moussorgski saw serfs crossing, through the snow, a feast day with bright sun. They stumbled and fell and again ploughed their way. But in a path walked gaily young girls, singing and laughing. Thus was the intermezzo suggested.

Moussorgski and Rimsky-Korsakoff were room-mates in 1870. They worked in the same chamber, they worked at the same time. In many ways while Moussorgski was alive and after his death his friend showed his devotion.

This overture has a program. "Let God arise, let His enemies be scattered," &c., from Psalm LXVIII., in the King James Bible. Then the verses from Mark, beginning "And when the Sabbath was past," and then these sentences: "And the joyful tidings were spread abroad all over the world, and they who hated Him fled before Him, vanishing like smoke.

"'Resurrexit!' sing the choirs of Angels in heaven, to the sound of the Archangels' trumpets and the fluttering of the wings of the Seraphim. 'Resurrexit!' sing the priests in the temples, in the midst of clouds of incense, by the light of innumerable candles, to the chiming of triumphant bells."

The orchestra includes bass-tuba, three kettledrums, glockenspiel, triangle, cymbals, bass drum, gong, harp. The composer indicates the number of strings: First violins, 20-12; second violins, 18-10; violas, 14-8; 'celli, 12-8; double basses, 10-6.

This overture is built on ecclesiastical melodies that are fraught with poignant association to the faithful. To us foreigners they are without special significance. They are simply tunes of sombre dignity. Without this personal recognition the piece appears singular rather than truly and musically effective, and much of the development seems labored. The piece was a piece d'occasion in a certain sense, and however loyal the composer was to the memory of his friends he has written music of higher flight and more universal interest.

* * *

Nor should there be regret here because Tschaikowsky's caprice was not played at an earlier date. There are passages that are needlessly and ineffectively vulgar; not with the vulgarity of a great, all-embracing nature, but with a cheap flavor that makes one remember regretfully the true and the great Tschaikowsky.

* * *

So, too, the genius Schumann is the composer of certain piano pieces, certain songs, the D minor concerto, not the maker of the B flat major symphony, which might well be put on the shelf for a time.

* * *

The first of the Harvard University chamber concerts was given by the Kneisel Quartet in Sanders' Theatre the 19th. The program includes Haydn's quartet, op. 76, in G major; Mozart's C major quartet, and Beethoven's E flat major quartet, op. 74. These masterpieces of their kind were played of course with exquisite quality of tone and rare musical intelligence.

* * *

Smith and De Koven's "Highwayman" will be produced in Boston the 25th. PHILIP HALE.

THE BOSTON
SATURDAY EVENING Gazette
ESTABLISHED 1813.

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, OCT. 31.

The Symphony Concert.

The Symphony Orchestra gave its third concert of the season last night in Music Hall. The programme was:

Symphony No. 3, F major, op. 90.......Brahms
Recitative and aria from "The Magic Flute" ....Mozart
Symphonic poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," op. 30 ....Richard Strauss
Bird Song from "La Perle du Bresil".....David
Invitation to the Dance ....Weber
(Orchestrated by Felix Weingartner.)
Soloist, Mrs. Marian Titus.

Interest naturally centered in the Strauss work, which was heard for the first time in Boston, and it produced an effect that it is not easy to forget. Just what the composer intended aside from displaying his wonderful skill in orchestration, it is difficult to say, even with the inspired Nietzsche as a guide. At first one is tempted to believe that Strauss intended a huge joke in the ponderous German manner, gathered together fragments from Liszt, Bellini, Beethoven, Mozart and Wagner, and wove them together with the richest and noisiest orchestration. But, in the first place a joke of this kind is too costly, and in the next place it is only just to Strauss to believe that he woul dnot punish his audience unless he were in his most serious mood.

To work out his ideas the composer has used all known species of instruments except the mouth organ and the xylophone, and the mass of sound that he produces is overwhelming. It is impossible not to be affected by the huge billowy waves of sound that sweep down on the ear and temporarily deafen it. The effect can hardly be called aesthetic, for it is produced by the number of instruments employed, the victory is won by the largeness of the army and not by the strategy of the general. The genius of Strauss is merciless; it possesses huge lungs and stands close to one's ear and bellows. On the art side it may be noted that a climax is never reached, for it is anticipated at the start. When a man is awakened by an entire city tumbling about his ears, the blowing up of a single building by nitroglycerine passes unnoticed. So after the first tremendous shock to the nerves one is prepared to note the poverty of the composer's ideas, his triviality when he attempts to invent a melody, of which defect the cheap vulgar waltz theme is an example, and the debt that he owes to other composers. Another objection might be urged, and that is, the poem is deficient in "values;" the color is laid on with a prodigal hand, the high flights are dazzling, the shadows are of the blackest, but there are no subtle intermediate tones leading from the one to the other. The effect is produced by the abruptest contrast, by opposing piannissimo to fortissimo effects, the faintest whisper followed by the loudest and shrillest shriek. The composer plays the part of the howling dervish, he whirls madly about until he becomes hysterical, and then he bellows. And yet there are logicalness and sequence of ideas, such as they are, and the rarest knowledge of orchestral effect, which is always masterful, but not always judiciously used, as when, for example it swamps the violin solo, and masks the themes generally. To make the lion roar when the nightingale is singing may show skill, but it is not wisdom. That some of the weak thin themes lose nothing by being hidden beneath the richest ornamentation is, perhaps not a thing of which to complain, except on principle. The work was faultlessly read and played, and it is worth hearing. It is a strong, but not a vital work, for it says nothing new, and wins its way by the strength of sound and not by strength of imagination or of ideas.

The programme for the fourth concert includes a Haydn symphony, Beethoven's "Leonore, No. 2" overture, four movements from Serenade No. 7 of Mozart, and a Schumann overture, scherzo, and finale. Mr. Franz Kneisel will be the soloist.

A curious blunder may be here mentioned. In his programme book Mr. Apthorp writes: "The name Zarathustra is of Nietzsche's invention; it is a fanciful variant of Zoroaster." Mr. Apthorp has imitated master Dogberry to perfection, but it is a pity that he should have written himself down in this way in a symphony programme. Both the assertions made in his brief line are incorrect, as every schoolboy knows.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, OCTOBER 25, 1897

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The second symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, brought the following programme:

Rimsky.Korsakoff: "La Grande Pâque Russe," Overture on themes from the Russian Church, opus 36.
(First time in Boston.)
Gernsheim: Concerto for Violin, in D major, opus 42.
(First time in Boston.)
Schumann: Symphony No. 1, in B-flat major, opus 38.
Tchaikovsky: Capriccio Italien, for Orchestra, opus 45.
(First time in Boston.)
Mr. Ignaz Schnitzler was the violinist.

Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture on liturgical cantus firmi of the Russian Church is a curious work; in it the greatest simplicity of plan goes hand in hand with a wondrous elaboration of quasi-ornamental details. Much of its impressiveness must be lost upon the un-Russian listener, who not only has no hallowing associations with the church tunes that constitute its thematic material, but is also unfamiliar with their musical idiom. And there can be little doubt that the composer relied upon the listener's associations with these melodies as an element of imputed impressiveness in his composition even more implicitly and, so to speak, ingenuously than is usual in such cases; for he has been apparently at small pains to invest his work with much specifically musical interest; the overture harps on these themes, progressively emphasizes and glorifies them rather than devolops them musically. To the American listener these old church tunes are neither beautiful nor impressive in themselves; their vague tonality may at times impart a certain character of impersonality and remoteness to them which is not without its poetic suggestiveness; but, as thematic material for an extended composition they seem weak and ineffectual. Moreover, there is a chance resemblance in one oft-recurring phrase to the familiar old "Au clair de la lune," which tends rather to provoke a smile. But, after eliminating the impressiveness that should come from old association, and the distinct musical appeal of the tunes to Russian ears, we find that the composer's glowing picturesqueness of treatment and the vigor of his enthusiasm still remain. The work is a vivid tone-picture of Easter rejoicing, full of gladsome shouting, ringing of bells, incense clouds and sunshine. The thing is carried through with unflagging energy of purpose; more radiant orchestral coloring we do not know. Even though it be but a half-understood message in a foreign tongue, we can catch its import and be uplifted by it. Save for one or two questionable interpretations of expression marks, the performance was superb.

The first movement of the Schumann symphony suffered from certain vagaries of rhythm and a general lack of vital accent; the Scherzo went tamely. But the slow movement and the finale went admirably well.

Tchaikovsky's Italian Capriccio, an early work of apparently no great importance, was given for the first time in Boston at this concert; but did we really hear it last Saturday evening? The present writer has his doubts. Tchaikovsky, notably in his younger days, had his faults galore, his strident wildnesses, trivialties, vulgarities, unkempt Cossack barbarisms; but he had dash and go, was not in the habit of leaving bare simplicity unhelped by sophistication when he felt that simplicity itself could hit the mark. That there is something of trivial vulgarity in this capriccio need not be denied; but the score seems overbrimming with life and dash, and the impression one gets from reading it is that the thing is really quite a devil of a piece. It is full of Italian vim, with now and then a touch of wild Slavic savagery. It was played with Prussian drill-sergeant accuracy, and made a dismal impression. We think it can be made to sound very differently; the painful goose-step has nothing to do with the saltarello.

Mr. Schnitzler played the Gernsheim concerto very beautifully, indeed. By the way, the statement in the programme books that he first played the work in Rotterdam "about 1857 or 1858" should be corrected to "about 1877 or 1878." No stretching of politeness can make the work worth playing at this late date; it has a respectable home-baked flavor, as of the work of a man of strict academic training, who wanted to show that he was above being bound hand and foot by school precedent, but had nothing unprecedented to say. It reminds one of his decent symphony. Ah! the sadness of these hand-me-downs that violinists exhibit to us from time to time. How eloquent they are of there being nothing else in the shop! They cannot compete with the old, threadbare articles at the second-hand dealer's around the corner. True, they are only shopworn and still have the nap on them; but, oh! the cut and the style! Of Mr. Schnitzler's playing, however, one can speak with admiring emphasis; he played like a consummate violinist, with appealing beauty of tone, elegance of phrasing and nimble virtuosity. He was applauded as he deserved.

And now one faint, ineffectual wail about the astonishing programme. Three novelties to one familiar work; five new movements to four well-known ones! What living biped can enjoy such a concert?

The next programme is: Richard Strauss, symphonic poem, "Also sprach Zarathustra" (first time); Félicien David, aria from "La Perle du Brésil"; Brahms's symphony, No. 3, in F major, opus 90; Mozart, recitative and aria, "Non Paventar," from "Il Flauto Magico"; Weber, "Aufforderung zum Tanz," opus 86, scored by Weingartner. Mrs. Marion Titus will be the singer.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, NOV. 1, 1897.

"Zarathustra" an Important New Work—Debut of Mrs. Titus.

The programme of Saturday was remarkable for vivid contrasts; it placed a work of most shapely symphonic style in juxtaposition with a modern musical hurricane, it presented the wildest orchestral roarings side by side with the most innocent French flute phrases.

The best came first, the concert beginning with Brahms' third symphony. When this symphony was first performed in Vienna, Hans Richter, in a toast given to honor the new work, called it "the Heroic Symphony," and certainly the first and last movements deserve the designation, for they are full of combat and contention, but the conflict of themes never draws the composer away from the domain of musical logic, no tempest of fury is strong enough to destroy the symmetrical architecture of his work.

Brahms in symphony, Robert Franz in song, teach us the lesson that the most fervent passion, expressed in tones, is yet compatible with absolute coherency.

Brahms gives us this lofty picture of antagonism without swelling his orchestra to an abnormal size, and the cultured auditor can watch the simple figures growing into mighty thoughts and can revel in that combination of intellectuality and emotion which is the best outcome of instrumental music as we understand it.

The slow movement of this work seems to us the least attractive of all the Brahms andantes. The slow movements of both the second and fourth symphonies are more perfect. The third movement is a serious one, more earnest than even the Schumann scherzos, and shows the necessity felt by this non-humorous composer, of replacing the "scherzo" with a more free "intermezzo" in which any mood might be represented.

The symphony was well played, although at times with an excess of vigor; possibly the athletic style of some of the ultra-modern compositions, which the orchestra has recently been indulging in, may have led to a slight loss of subtlety in more refined works; the palate accustomed to brandy or arrack must become insensible to the flavor of Chateau Yquem or Chambertin.

Ater the symphony Mrs. Marion Titus appeared in the "Infelice" aria from the "Magic Flute," a number only possible to the highest and most brilliant of sopranos. At first the voice seemed too light for the dramatic selection, and the "Magic Flute" dwindled into a magic piccolo, but this turned out to be only nervousness incidental to the commencement of a debut and the finale was brilliant enough, the runs, staccato passages in highest register, chromatic work, and every other kind of vocal fireworks arousing the large audience to much enthusiasm.

The second number given by the vocalist was yet more successful; it was David's "Charmant Oiseau," and coming after a frightfully portentous "Symphonic Poem" it was like David after Goliath. The number is one of those display works in which the voice enters into active competition with the flute (and the latter was finely played) imitating all the tasks set by the latter instrument.

Mrs. Titus sang this with much grace and sweetness, and at the end threw in a phenomenal high note. In Paris a few years ago Sybil Sanderson used to catch the multitude with a G in altissimo, which the French used to call her "Tour d'Eiffel" note; the public always takes these notes at a premium, and when Mrs. Titus followed the F in alt, which she had sung in the Mozart aria, with this amazing G, she was sure of many recalls, which were at once accorded her. She deserves praise for much good vocalism outside of this vocal ascent.

After Mrs. Titus's first number there came the most important and most disagreeable work of the concert; important because it presented the very acme of orchestral technique and difficulty, disagreeable because it showed a great composer, a genius, going in a false direction, lending his vast powers to push modern music still further into the brambles.

The chaos is entitled "Thus spake Zarathustra"—but Zarathustra shouted and whispered, mumbled and roared, did everything but speak; he had an impediment in his speech which caused him to stutter even the most beautiful sentences.

The work has difficulties which are almost beyond conception. To score such a noise, to manage such a colossal score, is in itself a Herculean task; if it were entitled "Advanced Studies in tone-coloring" one might accept it gladly as a series of scientific experiments with the modern orchestra, but we are asked to judge of it as music, as a philosophical tone-picture of the development and culmination of man a la Nietzsche. In olden times there was an idea that the test of a diamond was its ability to withstand the severest blows, wherefore the sapient investigators placed the diamond upon an anvil and generally managed to pulverize it with a sledgehammer; what with tubas and trumpets, cymbals, gong and bass drum, Richard Strauss has succeeded in splintering his gems quite thoroughly.

Not that there are so many diamonds either; one may take a great painting and divest it of all of its glow of color and there ought to remain, in plain black and white, something tangibly artistic in the shape of an etching; reduce "Thus spake Zarathustra" to a piano score and there will be almost no residuum.

Naturally a man who chooses such a thorny path of orchestration becomes morbid; Nietzsche's book on which the music is founded might also lead to this result; our Richard Strauss becomes somewhat of a Maeterlinck; he introduces weird groans and strange pauses which are intended to make our flesh creep, strange modulations that completely span the slight gap between the sublime and the ridiculous, progressions that would make the skeletons of Cherubini and Albrechtsberger dance a pas de deux.

At the end of the work there is a modulation from the key of B to the key of C that is unique, for the Gordian knot is cut by the simple process of going there and going back again. If such modulations are possible then the harmony books may as well be burnt at once.

Yet one must stand respectfully before some of the points of scoring; the opening passage, with its combination of organ with orchestra (St. Saens also used organ with orchestra in his third symphony) is most majestic; the bold uses of harmonics on the strings, the employment of piccolos in new effects, in short many of the instrumental touches, are to be carefully studied.

The Roman Coliseum was plundered for building material by the monks who despised the edifice and its uses; we fancy that Strauss's inventions (they are often nothing less) in the domain of scoring will reappear in the works of some who found nothing to admire in "Zarathustra."

One must cordially thank Mr. Paur and the orchestra for producing such a work. Composed only a year ago, Boston hears it before the European shouts of astonishment have died away. In the old days we should have waited ten or fifteen years before our first audition of the composition came along. Whether we like such a number or not we must hear it if we are to be abreast of modern orchestral thought. And the bristling difficulties were finely overcome; the work turns the orchestra into a gymnasium in which every performer has his athletic work to do, and all did their feats finely.

Yet "Zarathustra" must remain an "Abschreckendes Beispiel,"—a terrifying example; Strauss did better things, if not so dazzlingly colored, before he followed the Wagnerian will-o'-the-wisp. The "Wagner School" still remains Richard Wagner, and has besides, no business in the purely instrumental field. There was a time when Richard Strauss was under the influence of Brahms; he wrote good works then. We wish that Mr. Paur would rinse our ears with Strauss's Symphony in F minor.

The concert ended with Weingartner's commentary on Weber's "Invitation to the Dance," Weber made of this piano work a pleasant picture of a rather sentimental young man inviting a young lady to a turn in a most enticing waltz; Berlioz elevated the graphic work into the orchestral repertoire and caused a passionate violoncello to twirl with a languishing violin; Weingartner causes a very ponderous couple to whirl around in a circus tent.

There is more ingenuity than delicacy displayed in the arrangement of the dainty picture; themes are coupled together in unexpected ways and the work is magnified into something that was very far from Weber's thoughts. But one may acknowledge the skill displayed, and one may especially thank Mr. Weingartner for eliminating that awkward coda—where the young man comes back to take one more farewell of his partner—which always used to cause a few enthusiastic individuals to applaud ten measures before the end of the composition.

Louis C. Elson.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, OCT. 31, 1897.

Mrs Titus Sings at the Symphony Concert.

A Brahms symphony and a ponderous symphonic poem by Strauss were the rather too substantial instrumental features of last week's symphony concerts. Such massive and brain-taxing compositions as these would much better be presented on separate occasions. The audience listened with commendable attention, however, and bestowed well-merited applause upon the excellent playing by the orchestra. The program was as follows:

Symphony No. 3 in F major .... Johannes Brahms
Recitative, Non Paventar, and aria Infelice, from Il Flauto Magico .. .. Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart
Spmphonic poem, Thus Spake Zarathustra.. Richard Strauss
Bird song from La Perle du Bresil .... Felicien David Invitation to the Dance, op 65 .... Karl Maria von Weber

The No. 3 Brahms symphony is, perhaps, as generally interesting and intelligible to the average concert patron as is any of the more pretentious works by this composer. The symphony has been heard here several times, but never to better advantage than under Mr Paur's able direction. Especially brilliant was the orchestra's performance of the beautiful and impressive finale of the last movement.

The symphonic poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," is the latest work by Richard Strauss. The text is from the poem by Friedrich Nietzsche, which relates the German version of Zoroaster's downfall in the most graphic and picturesque manner imaginable. The innumerable opportunities offered by this text for the introduction of weird and tumultuous orchestral effects have not been neglected by Mr Strauss, who has brought to his aid the full resources of a modern orchestra. While the composition is undoubtedly possessed of many passages of remarkable power and great beauty, the scoring is so excessively elaborate that there are moments during its performance when the auditor is fairly dazed by the superabundance of rich coloring and dazzling ornamentation.

The appearance of Mrs Marian Titus as vocal soloist was very welcome. She was treated with great cordiality, and after her performance was recalled a dozen times or more. The enthusiasm awakened by her singing was thoroughly deserved, and there seems to be ample justification for the prediction which has been made regarding the brilliant future for this talented young Bostonian. Her voice is rather light, but greater power will no doubt come later. It is a voice of delightful quality, of extraordinary flexibility and remarkable range, and one that intelligent cultivation has brought under perfect control. The purity of her tones in the higher register was admirably shown in the "Magic Flute" aria. There are very few singers who are capable of singing this song in its original key, but Mrs Titus maintained the high pitch without apparent effort. The graceful ease with which she interpreted the showy bird song from "The Pearl of Brazil" also afforded evidence of her finished technique.

Boston Journal.
SUNDAY, OCTOBER 31, 1897.

THIRD SYMPHONY.

"Thus Spake Zarathustra," by R. Strauss.

Nietzsche, the Dionysian, Inspires Strange Music.

Mrs. Titus Sings Arias by Mozart and David.

The program of the third Symphony concert given last evening in Music Hall was as follows:

Symphony No. 3, in F major........Brahms
Recitative, "Non paventar," and Aria, "Infelice," from "Il Flauto Magico". Mozart
Symphonic Poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," Op. 30............Richard Strauss
(First time in Boston.)
"Charmant oiseau," from "La Perle du Brésil"................................ David
"Invitation to the Dance," Op. 65....Weber
Arranged for orchestra by Felix Weingartner.

And first a word about the program-book.

Mr. Apthorp says: "The name of Zarathustra is of Nietzsche's invention; it is a fanciful variant of Zoroaster."

And this statement appeared in Boston!

The word Zarathustra was known centuries before Nietzsche was born.

Zoroaster is the Greek form of the old Iranian Zarathushtra and the new Persian Zardusht—a word meaning, some say, "possessor of old camels."

⁂

The reader is led to believe from the sketch of Strauss that he is still living in Weimar. 'In 1889 went to Weimar as Court Kapellmeister with Eduard Lassen.' Not a word about his return to Munich, which took place in 1894. He has just refused a call to Hamburg. He is still first conductor of the Court at Munich at a salary of $3000 a year.

⁂

"Thus Spake Zarathustra" was begun Feb. 4, 1896, in Munich, and finished there Aug. 24 of the same year. It was first performed at Frankfort, Nov. 27, 1896. The composer conducted. He conducted it also at Cologne, Dec. 1. It was played in Berlin (under Mr. Nikisch), Nov. 30.

It was played twice in Chicago by Theodore Thomas's Orchestra the latter part of last season.

Now this Zarathustra is not the old sage who is said to have laughed the day he was born; he is Nietzsche himself. Strauss, abandoning Schopenhauer, found comfort in the strange book of Nietzsche, and the third act of his opera "Guntram" gives abundant proof of his study of the now insane philosopher.

Before the work had been performed, this program was published: First movement; Sunrise. Man feels the power of God. Andante religioso. But man still longs.

He plunges into passion (2d movement) and finds no peace. He turns toward science and tries vainly to solve life's problem in a fugue (3d movement). Then agreeable dance tunes sound; he becomes an individual, and his soul soars upward while the world sinks to the depths.

But Strauss himself gave this explanation to Mr. Otto Florsheim in Berlin: "I did not intend to write philosophical music, or to portray Nietzsche's great work musically. I meant to convey musically an idea of the development of the human race from its origin, through the various phases of development, religious as well as scientific, up to Nietzsche's idea of the Uebermensch. The whole symphonic poem is intended as my homage to the genius of Nietzsche, which found its greatest exemplification in his book, 'Thus Spake Zarathustra.'"

⁂

There are two ways of regarding this remarkable symphonic poem: One to consider it as program music, and judge it by the degree of force with which it expresses certain metaphysical ideas—to consider it as a "psychological rondo;" the other is to regard it as absolute music, as though there were no title, no motto. I belong to the party that believes there are no ideas in music except musical ideas. If you name an overture "Egmont," you may naturally try to find music characteristic of that hero's life; but if you should name the overture "Duke of Alva," could you not also find in the same music suggestions of the characteristics of that soldier and ruler, with the final exultation of a people victorious over him? In this music of Strauss, the final warring tonalities, B major and C major, may, according to the philosopher, represent the ascension of the ideal man and the sinking of the earth into the abyss; or you may say that the eternal riddle is thus left unsolved—but how far away all this is from music. Let me now record the impressions that follow a first hearing; and they are vague and almost timidly advanced after the only hearing of such an intricate and unusual work.

⁂

The opening is marvelously broad and impressive. The secret of its strength is simplicity. The introduction of the Gregorian "Credo" and "Magnificat" is effective, although in fact nearly all that comes after the opening with its organ pedal and rolling drums is more or less anti-climax. The section entitled "Von den Freuden und Leidenschaften" is full of interest, but I confess the fugue "Von der Wissenschaft" is to me as a mole in the ground. Nor does the orchestral brilliance of the sections "Der Genesende" and "Tanzliede" disguise the inherent vulgarity of themes and poverty of truly great ideas. But the "Nachtlied" has passages of rare beauty, and the finale, with its disquieting tonalities, is strong on account of its deliberate leaving the question unsolved.

This symphonic poem is a stupendous work, one that should be heard again, and soon. For surely if this music is madness it is the madness of a master. There is infinite color in detail; there is a giant's command of harmonic treatment and harmonic abuse. Whether the marshaling of all these instruments makes thereby the greater true effect is a question to which I am now unwilling to say "Yes" or "No." It surely aggravates apparent cacophony. To me at present the work is not as noble or beautiful music as the preceding "Death and Apotheosis" which was played last season.

[illegible] in [illegible] of the [illegible] Mr. [illegible] to be congratulated warmly on the intelligence, authority and sympathy with which he [illegible]. His task was evidently a labor of love and admiration.

⁂

Mrs. Marian Titus made her first appearance at these concerts. Her voice is of great compass, and it is of pure and agreeable quality. She sang the aria from David's opera delightfully. The recitative and the first part of the aria from "The Magic Flute" demand a broader, more dramatic voice; she sang them with intelligence and she displayed a firm and smooth legato; and in the bravura passages that follow she sang with more than ordinary accuracy and skill. Her colorature seemed natural and not deliberate or aggressive. The modesty of her bearing lent an additional charm to the exercise of her art.

⁂

When the Weingartner disarrangement of Weber's "Invitation to the Dance" was first played here, the joke was taken in good part. This particular joke, however, did not bear repetition. I am sorry that Mr. Paur thought otherwise.

Philip Hale.

CONCERTS.

The program of the Symphony rehearsal and concert in Music Hall, Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, will be as follows: Haydn, symphony ("The Bear"); Beethoven, overture, "Leonore," No. 2; Mozart, four movements from serenade No. 7 (Haffner); Schumann, overture, Scherzo and Finale.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.
SUNDAY MORNING, OCTOBER 31, 1897.
(Copyright, 1897, Post Publishing Co.)

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last evening in Music Hall. The orchestral selections included Brahms's third symphony in F major, Op. 90; symphonic poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," Op. 30, by Richard Strauss, and the "Invitation to the Dance" of C. M. von Weber, arranged for orchestra by Felix Weingartner. Mrs. Marion Titus was the soloist. She sang the recitative "Non Paventar" and aria "Infelice" from the "Magic Flute" of Mozart, also the "Bird Song" from Felicien David's opera, "The Pearl of Brazil."

Brahms's third symphony, which first appeared in 1884, seems to steadily grow in strength and understanding the more it is heard, and the performance was superb at every point. Brahms's works probably never have been given anywhere better than at our symphony concerts in Boston.

The new symphonic poem of Richard Strauss, given for the first time here, is another of those musical (?) monstrosities of which this composer has been turning out a large number the past few years.

It is at times noisy in the extreme, and is, generally speaking, an aimless, rambling sort of a work, as though the composer did not know at times "where he was at." About every instrument known to the modern orchestra is employed, an organ as well, and all sorts of devices in instrumentation are made use of.

One cannot help thinking of what use are such compositions to any musical person, whether it is heard once or many times.

The performance of the Weingartner arrangement of the "Invitation" was very fine indeed. It is a very clever arrangement, but whether he has improved upon Berlioz's arrangement is a question.

Mrs. Titus sang both her selections very acceptably. Her voice is of great range and flexibility and of pure quality of tone. She seems to be, however, a singer who will be more successful in brilliant bravura soprano parts than in compositions demanding a high degree of feeling for proper interpretation.

For next Saturday's concert, also for Friday afternoon, the programme will consist of a Haydn symphony, Beethoven's overture to "Leonore No. 2," four movements from Serenade No. 7 of Mozart, and Schumann's overture, scherzo, and finale. No soloist is announced.

THE BOSTON TIMES
BOSTON, SUNDAY, OCT. 31, 1897.

The programme of this week's Symphony concert and rehearsal will be: Symphony, Haydn; Overture, "Leonore No. 2," Beethoven; Four Movements from Serenade No. 7 (Haffner), violin obligato by Mr. Franz Kneisel, Mozart; Overture, Scherzo and Finale, Schumann.

The first of the Boston Symphony concerts in Sanders theatre, Cambridge, was given Thursday evening. The programme was: Brahms's Tragic Overture, Aria from "Pearl of Brazil." Beethonven's 7th Symphony, recitative and aria "Non parentar" from "Magic Flute," Chabrier's Rhapsody "Espana." Mrs. Marian Titus was the singer.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, OCT. 31, 1897.

Friedrich Nietzsche in his romantic novel about Zarathustra—as the old Parsee name for Zoroaster stands—represents that half mystical and half historical religious personage as wearying of his life of solitude and reflection and evolution of doctrine in the mountains. He comes forth at dawn and, addressing the sun, speaks of the human wishes which arise in his heart of forty years and his desire to be no longer a prophet and a priest, but a man once more. For this, he [illegible] must decline from his high estate, even as the sun descends from his zenith, and must pass to the unknown underworld—only not to return, as does the planet.

This brief address, eloquently and tersely put, might have taken a couple of minutes in delivery. But when Richard Strauss translated it into his symphonic poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," which Mr. Paur introduced as the novelty of his third programme, he needed about a half an hour, and an orchestra increased almost fantastically with an organ, a bell, and extra horns, flutes, oboes, harps and so on. In so far as his tremendous score can be understood, the composer has undertaken to present—in the opening recitatives of trumpets and trombones—the entrance of the prophet upon the scene and his first appeal to the great planet of day. Then he has apparently set about depicting those moods which possess man as he foreshadows what he may meet in the veiled future, reverences science, feels the gloom of the grave, grows back to healthy human life, longs for worldly delights, and finally loses himself in contemplation and silence. We may not have guessed the riddle aright; but such the explanation would seem to be in the light of what few hints Strauss has given.

The beginning promises well, being noble almost to majesty, broad, firm, and yet with some mystery in its slow, severe phrases, its deep notes and its solid organ-tones. But it soon rushes away into tumults which are nearly chaotic; into clamors as if a mob were shouting, and not a prophet speaking; into passages which out-Wagner Wagner himself, and into a multiplicity of devices and deviations which at last confuse and fatigue both ear and mind. There are in it many magnificent orchestral combinations, new and dazzling colorings and almost reckless boldness; but it gives more surprise than pleasure and excites nervously rather than arouses spiritually. It must be immensely difficult, and the performance was a glory to the virtuosity of the orchestra and to Mr. Paur's command and leadership.

The concert began with the third symphony of Brahms, which more perhaps than any other of his writing justifies his admirers when they would fain set him beside Beethoven. And the last number was that Weingartner transcription of "The Invitation to the Dance," which was played last season and called forth some critical opposition. The programme-book printed Weingartner's explanation of his proceeding showing it as exactly what it seemed to us last winter—an enthusiastic, brilliant, novel and yet respectful translation of Weber's music from the language of the piano to that of the full band— much as one might translate a scene of Shakespeare's text into the terms of painting. Viewed in that sense, we cannot find it ignoble or tawdry, while the effect is undeniably exhilarating and genial.

There was singing by Mrs. Marian Titus, who had chosen from Mozart's "Magic Flute" the Queen of Night's scene "Non paventar," and the "Charmant Oiseau" song from David's "Pearl of Brazil." This young artist is fast fulfilling the promise which we, with others, were glad to recognize at her private recital in Bumstead Hall, last season. Her voice is beautiful in its limpidity, its truth and its natural flexibility. Its extent is remarkable, for it rises easily to F, and even attains G above the staff, these tones being delivered in a quality more like the harmonics of a violin than to the notes of a flute. Best of all, the voice is beginning to show the warmth and sympathy which were missing at her debut, and its steadiness and sustaining power are increasing. The two selections were so well sung as to give ground for maintaining that Patti and Melba have done nothing which Mrs. Titus may not hope to do if she be faithful to her art and herself. The cantabile passages were smooth, even and calm, and the bravura was brilliant without hardness and assured but modest.

For the next concert there are promised: A Haydn symphony; Beethoven's "Leonora, No. 2" overture; four movements from a Mozart serenade, with violin obbligato by Mr. Kneisel; and the overture, scherzo and finale of Schumann.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

Baltimore

The sale of season tickets for the Boston Symphony Concerts will begin at Albert's next Monday. There will be the usual fine performances at Music Hall on Wednesday evenings, November 10, December 15, January 19, February 16 and March 23. The programmes for the entire series have already been prepared by Conductor Paur, and include, among other selections, Brahms' Symphony No. 3; Raff's Symphony, "Im Walde;" Dvorak's Symphony, "From the New World;" the Symphony No. 8 of Beethoven, and three movements from the Ninth Symphony, by the same composer. The overtures are the "Benvenuto Cellini," of Berlioz; the Tschaikowsky overture, "1812." The novelties include the "Espagna" of Chabriet, Tschaikowsky's "Italian Caprice," a new suite by Massenet, three movements from a suite by Rimsky Korsakoff and the "Invitation to Dance" of Weber, with a novel and brilliant orchestration by Weingartner. The soloists are: Mme. Lillian Blauvelt, Mr. David Bispham, Mr. Franz Kneisel and Mr. C. M. Loeffler. An evening will be devoted to selections from Wagner, as usual.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CII., NO. 123.

SUNDAY, OCTOBER 31, 1897.

MRS. TITUS A GREAT SUCCESS.

Richard Strauss' Symphonic Poem Ably Rendered.

Third in the Season's Symphony Concerts a Treat for Music-Lovers—The New Work of the Evening a Puzzling One to Analyze—Splendid Orchestral Work.

The selections for the third of this season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall last evening were:

Symphony No. 3, in F	Brahms
Aria, "Non paventar," from the "Magic Flute"	Mozart
Symphonic poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra"	R. Strauss
"Charmant oiseau," from "La Perle du Bresil"	F. David
Invitation to Dance	Weingartner-Weber

The soloist was Mrs. Marian Titus. The new work of the evening was the Strauss symphonic poem. As is well known by this time, the composer has founded his poem on eccentric Frederic Nietzsche's whirligig, rhapsodic and brain-puzzling work that bears the title given to the score. If Zara Thustra spake as he is said to have spoken by the author, it may be fairly surmised that it was through his hat; but if the interpretation given by Strauss is in any way reliable, Zara Thustra was possessed of pulmonic organs of rhinosceros hide, and shouted his "thus spake" through a megaphone of Brobdignagian proportions.

It is an impossible task to analyze the work except under conditions of complete familiarity with it, and even describing it is encompassed with like difficulty. In fact, it is one of those many things that must be heard to be appreciated, and heard often. And just here arises memory of Sam Weller's story of the little boy, who, after repeated floggings for his backwardness in learning the alphabet, complained of going through so much for so little. The boy was wrong in principle, for the alphabet has a very important place in the scheme of education, and it may be possible, after all, that a like value may pertain to a thorough mastery of the intricacies of this symphonic poem.

Whether or not what Zarathustra spake, according to Richard Strauss, is of any consequence or of any lasting worth is as yet open to question. What is already beyond all doubt is that the score is a colossal example of modern orchestration, that in wonderful fertility of resource and in knowledge what can be achieved in the science of instrumentation it stands alone. It is also certain that in places the composer has produced a more solidly-compact and ear-splitting noise than was ever before made by any master, past or present. Unfortunately, these places are too many. The first tremendous blast blares on the ear early in the work with staggering result, and the second soon follows. After this the repetitions become less and less effective, and at last, instead of surprising and thrilling, they excite an amused smile. The ammunition is expended early, and only powder is fired.

The work is unhealthy; it suffers severely from basstubaculosis, and its utterances are too often basstubathetic. Wagner at the topmost height he achieved in pursuit of noise never came within measurable distance of what Strauss has here achieved in that regard. In fact, after a hearing of this work, the bitterest opponent of Wagner in the capacity of noise-maker would be unpardonably unjust if he did not concede that the deity of Bayreuth has been unjustly aspersed, and was rather mild, lucid, not to say tame, than eardinning, in even his most boisterous moments. It is never difficult to make an orchestra speak noisily, even when it is confined to its normal numbers; but when the brass is increased, as it is in this score, 50 per cent. in excess of its normal state, the matter is greatly simplified. Here we have a brazen condition of six horns, four trumpets, three trombones and two bass tubas.

On the other side, it may be said that there are better things than savage and unmeaning noise. While the work as a whole is vague in meaning and barren of form in the sense in which that term is generally understood in music, it has many beautiful episodes, exquisite in the grace and delicacy of the instrumental effects. Nor is the music wholly in that vein of modern fastidiousness that scorns clear and flowing melodiousness and a close on a full cadence. It is true that the melody is not strikingly original; that it is sometimes almost vulgar, but melody is there, and in ample store.

Now and again one is almost astounded at the simplicity to which the composer bends, to the charm of the harmonic progressions he permits himself. There is so much of these things that one is almost inclined to think that the real Strauss is not fairly in evidence in the bizarre vein in which he ordinarily presents himself, but that there is beneath all this eccentricity another Strauss who is more truly artistic, and who prefers to masquerade, under the pressure of false shame, as an extreme modernist, than to show himself in his true colors.

The orchestration is a marvel of originality, intricacy and ingenuity. Even in its wildest moments the skill and knowledge of the composer are indubitable. The stringed instruments are divided and sub-divided into many parts in a manner never before attempted, and the result is often bewildering in its novelty, and the strange effect of so large and varied a body of string tone thus produced. The score is at its worst in that portion of it called "The Dance Song," which is a species of symphonic waltz, which is ushered in with unheard-of caterwauling, and with a grewsomeness of execrably ugly dissonances, and in a wild and incomprehensible fugue there comes what might be pronounced a realistic tone-picture of a sufferer from the worst pangs and throes of sea sickness in its most uncomfortable aspect. The opening of the work is nobly impressive in its dignified gravity.

Viewed from the most favorable aspect, this symphonic poem must, on a first acquaintance, necessarily prove more curious than edifying. It is certainly interesting, inasmuch as it has fine moments when its merits outweigh its general exaggerated eccentricities. But it is unwholesome music—music not to be encouraged where what is best and highest in art are concerned. As far as Zarathustra is in the question, it means absolutely no more than would be an attempt to give a musical version of a table of logarithms, and it is more than probable, if heard in a piano version, it would seem trivial, inflated enough, as music pure and simple; but as a hitherto untried effort at tone color on a huge scale, it is decidedly unparalleled. And that appears to be about all. The difficulties of the score are of the most trying description, and call for the extremest virtuosity of the players, string and wind alike.

Mr. Paur has evidently studied the work with all the earnestness that is in him, and the performance of it that he stimulated was brilliant, enthusiastic and effective in the highest degree. The audience may have been too greatly surprised by the strangeness of the work to welcome it with any vigorous outburst of approval; but be this as it may, it did not applaud with much fervor. The splendid work of the orchestra, at least, deserved a warmer recognition.

The Brahms symphony, the most poetic and genial of the master's achievements in its kind, was accorded a delightfully finished reading and performance. Weingartner's trashy, impertinent and beer-gardeny perversion of the Weber waltz again proved unworthy to be played by this orchestra.

Mrs. Titus won a great success by her singing of her two arias. She has a voice of pure and fresh quality and of remarkably high range, which reached to the high F in the allegro of the Mozart selection, and to the high G in that by David with the utmost certainty, firmness and perfect purity of intonation. Her middle notes are remarkably full and warm for a voice of so extreme a compass upward. In florid passages she proved herself exceptionally skilful by the ease, the smooth fluency and the clean cut clearness with which she sang the exacting coloratur in the Mozart aria, and the cadenzas in the other. She is a young singer of rare talent, unquestionably brilliant promise, and she at once won the hearty favor of the audience, for she was stormily applauded and was enthusiastically recalled four times after each effort.

The programme for the next concert is: Symphony in C, "The Bear," Haydn; overture, "Leonore," No. 2, Beethoven; four movements from the Haffner serenade, Mozart, and Schumann's overture, scherzo and finale.

The Boston Traveler

PUBLISHED BY THE
BOSTON TRAVELER CO.,
TORREY E. WARDNER, President

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 1, 1897.

THE SYMPHONY.

Richard Strauss' Startling Work. Fine Singing by Mrs. Marian Titus.

Seventeenth concert Boston Symphony Orchestra; third concert. Mrs. Marian Titus, soloist. The programme:

Symphony No, 3, in F	Brahms
Aria, Non paventar, from "The Magic Flute"	Mozart
Symphonic poem, Thus Spake Zarathustra	R. Strauss
Charmant oiseau, from "La Perle du Bresil"	F. David
Invitation to Dance	Weingartner-Weber

It is rather hard to say which was the more extraordinary feature of the concert, the symphonic poem of Richard Strauss or the singing of Mrs. Marian Titus. Let us take the most startling first—the alleged tone picture, "Thus Spake Zarathustra." The written episode by Nietzsche is abstruse and chaotic enough, in all conscience; but what can be said of the music that it has apparently inspired? Young Mr. Strauss is already known as a modern of the moderns, as a colorist of splendid abilities, as a supreme master of the possibilities of a grand orchestra. If we could only stop there and not chronicle that this latest work is the most outrageous piece of musical brutality ever written, the most hideous conglomerate of ear-tearing dissonances yet heard in Music Hall, or any other hall, the most terrific example of sheer noise known to the world! It makes Wagner sound like Mozart or Berlioz like Haydn. To suppose it, to describe it, or even to refer to the musings and prayers of a philosopher is to concede that Zarathustra was a raving maniac at the time young Mr. Strauss seized upon him. If the work must be considered as "programme" music, "Trouble in a Zoo" would be a far more truthful title. A very convincing accompanying sketch could be written by any one at all skilled in that sort of thing.

Of course, this "poem" cannot be contemptuously thrown aside as worthless stuff. It has moments of nobility of conception and splendor of harmony, and very rarely episodes of tender and pure beauty. But the general effect is that of a fierce uproar and a fiendishly ingenious cacophony that at last becomes an incentive to laughter. It would be an easy matter to transform the Symphony audience into a band of gibbering idiots by the weekly repetition of this masterpiece of noise.

It made the severest demands upon the orchestra, all of which were met in the most superb style.

Mrs. Titus' singing was remarkably fine, and her success was complete. Her voice is a clear, flute-like soprano of wonderfully high range and perfect intonation. She sings sympathetically and with great ease. In alt.—and she touched high G in the Bird Song—the tone is rich, full and certain in attack. The florid passages of the Mozart aria were given with a smoothness and delicacy worthy of the most distinguished of prima donnas. She made a deep impressoin on the audience, and was deservedly recalled three or four times.

The Brahms Symphony was admirably read, as was to be expected, for Mr. Paur is especially happy with this composer. Weingartner's orchestral transcription of "The Invitation to the Dance" is still an interesting work, spite of the enormous liberties the arranger has taken with Weber's writing. The playing off of themes against each other is ingenious and the orchestral devices well worked out. Opinions may differ as to the propriety of gilding the lily, but at any rate the gilding has been brilliantly performed.

W. D. QUINT.

THE NEWS.

DAILY AND WEEKLY.

Providence, Rhode Island.

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 1, 1897.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

It will be gratifying to the patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this city, many of them attendants at these concerts from the very beginning fifteen years ago, to learn that notwithstanding the increase in the number of concerts from six to eight and the attendant added expense, the sale of season tickets for the coming season is better than ever before.

The program for the first concert, next Wednesday evening, should satisfy the most exacting. The lover of the classical will find great satisfaction in the beautiful third symphony of Brahms, while those who prefer so-called "lighter" music will fairly revel in two waltzes. The first will be the well known "Espagna" of Chabrier, orchestrated most magnificently and in a manner to make it worthy of a place on a symphony concert program. The second waltz will be the even better known "Invitation to Dance" by Weber, but with a very recent orchestration by Felix Weingartner, one of the greatest of Europe's famous orchestra leaders. The marvelous rapidity and skill with which the melody of the waltz moves from one instrument to another is as fascinating as it is brilliant.

The announcement of Mme. Gadski as the soloist will be most acceptable to those who recall her brilliant success here last season. A brief sketch of her artistic career will undoubtedly prove interesting.

Frau Gadski's triumphs are not confined to the operatic stage. As a concert singer she has been applauded in Germany, Holland and the United States. At the Worcester, Mass., festival she won the unanimous and most hearty praise of professional musicians, audiences and critics. In Parker's "Hora Novissima," September 2, she proved herself a mistress of belcanto, and her rapt devotional spirit, finding expression in purest tones, became the voice of the celestial contemplation of the poet. In her solos and ensemble numbers from works of Wagner she aroused the next night the wildest enthusiasm.

Mme. Gadski will sing on Wednesday evening an aria, "Sulmaith," by Leopold Damrosch, and for her second selection "Dreams," a study from "Tristan and Isolde" by Wagner.

Season tickets at $7 each for the eight concerts and single tickets for the first concert at $1.25 each, are now on sale at Infantry hall.

INFANTRY HALL.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

FIRST CONCERT,
Wednesday Evening, November 3,
At 8 Sharp.

PROGRAMME:

Brahms	Symphony No. 3, in F major
Leopold Damrosch	Aria, "Sulmaith"
Chabrier	Rhapsody for Orchestra, "Espana" (First time at these concerts.)
Wagner	Song, "Dreams" (Study from "Tristan and Isolde")
Weber	"Invitation to the Dance" Arranged for Orchestra by Felix Weingartner.

Soloist, MME GADSKI.

Season tickets for the eight concerts, $7, and single tickets for the first concert, $1.25 each. Now on sale at Infantry Hall. n1-3t

---

Baltimore

* * *

In each city visited by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, it has come to be recognized that the musical season is not fairly opened until the arrival of this now famous organization, and in this connection it will be a source of pleasure to every lover of the best in music to learn that the 17th season in Boston opened on Friday afternoon last with a crowded house and a most hearty welcome to Conductor Paur, as he came upon the stage to begin his fifth season with the orchestra.

An enthusiastic audience of 3,500 of Boston's elite completely filled the Music Hall, despite the fact that there was no soloist. In fact, there has grown to be everywhere a very decided sentiment that the orchestra is the attraction after all at these concerts, and not the soloist. Notwithstanding this feeling, the management engages each year solo artists every way qualified to appear with this organization. The opening concert last Friday was the 1,500th given by the orchestra since it was founded in 1881, and the 801st performance in Boston. It seems unreasonable to ask that the orchestra shall improve upon its past record of well-nigh perfect ensemble, and yet there is always an earnest endeavor in this direction.

Conductor Paur has already selected the programmes for the entire season, which will contain, in addition to the standard classics, several striking and interesting novelties. The fact that the auction sales of season tickets in Boston reached the largest totals that have been realized in the past five years seems an almost sure indication of a prosperous season everywhere.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, OCT. 31, 1897.

Friedrich Nietzsche in his romantic novel about Zarathustra—as the old Parsi name for Zoroaster stands—represents that half mystical and half historical religious personage as wearying of his life of solitude and reflection and evolution of doctrine in the mountains. He comes forth at dawn and, addressing the sun, speaks of the human wishes which arise in his heart of forty years and his desire to be no longer a prophet and a priest, but a man once more. For this, he feels he must decline from his high estate, even as the sun descends from his zenith, and must pass to the unknown underworld—only not to return, as does the planet.

This brief address, eloquently and tersely put, might have taken a couple of minutes in delivery. But when Richard Strauss translated it into his symphonic poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," which Mr. Paur introduced as the novelty of his third programme, he needed about a half an hour, and an orchestra increased almost fantastically with an organ, a bell, and extra horns, flutes, oboes, harps and so on. In so far as his tremendous score can be understood, the composer has undertaken to present—in the opening recitatives of trumpets and trombones—the entrance of the prophet upon the scene and his first appeal to the great planet of day. Then he has apparently set about depicting those moods which possess man as he foreshadows what he may meet in the veiled future, reverences science, feels the gloom of the grave, grows back to healthy human life, longs for worldly delights, and finally loses himself in contemplation and silence. We may not have guessed the riddle aright; but such the explanation would seem to be in the light of what few hints Strauss has given.

The beginning promises well, being noble almost to majesty, broad, firm, and yet with some mystery in its slow severe phrases, its deep notes and its solid organ-tones. But it soon rushes away into tumults which are nearly chaotic; into clamors as if a mob were shouting, and not a prophet speaking; into passages which out-Wagner Wagner himself, and into a multiplicity of devices and deviations which at last confuse and fatigue both ear and mind. There are in it many magnificent orchestral combinations, new and dazzling colorings and almost reckless boldness; but it gives more surprise than pleasure and excites nervously rather than arouses spiritually. It must be immensely difficult, and the performance was a glory to the virtuosity of the orchestra and to Mr. Paur's command and leadership.

The concert began with the third symphony of Brahms, which more perhaps than any other of his writing justifies his admirers when they would fain set him beside Beethoven. And the last number was that Weingartner transcription of "The Invitation to the Dance," which was played last season and called forth some critical opposition. The programme-book printed Weingartner's explanation of his proceeding showing it as exactly what it seemed to us last winter—an enthusiastic, brilliant, novel and yet respectful translation of Weber's music from the language of the piano to that of the full band— much as one might translate a scene of Shakespeare's text into the terms of painting. Viewed in that sense, we cannot find it ignoble or tawdry, while the effect is undeniably exhilarating and genial.

There was singing by Mrs. Marian Titus, who had chosen from Mozart's "Magic Flute" the Queen of Night's scene "Non paventar," and the "Charmant Oiseau" song from David's "Pearl of Brazil." This young artist is fast fulfilling the promise which we, with others, were glad to recognize at her private recital in Bumstead Hall, last season. Her voice is beautiful in its limpidity, its truth and its natural flexibility. Its extent is remarkable, for it rises easily to F, and even attains G above the staff, these tones being delivered in a quality more like the harmonics of a violin than to the notes of a flute. Best of all, the voice is beginning to show the warmth and sympathy which were missing at her debut, and its steadiness and sustaining power are increasing. The two selections were so well sung as to give ground for maintaining that Patti and Melba have done nothing which Mrs. Titus may not hope to do if she be faithful to her art and herself. The cantabile passages were smooth, even and calm, and the bravura was brilliant without hardness and assured but modest.

For the next concert there are promised: A Haydn symphony; Beethoven's "Leonora, No. 2" overture; four movements from a Mozart serenade, with violin obbligato by Mr. Kneisel; and the overture, scherzo and finale of Schumann.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

Baltimore

The sale of season tickets for the Boston Symphony Concerts will begin at Albert's next Monday. There will be the usual fine performances at Music Hall on Wednesday evenings, November 10, December 15, January 19, February 16 and March 23. The programmes for the entire series have already been prepared by Conductor Paur, and include, among other selections, Brahms' Symphony No. 3; Raff's Symphony, "Im Walde;" Dvorak's Symphony, "From the New World;" the Symphony No. 3 of Beethoven, and three movements from the Ninth Symphony, by the same composer. The overtures are the "Benvenuto Cellini," of Berlioz; the Tschaikowsky overture, "1812." The novelties include the "Espagna" of Chabriet, Tschaikowsky's "Italian Caprice," a new suite by Massenet, three movements from a suite by Rimsky Korsakoff and the "Invitation to Dance" of Weber, with a novel and brilliant orchestration by Weingartner. The soloists are: Mme. Lillian Blauvelt, Mr. David Bispham, Mr. Franz Kneisel and Mr. C. M. Loeffler. An evening will be devoted to selections from Wagner, as usual.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CII., NO. 123.

SUNDAY, OCTOBER 31, 1897.

MRS. TITUS A GREAT SUCCESS.

Richard Strauss' Symphonic Poem Ably Rendered.

Third in the Season's Symphony Concerts a Treat for Music-Lovers—The New Work of the Evening a Puzzling One to Analyze—Splendid Orchestral Work.

The selections for the third of this season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall last evening were:

Symphony No. 3, in F	Brahms
Aria, "Non paventar," from the "Magic Flute"	Mozart
Symphonic poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra"	R. Strauss
"Charmant oiseau," from "La Perle du Bresil"	F. David
Invitation to Dance	Weingartner-Weber

The soloist was Mrs. Marian Titus. The new work of the evening was the Strauss symphonic poem. As is well known by this time, the composer has founded his poem on eccentric Frederic Nietzsche's whirligig, rhapsodic and brain-puzzling work that bears the title given to the score. If Zara Thustra spake as he is said to have spoken by the author, it may be fairly surmised that it was through his hat; but if the interpretation given by Strauss is in any way reliable, Zara Thustra was possessed of pulmonic organs of rhinosceros hide, and shouted his "thus spake" through a megaphone of Brobdignagian proportions.

It is an impossible task to analyze the work except under conditions of complete familiarity with it, and even describing it is encompassed with like difficulty. In fact, it is one of those many things that must be heard to be appreciated, and heard often. And just here arises memory of Sam Weller's story of the little boy, who, after repeated floggings for his backwardness in learning the alphabet, complained of going through so much for so little. The boy was wrong in principle, for the alphabet has a very important place in the scheme of education, and it may be possible, after all, that a like value may pertain to a thorough mastery of the intricacies of this symphonic poem.

Whether or not what Zarathustra spake, according to Richard Strauss, is of any consequence or of any lasting worth is as yet open to question. What is already beyond all doubt is that the score is a colossal example of modern orchestration, that in wonderful fertility of resource and in knowledge what can be achieved in the science of instrumentation it stands alone. It is also certain that in places the composer has produced a more solidly-compact and ear-splitting noise than was ever before made by any master, past or present. Unfortunately, these places are too many. The first tremendous blast blares on the ear early in the work with staggering result, and the second soon follows. After this the repetitions become less and less effective, and at last, instead of surprising and thrilling, they excite an amused smile. The ammunition is expended early, and only powder is fired.

The work is unhealthy; it suffers severely from basstubaculosis, and its utterances are too often basstubathetic. Wagner at the topmost height he achieved in pursuit of noise never came within measurable distance of what Strauss has here achieved in that regard. In fact, after a hearing of this work, the bitterest opponent of Wagner in the capacity of noise-maker would be unpardonably unjust if he did not concede that the deity of Bayreuth has been unjustly aspersed, and was rather mild, lucid, not to say tame, than eardinning, in even his most boisterous moments. It is never difficult to make an orchestra speak noisily, even when it is confined to its normal numbers; but when the brass is increased, as it is in this score, 50 per cent. in excess of its normal state, the matter is greatly simplified. Here we have a brazen condition of six horns, four trumpets, three trombones and two bass tubas.

On the other side, it may be said that there are better things than savage and unmeaning noise. While the work as a whole is vague in meaning and barren of form in the sense in which that term is generally understood in music, it has many beautiful episodes, exquisite in the grace and delicacy of the instrumental effects. Nor is the music wholly in that vein of modern fastidiousness that scorns clear and flowing melodiousness and a close on a full cadence. It is true that the melody is not strikingly original; that it is sometimes almost vulgar, but melody is there, and in ample store.

Now and again one is almost astounded at the simplicity to which the composer bends, to the charm of the harmonic progressions he permits himself. There is so much of these things that one is almost inclined to think that the real Strauss is not fairly in evidence in the bizarre vein in which he ordinarily presents himself, but that there is beneath all this eccentricity another Strauss who is more truly artistic, and who prefers to masquerade, under the pressure of false shame, as an extreme modernist, than to show himself in his true colors.

The orchestration is a marvel of originality, intricacy and ingenuity. Even in its wildest moments the skill and knowledge of the composer are indubitable. The stringed instruments are divided and sub-divided into many parts in a manner never before attempted, and the result is often bewildering in its novelty, and the strange effect of so large and varied a body of string tone thus produced. The score is at its worst in that portion of it called "The Dance Song," which is a species of symphonic waltz, which is ushered in with unheard-of caterwauling, and with a grewsomeness of execrably ugly dissonances, and in a wild and incomprehensible fugue there comes what might be pronounced a realistic tone-picture of a sufferer from the worst pangs and throes of sea sickness in its most uncomfortable aspect. The opening of the work is nobly impressive in its dignified gravity.

Viewed from the most favorable aspect, this symphonic poem must, on a first acquaintance, necessarily prove more curious than edifying. It is certainly interesting, inasmuch as it has fine moments when its merits outweigh its general exaggerated eccentricities. But it is unwholesome music—music not to be encouraged where what is best and highest in art are concerned. As far as Zarathustra is in the question, it means absolutely no more than would be an attempt to give a musical version of a table of logarithms, and it is more than probable, if heard in a piano version, it would seem trivial, inflated enough, as music pure and simple; but as a hitherto untried effort at tone color on a huge scale, it is decidedly unparalleled. And that appears to be about all. The difficulties of the score are of the most trying description, and call for the extremest virtuosity of the players, string and wind alike.

Mr. Paur has evidently studied the work with all the earnestness that is in him, and the performance of it that he stimulated was brilliant, enthusiastic and effective in the highest degree. The audience may have been too greatly surprised by the strangeness of the work to welcome it with any vigorous outburst of approval; but be this as it may, it did not applaud with much fervor. The splendid work of the orchestra, at least, deserved a warmer recognition.

The Brahms symphony, the most poetic and genial of the master's achievements in its kind, was accorded a delightfully finished reading and performance. Weingartner's trashy, impertinent and beer-gardeny perversion of the Weber waltz again proved unworthy to be played by this orchestra.

Mrs. Titus won a great success by her singing of her two arias. She has a voice of pure and fresh quality and of remarkably high range, which reached to the high F in the allegro of the Mozart selection, and to the high G in that by David with the utmost certainty, firmness and perfect purity of intonation. Her middle notes are remarkably full and warm for a voice of so extreme a compass upward. In florid passages she proved herself exceptionally skilful by the ease, the smooth fluency and the clear cut clearness with which she sang the exacting coloratur in the Mozart aria and the [illegible] in the other. She [illegible] unquestionably bri[illegible] she at once won the [illegible] audience, for she was sto[illegible] applauded and was enth[illegible] recalled four times after each effort.

The programme for the next concert is: Symphony in C, "The Bear," Haydn; overture, "Leonore," No. 2, Beethoven; four movements from the Haffner serenade, Mozart, and Schumann's overture, scherzo and finale.

The Boston Traveler

PUBLISHED BY THE
BOSTON TRAVELER CO.,
TORREY E. WARDNER, President

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 1, 1897.

THE SYMPHONY.

Richard Strauss' Startling Work. Fine Singing by Mrs. Marian Titus.

Seventeenth concert Boston Symphony Orchestra; third concert. Mrs. Marian Titus, soloist. The programme:

Symphony No, 3, in F	Brahms
Aria, Non paventar, from "The Magic Flute"	Mozart
Symphonic poem, Thus Spake Zarathustra	R. Strauss
Charmant oiseau, from "La Perle du Bresil"	F. David
Invitation to Dance	Weingartner-Weber

It is rather hard to say which was the more extraordinary feature of the concert, the symphonic poem of Richard Strauss or the singing of Mrs. Marian Titus. Let us take the most startling first—the alleged tone picture, "Thus Spake Zarathustra." The written episode by Nietzsche is abstruse and chaotic enough, in all conscience; but what can be said of the music that it has apparently inspired? Young Mr. Strauss is already known as a modern of the moderns, as a colorist of splendid abilities, as a supreme master of the possibilities of a grand orchestra. If we could only stop there and not chronicle that this latest work is the most outrageous piece of musical brutality ever written, the most hideous conglomerate of ear-tearing dissonances yet heard in Music Hall, or any other hall, the most terrific example of sheer noise known to the world! It makes Wagner sound like Mozart or Berlioz like Haydn. To suppose it, to describe it, or even to refer to the musings and prayers of a philosopher is to concede that Zarathustra was a raving maniac at the time young Mr. Strauss seized upon him. If the work must be considered as "programme" music, "Trouble in a Zoo" would be a far more truthful title. A very convincing accompanying sketch could be written by any one at all skilled in that sort of thing.

Of course, this "poem" cannot be contemptuously thrown aside as worthless stuff. It has moments of nobility of conception and splendor of harmony, and very rarely episodes of tender and pure beauty. But the general effect is that of a fierce uproar and a fiendishly ingenious cacophony that at last becomes an incentive to laughter. It would be an easy matter to transform the Symphony audience into a band of gibbering idiots by the weekly repetition of this masterpiece of noise.

It made the severest demands upon the orchestra, all of which were met in the most superb style.

Mrs. Titus' singing was remarkably fine, and her success was complete. Her voice is a clear, flute-like soprano of wonderfully high range and perfect intonation. She sings sympathetically and with great ease. In alt.—and she touched high G in the Bird Song—the tone is rich, full and certain in attack. The florid passages of the Mozart aria were given with a smoothness and delicacy worthy of the most distinguished of prima donnas. She made a deep impressoin on the audience, and was deservedly recalled three or four times.

The Brahms Symphony was admirably read, as was to be expected, for Mr. Paur is especially happy with this composer. Weingartner's orchestral transcription of "The Invitation to the Dance" is still an interesting work, spite of the enormous liberties the arranger has taken with Weber's writing. The playing off of themes against each other is ingenious and the orchestral devices well worked out. Opinions may differ as to the propriety of gilding the lily, but at any rate the gilding has been brilliantly performed.

W. D. QUINT.

THE NEWS.

DAILY AND WEEKLY.
Providence, Rhode Island.

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 1, 1897.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

It will be gratifying to the patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this city, many of them attendants at these concerts from the very beginning fifteen years ago, to learn that notwithstanding the increase in the number of concerts from six to eight and the attendant added expense, the sale of season tickets for the coming season is better than ever before.

The program for the first concert, next Wednesday evening, should satisfy the most exacting. The lover of the classical will find great satisfaction in the beautiful third symphony of Brahms, while those who prefer so-called "lighter" music will fairly revel in two waltzes. The first will be the well known "Espagna" of Chabrier, orchestrated most magnificently and in a manner to make it worthy of a place on a symphony concert program. The second waltz will be the even better known "Invitation to Dance" by Weber, but with a very recent orchestration by Felix Weingartner, one of the greatest of Europe's famous orchestra leaders. The marvelous rapidity and skill with which the melody of the waltz moves from one instrument to another is as fascinating as it is brilliant.

The announcement of Mme. Gadski as the soloist will be most acceptable to those who recall her brilliant success here last season. A brief sketch of her artistic career will undoubtedly prove interesting.

Frau Gadski's triumphs are not confined to the operatic stage. As a concert singer she has been applauded in Germany, Holland and the United States. At the Worcester, Mass., festival she won the unanimous and most hearty praise of professional musicians, audiences and critics. In Parker's "Hora Novissima," September 2, she proved herself a mistress of belcanto, and her rapt devotional spirit, finding expression in purest tones, became the voice of the celestial contemplation of the poet. In her solos and ensemble numbers from works of Wagner she aroused the next night the wildest enthusiasm.

Mme. Gadski will sing on Wednesday evening an aria, "Sulmaith," by Leopold Damrosch, and for her second selection "Dreams," a study from "Tristan and Isolde" by Wagner.

Season tickets at $7 each for the eight concerts and single tickets for the first concert at $1.25 each, are now on sale at Infantry hall.

INFANTRY HALL.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

FIRST CONCERT,
Wednesday Evening, November 3,
At 8 Sharp.

PROGRAMME:

Brahms	Symphony No. 3, in F major
Leopold Damrosch	Aria, "Sulmaith"
Chabrier	Rhapsody for Orchestra, "Espana" (First time at these concerts.)
Wagner	Song, "Dreams" (Study from "Tristan and Isolde")
Weber	"Invitation to the Dance" Arranged for Orchestra by Felix Weingartner.

Soloist, MME GADSKI.

Season tickets for the eight concerts, $7, and single tickets for the first concert, $1.25 each. Now on sale at Infantry Hall. n1-3t

---

* * *

In each city visited by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, it has come to be recognized that the musical season is not fairly opened until the arrival of this now famous organization, and in this connection it will be a source of pleasure to every lover of the best in music to learn that the 17th season in Boston opened on Friday afternoon last with a crowded house and a most hearty welcome to Conductor Paur, as he came upon the stage to begin his fifth season with the orchestra.

An enthusiastic audience of 3,500 of Boston's elite completely filled the Music Hall, despite the fact that there was no soloist. In fact, there has grown to be everywhere a very decided sentiment that the orchestra is the attraction after all at these concerts, and not the soloist. Notwithstanding this feeling, the management engages each year solo artists every way qualified to appear with this organization. The opening concert last Friday was the 1,500th given by the orchestra since it was founded in 1881, and the 891st performance in Boston. It seems unreasonable to ask that the orchestra shall improve upon its past record of well-nigh perfect ensemble, and yet there is always an earnest endeavor in this direction.

Conductor Paur has already selected the programmes for the entire season, which will contain, in addition to the standard classics, several striking and interesting novelties. The fact that the auction sales of season tickets in Boston reached the largest totals that have been realized in the past five years seems an almost sure indication of a prosperous season everywhere.

MUSICAL RECORD

BOSTON, NOVEMBER 1, 1897

Concerts in Boston

THE program of the first Symphony concert of the 17th season, given in Music Hall Oct. 16, Mr. Emil Paur conductor, included Brahms' Academic Festival Overture; Beethoven's 7th symphony; Chabrier's Rhapsody "Espana" (first time at these concerts); Poème lyrique, op. 12, Glazounow (first time in Boston); and Wagner's Kaisermarsch.

I do not care especially for Brahms's overture, the potpouri of student ditties. It is a pièce d'occasion, and no more spontaneous or inspired than are other overtures, or symphonies, or marches that have thus come to light by the Cæsarian operation. The translator of Dr. Deiters' biographical sketch of Brahms says that this overture was received with "hearty enthusiasm" in the fatherland. The reviews published in Leipsic and Vienna when it was produced there in 1881 contradict this statement flatly. There was one who raised glad hands to heaven, but the o'ermastering passion of Dr. Hanslick for all that Brahms wrote, spoke, or shed, is almost proverbial. Admire the architecture of the piece if you are so inclined; you must admit that the deco ration is dry and frigid.

Of course the overture was applauded genteelly, although it was none too well played. Not to accept everything of Brahms, not to applaud it in the sight of the people, is indecent, as indecent as it would be to appear in Music Hall without trousers.

There was also the perfunctorily hearty applause that follows the performance, however bad, of any piece, however dull or insignificant, signed by Beethoven. The seat of fetish worship is now in Boston, no longer in East Africa. "But don't you admire the 7th Symphony?" I hear some distressed person ask. I do, dear sir or madam, beyond measure; and for that reason I was pained deeply by the performance. There was a noble orchestra,— one of the finest, if not the finest in the world,— and there was a noble work: and what, pray, did Mr. Paur do with them? He coquetted with the first allegro, and thus ruined it by changing its delightful frankness into affectation; the second movement was distinguished chiefly by a spirit of dogged perseverance in accomplishing a task. The scherzo and the finale were less objectionable as read; in fact the finale was taken with amazing spirit, for once perhaps too fast.

Chabrier's dazzling Rhapsody was first played in Boston by the Philharmonic Orchestra, Jan. 14, 1892, and the performance was then inadequate and clumsy. The effect at the Symphony concert was instantaneous, irresistible. This apotheosis of the Jota fired the blood of the staidest matron, and led the pedant to forget the existence of analytical program-books. The more excited swear that Beethoven's statue raised one foot. And to think that this fascinating Rhapsody, with its dashing rhythm, exotic, pungent melody, orchestral beauty full of surprises,— this triumph of inspiration and skill produced as long ago as 1883 in Paris, was not heard at a Symphony concert until the year of our Lord 1897! Is there still in local musical circles the belief that a Frenchman must not be taken seriously,— that he is occupied chiefly with absinthe and the pursuit of his neighbor's wife?

I do not believe that the Poème lyrique is one of Glazounow's most characteristic works. It was played at Cincinnati in 1895, but Mr. Thomas, who led three of Glazounow's works in Chicago last year, and proposes to lead five more this season, has passed it by. The piece is melodious; it sounds well; but in certain places it is saved from vulgarity only by some ingenious harmonic twist or orchestral expression. I like the Russian best when he smells of vodka. Why should we not hear Glazounow's Fourth or Fifth symphony? He, too, by the way, wrote a pièce d'occasion, a Triumphal March for the World's Columbian Exposition in Chicago, 1893, with chorus ad libitum.

I did not hear Wagner's Kaisermarsch. I remembered the saying of Heinrich Dorn: "We can characterize the barbarous vulgarity of this latest Wagnerian outburst only as an insult against the noble dignity of the German Emperor."

Whatever his merits as a conductor may be, Mr. Paur is not fortunate in program-making. In this respect he is not unlike Mr. Gericke, who was too fastidious except when Viennese composers were concerned. Probably the best program-maker of the four conductors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was Mr. Henschel, who was kindly permitted by Mr. Higginson to learn his trade at the Symphony concerts, so that he could afterward try his luck with an orchestra in London.

* * *

The program of the Symphony concert Oct. 23 included Rimsky-Korsakoff's "La Grande Pâque Russe," op. 36 (first time in Boston); Gernsheim's violin concerto (first time in Boston); Schumann's First Symphony; Tschaikowsky's "Capriccio Italien," op. 45, (first time at these concerts). The piece by Rimsky-Korsakoff, founded on plain-song of the Russian Church, was written in memory of Alexandre Borodine, who died in 1887, and Modeste Moussorgsky, who died in 1886. It was in 1870 that the latter became the roommate of Rimsky-Korsakoff. They worked together, not only in the same room, but during the same hours. The first mention of this overture I find is that of the performance in manuscript at a Popular concert in Brussels, April 13, 1890, when it was conducted by the composer. Built upon themes of the Russian Church, themes that are of poignant meaning to the faithful, the work no doubt is more effective when played to a Russian audience. We foreigners are obliged to regard it simply as music, and the chief feeling awakened is that of surprise, which is at times akin to curiosity and the desire to know "what is coming next." I do not believe that all the contents of the overture were brought fully into the light. The second trombone solo, for instance, a recitative accompanied by six divided 'cellos and two double basses, is marked "a piena voce;" but the player was gentle, very gentle, and inclined to sentimental warbling. There are some interesting effects of instrumentation, but when you take away the themes, with their sombre dignity and the ecclesiastical cadences, the rest seems thin and perfunctory.

* * *

Mr. Schnitzler is a violinist of many excellent parts, but why in the world did he choose the conventional, manufactured, and dull concerto by Gernsheim, and thus hang a millstone to his fiddle-bow? What a waste of time in memorizing and in performance! Mr. Schnitzler possibly shortened his life by some minutes if not hours by the labor he bestowed on this concerto.

* * *

Tschaikowsky's Italian Caprice was played in Chicago as early as 1893, and it was probably played before that in New York. We did not miss much here by the delay. There are evidences galore of the composer's orchestral cunning, and the melodies are characteristic, but there is a very strong dash of the vulgarity that is found in many orchestral pieces of his early period, and suspected even in some later and greater works.

* * *

The B flat major symphony of Schumann is fast getting threadbare, and its orchestral dress is dusty. The scherzo, with its reminiscence of a Schubert song and portions of the finale, are worth hearing, but the freshness is gone from the first movement and the larghetto is now without authoritative beauty. The Schumann of genius is the composer of certain piano pieces, certain songs, and the D minor symphony.

PHILIP HALE.

October 25, 1897.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 1, 1897

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The programme of the third symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was:

Brams: Symphony No. 3, in F major, opus 90.
Mozart: Recitative, "Non paventar," and Aria, "Infelice," from "il Flauto Magico."
Richard Strauss: Symphonic Poem, "Also sprach Zarathustra," opus 30.
(First time in Boston.)
Félicien David: Couplets du Mysoli "Charmant oiseau," from "La Perle du Brésil."
Weber: "Aufforderung zum Tanz," opus 65 (arranged for orchestra by Felix Weingartner).
Mrs. Marian Titus was the singer.

Of the playing of the first movement of Brahms's F major symphony only the technical excellence can be praised; the reading seemed to us thoroughly bad, robbing the movement of all its native fire, strength and passion. Now and then a strong effect would be strongly, if over-laboriously, brought out; but there was a prevailing bent toward a finicking elaboration of minor details, a genteel timidity of accent, that made the mighty music seem like the counterpart of one of those steel-plate keep-sake engravings which the sentimentally inclined find so exquisite, and are called vulgar by artists. If ever Brahms hit out straight from the shoulder, it was in this movement; why, then, all this rose-petal minauderie? Were it not impossible that Mr. Paur should lack confidence in his orchestra, we should have said that this movement was taken timidly to avoid a muddle. Was the second movement taken too slow or not? It was hard to tell; we are by no means sure. But sure we are that it was terribly over-sentimentalized. The third movement went far better, and the finale, one of Brahms's most poetic flights, was admirably played. That dan [illegible]

[illegible] ghostly reappearance of the theme of the first movement in the last measures made so evident to the ear.

And so we have at last heard Richard Strauss's "Zarathustra"! If Nietzsche's Zarathustra spake thus, he spoke at no inconsiderable length and not with the most impeccable clearness, ending with "to be continued in our next." The composition reminds one of several things; only, for your life, not of any musical composition ever heard before—except by fits and starts. It reminds one of civic processions, where equidistant bands strike the ear with two tunes at once, and in different keys. It reminds one of the old definition: "When a man speaks to you in a language you do not understand, about something that he does not understand, that is metaphysics." It reminds one of things one has tried to escape from in nightmares. They say Strauss proceeds from Wagner; we should say he did with a vengeance—and with a certain carefulness in selecting his exact point of departure. [illegible] seems to have pitched upon that delicious burlesque "cats'-music passage" in the prelude to the "Meistersinger," and backed himself to outdo it—in the tragic mood. And yet, as Schumann said of the first measures in the overture to "Tannhäuser," there is "something in it that takes hold of you, in spite of all!" With all its outrageousness, perhaps because of its very outrageousness, it somehow gives you the unavoidable impression that the composer is a man, that he is in no sense a nobody. Whether you call his most prominent characteristic daring or cheek, such absolutely colossal ch— (beg pardon, we mean daring) has in itself something of sublimity. Still one can hardly call it the daring of excessive passionateness; neither does it seem akin to the gambler's desperate risk-all-to-win-all last throw. It is a very cold-blooded, precalculating sort of daring; self-conscious and tolerably sure of itself. The thematic material—what there is of it—bears evident signs of being constructed on mathematical principles; you feel the inner impulse to be lacking, that the composer was driven to make the best of calculation instead. Only in a few instances does he appear to have trusted to blind chance; there are indeed some passages that sound as if he had drawn the separate notes blindfold out of a hat, but these are few and far between. Not that Strauss does not know what passion is, but that his knowledge of it seems to have been gained from dictionaries mainly and from the definitions of philosophical writers. But he certainly does write at white heat, not of passion but of intense interest in his work; you can fancy Copernicus or Huxley working at just that heat, but never Beethoven or Wagner. He seems honest, too; at least to the point of making himself believe that he means every word he says. His power of will is enormous, almost amounting to genius in itself. He is so absorbed in his task of illustrating Nietzsche musically, so thoroughly bound to do it or die, that, in his concentration, he often forgets that what he writes is not entirely his own; the remembered phrase is to him as good as the calculated one; now it is from the "Flying Dutchman," now from the overture to "Elijah," now from Meyerbeer. We have heard some musicians say that this last "poem" of Strauss's shows forth his astounding orchestral technique even more brilliantly than any of his previous works; well, musicians presumably know what they are talking about, but it certainly seems to one who has never tried it himself as if it could not take any very enormous orchestral technique to make music sound so horrible. But the performance was truly a wonder; the orchestra had been rehearsing the work ever since the beginning of the season—possibly sacrificing a good deal else thereto—and the inordinately difficult score was played apparently to absolute perfection. Even that unearthly aequale in the 'celli and basses at the beginning of the fugue sounded almost clear. This passage, by the way, is headed "Of Science" in the score; but did ever ultramontane dogmatism say anything so unkind of science as that? So the much-talked-of work has been heard here, and Mr. Paur and his men have covered themselves with glory in the giving of it. Let so much go on record.

If anything could exceed the Teutonic impudence of Mr. Weingartner's preface to his orchestral arrangement of Weber's "Invitation," it is the vileness of the arrangement itself. The thing was played here last season; that was enough in the way of deference to Mr. Weingartner's reputation as a person of prominence in the musical world. Its repetition this season was an insult to Weber, Berlioz, and the public.

Mrs. Titus made her first appearance before a general Boston audience at this concert—for her singing at the Tuileries last winter could hardly count as a real début. She has made much progress since then. She is a truly delightful singer, her beautiful light soprano, with its unusual compass in alt, being no small item in the pleasure she gives. Of what is called nowadays "temperament"—in the exuberant, emotional sense of the word—we find little in her; she belongs rather to the canary-bird category of light soprani. All of which we would by no means count against her; dramatic passionateness does not cover the whole field of music, and there is much exquisite work of great artistic value for the lighter agile warblers to do. When a voice is a delightful instrument in itself, it is a sensuous pleasure to hear that voice made the most of in sparkling fioriture and ear-charming cantilena; our modern artistic "earnestness" has not made sweet sounds any the less sweet, nor fine vocal phrasing, showing forth the whole beauty of the musical phrase, the less artistic. Perhaps the agile bravura soprano is more handicapped at the beginning of her career than in any other; for the charm of her art lies mainly in its perfection, and perfection is not reached at the start. But Mrs. Titus is already far on the road thither; she sings really exquisitely, musically, and with a sense of what vocal perfection is. We liked her best in the David song; Mozart's great aria is on a larger scale, more dramatic in style, and calls the deeper emotions into play. The Mozart of "Die Zauberflöte" could not forget that he was a great dramatic genius, and [illegible] made his song-birds warble, you [illegible] thing volcanic beneath [illegible]

[illegible] and convincing. The [illegible] has a career before her [illegible] Salisbury (whilom Miss [illegible] may well be proud of her [illegible] teacher. The audience [illegible] as we did, for the applause [illegible] of the heartiest.

The next programme [illegible] symphony in C-major, "l'Ours" [illegible] Beethoven, overture to "Leonore," No. [illegible] opus 72; Mozart, four movements from [illegible] Serenade No. 7, in D-major, "Haffner" (violin solo by Mr. Kneisel); Schumann, overture, scherzo, and finale, opus 52.

MUSICAL RECORD

BOSTON, NOVEMBER 1, 1897

Concerts in Boston

THE program of the first Symphony concert of the 17th season, given in Music Hall Oct. 16, Mr. Emil Paur conductor, included Brahms' Academic Festival Overture; Beethoven's 7th symphony; Chabrier's Rhapsody "Espana" (first time at these concerts); Poème lyrique, op. 12, Glazounow (first time in Boston); and Wagner's Kaisermarsch.

I do not care especially for Brahms's overture, the potpouri of student ditties. It is a pièce d'occasion, and no more spontaneous or inspired than are other overtures, or symphonies, or marches that have thus come to light by the Cæsarian operation. The translator of Dr. Deiters' biographical sketch of Brahms says that this overture was received with "hearty enthusiasm" in the fatherland. The reviews published in Leipsic and Vienna when it was produced there in 1881 contradict this statement flatly. There was one who raised glad hands to heaven, but the o'ermastering passion of Dr. Hanslick for all that Brahms wrote, spoke, or shed, is almost proverbial. Admire the architecture of the piece if you are so inclined; you must admit that the decoration is dry and frigid.

Of course the overture was applauded genteelly, although it was none too well played. Not to accept everything of Brahms, not to applaud it in the sight of the people, is indecent, as indecent as it would be to appear in Music Hall without trousers.

There was also the perfunctorily hearty applause that follows the performance, however bad, of any piece, however dull or insignificant, signed by Beethoven. The seat of fetish worship is now in Boston, no longer in East Africa. "But don't you admire the 7th Symphony?" I hear some distressed person ask. I do, dear sir or madam, beyond measure; and for that reason I was pained deeply by the performance. There was a noble orchestra,— one of the finest, if not the finest in the world,— and there was a noble work: and what, pray, did Mr. Paur do with them? He coquetted with the first allegro, and thus ruined it by changing its delightful frankness into affectation; the second movement was distinguished chiefly by a spirit of dogged perseverance in accomplishing a task. The scherzo and the finale were less objectionable as read; in fact the finale was taken with amazing spirit, for once perhaps too fast.

Chabrier's dazzling Rhapsody was first played in Boston by the Philharmonic Orchestra, Jan. 14, 1892, and the performance was then inadequate and clumsy. The effect at the Symphony concert was instantaneous, irresistible. This apotheosis of the Jota fired the blood of the staidest matron, and led the pedant to forget the existence of analytical program-books. The more excited swear that Beethoven's statue raised one foot. And to think that this fascinating Rhapsody, with its dashing rhythm, exotic, pungent melody, orchestral beauty full of surprises,— this triumph of inspiration and skill produced as long ago as 1883 in Paris, was not heard at a Symphony concert until the year of our Lord 1897! Is there still in local musical circles the belief that a Frenchman must not be taken seriously,— that he is occupied chiefly with absinthe and the pursuit of his neighbor's wife?

I do not believe that the Poème lyrique is one of Glazounow's most characteristic works. It was played at Cincinnati in 1895, but Mr. Thomas, who led three of Glazounow's works in Chicago last year, and proposes to lead five more this season, has passed it by. The piece is melodious; it sounds well; but in certain places it is saved from vulgarity only by some ingenious harmonic twist or orchestral expression. I like the Russian best when he smells of vodka. Why should we not hear Glazounow's Fourth or Fifth symphony? He, too, by the way, wrote a pièce d'occasion, a Triumphal March for the World's Columbian Exposition in Chicago, 1893, with chorus ad libitum.

I did not hear Wagner's Kaisermarsch. I remembered the saying of Heinrich Dorn: "We can characterize the barbarous vulgarity of this latest Wagnerian outburst only as an insult against the noble dignity of the German Emperor."

Whatever his merits as a conductor may be, Mr. Paur is not fortunate in program-making. In this respect he is not unlike Mr. Gericke, who was too fastidious except when Viennese composers were concerned. Probably the best program-maker of the four conductors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was Mr. Henschel, who was kindly permitted by Mr. Higginson to learn his trade at the Symphony concerts, so that he could afterward try his luck with an orchestra in London.

* * *

The program of the Symphony concert Oct. 23 included Rimsky-Korsakoff's "La Grande Pâque Russe," op. 36 (first time in Boston); Gernsheim's violin concerto (first time in Boston); Schumann's First Symphony; Tschaikowsky's "Capriccio Italien," op. 45, (first time at these concerts). The piece by Rimsky-Korsakoff, founded on plain-song of the Russian Church, was written in memory of Alexandre Borodine, who died in 1887, and Modeste Moussorgsky, who died in 1886. It was in 1870 that the latter became the roommate of Rimsky-Korsakoff. They worked together, not only in the same room, but during the same hours. The first mention of this overture I find is that of the performance in manuscript at a Popular concert in Brussels, April 13, 1890, when it was conducted by the composer. Built upon themes of the Russian Church, themes that are of poignant meaning to the faithful, the work no doubt is more effective when played to a Russian audience. We foreigners are obliged to regard it simply as music, and the chief feeling awakened is that of surprise, which is at times akin to curiosity and the desire to know "what is coming next." I do not believe that all the contents of the overture were brought fully into the light. The second trombone solo, for instance, a recitative accompanied by six divided 'cellos and two double basses, is marked "a piena voce;" but the player was gentle, very gentle, and inclined to sentimental warbling. There are some interesting effects of instrumentation, but when you take away the themes, with their sombre dignity and the ecclesiastical cadences, the rest seems thin and perfunctory.

* * *

Mr. Schnitzler is a violinist of many excellent parts, but why in the world did he choose the conventional, manufactured, and dull concerto by Gernsheim, and thus hang a millstone to his fiddle-bow? What a waste of time in memorizing and in performance! Mr. Schnitzler possibly shortened his life by some minutes if not hours by the labor he bestowed on this concerto.

* * *

Tschaikowsky's Italian Caprice was played in Chicago as early as 1893, and it was probably played before that in New York. We did not miss much here by the delay. There are evidences galore of the composer's orchestral cunning, and the melodies are characteristic, but there is a very strong dash of the vulgarity that is found in many orchestral pieces of his early period, and suspected even in some later and greater works.

* * *

The B flat major symphony of Schumann is fast getting threadbare, and its orchestral dress is dusty. The scherzo, with its reminiscence of a Schubert song and portions of the finale, are worth hearing, but the freshness is gone from the first movement and the larghetto is now without authoritative beauty. The Schumann of genius is the composer of certain piano pieces, certain songs, and the D minor symphony.

PHILIP HALE.

October 25, 1897.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 1, 1897

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The programme of the third symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was:

Brams: Symphony No. 3, in F major, opus 90.
Mozart: Recitative, "Non paventar," and Aria, "Infelice," from "il Flauto Magico."
Richard Strauss: Symphonic Poem, "Also sprach Zarathustra," opus 30. (First time in Boston.)
Félicien David: Couplets du Mysoli "Charmant oiseau," from "La Perle du Bresil."
Weber: "Aufforderung zum Tanz," opus 65 (arranged for orchestra by Felix Weingartner).
Mrs. Marian Titus was the singer.

Of the playing of the first movement of Brahms's F major symphony only the technical excellence can be praised; the reading seemed to us thoroughly bad, robbing the movement of all its native fire, strength and passion. Now and then a strong effect would be strongly, if over-laboriously, brought out; but there was a prevailing bent toward a finicking elaboration of minor details, a genteel timidity of accent, that made the mighty music seem like the counterpart of one of those steel-plate keep-sake engravings which the sentimentally inclined find so exquisite, and are called vulgar by artists. If ever Brahms hit out straight from the shoulder, it was in this movement; why, then, all this rose-petal minauderie? Were it not impossible that Mr. Paur should lack confidence in his orchestra, we should have said that this movement was taken timidly to avoid a muddle. Was the second movement taken too slow or not? It was hard to tell; we are by no means sure. But sure we are that it was terribly over-sentimentalized. The third movement went far better, and the finale, one of Brahms's most poetic flights, was admirably played. That dangerously sudden break into the major [illegible] the wood-wind) near the close went better than we remember to have heard it go before, and surely never have we heard that ghostly reappearance of the theme of the first movement in the last measures made so evident to the ear.

And so we have at last heard Richard Strauss's "Zarathustra"! If Nietzsche's Zarathustra spake thus, he spoke at no inconsiderable length and not with the most impeccable clearness, ending with "to be continued in our next." The composition reminds one of several things; only, for your life, not of any musical composition ever heard before—except by fits and starts. It reminds one of civic processions, where equidistant bands strike the ear with two tunes at once, and in different keys. It reminds one of the [illegible] definition: "When a man speaks to you in a language you do not understand, about something that he does not understand, that is metaphysics." It reminds one of things one has tried to escape from in nightmares. They say Strauss proceeds from Wagner; we should say he did with a vengeance—and with a certain carefulness in selecting his exact point of departure. He seems to have pitched upon that delicious burlesque "cats'-music passage" in the prelude to the "Meistersinger," and backed himself to outdo it—in the tragic mood. And yet, as Schumann said of the first measures in the overture to "Tannhäuser," there is "something in it that takes hold of you, in spite of all!" With all its outrageousness, perhaps because of its very outrageousness, it somehow gives you the unavoidable impression that the composer is a man, that he is in no sense a nobody. Whether you call his most prominent characteristic daring or cheek, such absolutely colossal ch— (beg pardon, we mean daring) has in itself something of sublimity. Still one can hardly call it the daring of excessive passionateness; neither does it seem akin to the gambler's desperate risk-all-to-win-all last throw. It is a very cold-blooded, precalculating sort of daring; self-conscious and tolerably sure of itself. The thematic material—what there is of it—bears evident signs of being constructed on mathematical principles; you feel the inner impulse to be lacking, that the composer was driven to make the best of calculation instead. Only in a few instances does he appear to have trusted to blind chance; there are indeed some passages that sound as if he had drawn the separate notes blindfold out of a hat, but these are few and far between. Not that Strauss does not know what passion is, but that his knowledge of it seems to have been gained from dictionaries mainly and from the definitions of philosophical writers. But he certainly does write at white heat, not of passion but of intense interest in his work; you can fancy Copernicus or Huxley working at just that heat, but never Beethoven or Wagner. He seems honest, too; at least to the point of making himself believe that he means every word he says. His power of will is enormous, almost amounting to genius in itself. He is so absorbed in his task of illustrating Nietzsche musically, so thoroughly bound to do it or die, that, in his concentration, he often forgets that what he writes is not entirely his own; the remembered phrase is to him as good as the calculated one; now it is from the "Flying Dutchman," now from the overture to "Elijah," now from Meyerbeer. We have heard some musicians say that this last "poem" of Strauss's shows forth his astounding orchestral technique even more brilliantly than any of his previous works; well, musicians presumably know what they are talking about, but it certainly seems to one who has never tried it himself as if it could not take any very enormous orchestral technique to make music sound so horrible. But the performance was truly a wonder; the orchestra had been rehearsing the work ever since the beginning of the season—possibly sacrificing a good deal else thereto—and the inordinately difficult score was played apparently to absolute perfection. Even that unearthly aequale in the 'celli and basses at the beginning of the fugue sounded almost clear. This passage, by the way, is headed "Of Science" in the score; but did ever ultramontane dogmatism say anything so unkind of science as that? So the much-talked-of work has been heard here, and Mr. Paur and his men have covered themselves with glory in the giving of it. Let so much go on record.

If anything could exceed the Teutonic impudence of Mr. Weingartner's preface to his orchestral arrangement of Weber's "Invitation," it is the vileness of the arrangement itself. The thing was played here last season; that was enough in the way of deference to Mr. Weingartner's reputation as a person of prominence in the musical world. Its repetition this season was an insult to Weber, Berlioz, and the public.

Mrs. Titus made her first appearance before a general Boston audience at this concert—for her singing at the Tuileries last winter could hardly count as a real début. She has made much progress since then. She is a truly delightful singer, her beautiful light soprano, with its unusual compass in alt, being no small item in the pleasure she gives. Of what is called nowadays "temperament"—in the exuberant, emotional sense of the word—we find little in her; she belongs rather to the canary-bird category of light soprani. All of which we would by no means count against her; dramatic passionateness does not cover the whole field of music, and there is much exquisite work of great artistic value for the lighter agile warblers to do. When a voice is a delightful instrument in itself, it is a sensuous pleasure to hear that voice made the most of in sparkling fioriture and ear-charming cantilena; our modern artistic "earnestness" has not made sweet sounds any the less sweet, nor fine vocal phrasing, showing forth the whole beauty of the musical phrase, the less artistic. Perhaps the agile bravura soprano is more handicapped at the beginning of her career than in any other; for the charm of her art lies mainly in its perfection, and perfection is not reached at the start. But Mrs. Titus is already far on the road thither; she sings really exquisitely, musically, and with a sense of what vocal perfection is. We liked her best in the David song; Mozart's great aria is on a larger scale, more dramatic in style, and calls the deeper emotions into play. The Mozart of "Die Zauberflöte" could not forget that he was a great dramatic genius, and even when he made his song-birds warble, you feel something volcanic beneath. Mrs. Titus sang the aria extremely well, especially so in the [illegible] florid passages; [illegible] here is more [illegible] than she shows forth. [illegible] the charm of her phrasing in the David [illegible]ng, the winning fascination to the ear of that high G-natural at the end, were more penetrating and convincing. This young woman plainly has a career before her; her teacher, Mrs. Salisbury (whilom Miss Gertrude Franklin) may well be proud of her—and she of her teacher. The audience evidently thought as we did, for the applause and recalls were of the heartiest.

The next programme is: Haydn, symphony in C-major, "l'Ours;" Beethoven, overture to "Leonore," No. [illegible] opus 72; Mozart, four movements from serenade No. 7, in D-major, "Haffner" (violin solo by Mr. Kneisel); Schumann, overture, scherzo, and finale, opus 52.

Baltimore

The most important musical announcement of the year is that of the annual sale of season tickets for the series of concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall.

The interest in this sale never relaxes, and probably never will as long as the acknowledged high standing of the orchestra is maintained. These concerts have grown to be a permanent and potent element in the entertainment season. Every announcement made by the management has been fulfilled, except in case of illness, accident or events beyond control. No matter what the attraction, the same scale of prices has always been maintained. There will be the usual five performances on Wednesday evenings, November 10, December 15, January 19, February 16 and March 23.

Mr. Emil Paur will again conduct the orchestra, which will be of the same number and membership as last year. To this personnel, practically unchanged for the past 10 years, is largely due the established reputation of the orchestra. Another prominent factor is the enormous total of 1,500 performances which have been given by the orchestra since its founding in 1881. Although Boston is the home of the orchestra, every city visited takes a just pride in the glory of the organization, and the loyal support received everywhere is one of the strongest proofs of its integrity. It is a matter of special pride with the Boston Symphony Orchestra that the majority of its patrons in this city have attended the concerts from the very beginning.

The programmes for the entire series have already been prepared by Conductor Paur, and include, among other selections, Brahms' Symphony No. 3; Raff's Symphony, "Im Walde;" Dvorak's Symphony, "From the New World;" the Symphony No. 2 of Beethoven, and three movements from the Ninth Symphony, by the same composer. The overtures are the "Benvenuto Cellini," of Berlioz; the Tschaikowsky overture, "1812." The novelties include the "Espagna" of Chabrier, Tschaikowsky's "Italian Caprice," a new suite by Massenet, three movements from a suite by Rimsky Korsakoff and the "Invitation to Dance" of Weber, with a novel and brilliant orchestration by Weingartner.

The soloists are: Mme. Lillian Blauvelt, Mr. David Bispham, Mr. Franz Kneisel and Mr. C. M. Loeffler. An evening will be devoted to selections from Wagner, as usual.

The sale of season tickets will begin at Albert's, on Monday morning, October 18.

* * *

THE NEWS.

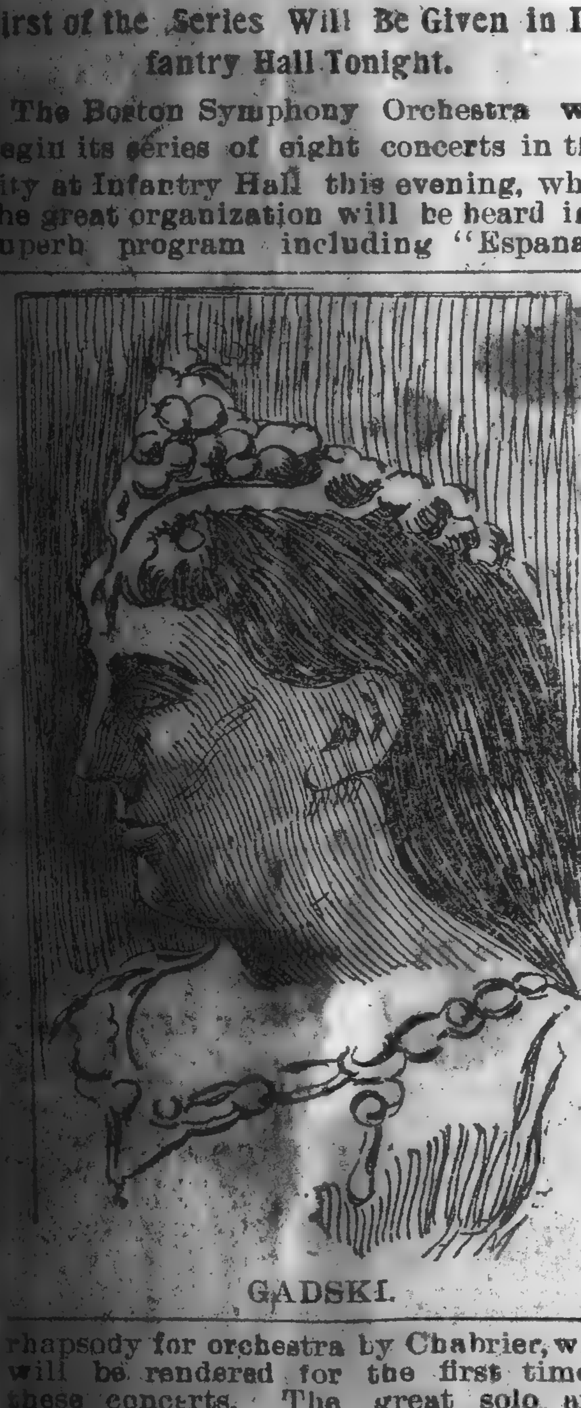
DAILY AND WEEKLY.
Providence, Rhode Island.

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 3, 1897.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

First of the Series Will Be Given in Infantry Hall Tonight.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its series of eight concerts in this city at Infantry Hall this evening, when the great organization will be heard in a superb program including "Espana," rhapsody for orchestra by Chabrier, which will be rendered for the first time at these concerts. The great solo artist Gadski, who is recognized as one of the world's foremost vocalists, will be heard in the famous song "Dreams," from "Tristan and Isolde." This will give scope to the wonderful powers of the gifted songstress and afford an opportunity to hear her at her best. The complete program is as follows:



GADSKI.

Brahms.......Symphony No. 3, in F major
Leopold Damrosch.....Aria, "Sulmaith"
Chabrier Rhapsody for Orchestra "Espana"
(First time at these concerts.)
Wagner..............Song, "Dreams"
(Study from "Tristan and Isolde")
Weber........"Invitation to the Dance"
Arranged for Orchestra by Felix Weingartner.

It will be noticed that nearly all of the musical feast is practically new to patrons of the orchestra in this city, and that it includes variety as well as merit of the highest grade.

From present indications Infantry Hall will enfold a superb audience this evening.

[illegible]

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 4, 1897.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

First Performance of the Season at Infantry Hall Last Evening.

The first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last evening in Infantry Hall. There was a large audience, showing conclusively that the extended scheme of concerts offered this year was a move in the right direction, and one that will command hearty support. In fact, the management reports a larger sale of season tickets than usual. The Symphony audience changes little from year to year, except in the matter of growth. The same familiar faces are to be seen season after season, and not a few have been steady patrons since the beginning of these concerts, a decade and a half ago. Last night there was plainly to be noted an air of subdued expectancy betokening anticipated pleasure, and the interest was further manifested by the fact that practically everybody was seated at the time for the first number to begin.

The orchestra, too, presents virtually the same personnel from one season to another, and thus is rendered possible that superb unity of movement and of purpose that can only come, even with such excellent and finished artists, from long and intimate association. An ideal ensemble demands both a band of virtuosi and the "shaking together" resulting from much rehearsing and many performances. It is needless to point out, at this late day, that this orchestra fulfills the most exacting requirements of individual ability and collective experience.

The customary little ovation was tendered to Conductor Emil Paur as he came forward to his desk, which he, evidently pleased, acknowledged with many smiles and bows. This complimentary episode over, the performance of the evening's programme proceeded in the following order:

Symphony No 3, in F major, Op. 90.............................Johannes Brahms
I. Allegro con brio (F major).
II. Andante (C major).
III. Poco Allegretto (C minor).
IV. Allegro (F minor).
Aria, "Sulmaith"..........Leopold Damrosch
Rhapsody for orchestra, "Espana"...............................Emmanuel Chabrier
(First time at these concerts.)
Song, "Dreams" (study from "Tristan and Isolde")..................Richard Wagner
"Invitation to the Dance," Op. 65...............................Karl Maria von Weber
(Arranged for orchestra by Felix Weingartner.)

Largely modern as this programme is in its make-up, it offers something very interesting in the way of contrast. Here is Brahms, the greatest modern master of musical form; Wagner, the progenitor of a new and puissant form; Damrosch and Chabrier, disciples of the later school, who abandon all pretence to form outside the fundamental and somewhat elastic bounds of mere rhythm; and the whole topped off with a return to Weber, the century-old maker of melodies still fresh and pleasing. The advocates of contrast as an indispensable factor in successful programme-making could find no fault with this.

Brahms's F major symphony, the piece de resistance of the evening, is one of the many compositions of this master that arouse in the mind of the hearer a most ardent desire to know what it all meant to Brahms. For without the key which the creative mind could alone supply much of it is frankly unintelligible. In its technical construction are to be found some things that show plainly enough that for all Brahms's great mastery of form he did not always choose to be bound by it. It is not many years ago that critics' hair stood on end at the famous "cross-relation" in the first measures of the opening allegro, and a noted conductor even instructed his players to "make that objectionable A flat as little noticeable as possible," though the musical world has now agreed to recognize it as a stroke of genius. There are, too, not a few harmonies of the sort that art termed "daring" when employed by a great composer, or irrelevant discords if perpetrated by an unknown. The andante contrasts sharply with the rest of the symphony in its simple and unaffected beauty. Here is Brahms in his melodic mood. But by far the most striking and impressive of the four movements is the final allegro. What it all means is hard enough to say. It might pass for an episode of evolution, or indeed for the whole story. Voices as of primeval things seem to call across vast abysses; there are strivings and upheavals of elemental forces; the end comes restfully with the sense of something well completed, but what it stands for still remains unseen. The orchestra played this curious work magnificently, surmounting its technical and rhythmical difficulties with certainty and apparent ease.

Broadly contrasted with the work of Brahms was the rhapsody "Espana" by Emmanuel Chabrier. This is really a fantasia on characteristic Spanish dance tunes, and presents a lively picture of the village fete, wherein the guitars, tambourines, and ruder instruments incite the revellers to the dance. The picture is cunningly drawn and needs no guide-book for its easy and enjoyable appreciation. The instrumentation is highly original and always strikingly effective. This, too, was played with abounding fire and suggestiveness, receiving the warmest applause of the evening. Weingartner's orchestral arrangement of Weber's "Invitation to the Dance" made a pleasing close to the concert, albeit the piece is more effective for the piano than with the cleverest arrangement for the orchestra.

The soloist was Madame Johanna Gadski, the brilliant young German prima donna, who made so pleasing an impression at her previous appearance in Infantry Hall with the Symphony Orchestra. The aria by the late Dr. Damrosch is a pretentious but wholly unmusical thing, entirely unworthy of the pains and the excellent singing which Madame Gadski bestowed upon it. It is a most astounding piece of cacophony. A triad of C-major in the upper wind, coming after five minutes of discords, suspensions, and purposeless wandering about, actually sounded like a mistake. In her second number Mme. Gadski showed to advantage the beauty of her young, fresh voice, and her undoubted vocal ability. She is one of the most satisfactory of the sopranos that have been heard here of late years.

The audience was very cordial, recalling the singer a number of times and generously applauding at every opportunity the finished work of the orchestra. A repeat would have been gladly welcomed afteh the Chabrier rhapsody or Mme. Gadski's number, and time would have permitted, for the concert was considerably shorter than usual. But the rule of no encore at these concerts (and a good rule, too,) was not broken. The next concert will be given on the evening of Wednesday, Dec. 1.

BOSTON HERALD

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CII., NO. 127.

THURSDAY, NOV. 4, 1897.

MUSIC LOVERS OUT IN FORCE.

Opening of Boston Symphony Orchestra's 16th Season in Providence.

[Special Dispatch to the Boston Herald.]

PROVIDENCE, R. I., Nov. 3, 1897. The Boston Symphony orchestra's 16th season was opened at Music Hall tonight. The audience was large and critical, all the first people and the professional musicians of the city being present. Every number was enthusiastically received, and Conductor Paur was obliged to respond to the encores. Mme. Gadski, the soloist, scored a great success.

BROOKLYN LIFE

VOL. XVI. BROOKLYN, N. Y., NOV. 6, 1897. No. 401

ON Friday afternoon the first of the series of five matinée concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place in the Academy. The program includes the Brahm's Symphony No. 3, an Adagio and Scherzo by Goetz, and the Berliz overture to "Benvenuta Cellini." The soloists will be Mrs. Titus and Franz Kneisel. Saturday evening a second series will be begun. Haydn's Symphony No. 7 will be played, and also for the first time here Chabrier's "Espana" and the Weber-Weingartner "Invitation to the Dance." Joseffy will be the soloist.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 3, 1897.

The program of the third Symphony concert in Music Hall last night was as follows:

Symphony No. 3, in F major.................................Brahms
Recitative, Non paventar, and aria, Infelice, from Il Flauto Magico..................................Mozart
Symphonic poem, Thus Spake Zarathustra, op. 30...........Strauss
(First time in Boston.)
Charmant Oiseau, from La Perle du Brésil....................David
Invitation to the Dance, op. 65..................................Weber
Arranged for orchestra by Felix Weingartner.

Mrs. Marian Titus, the singer, has a voice af unusual compass, nor are her extreme upper tones shrill or a mere fleeting squeak. The tones throughout, although small, have carrying power and they are even and agreeable. To her proficiency in colorature seems a birthright. In the aria of the Queen of Night the recitative and larghetto demand for full effect a more dramatic voice. Mrs. Titus sang them intelligently, displaying a fine legato; and she sang the following allegro with delightful accuracy and with a flexibility that gave no suspicion of long labor. Charming, too, was her performance of David's song from the opera with the queer libretto. Do you remember the story? When the opera was revived in 1883 the libretto was revised by Barbiere. At the very last rehearsal Madame Carvalho, the Zora, comprehended the plot and exclaimed with delight, "Oh, I see; the Admiral, then, is in love with Zora!"

Let me now digress a moment. As you know, Mozart wrote the part of the Queen of Night for his sister-in-law, Josepha Weber, whose first husband was Hofer, a violinist. You would naturally suppose that her voice was of extraordinary compass, and you read in certain books, "Josepha, a bravura singer, with a high and flexible voice, but a poor musician." But in F. L. W. Meyer's "Friedrich Ludwig Schröder," Vol. II., p. 87, you will find Schröder speaking thus of her when he saw her as Oberon, at Schikaneder's Theatre (1791): "Oberon, Madame Hofer, formerly Weber. A very disagreeable singer, whose voice is not high enough for the part." This Oberon was by Paul Wranitzky. If Josepha could sing the music of the Queen of Night, for heaven's sake where did Oberon's music, which she could not sing, lie?

I do not like to write about "Thus Spake Zarathustra" after one hearing. It would be an easier task to write about the sage known to us as Zoroaster. It would be easier to quote Pliny: How Zoroaster was the only man who laughed on the day that he was born; how his skull was so hot that you could not keep your hand on it, "which foretold his future great knowledge"; how at the age of three he reached one-half of his full stature; how he lived for twenty years in the desert eating nothing but cheese, which he had prepared so cunningly that it did not smell of age, nor was it musty, nor was it worm-eaten. Still more surprising are the things related concerning him. Thus he forbade walking with naked feet and eating dog's meat. But this would not shed light upon Nietzsche's book or the music of Strauss.

No, I wish to think it over. Obeying the daily newspaper custom that compels expression of opinion immediately after hearing, I recorded impressions, vague impressions. To-day the passages in this stupendous work that are fixed in the memory and still exert a spell are the marvelously broad and impressive opening and the beautiful moments in the Nachtlied. And the finale, with its warring tonalities, its B major opposed to the low and deliberate C—the leaving the eternal riddle of existence unsolved?—still impresses me mightily.

There are many things suggested by this symphonic poem that deserves thoughtful, earnest consideration. It is not a work to be summed up while you smoke a cigarette or stand waiting for a car. PHILIP HALE.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, NOV. 7, 1897.

Fourth Symphony Concert.

The fourth of this season's Symphony concerts in Music hall was enjoyed, Friday afternoon and last evening, by the usual large gatherings. Mr Paur offered the following program:

Symphony in C major, l'Ours, op 66 (Andre, No 2)............................Josef Haydn
Overture to Leonore, No. 2 in C major, op 72, Ludwig van Beethoven
Four movements from serenade No. 7, in D major (Cadenzas by E Paur)............Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart
Violin solo, Mr Franz Kneisel.
Overture, Scherzo, and finale, op 52, Robert Schumann

The symphony in C is one of the most enjoyable of Haydn's larger works, and its performance under Mr Paur's intelligent direction was listened to with much pleasure, and applauded with great heartiness. Rarely has the symphony been given a more satisfactory reading, and the playing of the orchestra left nothing to be desired. The score gives great prominence to the drums and heavy brass instruments, and there have been performances of the work here in the past when the strings and reeds were fairly drowned, but last evening's performance was thoroughly well-balanced and artistically effective.

The No 2 "Leonore" overture was finely played, of course, but it did not prove especially entertaining to the audience. Beethoven wrote so many works of much greater value and interest that it is not surprising that the number is so rarely found on concert programs.

The most enjoyable feature of last night's concert was undoubtedly the splendid performance of the four movements from Mozart's Serenade. The movements were the eight, Adagio in D major and Allegero assai in D major; the second, Andante in G major; the third, Minuet in G minor with trio in G major, and the fourth Rondo: Allegro in G major. Especially interesting was the fact that Mr Paur had written the cadenzas, and no less welcome was it that they were to be played by Mr Franz Kneisel. Of Mr Paur's work only words of warmest praise are to be written. The cadenzas are fine examples of this class of composition and are in keeping with spirit of the original work. Mr Kneisel's playing was positively brilliant, and well merited the enthusiastic applause won from both the audience and members of the orchestra.

The Schumann overture, scherzo and finale proved another agreeable number. The light and buoyant character of the overture with its many charming themes and contrasted color effects, received delightful interpretation; the scherzo, one of the brightest ever written by Schumann, was played with fine spirit and captivating effect, and the work of the orchestra in the brilliant finale was of unrivalled excellence.

There will be no symphony concert this week, the orchestra being away on its first tour of the season. For the concert of Nov 20 the program will be: Mozart's symphony in D major, Paderewski's concerto for pianoforte, Dvorak's suite in D major and Auber's overture to "Carlo Broschi." Mr Alberto Jonas will be the soloist.

—Boston symphony orchestra patrons will hear with pleasure of the remarkable season sale for the five concerts in Philadelphia, undoubtedly the most phenomenal season-ticket sale ever known in that city. In the vast academy of Music, seating over 3000 people, exactly 26 seats remained unsold for the season when the box office opened yesterday morning for the first concert on Monday evening.

—Mr B. F. Keith arrived in New York Friday evening after an absence of one year and seven months. With Mr Keith came his wife, who has been with

Baltimore

The most important musical announcement of the year is that of the annual sale of season tickets for the series of concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall.

The interest in this sale never relaxes, and probably never will as long as the acknowledged high standing of the orchestra is maintained. These concerts have grown to be a permanent and potent element in the entertainment season. Every announcement made by the management has been fulfilled, except in case of illness, accident or events beyond control. No matter what the attraction, the same scale of prices has always been maintained. There will be the usual five performances on Wednesday evenings, November 10, December 15, January 19, February 16 and March 23.

Mr. Emil Paur will again conduct the orchestra, which will be of the same number and membership as last year. To this personnel, practically unchanged for the past 10 years, is largely due the established reputation of the orchestra. Another prominent factor is the enormous total of 1,500 performances which have been given by the orchestra since its founding in 1881. Although Boston is the home of the orchestra, every city visited takes a just pride in the glory of the organization, and the loyal support received everywhere is one of the strongest proofs of its integrity. It is a matter of especial pride with the Boston Symphony Orchestra that the majority of its patrons in this city have attended the concerts from the very beginning.

The programmes for the entire series have already been prepared by Conductor Paur, and include, among other selections, Brahms' Symphony No. 3; Raff's Symphony, "Im Walde;" Dvorak's Symphony, "From the New World;" the Symphony No. 3 of Beethoven, and three movements from the Ninth Symphony, by the same composer. The overtures are the "Benvenuto Cellini," of Berlioz; the Tschaikowsky overture, "1812." The novelties include the "Espagna" of Chabrier, Tschaikowsky's "Italian Caprice," a new suite by Massenet, three movements from a suite by Rimsky Korsakoff and the "Invitation to Dance" of Weber, with a novel and brilliant orchestration by Weingartner.

The soloists are: Mme. Lillian Blauvelt, Mr. David Bispham, Mr. Franz Kneisel and Mr. C. M. Loeffler. An evening will be devoted to selections from Wagner, as usual.

The sale of season tickets will begin at Albert's, on Monday morning, October 18.

* * *

THE NEWS.
DAILY AND WEEKLY.
Providence, Rhode Island.
WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 3, 1897.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

First of the Series Will Be Given in Infantry Hall Tonight.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its series of eight concerts in this city at Infantry Hall this evening, when the great organization will be heard in a superb program including "Espana," rhapsody for orchestra by Chabrier, which will be rendered for the first time at these concerts. The great solo artist Gadski, who is recognized as one of the world's foremost vocalists, will be heard in the famous song "Dreams," from "Tristan and Isolde." This will give scope to the wonderful powers of the gifted songstress and afford an opportunity to hear her at her best. The complete program is as follows:

GADSKI.

Brahms.... Symphony No. 3, in F major
Leopold Damrosch .... Aria, "Sulmaith"
Chabrier Rhapsody for Orchestra "Espana"
(First time at these concerts.)
Wagner .... Song, "Dreams"
.... (Study from "Tristan and Isolde")
Weber ..... "Invitation to the Dance"
Arranged for Orchestra by Felix Weingartner.

It will be noticed that nearly all of the musical feast is practically new to patrons of the orchestra in this city, and that it includes variety as well as merit of the highest grade.

From present indications Infantry Hall will enfold a superb audience this evening.

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL.
THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 4, 1897.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

First Performance of the Season at Infantry Hall Last Evening.

The first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last evening in Infantry Hall. There was a large audience, showing conclusively that the extended scheme of concerts offered this year was a move in the right direction, and one that will command hearty support. In fact, the management reports a larger sale of season tickets than usual. The Symphony audience changes little from year to year, except in the matter of growth. The same familiar faces are to be seen season after season, and not a few have been steady patrons since the beginning of these concerts, a decade and a half ago. Last night there was plainly to be noted an air of subdued expectancy betokening anticipated pleasure, and the interest was further manifested by the fact that practically everybody was seated at the time for the first number to begin.

The orchestra, too, presents virtually the same personnel from one season to another, and thus is rendered possible that superb unity of movement and of purpose that can only come, even with such excellent and finished artists, from long and intimate association. An ideal ensemble demands both a band of virtuosi and the "shaking together" resulting from much rehearsing and many performances. It is needless to point out, at this late day, that this orchestra fulfills the most exacting requirements of individual ability and collective experience.

The customary little ovation was tendered to Conductor Emil Paur as he came forward to his desk, which he, evidently pleased, acknowledged with many smiles and bows. This complimentary episode over, the performance of the evening's programme proceeded in the following order:

Symphony No 3, in F major, Op. 90.......
..............................Johannes Brahms
I. Allegro con brio (F major).
II. Andante (C major).
III. Poco Allegretto (C minor).
IV. Allegro (F minor).
Aria, "Sulmaith"...........Leopold Damrosch
Rhapsody for orchestra, "Espana"........
..........................Emmanuel Chabrier
(First time at these concerts.)
Song, "Dreams" (study from "Tristan and Isolde")....................Richard Wagner
"Invitation to the Dance," Op. 65........
.....................Karl Maria von Weber
(Arranged for orchestra by Felix Weingartner.)

Largely modern as this programme is in its make-up, it offers something very interesting in the way of contrast. Here is Brahms, the greatest modern master of musical form; Wagner, the progenitor of a new and puissant form; Damrosch and Chabrier, disciples of the later school, who abandon all pretence to form outside the fundamental and somewhat elastic bounds of mere rhythm; and the whole topped off with a return to Weber, the century-old maker of melodies still fresh and pleasing. The advocates of contrast as an indispensable factor in successful programme-making could find no fault with this.

Brahms's F major symphony, the piece de resistance of the evening, is one of the many compositions of this master that arouse in the mind of the hearer a most ardent desire to know what it all meant to Brahms. For without the key which the creative mind could alone supply much of it is frankly unintelligible. In its technical construction are to be found some things that show plainly enough that for al' Brahms's great mastery of form he did not always choose to be bound by it. It is not many years ago that critics' hair stood on end at the famous "cross-relation" in the first measures of the opening allegro, and a noted conductor even instructed his players to "make that objectionable A flat as little noticeable as possible," though the musical world has now agreed to recognize it as a stroke of genius. There are, too, not a few harmonics of the sort that art termed "daring" when employed by a great composer, or irrelevant discords if perpetrated by an unknown. The andante contrasts sharply with the rest of the symphony in its simple and unaffected beauty. Here is Brahms in his melodic mood. But by far the most striking and impressive of the four movements is the final allegro. What it all means is hard enough to say. It might pass for an episode of evolution, or indeed for the whole story. Voices as of primeval things seem to call across vast abysses; there are strivings and upheavals of elemental forces; the end comes restfully with the sense of something well completed, but what it stands for still remains unseen. The orchestra played this curious work magnificently, surmounting its technical and rhythmical difficulties with certainty and apparent ease.

Broadly contrasted with the work of Brahms was the rhapsody "Espana" by Emmanuel Chabrier. This is really a fantasia on characteristic Spanish dance tunes, and presents a lively picture of the village fete, wherein the guitars, tambourines, and ruder instruments incite the revellers to the dance. The picture is cunningly drawn and needs no guide-book for its easy and enjoyable appreciation. The instrumention is highly original and always strikingly effective. This, too, was played with abounding fire and suggestiveness, receiving the warmest applause of the evening. Weingartner's orchestral arrangement of Weber's "Invitation to the Dance" made a pleasing close to the concert, albeit the piece is more effective for the piano than with the cleverest arrangement for the orchestra.

The soloist was Madame Johanna Gadski, the brilliant young German prima donna, who made so pleasing an impression at her previous appearance in Infantry Hall with the Symphony Orchestra. The aria by the late Dr. Damrosch is a pretentious but wholly unmusical thing, entirely unworthy of the pains and the excellent singing which Madame Gadski bestowed upon it. It is a most astounding piece of cacophony. A triad of C-major in the upper wind, coming after five minutes of discords, suspensions, and purposeless wandering about, actually sounded like a mistake. In her second number Mme. Gadski showed to advantage the beauty of her young, fresh voice, and her undoubted vocal ability. She is one of the most satisfactory of the sopranos that have been heard here of late years.

The audience was very cordial, recalling the singer a number of times and generously applauding at every opportunity the finished work of the orchestra. A repeat would have been gladly welcomed afteh the Chabrier rhapsody or Mme. Gadski's number, and time would have permitted, for the concert was considerably shorter than usual. But the rule of no encore at these concerts (and a good rule, too,) was not broken. The next concert will be given on the evening of Wednesday, Dec. 1.

BOSTON HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CII., NO. 127.
THURSDAY, NOV. 4, 1897.

MUSIC LOVERS OUT IN FORCE.

Opening of Boston Symphony Orchestra's 16th Season in Providence.

[Special Dispatch to the Boston Herald.]

PROVIDENCE, R. I., Nov. 3, 1897. The Boston Symphony orchestra's 16th season was opened at Music Hall tonight. The audience was large and critical, all the first people and the professional musicians of the city being present. Every number was enthusiastically received, and Conductor Paur was obliged to respond to the encores. Mme. Gadski, the soloist, scored a great success.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.
NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 3, 1897.

The program of the third Symphony concert in Music Hall last night was as follows:

Symphony No. 3, in F major.................................Brahms
Recitative, Non paventar, and aria, Infelice, from Il Flauto Magico..Mozart
Symphonic poem, Thus Spake Zarathustra, op. 30............Strauss
(First time in Boston.)
Charmant Oiseau, from La Perle du Brésil.....................David
Invitation to the Dance, op. 65..............................Weber
Arranged for orchestra by Felix Weingartner.

Mrs. Marian Titus, the singer, has a voice af unusual compass, nor are her extreme upper tones shrill or a mere fleeting squeak. The tones throughout, although small, have carrying power and they are even and agreeable. To her proficiency in colorature seems a birthright. In the aria of the Queen of Night the recitative and larghetto demand for full effect a more dramatic voice. Mrs. Titus sang them intelligently, displaying a fine legato; and she sang the following allegro with delightful accuracy and with a flexibility that gave no suspicion of long labor. Charming, too, was her performance of David's song from the opera with the queer libretto. Do you remember the story? When the opera was revived in 1883 the libretto was revised by Barbiere. At the very last rehearsal Madame Carvalho, the Zora, comprehended the plot and exclaimed with delight, "Oh, I see; the Admiral, then, is in love with Zora!"

Let me now digress a moment. As you know, Mozart wrote the part of the Queen of Night for his sister-in-law, Josepha Weber, whose first husband was Hofer, a violinist. You would naturally suppose that her voice was of extraordinary compass, and you read in certain books, "Josepha, a bravura singer, with a high and flexible voice, but a poor musician." But in F. L. W. Meyer's "Friedrich Ludwig Schröder," Vol. II., p. 87, you will find Schröder speaking thus of her when he saw her as Oberon, at Schikaneder's Theatre (1791): "Oberon, Madame Hofer, formerly Weber. A very disagreeable singer, whose voice is not high enough for the part." This Oberon was by Paul Wranitzky. If Josepha could sing the music of the Queen of Night, for heaven's sake where did Oberon's music, which she could not sing, lie?

I do not like to write about "Thus Spake Zarathustra" after one hearing. It would be an easier task to write about the sage known to us as Zoroaster. It would be easier to quote Pliny: How Zoroaster was the only man who laughed on the day that he was born; how his skull was so hot that you could not keep your hand on it, "which foretold his future great knowledge"; how at the age of three he reached one-half of his full stature; how he lived for twenty years in the desert eating nothing but cheese, which he had prepared so cunningly that it did not smell of age, nor was it musty, nor was it worm-eaten. Still more surprising are the things related concerning him. Thus he forbade walking with naked feet and eating dog's meat. But this would not shed light upon Nietzsche's book or the music of Strauss.

No, I wish to think it over. Obeying the daily newspaper custom that compels expression of opinion immediately after hearing, I recorded impressions, vague impressions. To-day the passages in this stupendous work that are fixed in the memory and still exert a spell are the marvelously broad and impressive opening and the beautiful moments in the Nachtlied. And the finale, with its warring tonalities, its B major opposed to the low and deliberate C—the leaving the eternal riddle of existence unsolved?—still impresses me mightily.

There are many things suggested by this symphonic poem that deserves thoughtful, earnest consideration. It is not a work to be summed up while you smoke a cigarette or stand waiting for a car. PHILIP HALE.

BROOKLYN LIFE
VOL. XVI. BROOKLYN, N. Y., NOV. 6, 1897. No. 401

ON Friday afternoon the first of the series of five matinee concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place in the Academy. The program includes the Brahm's Symphony No. 3, an Adagio and Scherzo by Goetz, and the Berliz overture to "Benvenuta Cellini." The soloists will be Mrs. Titus and Franz Kneisel. Saturday evening a second series will be begun. Haydn's Symphony No. 7 will be played, and also for the first time here Chabrier's "Espana" and the Weber-Weingartner "Invitation to the Dance." Joseffy will be the soloist.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, NOV. 7, 1897.

Fourth Symphony Concert.

The fourth of this season's Symphony concerts in Music hall was enjoyed, Friday afternoon and last evening, by the usual large gatherings. Mr Paur offered the following program:

Symphony in C major, l'Ours, op 66 (Andre, No 2)..........................Josef Haydn
Overture to Leonore, No. 2 in C major, op 72, Ludwig van Beethoven
Four movements from serenade No. 7, in D major (Cadenzas by E Paur)........... Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart
Violin solo, Mr Franz Kneisel.
Overture, Scherzo, and finale, op 52, Robert Schumann

The symphony in C is one of the most enjoyable of Haydn's larger works, and its performance under Mr Paur's intelligent direction was listened to with much pleasure, and applauded with great heartiness. Rarely has the symphony been given a more satisfactory reading, and the playing of the orchestra left nothing to be desired. The score gives great prominence to the drums and heavy brass instruments, and there have been performances of the work here in the past when the strings and reeds were fairly drowned, but last evening's performance was thoroughly well-balanced and artistically effective.

The No 2 "Leonore" overture was finely played, of course, but it did not prove especially entertaining to the audience. Beethoven wrote so many works of much greater value and interest that it is not surprising that the number is so rarely found on concert programs.

The most enjoyable feature of last night's concert was undoubtedly the splendid performance of the four movements from Mozart's Serenade. The movements were the eight, Adagio in D major and Allegero assai in D major; the second, Andante in G major; the third, Minuet in G minor with trio in G major, and the fourth Rondo: Allegro in G major. Especially interesting was the fact that Mr Paur had written the cadenzas, and no less welcome was it that they were to be played by Mr Franz Kneisel. Of Mr Paur's work only words of warmest praise are to be written. The cadenzas are fine examples of this class of composition and are in keeping with spirit of the original work. Mr Kneisel's playing was positively brilliant, and well merited the enthusiastic applause won from both the audience and members of the orchestra.

The Schumann overture, scherzo and finale proved another agreeable number. The light and buoyant character of the overture with its many charming themes and contrasted color effects, received delightful interpretation; the scherzo, one of the brightest ever written by Schumann, was played with fine spirit and captivating effect, and the work of the orchestra in the brilliant finale was of unrivalled excellence.

There will be no symphony concert this week, the orchestra being away on its first tour of the season. For the concert of Nov 20 the program will be: Mozart's symphony in D major, Paderewski's concerto for pianoforte, Dvorak's suite in D major and Auber's overture to "Carlo Broschi." Mr Alberto Jonas will be the soloist.

—Boston symphony orchestra patrons will hear with pleasure of the remarkable season sale for the five concerts in Philadelphia, undoubtedly the most phenomenal season-ticket sale ever known in that city. In the vast academy of Music, seating over 3000 people, exactly 26 seats remained unsold for the season when the box office opened yesterday morning for the first concert on Monday evening.

—Mr B. F. Keith arrived in New York Friday evening after an absence of one year and seven months. With Mr Keith came his wife, who has been with

NEWS. PROVIDEN

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Gave Its First Concert to a Delighted Audience.

The Splendid but Short Program Was Artistically Interpreted.

Johannes Brahms..........................
......Symphony No. 3, in F major, Op. 90
1. Allegro con brio F (major)......6-4
2. Andante (C major)..............6-4
3. Poco Allegretto (C minor)........3-8
4. Allegro (F minor)................2-2
Leopold Damrosch..........Aria, "Sulmaith"
Emmanuel Chabrier.........................
........Rhapsody for orchestra, "Espana"
(First time at these concerts.)
Richard Wagner...............................
..........Song, "Dreams" (Study from "Tristan and Isolde")
Karl Maria von Weber.......................
........"Invitation to the Dance," Op. 65
Arranged for orchestra by Felix Weingartner.

Boston plumes itself for excellence in several directions, but in one respect it holds the palm and sits on a lofty eminence in musical art through the magnificent achievements of its superb Symphony Orchestra. It is a great distinction to be foremost in any good thing but to be recognized as the most accomplished exponent of the divine art in a nation, a continent, and probably the world, is a triumph rarely achieved in a young nation under government by the people and for the people. There is hardly time to stop by the wayside of art to achieve greatness in an avenue not overcrowded with gifted aspirants.

EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.

Boston, however, had art lovers, public-spirited citizens and wealth enough to start, foster and maintain a musical organization that has become world famous. From a few, comparatively speaking, it has grown into the affections of many, until today the Boston Symphony Orchestra is beloved in every large centre where music has an abiding place and where beauty, strength and grace in tone expression is understood and appreciated. The ever widening circles of its influence are enfolding the people and teaching them musical mysteries that were only understood by students and musicians a few years ago. It is therefore a great educator as well as pleasure purveyor. This charming element is not only recognized in this city, but every where else that the orchestra plays.

New York will crowd its fine temple of music, the Metropolitan Opera House, whenever this famous band appears; and Baltimore, Washington, Philadelphia and other large cities are equally as liberal in patronage and as generous with appreciation and praise. It is small wonder, therefore, that Infantry Hall held a splendid audience last evening when the orchestra began its season of eight concerts in this city.

A casual examination of the makeup of the audience showed that the patronage was almost entirely the same as that which has made these concerts so profitable to the management of the orchestra and which encouraged the increase from six to eight concerts during the season. The expected addition to the regular habitues was also noted, and the increase will be more notable as the subsequent musical feasts are spread before the public.

The only fault to be found with the [illegible] program of last evening was its brevity. The audience left the hall hungry for more. "I could sit all night and listen," was a frequent remark as the people reluctantly departed.

There has been little change in the personnel of the orchestra since last year and the reappearance of the artists was acknowledged and included in the hearty greeting which Conductor Emil Paur received as he advanced to the desk. It was a glad "how do you do," and the great conductor showed that he was pleased to meet his neighbors again.

The symphony which was the first number played has not been heard often, and it is not well understood even by musicians. It illustrates the Brahmsish characteristics, however, and for this reason certain interest centres about the work. It was first played in 1884, and its peculiarity of construction was a theme of discussion by the critics at that time. Its chief peculiarity consists of a frequently recurring phrase of evident thematic significance, which is not one of the regular themes of the work. It conjures strange fancies and sets the imagination on a revel. The andante is more harmonious, quiet and simple, and it leaves a pleasant taste, [illegible] is a sort of romanza, having no particular bearing on that which has gone before. The closing movement added to the uncertainty of the composer's drift and accentuated the mystery which has always clouded his meaning. It was an enjoyable number and it was superbly played. Indeed the skill of the artists employed in its interpretation accounted in a large measure for the interest it sustained.

In strange contrast to the symphony was the frolicsome rhapsody "Espana," which conjured a whole village of festive Spaniards in a big frolic. Something of the same spirit which greeted its first performance in Paris in 1883 was felt last evening. From the first it was a prodigious success. It is a brilliant fantasia, perfectly free in form, on original Spanish dance tunes and its reception at this concert was most cordial. Its unfamiliarity to most of those present made it especially agreeable.

The Weber number was more familiar as it is a favorite with the more accomplished pianists. It made a graceful and pleasing conclusion to the particular work of the orchestra. The accompaniments to the selections by Mme. Gadski, however, were rendered superbly and contributed a generous share to the success of the solo vocalist.

Mme. Gadski has been heard in this city before and her fine vocal gifts received their full measure of praise last season. She is one of the best sopranos now before the public, and her excellent method and thorough equipment to master the most intricate music was understood and felt even in the rather unsatisfying Damrosch aria "Sulmaith." Her

A MUSICAL ADVANTAGE.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra which opened its season in Providence last evening may be claimed as one of our own distinguishing institutions. To this splendid company of artists, the pre-eminent musical organization of America, Providence has long since ceased to be an experiment, but here the Symphony counts with confidence upon one of its most cultured and cordial audiences, new evidence of which is afforded by this season's program which extended by two concerts over previous years.

Providence is fortunate to be so situated as to have the Symphony Orchestra easily at command, for while its field, as the leading organization of its kind in the country, is national, it is, of course, a physical impossibility for it to cover more than a very limited portion of that field. New York extends its royal welcome on its occasional visits to that city, and if it were feasible a triumphal tour is open to it through the country. As it is the opportunity to hear this large and gifted band of artists, selected and assembled from Europe and America's choicest company, is open only to a very limited area of which our city is fortunately a part. That the music lovers of Providence are sufficiently numerous and enthusiastic to make its visit to our city a good business investment is a matter for congratulation since many a community would welcome the chance to change places with this favored town when the musical season opens.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, NOVEMBER 7, 1897.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The fourth of this season's symphony concerts, taken as a whole, was perhaps the most enjoyable of those so far given because of the uniform excellence of the band.

The programme opened with Haydn's Symphony in C major, which is one of the most popular of this composer's works. Mr. Paur has the faculty of interpreting all of Haydn's compositions in a wholly delightful manner, and he carried his men through the four movements of the symphony with so much fervor as to arouse the audience to quite a display of enthusiasm. The second and third numbers of the programme were transposed, which brought the four movements from the Mozart Serenade No. 7 next. This brought forward Mr. Kneisel, who played the always charming violin solos in a very artistic manner. It is great pleasure to listen to Mr. Kneisel, for he steadily improves in his art. At each hearing he seems to grow more intense, and his tones take on that added firmness and strength which make everything he does thoroughly convincing. And no one appreciates his masterly interpretation of everything he does more than the Symphony patrons, and they always accord him the applause he deserves.

Following came the Beethoven overture to "Lenore," No. 2, which is of a martial order and thoroughly soul-stirring. This is the first grand overture Beethoven ever wrote, and is not often heard at these concerts. It is full of beautiful phrases and there are a number of charming melodies skilfully developed. The Schumann overture, or rather three movements of it, finished the programme. Especially delightful was the second movement, with its graceful rhythm and the way the orchestra brought out all its subtle beauties could not have been improved upon.

At the next concert, two weeks hence, there will be selections from Mozart, Paderewski, Dvorak and Auber, and the piano soloist will be Mr. Alberto Jonas.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.

MONDAY MORNING, NOV. 8, 1897.

Symphony Concert Up to Highest Standard of Orchestra.

The programme of Saturday showed that Dr. Paur feared that indigestion or even gout might follow upon the heels of the rich viands he has been allowing us; therefore Strauss, Rimski-Korsakoff, and all the other highly spiced dishes, were put back in the cupboard, and we were suddenly ordered a simple diet of musical oatmeal and gruel.

A long reign of simplicity marked the first two thirds of the concert, and Haydn and Mozart ousted the morbid and noisy moderns. After all it is as well to be reminded occasionally that there was once a time when seventh chords were resolved, and when logical ideas were expressed without the aid of a monster brass band. But the change came somewhat over suddenly, and the course of dieting was continued too long. It was not good policy to present a light work by Mozart directly after a very simple Haydn symphony. Mr. Paur was too evidently anxious to separate the sheep from the goats, to serve his novelties and his antiquities in batches. Therefore the concert at first seemed a little too rococo. But it rested the men and it was easy for the audience.

Haydn's symphony, called "The Bear" (for Haydn's frequent duplication of keys rendered special nomenclature necessary in a time when opus numbers were not carefully used) was charmingly played, and the last movement, particularly, had an abandon and a swing that was inspiring. Good, healthy and exhilarating music it was, and its merits were recognized by the audience.

There were no moments of frenzy in the work, no passages (as in "Zarathustra") where a war between B major and C major symbolically proved that all human knowledge ends in doubt and dissatisfaction; there was no philosophy of any kind, only some attractive melody, some pure harmony, some clearly-defined musical architecture, and a very lively ending, resembling a bear-dance. Yet it seemed a good foundation to build upon. Perhaps some day a composer will come along who will unite this directness of melody, this perfect symmetry of parts, with modern orchestration and more advanced figure development, and that composer will clear the modern musical atmosphere. We fancy that Bizet might have become such a composer had he only lived beyond the "fatal thirties."

To follow Addison with Wordsworth, to give gentle Mozart after simple Haydn, was "wasteful and ridiculous excess." It was the Haffner Serenade that came after the symphony, curtailed to four movements, with Mr. F. Kneisel in the obbligato violin part. This serenade (a set of short movements, in the last century fashion for instrumental serenades) was originally a bit of lightly scored wedding music for the daughter of a merchant, an unpretentious and pretty composition—in its proper sphere. Of the man who passes by such a work disdainfully one can only say:—

> "A primrose by a river's brim
> A yellow primrose was to him,
> And it was nothing more,"

Only on this occasion it might be objected that the primrose was magnified into a chrysanthemum. The work is essentially chamber music, and it did not fit a symphonic programme in Music Hall; and in its full orchestral dress it seemed like a country maiden in a Worth gown. Mr. Kneisel played the solo passages with a quiet and modest manner that suited well to the number, and the cadenzas by Mr. Paur were commendably unobtrusive and musicianly. It speaks well for our director's poetic insight that he is able to give a fitting set of cadenzas to a work of this character; most composers would have over-loaded the music with some prolix figure treatment or some briliant display of their individuality, but these cadenzas seemed to grow logically out of Mozart's themes. Both Mr. Paur and Mr. Kneisel were applauded at the end of every movement.

And now there came a step towards modern music in the performance of Beethoven's "Leonore Overture, No. 2." The overture is not in the full modern style ("Leonore, No. 3," is that), but it seemed grandly dramatic, coming after so much last century music; one was able to appreciate it, on this occasion, as those did who first heard it, when it seemed the culmination of all that was bold, emotional and daring. It must not be forgotten that there are some who prefer the second Leonore overture (the accepted numeration is not chronologically correct) to the famous "No. 3." While we are not of these, we certainly may deplore that the greater work is pushing the less developed one into obsolescence; the present number is heard far too seldom, it is treated like a poor relation in a rich family.

It received a really splendid interpretation; powerful, earnest, with every little figure and sub-theme brought out clearly, so that the veriest tyro might follow its construction. Its famous trumpet call was given (by Mr. Mueller we presume) without a break and in perfect combination with the distant orchestra.

The concert then took a step still nearer to the music of today by presenting Schumann's "Overture, Scherzo and Finale," really a symphony without a slow movement, and more clearly in symphonic form than the four "symphonies" of the composer. Although given to the world in a revised form, the little symphony was originally an outcome of that happy period which marked Schumann's highest powers, the year immediately following his marriage with Clara Wieck, which took place in 1840. Just as this epoch brought forth two contrasted cycles of song ("Frauenliebe und Leben" and "Dichterliebe") so one finds it evolving simultaneously, two different symphonies, the glorious one in B flat, recently performed, and this earnest and less popular work.

Although there is no slow movement in this composition it seems a more sombre work than the B flat symphony. It is probably the more Schumanneesque of the two; if there seem too much of dissonance, of shadow, for a product of the happiest era of the composer's life, it may be remembered that with Schumann a great joy was a serious thing, that the dreamy part of his dual nature, the part he named "Eusebius," was ever introspective, never wildly jubilant.

If in speaking of Schumann's works we constantly refer to points in the composer's life, it may be borne in mind that this composer wrote music more directly autobiographical than any other. His music was often the offspring of definite events in his career.

We have spoken of the clear architecture of this work; the sonata-allegro of the first movement is as clear as one of Mozart's, and as the concert-overture (established by his colleague Mendelssohn) was a sonata-allegro form, we can understand the title—"Overture"—as given to this first movement; it is as much a concert-overture as "The Hebrides," or "The Fair Melusina."

Every movement was finely played; in fact, the whole concert was up to the highest standard of our orchestra. The finale was given with a massive power and solidity that caused it to become almost a revelation. The culmination was like a great hymn of thanksgiving, and infinitely more sincere and convincing than the offering of thanks with which Mendelssohn closes his "Scotch" symphony.

Altogether then, if the programme was not the most pregnant with interest, if it lacked contrast in its earlier numbers and movements, it was none the less one of the enjoyable occasions, chiefly because of the steadiness and perfection of ensemble that ruled throughout.

Louis C. Elson.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CII., NO. 130.

SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 7, 1897.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Fine Programme of Music of the Older Compositions.

A Wholly Pleasing Concert and Most Interesting—The Haydn Symphony and a Beethoven Overture Among the Numbers—A Mozart Serenade.

The programme for last evening's concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall was:

Symphony in C..............................Haydn
Overture to "Leonore," No. 2.......Beethoven
Four movements from the "Haffner" Serenade..............................Mozart
Overture, scherzo and finale.........Schumann

After programmes so largely devoted to what was extremely modern, it was probably thought advisable to return wholly to the old by way of contrast. Without putting in a plea against the new, nor intending any captious reflection on it, still, it is good now and then to return to first principles. The concert was wholly pleasing and deeply interesting.

The Haydn symphony, though in the composer's most naive vein in the first three movements, shows him almost at his best in the finale, which, for some undiscoverable reason, caused the work to be given the title, "L'Ours." Why "The Bear"?

Many of his symphonies have had these droll names conferred on them, such as "Morning," "Noon," "Evening," "The Hen," "The Schoolmaster," "Mercury," "The Philosopher," "The Chase," "The Clock," and so on. Another is named "Mit dem Paukenschlag," and still another "Mit dem Paukenwirbel."

Haydn wrote 125 symphonies, and as he necessarily repeated the keys very often, this christening of them was probably by way of giving them a more certain recognition than the key name would have provided. The process was carried still further and more prosaically by naming a set of symphonies after the letters of the whole alphabet.

The finale of "The Bear" is the most interesting of the movements, the working out being in Haydn's most vigorous and most elaborate and most brilliant manner.

The serenade, which was written for the wedding of Elizabeth Hafner, a daughter of one of the prominent merchants of Germany, was not the only work Mozart composed in honor of the Hafners, the other being a symphony in D, also composed for a wedding in the same family.

The serenade is in eight movements, of which only an adagio, one of the four allegros, an andante and one of the three minuets were performed last evening. Of these movements three have a part for the solo violin, the andante being prominent in this regard. For the solo instrument Mr. Paur has written cadenzas which are thoroughly charming in their close adherence to the spirit of the work in which they are introduced, in their grace and refinement of taste and in their effectiveness. In addition they are discreetly brief, not over ambitious, are in nowise obtrusive, and give a delightfully piquant and appropriate emphasis at just the proper moment.

The serenade was beautifully read and performed, the fine minuet with special nobility of style. Mr. Kneisel interpreted the solo part with infinite delicacy, and in the andante with a warm and tender sympathy that was artistic in the very best sense of the word. This performance throughout was genuine Mozart playing, which, simple as it may appear, is not a task easy of successful achievement. There was great applause after each movement, and Mr. Paur and Mr. Kneisel were called on to bow their acknowledgement on each occasion.

The Beethoven overture, in several respects the most effective, if not the most elaborate, of the introductions he composed for his operas, wears wonderfully. Even at a time when music is revolutionized it still sounds fresh, orchestration included, and among all the overtures that have been written since it would not be easy to find its peer. It was splendidly read and played; nothing was lacking in regard to color, vigor and effectiveness.

The Schumann symphony cannot be said to retain its freshness, except in the scherzo. The repetitions in the first movement begin to pall and the hues have faded. The work of the orchestra

---

When Mr. Paur stepped upon the platform in Providence, Wednesday, to open the series of symphony concerts there, he and his men not only faced the largest gathering of society and musical folk that had ever greeted them, but the conductor had a personal tribute. His stand was covered with a decoration of smilax strings studded with carnations.

In the burst of enthusiasm which greeted Mme. Gadski, Mr. Paur plucked the carnations and presented them to her, which graceful act won him her smile and the plaudits of the house.

Mr. Curtis Guild of the Commercial Bulletin, who has been confined to his bed for a fortnight with a serious illness, is now making rapid progress tow-

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 8, 1897

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The programme of the fourth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was:

Haydn: Symphony in C major, "L'Ours," opus 66.
Mozart: Four movements from Serenade No. 7, in D Major, "Haffner."
(Cadenzas by Mr. E. Paur; violin solo, Mr. F. Kneisel.)
Beethoven: Overture to "Leonore," No. 2, opus 72.
Schumann: Overture, Scherzo and Finale, opus 52.

What looks well enough on paper is not always so welcome to the ear. The succession of such four names as Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven and Schumann—in historico-chronological order, too—has, in itself, something that appeals pleasantly to the imagination; it suggests a bird's-eye view of the progressive work of four great classicists, in which the romantic element comes more and more to the fore the farther down one gets in the list. But, to the ear, such a programme may well be rather tiresome than otherwise, in this year 1897; and we doubt if most of last Saturday evening's audience did not find it so. The wisdom of giving entirely classical programmes nowadays is as questionable as that of giving wholly modern ones, in which novelties predominate. Each of these two sorts appeals welcomely only to those who are to a certain extent extremists in their musical taste; and there are comparatively few such extremists in any audience. Such programmes leave the majority of the public out in the cold. It need not be denied that they do not wholly lack variety, in a way; one certainly can find in them variety in individuality, variety in style and manner; but what one misses in them is variety in musical and artistic point of view, just the variety which is most palpable to the general listener.

Last Saturday evening's concert suggests to us some thoughts on the classical orchestral repertory in general, and its present position in the scheme of concert-giving. This position is by no means what it was twenty years ago. It may be well to consider why.

The present writer cannot remember the time when it was not the general consensus of musicians in this city that the Music Hall was too large a place for good orchestral effect; and by good orchestral effect was meant, twenty or twenty-five years ago, the good effect of the classical orchestral repertory, for the classical repertory was pretty nearly all we had then. But the unsatisfactory effect of orchestral playing in the Music Hall was, upon the whole, felt by musicians only, by men who had an ideal standard in their minds, and found this standard fallen short of; the general public, whose standard is based more upon what they are in the habit of actually hearing than upon any preconceived ideal, did not, as a rule, feel the insufficiency. Most of them had heard orchestral playing only in the Music Hall, and had no other notions of orchestral effect than were to be gathered from what they heard. Moreover, they had little or no means of drawing comparisons. To be sure, some of the newer music—by Berlioz, Liszt and Wagner—began to creep into our programmes, and its more sonorous scoring showed itself better fitted to cope with the sound-absorbing spaciousness of the hall. But this new music had not then really won for itself an acknowledged place in the repertory; it was commonly regarded as something strange, irregular, abnormal, and was, upon the whole, not very generally liked. Musicians, even those most opposed to it, could not help recognizing that, with all its then questionable peculiarities, it really did sound in the Music Hall, and that the hall was not too large for it; but the general public, whose notions of orchestral effect were based, as we have said, upon the effect of the classical repertory in that particular place, found it unduly noisy. At any rate, their experience of what of the modern music they heard, with its brilliant, sonorous scoring and imposing masses of orchestral tone, did not in the least affect their enjoyment of older, less-powerfully scored compositions; their general standard of orchestral effect remained what it had been. That is, they still looked upon the effect of the classical repertory in the Music Hall as normal, and upon that of the newer music as abnormal and over-strident. They had little comprehension of what musicians meant by calling the effect of the newer music normal, and that of the classical repertory abnormally weak, vague and breezy. When some musician happened to tell them of the effect of, say, a Haydn symphony in the old Leipzig Gewandhaus, where "the strings sounded strong as trumpets, and the first violins cut like a knife," they only wondered how he could like that sort of thing, for they themselves did not want anything to "cut like a knife."

But these conditions are entirely and radically altered now. The newer music has won for itself a regular, recognized place in the concert repertory; the more sonorous scoring of Berlioz, Liszt, Wagner, Brahms, Goldmark, Dvorak, and others has become the rule rather than the exception, and the public ear has grown accustomed to it. More than this, the modern Frenchmen and Russians are coming in—Tchaikóvsky, Bizet, and Saint-Saëns have even a settled position in the repertory—and the "orchestral extremists," instead of being Berlioz or Wagner, are now Chabrier and Richard Strauss. In a word, the general ear has become habituated to modern orchestration and to its effect in the Music Hall; the public has at last got a standard of comparison by which it is beginning to appreciate that the effect of the classical repertory is really unduly weak and unimpressive. The classical repertory is accordingly gradually sliding down the declivity of unpopularity; the public finds it less to its taste than formerly, the orchestra itself is growing tired of it.

This is sad; for the classical repertory is, after all, still the backbone of a symphony concert season. Perhaps doubly sad, because this growing distaste for the great classic masters springs mainly from a correct appreciation of what normal orchestral effect really is and should be, and musicians and general public feel much the same about the matter—much the same, if with a noteworthy difference in one particular. The general public is not much given to reasoning; if it finds that the classic repertory is getting tedious in comparison with the newer things, it takes for granted that the former is being naturally and quite legitimately ousted by the latter, according to the general law of decay of the old and thriving of the new. So they see no reason for not being off with the old love and on with the new, without further ado. They do not appreciate, as musicians do, that the classic repertory is gradually being legitimately ousted by the modern only in halls like the Music Hall; that the older things never sounded any better there than they do now, but that they themselves have unconsciously come to the position held by musicians twenty years ago, that the effect of the classic repertory never was good in that vast place. If the older things could only be played to them in a hall of fitting size, there can be no reasonable doubt that the public would enjoy them as heartily now as ever.

Unfortunately this is just what cannot be done; the large concert hall—of which our Music Hall is a fair average sample—is one of the nearly universal and characteristic conditions of orchestral concert-giving all over the musical world today; the large hall "has come to stay." Even were Mr. Higginson inclined to split up his season into two courses, one modern course in the Music Hall, and one classical one in a more fitting place, there is no such smaller hall in Boston. The classical repertory must continue to be given here at a terrible, and ever-increasing, disadvantage.

One more consideration, and, to our thinking, the unhappiest of all. The style in which the works of the great classic masters are now given here seems to us the very worst calculated to enable them to keep up a successful competition with the newer music, under conditions which are already unfavorable in themselves. If the classic repertory have any sound hope of survival, in competition with the new, this hope lies in its contrast with the new, not in its similarity. And the now prevalent fashion of applying a distinctly modern style of performance to classical compositions tends more and more to efface this contrast. Instead of emphasizing, even perhaps to a degree bordering upon exaggeration, the most characteristic and distinctive features of the older music, those features in which it differs most from the more modern, and so giving it a special flavor and zest of its own, modern conductors—of whom Mr. Paur is a fair example—seem bent upon modernizing the expression of the older works and making them sound as much like the newer ones as they can. Instead of throwing into sharp relief the rhythmic vivacity and energy, the coherence and clearness of development, the general continuity of mood and unity of design of the older music—traits in which it contrasts most sharply with the newer,—Mr. Paur seems to do his best to veil these characteristic features behind a distinctively modern fitfulness of style, vagueness of rhythm, and instability of tempo.

Take last Saturday evening's concert as an example; it seemed as if our orchestra were wholly unable to play a crescendo without hurrying, a diminuendo without dragging, a bit of expressive cantilena without taking it at a sentimentalizing slow tempo. In short, it seemed as if it had fallen for good(?) and all into the rudimentary faults against which fervid beginners of sweet sixteen are warned. The only thing that produced its true effect was the Mozart serenade—partly, no doubt, because of Mr. Kneisel's admirable playing of the solo part and his often taking the tempo into his own hands; but also largely because just this composition of Mozart's was written for a very small band of players, for performance in a private house, and the enormous doubling of the string-parts by our orchestra brought it up to something like normal relations to the vast Music Hall.

The next programme (for Friday afternoon, Nov. 19, and Saturday evening, Nov. 20—there will be no concert nor rehearsal this week) is: Mozart, symphony in D major, No. 7 (without minuet); Paderewski, pianoforte concerto in A minor, opus 17; Dvorak, suite in D major, opus 39; Auber, overture to "La Part du Diable." Mr. Alberto Jonas will be the pianist.

BOSTON EVENING [illegible]

NOVEMBER 8 1897.

Symphony Concert Up to Highest Standard of Orchestra.

The programme of Saturday showed that Dr. Paur feared that indigestion or even gout might follow upon the heels of the rich viands he has been allowing us; therefore Strauss, Rimski-Korsakoff, and all the other highly spiced dishes, were put back in the cupboard, and we were suddenly ordered a simple diet of musical oatmeal and gruel.

A long reign of simplicity marked the first two thirds of the concert, and Haydn and Mozart ousted the morbid and noisy moderns. After all it is as well to be reminded occasionally that there was once a time when seventh chords were resolved, and when logical ideas were expressed without the aid of a monster brass band. But the change came somewhat over suddenly, and the course of dieting was continued too long. It was not good policy to present a light work by Mozart directly after a very simple Haydn symphony. Mr. Paur was too evidently anxious to separate the sheep from the goats, to serve his novelties and his antiquities in batches. Therefore the concert at first seemed a little too rococo. But it rested the men and it was easy for the audience.

Haydn's symphony, called "The Bear" (for Haydn's frequent duplication of keys rendered special nomenclature necessary in a time when opus numbers were not carefully used) was charmingly played, and the last movement, particularly, had an abandon and a swing that was inspiring. Good, healthy and exhilarating music it was, and its merits were recognized by the audience.

There were no moments of frenzy in the work, no passages (as in "Zarathustra") where a war between B major and C major symbolically proved that all human knowledge ends in doubt and dissatisfaction; there was no philosophy of any kind, only some attractive melody, some pure harmony, some clearly-defined musical architecture, and a very lively ending, resembling a bear-dance. Yet it seemed a good foundation to build upon. Perhaps some day a composer will come along who will unite this directness of melody, this perfect symmetry of parts, with modern orchestration and more advanced figure development, and that composer will clear the modern musical atmosphere. We fancy that Bizet might have become such a composer had he only lived beyond the "fatal thirties."

To follow Addison with Wordsworth, to give gentle Mozart after simple Haydn, was "wasteful and ridiculous excess." It was the Haffner Serenade that came after the symphony, curtailed to four movements, with Mr. F. Kneisel in the obbligato violin part. This serenade (a set of short movements, in the last century fashion for instrumental serenades) was originally a bit of lightly scored wedding music for the daughter of a merchant, an unpretentious and pretty composition—in its proper sphere. Of the man who passes by such a work disdainfully one can only say:—

> "A primrose by a river's brim
> A yellow primrose was to him,
> And it was nothing more,"

Only on this occasion it might be objected that the primrose was magnified into a chrysanthemum. The work is essentially chamber music, and it did not fit a symphonic programme in Music Hall; and in its full orchestral dress it seemed like a country maiden in a Worth gown. Mr. Kneisel played the solo passages with a quiet and modest manner that suited well to the number, and the cadenzas by Mr. Paur were commendably unobtrusive and musicianly. It speaks well for our director's poetic insight that he is able to give a fitting set of cadenzas to a work of this character; most composers would have over-loaded the music with some prolix figure treatment or some briliant display of their individuality, but these cadenzas seemed to grow logically out of Mozart's themes. Both Mr. Paur and Mr. Kneisel were applauded at the end of every movement.

And now there came a step towards modern music in the performance of Beethoven's "Leonore Overture, No. 2." The overture is not in the full modern style ("Leonore, No. 3," is that), but it seemed grandly dramatic, coming after so much last century music; one was able to appreciate it, on this occasion, as those did who first heard it, when it seemed the culmination of all that was bold, emotional and daring. It must not be forgotten that there are some who prefer the second Leonore overture (the accepted numeration is not chronologically correct) to the famous "No. 3." While we are not of these, we certainly may deplore that the greater work is pushing the less developed one into obsolescence; the present number is heard far too seldom, it is treated like a poor relation in a rich family.

It received a really splendid interpretation; powerful, earnest, with every little figure and sub-theme brought out clearly, so that the veriest tyro might follow its construction. Its famous trumpet call was given (by Mr. Mueller we presume) without a break and in perfect combination with the distant orchestra.

The concert then took a step still nearer to the music of today by presenting Schumann's "Overture, Scherzo and Finale," really a symphony without a slow movement, and more clearly in symphonic form than the four "symphonies" of the composer. Although given to the world in a revised form, the little symphony was originally an outcome of that happy period which marked Schumann's highest powers, the year immediately following his marriage with Clara Wieck, which took place in 1840. Just as this epoch brought forth two contrasted cycles of song ("Frauenliebe und Leben" and "Dichterliebe") so one finds it evolving simultaneously, two different symphonies, the glorious one in B flat, recently performed, and this earnest and less popular work.

Although there is no slow movement in this composition it seems a more sombre work than the B flat symphony. It is probably the more Schumannesque of the two; if there seem too much of dissonance, of shadow, for a product of the happiest era of the composer's life, it may be remembered that with Schumann a great joy was a serious thing, that the dreamy part of his dual nature, the part he named "Eusebius," was ever introspective, never wildly jubilant.

If in speaking of Schumann's works we constantly refer to points in the composer's life, it may be borne in mind that this composer wrote music more directly autobiographical than any other. His music was often the offspring of definite events in his career.

We have spoken of the clear architecture of this work; the sonata-allegro of the first movement is as clear as one of Mozart's, and as the concert-overture (established by his colleague Mendelssohn) was a sonata-allegro form, we can understand the title—"Overture"—as given to this first movement; it is as much a concert-overture as "The Hebrides," or "The Fair Melusina."

Every movement [illegible] played, in fact, the whole concert was up to the highest standard of our orchestra. The finale was given with a massive power and solidity that caused it to become almost a revelation. The culmination was like a great hymn of thanksgiving, and infinitely more sincere and convincing than the offering of thanks with which Mendelssohn closes his "Scotch" symphony.

Altogether then, if the programme was not the most pregnant with interest, if it lacked contrast in its earlier numbers and movements, it was none the less one of the enjoyable occasions, chiefly because of the steadiness and perfection of ensemble that ruled throughout.

Louis C. Elson.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 7, 1897.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

An Evening Without a Soloist or Any Orchestral Sensation.

The program of the fourth Symphony concert, given last evening in Music Hall, was as follows:

Symphony in C major, "l'Ours," Op. 66. Haydn
Four Movements from Serenade No. 7, in D major, "Haffner"................Mozart
Cadenzas by E. Paur.
(Violin Solo by Mr. Franz Kneisel.)
Overture to "Leonore," No. 2.....Beethoven
Overture, Scherzo, and Finale, Op. 52.. Schumann

This was a concert that gave respectable pleasure. The composers were all good men and true. There were no doubtful characters admitted, no Russians—terrible fellows, reeking with vodka—no frivolous and suspicious Frenchmen, leering at estimable matrons of the Back Bay, no queer Swedes or Norwegians or Danes or Italians.

To be sure there was wedding music, but the music Mozart wrote was eminently fit for the wedding of Miss Elizabeth Haffner, daughter of the wholesale merchant and burgomaster, to Mr. Spaeth. None of the guests became intoxicated, and there were no jests to bring a blush to the bride's face.

⁂

Haydn's "Bear" symphony was played here under Mr. Nikisch, Dec. 7, 1889. The program book then stated that it was the first performance of it in Boston. This seems hardly possible, but the statement was not contradicted. It is my impression that the symphony has not been played here since. And no wonder—for there is little of interest in it except the finale, which says something and in an ingenious fashion. The first three movements are hopelessly antiquated, without any of the beauty that is often found in old-fashioned things.

And much of the Mozart would have been dull if the performance had not been so admirable. Of course we hear this music all out of proportion. It was written for a festival occasion, and there was feasting, there was laughter, there was wooing between the movements. It was played by a small orchestra, not by such a large band of strings with a few wind instruments. But played as they were last night the movements chosen gave pleasure, especially the andante, menuetto and rondo. Mr. Kneisel played the solos with exquisite finish and beauty of tone. Mozart himself would have applauded. And the cadenzas by Mr. Paur were in excellent taste. They were in the spirit, and they were not too long.

We are so accustomed to the Leonore No. 3 that we are likely to forget the grandeur of the No. 2 overture. There are passages in this Leonore No. 2 that seem to me even more dramatic than any in the so-called greater. I am not sure but that as a theatre overture it is more stirring, nor am I willing to admit that the coda is less effective for theatre use. And how modern this overture is! What sonority! What effects gained without summoning tubas, bass clarinets, regiments of extra instruments! For here is depth of thought as well as strength in expression.

The overture in the little symphony of Schumann is very delightful music. The grace and spontaneity of melody rise above the somewhat dogged technical endeavor.

Philip Hale.

There will be no Symphony rehearsal or concert this week. The program for the 19th and 20th will be as follows: Mozart's Symphony in D major (without menuet); Paderewski's concerto for pianoforte; Dvorak's suite in D major, op. 39, and Auber's overture to "Part du Diable."

The program of the third Harvard University chamber concert will include Mozart's Quintet for piano, oboe, clarinet, horn and bassoon, in E flat; Beethoven's sonata appassionata for piano, and Hummel's septet. Mr. Bearmann and members of the Symphony Orchestra will play.

Such was the demand for subscription tickets for the series of five concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music, Philadelphia, a theatre which holds over 3000, that only 16 tickets were for sale to the general public.

N.Y. FIGARO

Sonnabend, den 6. November 1897.

Herausgeber: Leo von Raven.
Redakteur: Emil Jasper.

Providence, 4. Nov.

Weit energiſcher als in vergangenen Jahren ſcheint unſere diesjährige Muſikſaiſon in's Zeug zu gehen, denn neben den Boſton Symphonie und Arion Club Konzerten hat ſich jetzt noch eine dritte muſikaliſche Macht — das Kneiſel Streichquartett — geſellt. Das Boſton Symphonie Orcheſter hat zwei Konzerte mehr angeſagt, ein klarer Beweis für die Zunahme des populären Muſikverſtändniſſes. Volle Anerkennung muß ich gerne Dr. Jules Jordan, dem Dirigenten der Arion Club Konzerte, zollen. Herr Dr. Jordan wird nicht mehr ein zuſammengewürfeltes Orcheſter (wenn es auch aus Boſton kam) für die wirklich ausgezeichneten Chor-Konzerte gebrauchen, ſondern das Boſton Symphonie Orcheſter, wenn auch in verkleinertem Maßſtabe. Dieſe wirklich populären Konzerte dürſten jetzt um ſo beliebter werden. Das Kneiſel Quartett wird drei Soireen in Steinert Hall geben und findet die erſte Soiree am 8. Dezember ſtatt. Als großer Quartettfreund ſehe ich dieſen Konzerten mit großem Intereſſe entgegen. Ich freue mich berichten zu können, daß dieſe Quartett-Soireen auch einen finanziellen Erfolg haben werden. Das erſte Boſton Symphonie Orcheſter Konzert fand dieſe Woche ſtatt. Ich habe über die künſtleriſche Befähigung dieſes wohl jetzt weltbekannten Orcheſters in dieſen Spalten ſo oft und ausführlich geſchrieben und will ich nur dieſes Mal bemerken, daß, wenn ich vom hohen Standpunkte herab mit unerbittlicher Strenge richte, ich nur widerholen kann, wie wahrhaft gediegen das Spiel dieſes Orcheſters iſt — die Execution in ihrer Art iſt dem Werke ebenbürtig. Die Mitglieder dieſes Orcheſters haben mit eingeborener Begeiſterung und mit Geſchick Jahre lang geübt und ſich innig in einander eingelebt. Das Programm des erſten Konzertes beſtand aus der Brahms'ſchen Symphonie No. 3. in F-moll; Espana Rhapſodie von Chabrier und Weber's „Aufforderung zum Tanz", bearbeitet ganz kürzlich von Felix Weingartner. Frau Gadski war die Soliſtin des Abends und ſang ſie die Arie „Sulmaith" von Dr. Leopold Damroſch und Träumereien (Triſtan und Iſolde) von Wagrer.

Herm. Mueller.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR,
VOL CIL, NO. 135.

FRIDAY, NOV. 12, 1897.

SYMPHONY CONCERT IN NEW YORK.

The Reception Accorded to the Boston Orchestra Was a Very Cordial One.

[Special Dispatch to the Boston Herald.]

NEW YORK, Nov. 11, 1897. The Boston Symphony orchestra, Emil Paur conductor, gave its first concert of the season at the Metropolitan Opera House tonight. The concert opened with Brahms' third symphony (F major). While classical in form, it is a thoroughly modern work, both in its material and instrumentation, and Mr. Paur's reading of it was judiciously conservative without being old-fogyish. The lovely third movement was most charmingly played.

The second number on the programme, Schuman's pianoforte concerto, was interpreted by Rafael Joseffy with a depth of feeling which clearly showed the influence upon him of his now favorite master, Brahms.

A brilliant performance of Chabrier's "Espana" rhapsody brought the concert to a close.

The reception accorded the orchestra by the large audience was of the most hearty description, and the warm greeting that met Mr. Joseffy on his appearance showed how highly his qualities are appreciated in New York.

The Boston Traveler

PUBLISHED BY THE
BOSTON TRAVELER CO.,
TORREY E. WARDNER, President

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 8, 1897.

THE SYMPHONY.

A Concert of Comparatively Calm Classics — Haydn, Mozart, Schumann and Beethoven.

Seventeenth season Boston Symphony orchestra; fourth concert. The programme:

Symphony in C......................Haydn
Overture to "Leonore," No. 2..Beethoven
Four movements from the "Haffner"
Serenade.............................Mozart
Overture, scherzo and finale....Schumann

After the Richard Strauss uproar of the week previous, the calm classicism of the programme was something of a delight, like the blue sky and sunshine that follows a particularly vicious thunder shower. It was no doubt carefully thought out by Mr. Paur—this presentation of the four greatest names in music to the exclusion of anything modern. If he were a stern classicist, one might suspect him of revenging himself a bit upon the shouters for things modern and up-to-date. As he is not hide-bound in any one direction, we may as well conclude that he made this programme as a matter of compensation, and in order to suit all varieties of tastes. But the lesson was there, and he who loves pure beauty of form and limpid depth of inspiration felt its force. Is there not infinitely more of the dramatic and passionate in one simple phrase of the "Leonore" overture than in all the frightful howlings of "Thus Spake Zarathustra"?

The Haydn symphony, "The Bear," is pleasant and characteristically tuneful, but not of any great value. It savors of pot-boiling—for even the great Josef was not above writing for the occasion. The finale with its drone bass and quaint little time on the violins is really the only movement worth preserving. The whole symphony was played with exceeding grace and daintiness.

It was interesting to hear the No. 2 "Leonore" overture, for, in spite of the condensed and more fiery No. 3, it is a marvelously clear and powerful work. It is as impressive today as ever, and would stamp Beethoven as a genius of the first rank had he never written another bar. The reading and performance of it were beyond criticism.

Mozart's most charming vein was exhibited in the movements of the Serenade in D, without any of his depth. It was all very pretty, yet no finer than others of his day, whose names are perhaps now unknown, could have written. The several cadenzas by Mr. Paur were quite in the right vein, and they were played with accustomed elegance by Mr. Kneisel.

There was immense dash and the joy of life in the Schumann number. For the most part dreamy, mystic, mournful, no composer has ever lived who could so thrill with his buoyancy when he chose. The most delightful melodiousness, the gayest swing, the tenderest sentiment are all contained in the three movements of this miniature symphony. It was played in a masterly way, and it brought a thoroughly enjoyable concert to a fitting end.

WILDER D. QUINT.

Boston Daily Globe.

WEDNESDAY, NOV. 10, 1897.

Symphony Orchestra at the Capital.

The first concert of the present season was given by the Boston symphony orchestra today, and contrary to the usual custom, took place in the afternoon instead of in the evening. The change from an evening to an afternoon concert was regarded as rather a daring experiment, but it proved entirely successful as, although the seating capacity of the theater is greater than any other hall in which the concerts have heretofore been given, the attendance was very much larger than has ever before been known.

On the invitation of assistant manager C. F. Comee, Pres and Mrs McKinley occupied a box, and the audience included, as usual, the members of the diplomatic corps, members of the cabinet and the leaders of society. A magnificent program was given in the usual incomparable style of this superb organization.

A. Maurice Low.

THE BOSTON
SATURDAY EVENING
Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 7.

The Symphony Concert.

The fourth concert of the season was given by the Symphony Orchestra last night in Music Hall. The programme was:

Symphony, C major, op. 66.............Haydn
Overture, Leonore, No. 2...........Beethoven
Four movements from Serenade No. 7, D
major ....Mozart
Overture, Scherzo and Finale, op. 52.Schumann
Soloist, Mr. Franz Kneisel.

The programme was very attractive despite its antiquity, and one could listen to it with unalloyed delight, although, perhaps, with a tolerance that we who have the luck to be born at a later day generally display towards the old masters. Some of us may have wished that "papa" Haydn had lived in modern days when bass tubas take the place of ideas, but the symphony was delightful nevertheless, and the learning, grace and imagination of the master as evident as ever. The Mozart Serenade added to the charm and it gave Mr. Kneisel the opportunity to again demonstrate his rare skill, faultless taste and exquisite grace as a violinist. Mr. Kneisel is an accomplished master in subduing his individuality to the intentions of the composer whose works he interprets, and nothing is wanting in the way of proper color and style fitted to the work in hand. He is always the artist, but never more admirable than when playing the works of the old masters.

There will be no concert next week; the programme for the week following is: Symphony, D major, No. 7 (without minuet), Mozart; concerto for pianoforte, Paderewski; suite, D major, op. 39, Dvorak; overture, "Carlo Broschi," Auber. The soloist is Mr. Alberto Jonas.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 7, 1897.

The fourth Symphony programme was entirely a standard one, as if Mr. Paur had thought that everybody on the stage and off needed a little respite from the demands which have been recently made on mind and nerves. There were Haydn's "Bear" Symphony, Beethoven's "Leonore, No. 2" overture, Schumann's "Overture, Scherzo and Finale," and —this being the only unfamiliar selection—four movements from the Serenade by Mozart which is numbered seven in the Haffner edition, Mr. Kneisel playing the violin obbligato. Of such a programme there is nothing to be said save that it was delightfully and worthily performed throughout and that Mr. Kneisel rendered deliciously the solo violin part and Mr. Paur's appropriate cadenzas in the "Serenade."

The programme for a fortnight hence stands thus: Mozart, Symphony in D major, No. 7, Op. 22, (without Minuet); Paderewski, Concerto for Pianoforte; Dvorak, Suite in D major, Op. 39; Auber, Overture, "Carlo Broschi." Soloist, Mr. Alberto Jonas.

N. Y. FIGARO

Sonnabend, den 6. November 1897.

Herausgeber Leo von Raven.
Redakteur: Emil Jasper.

Providence, 4. Nov.

Weit energiſcher als in vergangenen Jahren ſcheint unſere diesjährige Muſikſaiſon in's Zeug zu gehen, denn neben den Boſton Symphonie und Arion Club Konzerten hat ſich jetzt noch eine dritte muſikaliſche Macht — das Kneiſel Streichquartett — geſellt. Das Boſton Symphonie Orcheſter hat zwei Konzerte mehr angeſagt, ein klarer Beweis für die Zunahme des populären Muſikverſtändniſſes. Volle Anerkennung muß ich gerne Dr. Jules Jordan, dem Dirigenten der Arion Club Konzerte, zollen. Herr Dr. Jordan wird nicht mehr ein zuſammengewürfeltes Orcheſter (wenn es auch aus Boſton kam) für die wirklich ausgezeichneten Chor-Konzerte gebrauchen, ſondern das Boſton Symphonie Orcheſter, wenn auch in verkleinertem Maßſtabe. Dieſe wirklich populären Konzerte werden jetzt um ſo beliebter werden. Das Kneiſel Quartett wird drei Soireen in Steinert Hall geben und findet die erſte Soiree am 8. Dezember ſtatt. Als großer Quartettfreund ſehe ich dieſen Konzerten mit großem Intereſſe entgegen. Ich freue mich berichten zu können, daß dieſe Quartett-Soireen auch einen finanziellen Erfolg haben werden. Das erſte Boſton Symphonie Orcheſter Konzert fand dieſe Woche ſtatt. Ich habe über die künſtleriſche Befähigung dieſes wohl jetzt weltbekannten Orcheſters in dieſen Spalten ſo oft und ausführlich geſchrieben und will ich nur dieſes Mal bemerken, daß, wenn ich vom hohen Standpunkte herab mit unerbittlicher Strenge richte, ich nur widerholen kann, wie wahrhaft gediegen das Spiel dieſes Orcheſters iſt — die Execution in ihrer Art iſt dem Werke ebenbürtig. Die Mitglieder dieſes Orcheſters haben mit eingeborener Begeiſterung und mit Geſchick Jahre lang geübt und ſich innig in einander eingelebt. Das Programm des erſten Konzertes beſtand aus der Brahms'ſchen Symphonie No. 3. in F-moll; Espana Rhapſodie von Chabrier und Weber's „Aufforderung zum Tanz", bearbeitet ganz kürzlich von Felix Weingartner. Frau Gadski war die Soliſtin des Abends und ſang ſie die Arie „Sulmaith" von Dr. Leopold Damroſch und Träumereien (Triſtan und Iſolde) von Wagner.

Herm. Mueller.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR,
VOL CII., NO. 135.

FRIDAY, NOV. 12, 1897.

SYMPHONY CONCERT IN NEW YORK.

The Reception Accorded to the Boston Orchestra Was a Very Cordial One.

[Special Dispatch to the Boston Herald.]

NEW YORK, Nov. 11, 1897. The Boston Symphony orchestra, Emil Paur conductor, gave its first concert of the season at the Metropolitan Opera House tonight. The concert opened with Brahms' third symphony (F major). While classical in form, it is a thoroughly modern work, both in its material and instrumentation, and Mr. Paur's reading of it was judiciously conservative without being old-fogyish. The lovely third movement was most charmingly played.

The second number on the programme, Schuman's pianoforte concerto, was interpreted by Rafael Joseffy with a depth of feeling which clearly showed the influence upon him of his now favorite master, Brahms.

A brilliant performance of Chabrier's "Espana" rhapsody brought the concert to a close.

The reception accorded the orchestra by the large audience was of the most hearty description, and the warm greeting that met Mr. Joseffy on his appearance showed how highly his qualities are appreciated in New York.

The Boston Traveler

PUBLISHED BY THE
BOSTON TRAVELER CO.,
TORREY E. WARDNER, President.

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 8, 1897.

THE SYMPHONY.

A Concert of Comparatively Calm Classics — Haydn, Mozart, Schumann and Beethoven.

Seventeenth season Boston Symphony orchestra; fourth concert. The programme:

Symphony in C......................Haydn
Overture to "Leonore," No. 2..Beethoven
Four movements from the "Haffner"
Serenade....... ....Mozart
Overture, scherzo and finale....Schumann

After the Richard Strauss uproar of the week previous, the calm classicism of the programme was something of a delight, like the blue sky and sunshine that follows a particularly vicious thunder shower. It was no doubt carefully thought out by Mr. Paur—this presentation of the four greatest names in music to the exclusion of anything modern. If he were a stern classicist, one might suspect him of revenging himself a bit upon the shouters for things modern and up-to-date. As he is not hide-bound in any one direction, we may as well conclude that he made this programme as a matter of compensation, and in order to suit all varieties of tastes. But the lesson was there, and he who loves pure beauty of form and limpid depth of inspiration felt its force. Is there not infinitely more of the dramatic and passionate in one simple phrase of the "Leonore" overture than in all the frightful howlings of "Thus Spake Zarathustra"?

The Haydn symphony, "The Bear," is pleasant and characteristically tuneful, but not of any great value. It savors of pot-boiling—for even the great Josef was not above writing for the occasion. The finale with its drone bass and quaint little time on the violins is really the only movement worth preserving. The whole symphony was played with exceeding grace and daintiness.

It was interesting to hear the No. 2 "Leonore" overture, for, in spite of the condensed and more fiery No. 3, it is a marvelously clear and powerful work. It is as impressive today as ever, and would stamp Beethoven as a genius of the first rank had he never written another bar. The reading and performance of it were beyond criticism.

Mozart's most charming vein was exhibited in the movements of the Serenade in D, without any of his depth. It was all very pretty, yet no finer than others of his day, whose names are perhaps now unknown, could have written. The several cadenzas by Mr. Paur were quite in the right vein, and they were played with accustomed elegance by Mr. Kneisel.

There was immense dash and the joy of life in the Schumann number. For the most part dreamy, mystic, mournful, no composer has ever lived who could so thrill with his buoyancy when he chose. The most delightful melodiousness, the gayest swing, the tenderest sentiment are all contained in the three movements of this miniature symphony. It was played in a masterly way, and it brought a thoroughly enjoyable concert to a fitting end.

WILDER D. QUINT.

Boston Daily Globe.

WEDNESDAY, NOV. 10, 1897.

Symphony Orchestra at the Capital.

The first concert of the present season was given by the Boston symphony orchestra today, and contrary to the usual custom, took place in the afternoon instead of in the evening. The change from an evening to an afternoon concert was regarded as rather a daring experiment, but it proved entirely successful as, although the seating capacity of the theater is greater than any other hall in which the concerts have heretofore been given, the attendance was very much larger than has ever before been known.

On the invitation of assistant manager C. F. Comee, Pres and Mrs McKinley occupied a box, and the audience included, as usual, the members of the diplomatic corps, members of the cabinet and the leaders of society. A magnificent program was given in the usual incomparable style of this superb organization.

A. Maurice Low.

THE BOSTON
SATURDAY EVENING Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 7.

The Symphony Concert.

The fourth concert of the season was given by the Symphony Orchestra last night in Music Hall. The programme was:

Symphony, C major, op. 66..............Haydn
Overture, Leonore, No. 2...........Beethoven
Four movements from Serenade No. 7, D
major ....Mozart
Overture, Scherzo and Finale, op. 52.Schumann
Soloist, Mr. Franz Kneisel.

The programme was very attractive despite its antiquity, and one could listen to it with unalloyed delight, although, perhaps, with a tolerance that we who have the luck to be born at a later day generally display towards the old masters. Some of us may have wished that "papa" Haydn had lived in modern days when bass tubas take the place of ideas, but the symphony was delightful nevertheless, and the learning, grace and imagination of the master as evident as ever. The Mozart Serenade added to the charm and it gave Mr. Kneisel the opportunity to again demonstrate his rare skill, faultless taste and exquisite grace as a violinist. Mr. Kneisel is an accomplished master in subduing his individuality to the intentions of the composer whose works he interprets, and nothing is wanting in the way of proper color and style fitted to the work in hand. He is always the artist, but never more admirable than when playing the works of the old masters.

There will be no concert next week; the programme for the week following is: Symphony, D major, No. 7 (without minuet), Mozart; concerto for pianoforte, Paderewski; suite, D major, op. 39, Dvorak; overture, "Carlo Broschi," Auber. The soloist is Mr. Alberto Jonas.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 7, 1897.

The fourth Symphony programme was entirely a standard one, as if Mr. Paur had thought that everybody on the stage and off needed a little respite from the demands which have been recently made on mind and nerves. There were Haydn's "Bear" Symphony, Beethoven's "Leonore, No. 2" overture, Schumann's "Overture, Scherzo and Finale," and —this being the only unfamiliar selection—four movements from the Serenade by Mozart which is numbered seven in the Haffner edition, Mr. Kneisel playing the violin obbligato. Of such a programme there is nothing to be said save that it was delightfully and worthily performed throughout and that Mr. Kneisel rendered deliciously the solo violin part and Mr. Paur's appropriate cadenzas in the "Serenade."

The programme for a fortnight hence stands thus: Mozart, Symphony in D major, No. 7, Op. 22, (without Minuet); Paderewski, Concerto for Pianoforte; Dvorak, Suite in D major, Op. 39; Auber, Overture, "Carlo Broschi." Soloist, Mr. Alberto Jonas.

THE MUSICAL COUR[illegible]R.

NEW [illegible]RK, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 10[illegible]97.

Th[illegible]ram of the fourth Symphony concer[illegible]iven last n[illegible]as as follows:

Symphony in C major (The Bear)	Haydn
Four movements from Serenade No. 7, in D major (Haffner)	Mozart
Overture Leonore, No. II	Beethoven
Overture, Scherzo and Finale, op. 52	Schumann

It was only a week ago that Strauss' "Thus Spake Zarathustra" was played by the orchestra under Mr. Paur.

And in that orchestra sat as an extra oboist Mr. de Ribas.

If you should look at the Musical World (London) for 1837 you might find in the number dated April 14 a review of a concert given by Mr. de Ribas, a flute player. And you might find that "his brother, too—quite a lad—distinguished himself in a solo by Vogt on the oboe; he will become a very fine player, for his tone is beautiful and his execution already surprising for his years."

This is Mr. de Ribas who played April 17, 1847, at a Philharmonic concert in New York "an aria for oboe from a violin solo" by De Beriot.

And Mr. J. S. Dwight, in a number of his journal in April, 1852, spoke thus of him: "Mr. de Ribas is one of our most useful musicians; in our principal orchestra from the Academy time to this his oboe has been remarked as one of the good points; and in this inclement weather, in spite of very poor health, he has been always at his post."

* * *

Mr. de Ribas played in London in 1837. Stop a moment and think what that means. Mendelssohn had just married Cécile Jeanrenaud and had not penned a note of the "Elijah." Schumann had not written his first symphony. Schubert had not been dead ten years, and it was only ten years before that Beethoven had been buried. Brahms was four years old. It was the year of Berlioz's Requiem. The autumn of that year, 1837, Wagner, twenty-four years old, went to Riga. Verdi had not written his first opera. Gounod was studying at the Paris Conservatory. Tschaikowsky was not in this world; Rubinstein was seven years old. And Richard Strauss did not see the light until 1864.

And there Mr. de Ribas sat, playing his oboe and obeying the beat of Emil Paur, who was not born until 1855. What, pray, would he have said in 1837, what would the most experienced violinist of that day have said as he looked over the score of "Thus Spake Zarathustra?

* * *

It is over a week since I heard the symphonic poem of Strauss, and each day has strengthened my dislike. I remember with pleasure and admiration only the nobly broad and uplifting opening measures, Zarathustra's "Greeting to the Sun." The sublime effect of the roaring pedal, the simple trumpet theme, the full orchestral chords C major, C minor, and then the return to C major, still masters me, and still does all, or nearly all, that follows seem a lame and impotent conclusion. I remember nothing of "The Dwellers in the Rear World," save a fleeting echo of the Gregorian Credo and Magnificat. The section of "Joy and Passion" is to me now but a mighty pother, and neither the theme given to violins, oboes and horn, nor the trombone theme, seems of any real worth. "The Grave Song" is not without passages of sombre beauty, but the fugued passage "Of Science" is to me a dismal nightmare. "The Dance Song" is pretentious in orchestration; the chief theme is commonplace, yes, worse than commonplace. "The Night Wanderer's Song" is comparatively a relief. Then comes the much discussed end. Violins (in the highest) and harps in B major, the second position of the chord. Then trombones play this chord—C natural, E, F sharp, and against it the double-basses pick C natural, G natural, the fifth, C natural the octave. Again the chord of B major in the same position. The double basses pick C natural three times. And Mr. Reimann asks, "Has Zarathustra really solved the world riddle, or do investigation and longing and suffering, &c., begin again?"

* * *

Now, concerning the metaphysics or the philosophy of this strange and huge work, I have nothing to say. I tried last spring to read the book of Nietzsche, but neither in German nor in English could I make head or tail of it.

I remember Mr. Floersheim writing from Berlin that Strauss told him: "I did not intend to write philosophical music, or to portray Nietzsche's great work musically. I meant to convey musically an idea of the development of the human race, from its origin through the various phases of development, religious as well as scientific, up to Nietzsche's idea of the Uebermensch. The whole sysphonic poem is intended as my homage to the genius of Nietzsche, which found its greatest exemplification in his book 'Thus Spake Zarathustra.'"

* * *

As absolute music this work, as a whole, is swollen out of all proportion—bombastic, ugly without excuse, wilfully perverse. The themes are for the most part vulgar, and the treatment of them is preposterous. The orchestra is thus composed: One piccolo-flute, three flutes (the third of which is interchangeable with a second piccolo), three oboes, one English horn, one E flat clarinet, two ordinary clarinets, one bass clarinet, three bassoons, one double bassoon, six horns, four trumpets, three trombones, two bass tubas, one pair of kettledrums, bass drum, cymbals, triangle, Glockenspiel, one low bell, two harps, the usual strings, and organ.

In spite of this army of instruments, with the exception of the superb opening measures, there is little true sonority. My friend and colleague, Mr. Woolf, speaking of the unhealthiness of the music, wrote, "It suffers severely from basstubaculosis, and its utterances are too often basstubathetic." And yet you seldom hear a true, full, satisfactory bass in the harmonies; there is seldom a majestic or satisfying walk in the bass. Everything is shrieking high up in the air. In desperately polyphonic pages there is emptiness where there should be strength. Of course there is much that is wonderful and surprising in the detail of the orchestration, but with the exception of the opening measures there is no great thought nobly expressed in the whole work. As absolute music it must fall below the "Death and Apotheosis" of the same composer. Vulgarity here shakes hands with predetermined eccentricity. It is as though you listened to the ravings of a disordered mind that in the wild pursuit after originality of expression had forgotten coherency of thought and logical association of ideas; yet in the ravings are felicitous phrases, a mental brilliance that distresses, for you realize that this man was singularly gifted musically in certain ways.

* * *

And last night, although the Haydn symphony, so far as the first three movements are concerned, is a dull thing, and the academic beauty of Mozart was vitalized only by the exquisite art of Mr. Kneisel, yet there was the constant thought that even academic dullness or beauty is preferable to such originality as that of Zarathustra preferable to such originality as that of Zarathustra by out "Thus Spake Zarathustra" entirely from the memory, but it made one realize—for it was played marvelously well—that it is more truly dramatic, and indeed more highly inspired than the Leonore No. 3. And this not because it was written by Beethoven; not because the composer is dead, but because sublime thoughts are expressed in sublimely forcible and beautiful and lucid harmonic and orchestral speech.

* * *

Mr. Paur's cadenzas to the Mozart Serenade were in admirable taste.

Herald
Nov 7

When Mr. Paur stepped upon the platform in Providence, Wednesday, to open the series of symphony concerts there, he and his men not only faced the largest gathering of society and musical folk that had ever greeted them, but the conductor had a personal tribute. His stand was covered with a decoration of smilax strings studded with carnations.

In the burst of enthusiasm which greeted Mme. Gadski, Mr. Paur plucked the carnations and presented them to her, which graceful act won him her smile and the plaudits of the house.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 15, 1897.

And this reminds us of the great success of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, led by Mr. Paur, in New York last week. Mr. Henderson wrote as follows in the New York Times of the 12th: "The tonal splendors of the Boston orchestra are glorious. The instrumental color is always so rich, so solid, so noble that it seems to have something more than merely sensuous beauty. But that is because it is used as a means not an end. The phrasing of the orchestra is like that of a great singer, and every nuance is full of meaning. But it is hardly profitable to go into details about the matter. Suffice it to say that this is a band of virtuosi, singing through their instruments in perfect unanimity and with a high and inexhaustible artistic enthusiasm."

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CII., NO. 137.

SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 14, 1897.

The first in the series of this season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, attracted an exceptionally numerous audience, and was an overwhelming success. The subscription this year for these concerts is twice as large as it was last year, and the single sales for the opening performance were much in excess of any that have hitherto prevailed. The press notices of the concert were strikingly unanimous in their enthusiastic appreciation of the orchestra, its conductor and its performances.

BROOKLYN LIFE

VOL. XVI. BROOKLYN, N. Y., NOV. 13, 1897. No. 402

TO-NIGHT (Saturday) the first evening concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place at the Academy of Music. With the splendid program announced—which includes Joseffy at the piano-forte—and popular prices there ought to be a fine attendance.

[illegible]NDAY TELEGRAM

PROVIDENCE,

NOVEMBER 7, 1897.

The season of Boston Symphony concerts opened Wednesday evening in a [illegible]aze of glory, as it were. It was an unusually good concert, the attendance was the largest that has ever assembled at the opening of the symphonies, and then, you know, it was the first of eight concerts, the largest number ever given here.

The season heretofore has always commenced in October, before everybody had really returned to town, and although they subscribed for their seats just the same, they were unable to be present at the opening concert.

There were ever so many strange faces in familiar locations, and seats in which you naturally expected to find old acquaintances and friends were occupied by new forms and faces. All this is owing to the demand for seats in good locations, and standing in line half an hour after the sale of seats opened before you could even approach the box office meant that you could not get your choice but must take what you could get.

There are ever so many clubs this season. That is, ten or twelve young people musically inclined either secure a season ticket or a share of one for a certain number of concerts, and under the guidance of a chaperone attend the concert in a body. Mrs. Abbie Shepardson-Nauck has always had a large party under her care, who meet with her afterwards to talk over the merits and beauties of the concert.

Mr. Paur always has a special mark of favor bestowed upon him at the first concert, as he invariably enters upon the platform to wield his baton to find his conductor's stand hidden with strings of smilax studded here and there with pink and white carnations. The audience loudly clapped him upon his entrance, and he naturally felt pleased with the ovation and the floral tribute.

Mr. Timothee Adamowski, who occupied his accustomed seat on the end of the second row, was also pleasantly recognized by his friends in the audience who happened to be seated in his vicinity.

In the audience were Mr. Robert I. Goddard and party, Miss Goddard in plain black with black aigrette in her uncovered head; Mrs. Robert I. Gammell, Miss Virginia Gammell, Mr. and Mrs. William G. Nightingale, Miss Mollie Foster, Miss Pegram, Miss Isabel Pegram, Miss Hallie Hazard, Mrs. Le Baron Colt, Mrs. Frank Rhodes, Mr. and Mrs. Howard O. Sturges, Mrs. W. W. White, Mr. and Mrs. Roscoe M. Washburn, Mrs. I. Harris Metcalf, Mr. and Mrs. Hodgman, Miss Ham, Miss Sharpe, Mr. Frank Richmond, Miss Cook, Mr. and Mrs. Granger, Miss Helen Granger, Mr, and Mrs. C. M. Smith, Miss Dwight, Miss Child, Mr. and Mrs. Julian Herreshoff, Dr. Jules Jordan, Mr. Dorrance, Mrs. Alfred Metcalf, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Bailey, Miss Robinson, Miss Corliss, Miss Eddy.

There were some vacant seats when every one should have been filled. If some of our Providence people would only see how eager Bostonians are even to get standing room they would see that every seat here was occupied.

The only fault to be found with the concert was that it was too short—over soon after 9, so that there was no hurrying on the part of the orchestra to catch the last Boston train. As Mr. Comee expressed it, "it was much better to send them home not satisfied than with too long a concert."

The gems were the Spanish Rhapsody, by Chabrier, given for the first time, which evoked a genuine outburst of appreciation, and the familiar "Invitation to the Dance," which Providence audiences always like to have on the programs.

Whenever there was a lady soloist there always was interest in the concert. Mme. Gadski not only sang beautifully, but her appearance and beauty of form and figure made it a pleasure to gaze upon her when she sang.

Her gown was a white brocade with a broad stripe of green which was very effective. The low round neck had a deep frill of Point d'Alencon lace. She wore long tan gloves, amber beads about her neck and in her prettily braided hair an ornament of pearls.

Mr. Paur, in a moment of enthusiasm, plucked the carnations off his stand decorations, as a floral tribute to her rendering of Wagner's "Dreams." It was a pretty idea, conceived on the impulse of the moment, and was duly appreciated by the audience.

THE MUSICAL COURI R.

NEW ORK, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 10 97.

Th ram of the fourth Symphony concer given last ni as as follows:

Symphon in C major (The Bear)	Haydn
Four movements from Serenade No. 7, in D major (Haffner)	Mozart
Overture Leonore, No. II	Beethoven
Overture, Scherzo and Finale, op. 52	Schumann

It was only a week ago that Strauss' "Thus Spake Zarathustra" was played by the orchestra under Mr. Paur.

And in that orchestra sat as an extra oboist Mr. de Ribas.

If you should look at the Musical World (London) for 1837 you might find in the number dated April 14 a review of a concert given by Mr. de Ribas, a flute player. And you might find that "his brother, too—quite a lad—distinguished himself in a solo by Vogt on the oboe; he will become a very fine player, for his tone is beautiful and his execution already surprising for his years."

This is Mr. de Ribas who played April 17, 1847, at a Philharmonic concert in New York "an aria for oboe from a violin solo" by De Beriot.

And Mr. J. S. Dwight, in a number of his journal in April, 1852, spoke thus of him: "Mr. de Ribas is one of our most useful musicians; in our principal orchestra from the Academy time to this his oboe has been remarked as one of the good points; and in this inclement weather, in spite of very poor health, he has been always at his post."

* * *

Mr. de Ribas played in London in 1837. Stop a moment and think what that means. Mendelssohn had just married Cécile Jeanrenaud and had not penned a note of the "Elijah." Schumann had not written his first symphony. Schubert had not been dead ten years, and it was only ten years before that Beethoven had been buried. Brahms was four years old. It was the year of Berlioz's Requiem. The autumn of that year, 1837, Wagner, twenty-four years old, went to Riga. Verdi had not written his first opera. Gounod was studying at the Paris Conservatory. Tschaikowsky was not in this world; Rubinstein was seven years old. And Richard Strauss did not see the light until 1864.

And there Mr. de Ribas sat, playing his oboe and obeying the beat of Emil Paur, who was not born until 1855. What, pray, would he have said in 1837, what would the most experienced violinist of that day have said as he looked over the score of "Thus Spake Zarathustra?

* * *

It is over a week since I heard the symphonic poem of Strauss, and each day has strengthened my dislike. I remember with pleasure and admiration only the nobly broad and uplifting opening measures, Zarathustra's "Greeting to the Sun." The sublime effect of the roaring pedal, the simple trumpet theme, the full orchestral chords C major, C minor, and then the return to C major, still masters me, and still does all, or nearly all, that follows seem a lame and impotent conclusion. I remember nothing of "The Dwellers in the Rear World," save a fleeting echo of the Gregorian Credo and Magnificat. The section of "Joy and Passion" is to me now but a mighty pother, and neither the theme given to violins, oboes and horn, nor the trombone theme, seems of any real worth. "The Grave Song" is not without passages of sombre beauty, but the fugued passage "Of Science" is to me a dismal nightmare. "The Dance Song" is pretentious in orchestration; the chief theme is commonplace, yes, worse than commonplace. "The Night Wanderer's Song" is comparatively a relief. Then comes the much discussed end. Violins (in the highest) and harps in B major, the second position of the chord. Then trombones play this chord—C natural, E, F sharp, and against it the double-basses pick C natural, G natural, the fifth, C natural the octave. Again the chord of B major in the same position. The double basses pick C natural three times. And Mr. Reimann asks, "Has Zarathustra really solved the world riddle, or do investigation and longing and suffering, &c., begin again?"

* * *

Now, concerning the metaphysics or the philosophy of this strange and huge work, I have nothing to say. I tried last spring to read the book of Nietzsche, but neither in German nor in English could I make head or tail of it.

I remember Mr. Floersheim writing from Berlin that Strauss told him: "I did not intend to write philosophical music, or to portray Nietzsche's great work musically. I meant to convey musically an idea of the development of the human race, from its origin through the various phases of development, religious as well as scientific, up to Nietzsche's idea of the Uebermensch. The whole sysphonic poem is intended as my homage to the genius of Nietzsche, which found its greatest exemplification in his book 'Thus Spake Zarathustra.' "

* * *

As absolute music this work, as a whole, is swollen out of all proportion—bombastic, ugly without excuse, wilfully perverse. The themes are for the most part vulgar, and the treatment of them is preposterous. The orchestra is thus composed: One piccolo-flute, three flutes (the third of which is interchangeable with a second piccolo), three oboes, one English horn, one E flat clarinet, two ordinary clarinets, one bass clarinet, three bassoons, one double bassoon, six horns, four trumpets, three trombones, two bass tubas, one pair of kettledrums, bass drum, cymbals, triangle, Glockenspiel, one low bell, two harps, the usual strings, and organ.

In spite of this army of instruments, with the exception of the superb opening measures, there is little true sonority. My friend and colleague, Mr. Woolf, speaking of the unhealthiness of the music, wrote, "It suffers severely from basstubaculosis, and its utterances are too often basstubathetic." And yet you seldom hear a true, full, satisfactory bass in the harmonies; there is seldom a majestic or satisfying walk in the bass. Everything is shrieking high up in the air. In desperately polyphonic pages there is emptiness where there should be strength. Of course there is much that is wonderful and surprising in the detail of the orchestration, but with the exception of the opening measures there is no great thought nobly expressed in the whole work. As absolute music it must fall below the "Death and Apotheosis" of the same composer. Vulgarity here shakes hands with predetermined eccentricity. It is as though you listened to the ravings of a disordered mind that in the wild pursuit after originality of expression had forgotten coherency of thought and logical association of ideas; yet in the ravings are felicitous phrases, a mental brilliance that distresses, for you realize that this man was singularly gifted musically in certain ways.

* * *

And last night, although the Haydn symphony, so far as the first three movements are concerned, is a dull thing, and the academic beauty of Mozart was vitalized only by the exquisite art of Mr. Kneisel, yet there was the constant thought that even academic dullness or beauty is preferable to such originality as that of Zarathustra preferable to such originality as that of Zarathustra by out "Thus Spake Zarathustra" entirely from the memory, but it made one realize—for it was played marvelously well—that it is more truly dramatic, and indeed more highly inspired than the Leonore No. 3. And this not because it was written by Beethoven; not because the composer is dead, but because sublime thoughts are expressed in sublimely forcible and beautiful and lucid harmonic and orchestral speech.

* * *

Mr. Paur's cadenzas to the Mozart Serenade were in admirable taste.

When Mr. Paur stepped upon the platform in Providence, Wednesday, to open the series of symphony concerts there, he and his men not only faced the largest gathering of society and musical folk that had ever greeted them, but the conductor had a personal tribute. His stand was covered with a decoration of smilax strings studded with carnations.

In the burst of enthusiasm which greeted Mme. Gadski, Mr. Paur plucked the carnations and presented them to her, which graceful act won him her smile and the plaudits of the house.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 15, 1897.

And this reminds us of the great success of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, led by Mr. Paur, in New York last week. Mr. Henderson wrote as follows in the New York Times of the 12th: "The tonal splendors of the Boston orchestra are glorious. The instrumental color is always so rich, so solid, so noble that it seems to have something more than merely sensuous beauty. But that is because it is used as a means not an end. The phrasing of the orchestra is like that of a great singer, and every nuance is full of meaning. But it is hardly profitable to go into details about the matter. Suffice it to say that this is a band of virtuosi, singing through their instruments in perfect unanimity and with a high and inexhaustible artistic enthusiasm."

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CII., NO. 137.

SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 14, 1897.

The first in the series of this season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, attracted an exceptionally numerous audience, and was an overwhelming success. The subscription this year for these concerts is twice as large as it was last year, and the single sales for the opening performance were much in excess of any that have hitherto prevailed. The press notices of the concert were strikingly unanimous in their enthusiastic appreciation of the orchestra, its conductor and its performances.

BROOKLYN LIFE

VOL. XVI. BROOKLYN, N. Y., NOV. 13, 1897. No. 402

TO-NIGHT (Saturday) the first evening concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place at the Academy of Music. With the splendid program announced—which includes Joseffy at the piano-forte—and popular prices there ought to be a fine attendance.

SUNDAY TELEGRAM

PROVIDENCE,

NOVEMBER 7, 1897

The season of Boston Symphony con- rts opened Wednesday evening in a aze of glory, as it were. It was an nusually good concert, the attendance was the largest that has ever assembled at the opening of the symphonies, and then, you know, it was the first of eight concerts, the largest number ever given here.

The season heretofore has always commenced in October, before everybody had really returned to town, and although they subscribed for their seats just the same, they were unable to be present at the opening concert.

There were ever so many strange faces in familiar locations, and seats in which you naturally expected to find old acquaintances and friends were occupied by new forms and faces. All this is owing to the demand for seats in good locations, and standing in line half an hour after the sale of seats opened before you could even approach the box office meant that you could not get your choice but must take what you could get.

There are ever so many clubs this season. That is, ten or twelve young people musically inclined either secure a season ticket or a share of one for a certain number of concerts, and under the guidance of a chaperone attend the concert in a body. Mrs. Abbie Shepardson-Nauck has always had a large party under her care, who meet with her afterwards to talk over the merits and beauties of the concert.

Mr. Paur always has a special mark of favor bestowed upon him at the first concert, as he invariably enters upon the platform to wield his baton to find his conductor's stand hidden with strings of smilax studded here and there with pink and white carnations. The audience loudly clapped him upon his entrance, and he naturally felt pleased with the ovation and the floral tribute.

Mr. Timothee Adamowski, who occupied his accustomed seat on the end of the second row, was also pleasantly recognized by his friends in the audience who happened to be seated in his vicinity.

In the audience were Mr. Robert I. Goddard and party, Miss Goddard in plain black with black aigrette in her uncovered head; Mrs. Robert I. Gammell, Miss Virginia Gammell, Mr. and Mrs. William G. Nightingale, Miss Mollie Foster, Miss Pegram, Miss Isabel Pegram, Miss Hallie Hazard, Mrs. Le Baron Colt, Mrs. Frank Rhodes, Mr. and Mrs. Howard O. Sturges, Mrs. W. W. White, Mr. and Mrs. Roscoe M. Washburn, Mrs. I. Harris Metcalf, Mr. and Mrs. Hodgman, Miss Ham, Miss Sharpe, Mr. Frank Richmond, Miss Cook, Mr. and Mrs. Granger, Miss Helen Granger, Mr, and Mrs. C. M. Smith, Miss Dwight, Miss Child, Mr. and Mrs. Julian Herreshoff, Dr. Jules Jordan, Mr. Dorrance, Mrs. Alfred Metcalf, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Bailey, Miss Robinson, Miss Corliss, Miss Eddy.

There were some vacant seats when every one should have been filled. If some of our Providence people would only see how eager Bostonians are even to get standing room they would see that every seat here was occupied.

The only fault to be found with the concert was that it was too short—over soon after 9, so that there was no hurrying on the part of the orchestra to catch the last Boston train. As Mr. Comee expressed it, "It was much better to send them home not satisfied than with too long a concert."

The gems were the Spanish Rhapsody, by Chabrier, given for the first time, which evoked a genuine outburst of appreciation, and the familiar "Invitation to the Dance," which Providence audiences always like to have on the programs.

Whenever there was a lady soloist there always was interest in the concert. Mme. Gadski not only sang beautifully, but her appearance and beauty of form and figure made it a pleasure to gaze upon her when she sang.

Her gown was a white brocade with a broad stripe of green which was very effective. The low round neck had a deep frill of Point d'Alencon lace. She wore long tan gloves, amber beads about her neck and in her prettily braided hair an ornament of pearls.

Mr. Paur, in a moment of enthusiasm, plucked the carnations off his stand decorations, as a floral tribute to her rendering of Wagner's "Dreams." It was a pretty idea, conceived on the impulse of the moment, and was duly appreciated by the audience.

The Sun.

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 12, 1897.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The First Concert of the Season—Joseffy Heard Again.

Following is the programme of the first concert of the seventeenth season of the Boston Symphony Society—the twelfth season in New York:

1. Johannes Brahms—Symphony No. 3, in F major, op. 90.
2. Robert Schumann—Concerto for piano in A minor.
3. Grieg—Suite, "Peer Gynt."
4. Chabrier—"Espana," rhapsody for orchestra.

It was highly appropriate that Brahms and Schumann should be associated together so closely, Schumann having been the prophet who predicted so truly Brahms's worth and his future greatness. Brahms, in a way, seems to have continued Schumann's art work, carrying out into longer stretches the strong intellectual methods of the older composer, while in pure romantic beauty he scarcely drops behind him, although Brahms is a man of individuality, but not many varying moods, while Schumann had as many changing tempers as there were pages in his creations. Grieg, another of the highest apostles of romance, was in amiable unison with the two more powerful men represented on last night's programme. And the only dissonance came from the light, and, in comparison with the rest, the unimportant rhapsody by Chabrier, which savored more of garden concerts than of classical ones, and suffered miserably from its juxtaposition with what had gone before.

Where all is so perfectly performed as it is at the hands of Mr. Paur and his men, there is but little to be said. It has long been known how solidly the various choirs in his orchestra seem to be packed and joined together—this due, of course, to the clever manner in which they are kept in an even proportion of weight of tone, so that no one set of instruments can unduly predominate over the others. And certain bits of wonderful effect, such as the three last vanishing chords in Grieg's impressive funeral march, "Ases' Tod," or in the weird rushing twists and twirls of the gnome music from "The Hall of the Mountain King," may be especially wondered at and commended. Every one expects, however, that Brahms's glorious symphony should be perfect in its peaceful nobility, and no one is amazed that in beauty and gradation of tone this splendid art work should have had a rendering commensurate with its value, nor that the mechanical means to this end was absolutely hidden so that no trace of effort could possibly mar the serene contemplation of the inmost thought and meaning of the composition.

In Mr. Joseffy's interpretation of Schumann's concerto was discernible the increased calm and deliberation that has been of late years illuminating his renderings. While he played with the immense difficulties of the piece as though they were his tame and familiar pets, yet there was an utter absence of display in technique, an absolute sinking of the personality of the artist in the work he was performing, and an intensely clear and vivid outlining of his own understanding of Schumann's meaning. There was also a fine breadth of phrasing, and a distinct and clear manipulation of the keyboard, where tones were kept so nicely apart as to seem to let air and sunshine in between them. There was height as well as breadth in Joseffy's rendering.

YORK JOURNAL AND ADVERTISER.
W. R HEARST.

TREET, NEW YORK, FRIDAY, NOV. 12, 1897.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

First Concert of the Season Listened to by a Large Audience at the Metropolitan.

The first concert this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was attentively listened to last evening at the Metropolitan Opera House by a large audience. This is the twelfth annual visit of the well-known organization, which seems to receive more attention, with each visit, but never more recognition than it did last evening, from music loving New Yorkers. The programme was as follows:

Symphony No. 3, in F major, Op 90,
Johannes Brahms
I. Allegro con brio (F major), 6-4.
II. Andante (C major), 4-4.
III. Poco Allegretto (C minor), 3-8.
IV. Allegro (F minor), 2-2.
Concerto for pianoforte in A minor, Op. 54,
Robert Schumann
I. Allegro affettuoso (A minor), 4-4.
II. Intermezzo: Andantino grazioso (F major), 2-4.
III. Allegro vivace (A major), 3-4.
Suite, "Peer Gynt," Op. 46. Eduard Hagerup Greig
"Daybreak."
"The Death of Aase."
"Anitra's Dance."
"The Hall of the Mountain King."
Rhapsody for Orchestra, "Espana."
Emmanuel Chabrier

The rhapsody for orchestra, "Espana," was given for the first time. It is a brilliant fantasia, perfectly free in form, on original Spanish dance tunes, the various forms of Jota and the Malaguena being especially prominent.

The Spanish Jota is a waltz always in three time, but with much more freedom in the dancing than is customary in waltzes. It is danced in couples, each pair being quite independent of the rest. The respective partners face each other; the guitar twangs, the spectators accompany with a whining nasal drawing refrain and clapping of hands. You put your arm around your partner's waist for a few bars, take a waltz round, stop, and give her a fling under your raised arm. Then the two dance backward and forward, across and back, whirl round and chassez, and do some nautch-wallah-ing, accompanying with the castanets, or snapping of fingers and thumbs.

This composition was excellently rendered, as was "Peer Gynt," an inspiration from Ibsen's dramatic poem, taken from Norwegian folk-legends.

The New York Times.

NEW YORK, FRIDAY, NOV. 12, 1897.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

First Concert of the Season Given Last Night.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first concert of the current season at the Metropolitan Opera House last night. In spite of the storm, the auditorium was crowded. It is evident that persistent visits to New York by this orchestra and the relentless insistence of the entire press upon its superiority to any other orchestra in the country have finally convinced New Yorkers, who in matters musical seem to know only opera singers, that here is a glorious singer of a hundred voices worthy of honor and praise and glory more than a house full of trilling prime donne or high-chest-C tenors. We live and learn; but we must keep on learning, for at no concert in recent times has mere virtuosity gained such a triumph for a bit of cheap musical trickery as at that of last night. The audience vociferously and imperatively demanded a repetition of the closing movement of Grieg's "Peer Gynt" suite—a piece of composition belonging to the same class as "There's a hot time in the old town to-night." The other three movements, which are much better, caused no excitement, but this one having the incisive rhythm of a walk around lifted about half the audience into the seventh heaven of joy. It is only fair to say that the other half was unmoved.

The other numbers on the programme were Brahms's third symphony, Schumann's piano concerto, and Charbrier's Spanish rhapsody. The soloist of the evening was Mr. Rafael Joseffy, whose performance of his part of the Schumann work was simply that of a master of his art. A performance more beautiful in its clarity and quality of tone, its perfect comprehension of the composer's meaning. its exquisite and unfailingly correct adjustment of the technics of piano playing to the revelation of that meaning, and its respect for the character of the solo instrument it would be hard to imagine. Mr. Joseffy's style has lost none of its clean crispness of touch or its delicate shadings, yet it has gained immensely in breadth and authority. Where there was formerly only beauty, there is now added strength. Mr. Joseffy stands easily in the front rank of living pianists. He responded to several recalls last night with a Brahms intermezzo, a little masterpiece, superbly played with wonderful coloring, with most poetic insight, and with some remarkable technical excellences in the management of the middle voices and the use of the pedals. The audience was not enthusiastic about it.

The same thing may be said in regard to the Brahms symphony, in which only the second and third movements were generally liked. But Brahms is growing, and his time, like that of others, is bound to come. The public did not like Beethoven at first, but he is tolerably popular now, even in New York. As for Charbrier's rhapsody, that belongs distinctly to the Sunday night concert. It is a piece of orchestral color and that is all that can be said for it. The orchestra was in fine form last night. The Brahms symphony was played magnificently. The tonal splendors of the Boston orchestra are glorious. The instrumental color is always so rich, so solid, so noble that it seems to have something more than merely sensuous beauty. But that is because it is used as a means, not an end. The phrasing of the orchestra is like that of a great singer, and every nuance is full of meaning. But it is hardly profitable to go into details about the matter. Suffice it to say that this is a band of virtuosi, singing through their instruments in perfect unanimity and with a high and inexhaustible artistic enthusiasm. Mr. Paur read the Brahms symphony intellectually and conducted the orchestral part of the concert well.

The World

d by the Press Publishing Company, 53 to 63 PARK
New York.

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 12, 1897.

BOSTON'S PEERLESS MUSICIANS.

Symphony Orchestra Gives Its First Concert at the Opera-House, with Rafael Joseffy as Soloist.

The musicians who form the Boston Symphony Orchestra—the highest exponents of orchestral work in the country—received a royal welcome at the Metropolitan Opera-House last evening. In spite of weather of the sort that makes people stick to homes and firesides, the audience was a large one. It was enthusiastic too, and Mr. Paur, the conductor, who is more of a prophet at home than abroad, and who has found his most severe critics in New York, fairly beamed with joy when an encore was insisted upon after the performance of Grieg's suite, "Peer Gynt."

In this number of the programme the orchestra gave a superlative exhibition of its extraordinary virtuosity. The precision of execution, the homogeneity of tone, the unanimity of expression, shading, of the subtlest sort, pianissimos as soft as zephyrs, crescendos that were irresistible, made the performance one that will be long remembered. In "The Death of Aase" there was a mysterious solemnity that filled one with awe. "Anitra's Dance" had a ravishing delicacy of rhythmic sprightliness, and there was a barbaric fury in the tremendous accelerando that ends the last movemnt of the suite, "The Hall of the Mountain King."

Chabner's Spanish Rhapsody with its brilliant characterizations and idealizations of Spanish dances, was another triumph for the players.

Mr. Paur gave a straightforward reading of Brahm's Third Symphony. He did not illumine sympathetically its purport to any particular extent, and the many passages in which the composer has remained musically ambiguous were not made clearer, but the reading was clean-cut and correct.

The soloist was Mr. Rafael Joseffy. Now that this eminent pianist has resumed concert work, the field for the foreign pianist has become a narrow one. In the playing of Mr. Joseffy there is the supreme union of virtuosity and musical feeling. Last evening he played Schumann's concerto in A minor—an opus which, while intrinsically brilliant, is so written in the medium of the instrument that only a master can make it what it is intended to be. He played it with technical perfection, with an extraordinary accentuation of its varying rhythms and with an exquisite realization of the romance which underlies every phrase Schumann has written.

New-York Daily Tribune.

FOUNDED BY HORACE GREELEY.

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 12, 1897.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

The vicissitudes of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New-York have entered upon a new phase, to judge by the attendance at the first concert of the organization, which took place last night in the Metropolitan Opera House. When the band first began to give concerts in Steinway Hall ten or a dozen years ago the audiences were of the kind usually described as small but select. So far as the mass of the city's music-lovers was concerned, there seemed to exist something like an indifference to the visitors, possibly even a disposition to treat them as interlopers, as if New-York needed no one to come from the farther East to show it what orchestral music might be. Then it was noticeable that the faithful, who were not numerous, but were obviously select, were people of Bostonian antecedents. The number grew, however, for New-York is too metropolitan to cherish small prejudices long, and by the time that it was thought expedient to house the concerts in Carnegie Hall, large audiences of liberal tastes and no marks of even distinguished provinciality awaited the coming of the Boston musicians eagerly, and heard them gladly. There came an unfortunate reaction later, and the seasons at the Metropolitan Opera House have disclosed a great disparity between their artistic and financial outcomes. But there is no discouraging Mr. Higginson, and his reward seems to have come, for the subscription this year is twice as large as that of last year, and last night's audience was such in point of numbers, as well as character, as to make the heart of a manager crow chanticleer.

There was nothing unfamiliar in the programme, though its concluding number, Chabrier's Spanish Rhapsody, has not been heard here often, probably because local conductors have recognized that its success with an audience depends upon the utmost virtuosity in performance, there being nothing in its melodic ideas to compel even moderate respect, to say nothing of admiration. But Mr. Joseffy was down for the solo number, and his name is a good one to conjure with. He played the Schumann Concerto, but not in a way to satisfy all the expectations which the announcement of his purpose awakened. That he is thoroughly in sympathy with the work is open to very serious question. If he were, his performance would surely have been broader and more poetical. There was an intimation in the intermezzo that the feeling of disappointment left by the first movement would be dissipated in the finale, but his treatment of its principal melody was singularly incomprehensible, coming from so sincere and experienced a musician. Here, as in the preceding portions of his work, the clarity of his chords and the crispness of his finger work were admirable, but the chivalresque puissance of the music was not brought to the consciousness of the listener. Plainly, his heart was not in it; or, if so, not to a fraction of the extent that it was in the intermezzo from Brahms's Opus No. 116, which he played on the recall. Here we had not only Brahms in all his loveliness, but also Joseffy, with all his delicacy, all his poetry, all his knowledge of the effects possible to the pianoforte. It provided a moment of supreme delight.

The concert began with a tribute to the memory of Brahms—a performance of his symphony in F—obviously offered in a spirit of truest devotion by Mr. Paur and his men, and accepted with gladness by the audience. After it and the concerto came the familiar "Peer Gynt" music of Grieg, and the Chabrier Rhapsody. The grotesque concluding number, written to illustrate an episode in Ibsen's fantastic creation, made so strong an appeal to the lovers of the bass drum and "Turkish Patrol" effects that it had to be repeated to still the clamoring of a portion of the audience, notwithstanding that Mr. Paur showed commendable unwillingness to disturb the dignity of the evening, already strained by the Grieg number and the Chabrier, "España," at the time still in petto.

N.Y. World
Sunday, Nov. 14

IN THE WORLD OF MUSIC.

New York's Belated Recognition of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

DYNA BEUMER'S COLORATURE.

Pianist Richard Hoffman's Extraordinary Achievement—A New Chamber Music Club.

The visits of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to New York have lost their altruistic character. They are now profitable speculations. This was made plainly evident by the large gathering at the Metropolitan Opera-House on Thursday evening. It is a pleasure to record the fact that the music lovers of this city have finally realized that these musicians are—as has been written in these columns—"the highest exponents of orchestral work in this country."

The persistence of the orchestra's backers has earned its reward, but it has been materially assisted by both the frank criticisms and the insistent proclamations of the organization's abstract superiority which have been made by the local press.

But the musicians who play under Mr. Paur's baton have not yet received the full meed of the appreciation they deserve. They are still being applauded more for their virtuosity than for their higher and grander musical merits.

Balto Herald

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Brilliant Performance and Artistic Success of the Orchestra Last Night—Mr. Kneisel's Solo.

If such a thing be possible, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in its concert at the Music Hall last night, even surpassed the standard which the excellence of its performances in Baltimore during the past 12 years has established.

Under the able leadership of Emil Paur the superb organization has won the warm esteem of music lovers in this city, as elsewhere. Many members of the orchestra have established individual reputations and social ties among the local residents, and the applause from a fairly large audience last night was warm and hearty. Mr. Paur and Franz Kneisel, the distinguished solo violinist, were particularly honored by enthusiastic receptions.

Johannes Brahm's magnificent Symphony No. 3, in F major, was the first number on the programme. The orchestra never had a better opportunity to display its perfect conception of the spirit of a composition, or its unity and accord in the interpretation of a work. It scored an artistic triumph, especially in the weird transitional harmonies of the andante movement. The counterpoint, at every stage, was as precise as the most exacting ear could desire, and there was no lack of enthusiasm in the rendition of the passages containing antithetical major and minor themes, which constitute the distinguishing feature of the symphony.

Mr. Kneisel played the solo violin in the second number—the second and third movements from Karl Goldmark's concerto, opus 28. At the very beginning, the 16 measures of simply melody, the artistic nature of the player impressed itself upon all, and in the following melodic developments, Mr. Kneisel quite won even those who had not heard him before. A storm of applause came in the brief interval between the second and third movements. In the Polacca rondo, containing a superb unaccompanied cadenza, his technique was most brilliant. The audience insisted upon recalling him again and again, but all invitations for a further exhibition of his skill were denied.

The last two numbers on the programme were much "lighter" in character than the first half of the concert. Chabrier's orchestral rhapsody, "Espana," as the orchestra's historian remarks in the programme notes, is so entirely free in form and development as to elude technical analysis. It is built upon Spanish dance tunes, such as the "Jota" and the "Malaguena," and, as played by the orchestra, in some passages bears a resemblance to the music of a thousand guitars. The fantasia was given with a wild rhythm and verve which fairly made the auditors' nerves tingle with pleasure.

Felix Weingartner's orchestral arrangement of Weber's "Invitation to the Dance" was the concluding number for the evening. It is a truthful and perfectly poetical translation of the famous pianoforte rondo brilliant, with the exception of a short cadenza preceding the allegro.

All of the numbers performed last night, with the exception of Brahm's symphony, were new and very acceptable additions to the repertoire of the concerts. The next performance will be given December 15.

The Music Hall management is to be congratulated upon the careful observance of the rule concerning late-comers. About 50 people arrived after the performance commenced last night, and much discomfort must have been afforded those who wished to hear the music had the tardy ones been allowed to proceed to their seats before the end of the first movement.

NOVEMBER 9, 1897.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Audience at the Academy to Open the Orchestral Season.

Mr. Paur believes that it is always well in making up the first programme for the series of symphony concerts, to give one fine old-fashioned symphony, a joy from its liquid simplicity, a glowing bit of modernity in the way of some colorful tour de force, and something in lighter form, which may be said to be, without offending any one, a concession to popular taste. Last year we had Mozart, Massenet and Weber-Berlioz. This year, Haydn, Chabrier and Weber-Weingartner. Last year we were invited to the dance with a certain amount of decorus corybantic simplicity; while this year the invitation was accompanied by the gurgling of beer and the popping of champagne corks. Such a programme has a great attraction, since its contrasts are obvious; and, when, as was the case last night, Joseffy interprets a Schumann concerto, and the concert opens with an easily comprehensible example of Brahms, everyone should be satisfied.

As this year the sale of seats has even surpassed the remarkable sale of other years, the Academy last night was crowded with a brilliant audience and most enthusiastic, particularly over their favorites. The orchestra did not seem its best in the Brahms Academic overture, with its German college student themes—one, a well-known hymn in American churches—and it was Joseffy who aroused the deepest interest by his fine work in the Schumann concerto in A minor for the piano. As so often here before, particularly in 1895, on his return to the concert stage, the pianist gave full evidence of the beauty of tone and the delicacy of touch and depth of expression. The various movements, with all their fine contrast, were handled beautifully, and the insistent applause was rewarded by an encore, so rarely granted at these concerts that the piano was being hauled aside when the obliging pianist came back. As the orchestra struck in on Haydn's fresh and blithe and pure symphony in C Major, it gave the greatest pleasure of the evening. The melodic beauty and the good humor, even to a little jocosorie, of the symphony are very taking qualities, and all that was in the music was brought out by the fine reading, particularly in the allegretto and finale, when the orchestra rendered the old-time charm of Haydn with rare enthusiasm.

In the second part of the programme things went on the jump indeed. Weingartner's richly involved arrangement of Weber's "Invitation to the Dance" was given with splendid swing and brilliant effect. Weingartner gives you Weber in full measure running over the themes with clever introductions of his own singly and then doubled up contrapuntally, all with the air of an attack on the susceptibilities of a joyous cosmopolitan open air garden audience. Every man in the orchestra has his chance and the total effect is a triumphant expansion of the beautiful rondo which a great orchestra prevents from being meretricious. In conclusion Chabrier's "Espana" was the characteristic bit of French orchestral modernity so well worked out in similar lines by Bizet. The "Espana" has all the vital roughness of an up country waltz with the fandango thrown in, the suggestion of a Sevillana all worked out richly in the orchestral choirs in the final melee is clever in effect as it is varied in color and all thoroughly national.

News

The seats for the Boston Symphony Orchestra rehearsals in that city a few days ago were sold by auction. The premiums ranged higher than ever before, the highest being $102, paid by Mr. Connelly, of the Adams House. Ninety and $50 premiums were common. Very few seats went under $30. These prices were for what are known as the "$12" seats—those in the rows nearest the stage. The "$7.50" seats in the rows farther back were sold at auction next day and also brought high premiums.

American

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Next Wednesday evening, at Music Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra begins its thirteenth season in this city. "Nothing succeeds like success," and everybody interested in the cause of good music will be gratified to learn of the orchestra's promising outlook for the season, not only at home, but in every city visited, and notably in Philadelphia, where, in the Academy of Music, seating over three thousand people, less than fifty seats remain unsold for the season. This is probably the most phenomenal sale of season tickets ever known in Philadelphia.

Again, in Providence, R. I., where the orchestra has just commenced its fifteenth season, the Providence Journal, commenting on the opening concert, says: "There was a large audience, showing conclusively that the increase from six to eight concerts this year was a move in the right direction, and one that will command hearty support."

In New York the season sale for the coming season is nearly double that of last year—a very satisfactory showing, considering the large number of entertainments of a similar nature given in that city.

A most interesting program has been prepared for the first concert, which will be announced in a few days.

Philadelphia, Tuesday, Nov. 9, 1897.

Academy of Music—"Boston Symphony Orchestra."

The immense popularity which the Boston Symphony Orchestra enjoy in Philadelphia was strongly in evidence last night, when, despite the disagreeableness of the weather, an audience which filled every seat in the Academy of Music from parquet to gallery assembled to listen to the first concert of of what is now their thirteenth season in this city.

The programme, which, following the usual custom, had appended to it an interesting analysis of the music to be rendered, besides biographical notices of the composers, by William F. Apthorp, was as follows:

Academic Festival Overture, in C minor, Johannes Brahms.

Concerto for Pianoforte, in A minor, Op. 54, Robert Schumann.

Symphony in C major, "l'Ours," Op. 66, Josef Haydn.

"Invitation to the Dance," Op. 65, arranged for orchestra by Felix Weingartner (first time at these concerts), Karl Maria von Weber.

Rhapsody for Orchestra, "Espana" (first time at these concerts), Emmanuel Chabrier.

Criticism is almost superfluous when directed against such playing as was heard last night. Some might have preferred better known music, others more popular themes, but the majority were more than satisfied, both with the programme and the way it was rendered. Mr. Joseffy's rendition of Schumann's concerto in A minor on the pianoforte was a genuine triumph. He has the velvet touch, the soulful conception that united drew forth an ovation from every part of the house and compelled an encore. L'Ours, the Haydn Symphony in C major, was beautifully rendered. It is typically Hadynesque, especially the third movement, the Menuetto; nothing could exceed the delicacy of the way in which it was handled.

Weber's "Invitation to the Dance" was perhaps the best known and least appreciated of the numbers, but Emmanuel Chabrier's rhapsody for orchestra, "Espana," was truly delightful in its warmth of color and its Spanish suggestiveness.

The programme was short, too short for those who were listening, but just enough to whet the appetite for the next event in December.

A word about Mr. Emil Paur, the conductor. He is—without disrespect—a bundle of nerves, and, like a fabled being of old, seems to possess a hundred hands, a hundred eyes, a hundred ears, with which to keep his grasp on every member of the orchestra. His spirit infuses itself into them; he animates them, he sways them as he wills nothing escapes him, and to him is due a very large measure of the success which attended last night's delightful concert.

THE RECORD

Philadelphia, November 9, 1897.

Boston Symphony Concert at the Academy of Music.

The unique novelty of the first Boston Symphony Concert of the season at the Academy of Music last evening was Emmanuel Chabrier's rhapsody, "Espana," which is, indeed, a peculiar product in French art. Chabrier himself, who died three years ago of creeping paralysis of the brain, was an original, an eccentric, who in music created madly comical things in a curiously serious way, and who perpetuated such vocal buffooneries as the "Ballad of Fat Turkeys," and the "Pastorale of Little Pink Piggies." On the passing away of this fantastic individuality, this composer of the "Joyous March," Le Menestral exclaimed: "Poor Chabrier, shattered by premature disease, was yet a type of life, intense to the point of exuberance. He was a sincerely joyous being, full of startling buffooneries, with the Rabelaisian wit and temperament, who thought, like the cure of Meudon, that laughter was the special property of Man." No wonder this capricious maestro turned to the unspeakable Catulle Mendes for the libretto of his notable opera, "Gwendoline," and composed a burlesque operetta on satyr Paul Verlaine's studio caricature, "Vauvochard." His was, truly, a musical "Life in Bohemia" (Vie de Boheme). His "Espana," a fantasia on Spanish dance tunes—the jota (a waltz) and the malaguena (a fandango)—was certainly whimsical and odd enough in its instrumentation, and pictured forth musical Spain with deeply laid-on colors. Now it was Carmen humming a seguidilla, and now her bull-fighter flaunting his jaunty cap. But Chabrier can scarcely be said to have succeeded so well in playing on his orchestra like a Spanish guitar as Edouard Lalo has done in the serenade portion of his splendid suite, "Namouna." There, indeed, Lalo transformed the orchestra, in the words of Berlioz, into an enormous guitar. Chabrier's waltz rhythm has also been utilized by Waldteufel. Another musical curiosity of the evening was Brahm's "Academic Festival Overture," in C minor, which that usually serious-minded composer wrote on some convivial student songs in honor of his dubbing as a doctor by the University of Breslau. This characteristic German piece of humor makes the most possible out of the kneipe and commerz hymns.

But the two conspicuous numbers of the concert were the appreciative interpretation of old Papa Haydn's sweetly simple "Bear" symphony, with its quaint chasse-ing of the themes back and forth on the strings, and Rafael Joseffy's playing of the Schumann Concerto in A minor. This middle register composition may be, as Liszt pronounced it, a "concerto without the piano," but Joseffy demonstrated last evening what a wealth of brilliancy lies within its confined medium scope. The left hand had some, especially grand passages. Throughout the quiet technique of this remarkable virtuoso was emphatically demonstrated, a solidity that spurns all showy flourish and yet achieves the most delicate effects of light and shade. An unusual warmth characterized his rendition of the intermezzo, while his expression in the third movement justifies the assertion that Joseffy is adding more soul to the body of his technique.

TUESDAY NOVEMBER 9, 18

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Its First Concert of the Season at the Academy Last Night.

The return of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to this city for the opening of its seventeenth season crowded the Academy of Music last night with a representative audience. The program was as follows, with Mr. Emil Paur conductor.

Johannes Brahms....Academic Festival Overture, in C minor, Op. 80.

Robert Schumann....Concerto for Pianoforte, in A minor, Op. 54.

Josef Haydn.........Symphony in C major, "l'Ours," Op. 66.

Karl Maria von Weber.."Invitation to the Dance," Op. 65.

Arranged for Orchestra by Felix Weingartner. (First time at these concerts.)

Emmanuel Chabrier....Rhapsody for Orchestra, "Espana." (First time at these concerts.)

Soloist, Mr. Rafael Joseffy.

In this notice of a concert which was indeed a delight, the place of honor must be given to Rafael Joseffy. When he made his appearance in this city last year with the Symphony Orchestra nearly a decade had elapsed since Philadelphians had heard him, and it was seen what he had gained in artistic development. Last night it almost seemed as if he had reached a higher stage in his breadth, authority, brillancy and artistic finish. His playing of the Schumann concerto was marked by masterful strength and delicacy. It used to be said of this great artist that with all the purity of his tone and the wonderful crispness and clearness of his touch he lacked poetic sensibility, that his color was that of the moonlight or the starlight and that his playing did not have the passionate warmth and splendor of the sunshine. That could not have been said last year, nor of a surety, last night. While he shows his analytical and intellectual power he also displays a broader sweep of force than ever, he makes his utterances luminous, his tone-color is composed of warm and glowing tints, and the soft, the tender and the imaginative moods of the composer were interpreted in the most perfect fashion. The first movement, the allegro affetuosso, which is eminently fitted to show the strong points of his art and style, was played faultlessly; in the second movement, intermezzo, the delicate andantino was full of sympathy and color, and all through it he spread wide a lovely range of the most exquisite and varied shades; while in the third movement, allegro vivace, the marvelous fluency and finish of his scale passages, the exquisite delicacy of his pianissimo, his tonal beauty and the transcendent reach of his technique made up playing that left behind it the most profound impression. It need scarcely be said that the orchestra was in full sympathy and accorded with the player.

The orchestra numbers of the program were given with the most admirable precision, delicacy and harmony. One could hardly have supposed that the Brahms who wrote the Academic overture for his university degree was the Brahms who was to develop such masterful yet cold musical intellectuality. The number is full of color surprises, while showing breadth of scholarship, and is built up on themes taken from German students' songs. There is much in it both for strings and wood winds, and the strength of the latter was largely in evidence. Of the performance of the Haydn Symphony it can only be said that it was interpreted in the tenderest and most refined manner. The work abounds in relief and contrast, and these were delightfully accentuated by the players. The light and shade were pictured with the utmost delicacy, and the interpretation of the minuet by the strings was as dainty in its setting as is a piece of Dresden, and as diaphanous in tone coloring as the thread of the gossamer. The orchestra, it may be said without exaggeration, has never before so near reached the ideal of orchestral work. Almost as much praise can be bestowed upon the "Invitation to the Dance," arranged for orchestra. The orchestration brought out the full beauty of the themes, and the playing was poetic. It is not likely that any one who listened to it will soon forget the wondrous and yet touching splendor of the closing passages, and there was little marvel that the audience clamored for a repetition, which, fortunately from an artistic standpoint, they were not granted. The Chabrier rhapsody which closed the program is, as its name "Espana" would suggest, a fantasia on original Spanish dance tunes. It has much freedom and rhythm, the composer has caught the spirit of Spain, which shows itself through every movement, and the joyous manner in which it was rendered by the orchestra brought out all its bizarre and eccentric flavor.

If Mr. Paur continues to furnish such programs during the season, the most hypercritical listener will be doomed to silence.

Office of The Call,

26 South Seventh Street.

Philadelphia, 11/9

The Boston Symphony Concert.

The musical season of 97-98 was opened last night at the Academy of Music by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The academy was crowded in every part and the favorite organization, which again is under the direction of Mr. Emil Paur, was warmly welcomed. The program included Brahm's academic festival overture, Haydn's C major symphony, Felix Weingaertner's orchestration of Weber's invitation to the dance and Chabrier's rhapsody "Espana." These numbers of at least three different schools again demonstrated the virtuosity of the splendid Boston organization. It would indeed be difficult to find anywhere to-day a body of musicians who could give better itnerpretations of the intricate arrangements of Weingaertner and Chabrier, and the enthusiasm aroused by these performances was a well-deserved compliment to the orchestra and its able conductor. The soloist of the occasion was Mr. Rafael Joseffy, who played the well-known A minor concerto, by Schumann. Mr. Joseffy's performance of this work is too well known to need extended comment. He is one of the finest exponents of the concerto under notice, and the rendition last night was as finished as mortal man could wish to hear. The enthusiasm of the large audience was such that for once Mr. Paur had to allow the rule "no encore" to be broken, and, in fact, the conductor himself urged the pianist to gratify the wishes of his auditors. The second concert of the series will take place on December 13.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 9, 1897.

MUSIC AT THE ACADEMY.

The Opening Concert for the Season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Philadelphia season of 1897-98 of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was brilliantly opened at the Academy of Music last evening. Although the weather was so inclement the great auditorium was crowded in every part. Not a vacant seat could anywhere be seen, even the most available standing room was all taken up, and on every side there was apparent that indescribable air of half-suppressed, wholly pleasurable excitement which marks an occasion of exceptional interest and importance. Every one seemed to be rejoicing in the prospect of hearing again the finest orchestra in the country and to be happy in the anticipation of the enjoyment which the season promises. The salient characteristic of the programme performed last night was its variety. It contained examples of every period and almost of every distinct style of musical composition from the time of Haydn down to the present day. The genial old Viennese master himself was represented by his symphony in C major, known as the Bear symphony, which was played with great brilliancy and evident relish, and which,, though not a great work, is grateful from its clearness of form and healthful simplicity of sentiment to ears jaded with the overstrained emotion and elaborate complexities of the modern manner. After Haydn, chronologically, came Weber as represented by his familiar "Invitation to the Waltz," cleverly instrumented by Felix Weingartner. The middle period was exemplified by Schumann's pianoforte concerto in A minor, artistically though rather colorlessly played by Rafael Joseffy. Modern classicism was illustrated by Brahms' scholarly "Academic Overture," while Chabrier's rather tawdry "Espana" rhapsody, which brought the concert to a close, may be said to stand for the latter day sensationalism of the decadent school. Thus there was something for every taste, and to each different demand the orchestra rose triumphant. It has gained in strength and freedom without losing in delicacy or grace, and it is conducted by Mr. Paur with a broader freedom than of old and a more assured mastery. There is every promise that the season thus auspiciously begun will in all ways cap the climax of success.

The Times

PHILADELPHIA, NOVEMBER 9, 1897.

FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERT

The Boston Orchestra, With Joseffy, Opens the Season Successfully.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first concert of the season at the Academy of Music last night before an audience of brilliant dimensions and pronounced enthusiasm. Emil Paur received a hearty welcome upon taking his position on the platform, and the minute control which he exercised over the different departments of his band was marked with the same degree of care that has made the ensemble technique of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and rare excellence synonymous terms. This organization again gave ample evidence that it is still the vehicle of harmonious splendor, and it further gave proof of improved mellowness and broadness of tone and perfectness in the exercise of its technicque. With the exception of an anticipation of attack on the part of the second violins in the last movement of the symphony there appeared to be an absolutely exact understanding and delivery of balance and shade between the conductor and his men. The flute department and also the brass keeps pace in its improvement with the established excellence of the first violins and the cellos, and these are as nearly perfect as possible.

It may be said, therefore, that as an orchestra this one stands for all that is best in music in America. Why, therefore, should not the building of the programme be of a class to correspond with its acknowledged merit? To enfold a listener with the sensuousness of college madrigals wonderfully embellished by Brahms and then add the brilliancy and dash of Schumann's finale in the A minor concerto, in advance of a presentation of the purest morceau in musical literature, Haydn's Symphony in C major, is a proceeding which finds no ready excuse. Rafael Joseffy was the soloist, and his reasons for selecting the medium of the Schumann concerto for his re-entry here were easily explained. The third movement is entirely his own at present. No one can play it at this day as can Joseffy. The brilliancy of this technique, its clear, sparkling, running liquidness was perfectly astounding. Besides which he almost made the anaemic intermezzo interesting, and that if itself is a herculean task. The novelties in the programme were Weingartner's smart instrumentation of the "Invitation to the Dance"—which may be called Weber-up-to-date—and Chabrier's highly colored but not otherwise very impressive Spanish rhapsody.

Life

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

NO VISITING organization receives a warmer welcome in this city than the Bostonn Symphony Orchestra, whose series of concerts at Music Hall forms a distinctive feature of each musical season. Unlike nearly every other organization appealing to the musical public for support, the attractiveness of its performances rests upon the musicianship and ability of all its members, and not upon the personality or talent of an individual or of a few stars. The fine quality of the performances of this orchestra has long been recognized, and each year adds to its prestige. Conductor Paur's programs for the coming season are particularly well chosen, and embrace a variety of orchestral works calculated to suit all tastes.

The first concert of the series will be given next Wednesday evening, November 10. Among the soloists who have been engaged are Mme. Blauvelt, Mr. Bispham, Mr. Joseffy, Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Loeffler.

The sale of season tickets is now progressing. Next Monday the single sale will begin. The program for the first concert is Brahm's Symphony No. 3; two movements from the concerto for violin. (Mr. Kneisel soloist.) Rhapsody for orchestra, "Espana," Chabrier; "Invitation to the Dance," Weber, arranged for orchestra by Felix Weingartner.

The Philadelphia Press

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 9, 1897.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Brilliant Audience at the Academy of Music to Open the Orchestral Season.

Mr. Paur believes that it is always well in making up the first programme for the series of symphony concerts, to give one fine old-fashioned symphony, a joy from its liquid simplicity, a glowing bit of modernity in the way of some colorful tour de force, and something in lighter form, which may be said to be, without offending any one, a concession to popular taste. Last year we had Mozart, Massenet and Weber-Berlioz. This year, Haydn, Chabrier and Weber-Weingartner. Last year we were invited to the dance with a certain amount of decorus corybantic simplicity; while this year the invitation was accompanied by the gurgling of beer and the popping of champagne corks. Such a programme has a great attraction, since its contrasts are obvious; and, when, as was the case last night, Joseffy interprets a Schumann concerto, and the concert opens with an easily comprehensible example of Brahms, everyone should be satisfied.

As this year the sale of seats has even surpassed the remarkable sale of other years, the Academy last night was crowded with a brilliant audience and most enthusiastic, particularly over their favorites. The orchestra did not seem its best in the Brahms Academic overture, with its German college student themes—one, a well-known hymn in American churches—and it was Joseffy who aroused the deepest interest by his fine work in the Schumann concerto in A minor for the piano. As so often here before, particularly in 1895, on his return to the concert stage, the pianist gave full evidence of the beauty of tone and the delicacy of touch and depth of expression. The various movements, with all their fine contrast, were handled beautifully, and the insistent applause was rewarded by an encore, so rarely granted at these concerts that the piano was being hauled aside when the obliging pianist came back. As the orchestra struck in on Haydn's fresh and blithe and pure symphony in C Major, it gave the greatest pleasure of the evening. The melodic beauty and the good humor, even to a little jocosorie, of the symphony are very taking qualities, and all that was in the music was brought out by the fine reading, particularly in the allegretto and finale, when the orchestra rendered the old-time charm of Haydn with rare enthusiasm.

In the second part of the programme things went on the jump indeed. Weingartner's richly involved arrangement of Weber's "Invitation to the Dance" was given with splendid swing and brilliant effect. Weingartner gives you Weber in full measure running over the themes with clever introductions of his own singly and then doubled up contrapuntally, all with the air of an attack on the susceptibilities of a joyous cosmopolitan open air garden audience. Every man in the orchestra has his chance and the total effect is a triumphant expansion of the beautiful rondo which a great orchestra prevents from being meretricious. In conclusion Chabrier's "Espana" was the characteristic bit of French orchestral modernity so well worked out in similar lines by Bizet. The "Espana" has all the vital roughness of an up country waltz with the fandango thrown in, the suggestion of a Sevillana all worked out richly in the orchestral choirs in the final melee is clever in effect as it is varied in color and all thoroughly national.

News

The seats for the Boston Symphony Orchestra rehearsals in that city a few days ago were sold by auction. The premiums ranged higher than ever before, the highest being $102, paid by Mr. Connelly, of the Adams House. Ninety and $50 premiums were common. Very few seats went under $30. These prices were for what are known as the "$12" seats—those in the rows nearest the stage. The "$7.50" seats in the rows farther back were sold at auction next day and also brought high premiums.

Ame

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Next Wednesday evening, at Music Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra begins its thirteenth season in this city. "Nothing succeeds like success," and everybody interested in the cause of good music will be gratified to learn of the orchestra's promising outlook for the season, not only at home, but in every city visited, and notably in Philadelphia, where, in the Academy of Music, seating over three thousand people, less than fifty seats remain unsold for the season. This is probably the most phenomenal sale of season tickets ever known in Philadelphia.

Again, in Providence, R. I., where the orchestra has just commenced its fifteenth season, the Providence Journal, commenting on the opening concert, says: "There was a large audience, showing conclusively that the increase from six to eight concerts this year was a move in the right direction, and one that will command hearty support."

In New York the season sale for the coming season is nearly double that of last year—a very satisfactory showing, considering the large number of entertainments of a similar nature given in that city.

A most interesting program has been prepared for the first concert, which will be announced in a few days.

PUBLIC LEDGER

Philadelphia, Tuesday, Nov. 9, 1897.

Academy of Music—"Boston Symphony Orchestra."

The immense popularity which the Boston Symphony Orchestra enjoy in Philadelphia was strongly in evidence last night, when, despite the disagreeableness of the weather, an audience which filled every seat in the Academy of Music from parquet to gallery assembled to listen to the first concert of of what is now their thirteenth season in this city.

The programme, which, following the usual custom, had appended to it an interesting analysis of the music to be rendered, besides biographical notices of the composers, by William F. Apthorp, was as follows:

Academic Festival Overture, in C minor, Johannes Brahms.

Concerto for Pianoforte, in A minor, Op. 54, Robert Schumann.

Symphony in C major, "l'Ours," Op. 66, Josef Haydn.

"Invitation to the Dance," Op. 65, arranged for orchestra by Felix Weingartner (first time at these concerts), Karl Maria von Weber

Rhapsody for Orchestra, "Espana" (first time at these concerts), Emmanuel Chabrier.

Criticism is almost superfluous when directed against such playing as was heard last night. Some might have preferred better known music, others more popular themes, but the majority were more than satisfied, both with the programme and the way it was rendered. Mr. Joseffy's rendition of Schumann's concerto in A minor on the pianoforte was a genuine triumph. He has the velvet touch, the soulful conception that united drew forth an ovation from every part of the house and compelled an encore. L'Ours, the Haydn Symphony in C major, was beautifully rendered. It is typically Hadynesque, especially the third movement, the Menuetto; nothing could exceed the delicacy of the way in which it was handled.

Weber's "Invitation to the Dance" was perhaps the best known and least appreciated of the numbers, but Emmanuel Chabrier's rhapsody for orchestra, "Espana," was truly delightful in its warmth of color and its Spanish suggestiveness.

The programme was short, too short for those who were listening, but just enough to whet the appetite for the next event in December.

A word about Mr. Emil Paur, the conductor. He is—without disrespect—a bundle of nerves, and, like a fabled being of old, seems to possess a hundred hands, a hundred eyes, a hundred ears, with which to keep his grasp on every member of the orchestra. His spirit infuses itself into them; he animates them, he sways them as he wills nothing escapes him, and to him is due a very large measure of the success which attended last night's delightful concert.

THE RECORD

Philadelphia, November 9, 1897.

Boston Symphony Concert at the Academy of Music.

The unique novelty of the first Boston Symphony Concert of the season at the Academy of Music last evening was Emmanuel Chabrier's rhapsody, "Espana," which is, indeed, a peculiar product in French art. Chabrier himself, who died three years ago of creeping paralysis of the brain, was an original, an eccentric, who in music created madly comical things in a curiously serious way, and who perpetuated such vocal buffooneries as the "Ballad of Fat Turkeys," and the "Pastorale of Little Pink Piggies." On the passing away of this fantastic individuality, this composer of the "Joyous March," Le Menestral exclaimed: "Poor Chabrier, shattered by premature disease, was yet a type of life, intense to the point of exuberance. He was a sincerely joyous being, full of startling buffooneries, with the Rabelaisian wit and temperament, who thought, like the cure of Meudon, that laughter was the special property of Man." No wonder this capricious maestro turned to the unspeakable Catulle Mendes for the libretto of his notable opera, "Gwendoline," and composed a burlesque operetta on satyr Paul Verlaine's studio caricature, "Vauvochard." His was, truly, a musical "Life in Bohemia" (Vie de Boheme). His "Espana," a fantasia on Spanish dance tunes—the jota (a waltz) and the malaguena (a fandango)—was certainly whimsical and odd enough in its instrumentation, and pictured forth musical Spain with deeply laid-on colors. Now it was Carmen humming a seguidilla, and now her bull-fighter flaunting his jaunty cap. But Chabrier can scarcely be said to have succeeded so well in playing on his orchestra like a Spanish guitar as Edouard Lalo has done in the serenade portion of his splendid suite, "Namouna." There, indeed, Lalo transformed the orchestra, in the words of Berlioz, into an enormous guitar. Chabrier's waltz rhythm has also been utilized by Waldteufel. Another musical curiosity of the evening was Brahm's "Academic Festival Overture," in C minor, which that usually serious-minded composer wrote on some convivial student songs in honor of his dubbing as a doctor by the University of Breslau. This characteristic German piece of humor makes the most possible out of the kneipe and commerz hymns.

But the two conspicuous numbers of the concert were the appreciative interpretation of old Papa Haydn's sweetly simple "Bear" symphony, with its quaint chasse-ing of the themes back and forth on the strings, and Rafael Joseffy's playing of the Schumann Concerto in A minor. This middle register composition may be, as Liszt pronounced it, a "concerto without the piano," but Joseffy demonstrated last evening what a wealth of brilliancy lies within its confined medium scope. The left hand had some, especially grand passages. Throughout the quiet technique of this remarkable virtuoso was emphatically demonstrated, a solidity that spurns all showy flourish and yet achieves the most delicate effects of light and shade. An unusual warmth characterized his rendition of the intermezzo, while his expression in the third movement justifies the assertion that Joseffy is adding more soul to the body of his technique.

Philadelphia Inquirer

TUESDAY - - - NOVEMBER 9, 1897

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Its First Concert of the Season at the Academy Last Night.

The return of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to this city for the opening of its seventeenth season crowded the Academy of Music last night with a representative audience. The program was as follows, with Mr. Emil Paur conductor.

Johannes Brahms....Academic Festival Overture, in C minor, Op. 80.
Robert Schumann....Concerto for Pianoforte, in A minor, Op. 54.
Josef Haydn..........Symphony in C major, "l'Ours," Op. 66.
Karl Maria von Weber.."Invitation to the Dance," Op. 65.
Arranged for Orchestra by Felix Weingartner. (First time at these concerts.)
Emmanuel Chabrier....Rhapsody for Orchestra, "Espana."
(First time at these concerts.)

Soloist, Mr. Rafael Joseffy.

In this notice of a concert which was indeed a delight, the place of honor must be given to Rafael Joseffy. When he made his appearance in this city last year with the Symphony Orchestra nearly a decade had elapsed since Philadelphians had heard him, and it was seen what he had gained in artistic development. Last night it almost seemed as if he had reached a higher stage in his breadth, authority, brillancy and artistic finish. His playing of the Schumann concerto was marked by masterful strength and delicacy. It used to be said of this great artist that with all the purity of his tone and the wonderful crispness and clearness of his touch he lacked poetic sensibility, that his color was that of the moonlight or the starlight and that his playing did not have the passionate warmth and splendor of the sunshine. That could not have been said last year, nor of a surety, last night. While he shows his analytical and intellectual power he also displays a broader sweep of force than ever, he makes his utterances luminous, his tone-color is composed of warm and glowing tints, and the soft, the tender and the imaginative moods of the composer were interpreted in the most perfect fashion. The first movement, the allegro affetuosso, which is eminently fitted to show the strong points of his art and style, was played faultlessly; in the second movement, intermezzo, the delicate andantino was full of sympathy and color, and all through it he spread wide a lovely range of the most exquisite and varied shades; while in the third movement, allegro vivace, the marvelous fluency and finish of his scale passages, the exquisite delicacy of his pianissimo, his tonal beauty and the transcendent reach of his technique made up playing that left behind it the most profound impression. It need scarcely be said that the orchestra was in full sympathy and scored with the player.

The orchestra numbers of the program were given with the most admirable precision, delicacy and harmony. One could hardly have supposed that the Brahms who wrote the Academic overture for his university degree was the Brahms who was to develop such masterful yet cold musical intellectuality. The number is full of color surprises, while showing breadth of scholarship, and is built up on themes taken from German students' songs. There is much in it both for strings and wood winds, and the strength of the latter was largely in evidence. Of the performance of the Haydn Symphony it can only be said that it was interpreted in the tenderest and most refined manner. The work abounds in relief and contrast, and these were delightfully accentuated by the players. The light and shade were pictured with the utmost delicacy, and the interpretation of the minuet by the strings was as dainty in its setting as is a piece of Dresden, and as diaphanous in tone coloring as the thread of the gossamer. The orchestra, it may be said without exaggeration, has never before so near reached the ideal of orchestral work. Almost as much praise can be bestowed upon the "Invitation to the Dance," arranged for orchestra. The orchestration brought out the full beauty of the themes, and the playing was poetic. It is not likely that any one who listened to it will soon forget the wondrous and yet touching splendor of the closing passages, and there was little marvel that the audience clamored for a repetition, which, fortunately from an artistic standpoint, they were not granted. The Chabrier rhapsody which closed the program is, as its name "Espana" would suggest, a fantasia on original Spanish dance tunes. It has much freedom and rhythm, the composer has caught the spirit of Spain, which shows itself through every movement, and the joyous manner in which it was rendered by the orchestra brought out all its bizarre and eccentric flavor.

If Mr. Paur continues to furnish such programs during the season, the most hypercritical listener will be doomed to silence.

Office of The Call,

26 South Seventh Street.

Philadelphia, 11/9

The Boston Symphony Concert.

The musical season of 97-98 was opened last night at the Academy of Music by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The academy was crowded in every part and the favorite organization, which again is under the direction of Mr. Emil Paur, was warmly welcomed. The program included Brahm's academic festival overture, Haydn's C major symphony, Felix Weingaertner's orchestration of Weber's invitation to the dance and Chabrier's rhapsody "Espana." These numbers of at least three different schools again demonstrated the virtuosity of the splendid Boston organization. It would indeed be difficult to find anywhere to-day a body of musicians who could give better itnerpretations of the intricate arrangements of Weingaertner and Chabrier, and the enthusiasm aroused by these performances was a well-deserved compliment to the orchestra and its able conductor. The soloist of the occasion was Mr. Rafael Joseffy, who played the well-known A minor concerto, by Schumann. Mr. Joseffy's performance of this work is too well known to need extended comment. He is one of the finest exponents of the concerto under notice, and the rendition last night was as finished as mortal man could wish to hear. The enthusiasm of the large audience was such that for once Mr. Paur had to allow the rule "no encore" to be broken, and, in fact, the conductor himself urged the pianist to gratify the wishes of his auditors. The second concert of the series will take place on December 13.

The North American

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 9, 1897.

MUSIC AT THE ACADEMY.

The Opening Concert for the Season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Philadelphia season of 1897-98 of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was brilliantly opened at the Academy of Music last evening. Although the weather was so inclement the great auditorium was crowded in every part. Not a vacant seat could anywhere be seen, even the most available standing room was all taken up, and on every side there was apparent that indescribable air of half-suppressed, wholly pleasurable excitement which marks an occasion of exceptional interest and importance. Every one seemed to be rejoicing in the prospect of hearing again the finest orchestra in the country and to be happy in the anticipation of the enjoyment which the season promises. The salient characteristic of the programme performed last night was its variety. It contained examples of every period and almost of every distinct style of musical composition from the time of Haydn down to the present day. The genial old Viennese master himself was represented by his symphony in C major, known as the Bear symphony, which was played with great brilliancy and evident relish, and which,, though not a great work, is grateful from its clearness of form and healthful simplicity of sentiment to ears jaded with the overstrained emotion and elaborate complexities of the modern manner. After Haydn, chronologically, came Weber as represented by his familiar "Invitation to the Waltz," cleverly instrumented by Felix Weingartner. The middle period was exemplified by Schumann's pianoforte concerto in A minor, artistically though rather colorlessly played by Rafael Joseffy. Modern classicism was illustrated by Brahms' scholarly "Academic Overture," while Chabrier's rather tawdry "Espana" rhapsody, which brought the concert to a close, may be said to stand for the latter day sensationalism of the decadent school. Thus there was something for every taste, and to each different demand the orchestra rose triumphant. It has gained in strength and freedom without losing in delicacy or grace, and it is conducted by Mr. Paur with a broader freedom than of old and a more assured mastery. There is every promise that the season thus auspiciously begun will in all ways cap the climax of success.

The Times

PHILADELPHIA, NOVEMBER 9, 1897.

FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERT

The Boston Orchestra, With Joseffy, Opens the Season Successfully.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first concert of the season at the Academy of Music last night before an audience of brilliant dimensions and pronounced enthusiasm. Emil Paur received a hearty welcome upon taking his position on the platform, and the minute control which he exercised over the different departments of his band was marked with the same degree of care that has made the ensemble technique of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and rare excellence synonymous terms. This organization again gave ample evidence that it is still the vehicle of harmonious splendor, and it further gave proof of improved mellowness and broadness of tone and perfectness in the exercise of its technique. With the exception of an anticipation of attack on the part of the second violins in the last movement of the symphony there appeared to be an absolutely exact understanding and delivery of balance and shade between the conductor and his men. The flute department and also the brass keeps pace in its improvement with the established excellence of the first violins and the cellos, and these are as nearly perfect as possible.

It may be said, therefore, that as an orchestra this one stands for all that is best in music in America. Why, therefore, should not the building of the programme be of a class to correspond with its acknowledged merit? To enfold a listener with the sensuousness of college madrigals wonderfully embellished by Brahms and then add the brilliancy and dash of Schumann's finale in the A minor concerto, in advance of a presentation of the purest morceau in musical literature, Haydn's Symphony in C major, is a proceeding which finds no ready excuse. Rafael Joseffy was the soloist, and his reasons for selecting the medium of the Schumann concerto for his re-entry here were easily explained. The third movement is entirely his own at present. No one can play it at this day as can Joseffy. The brilliancy of this technique, its clear, sparkling, running liquidness was perfectly astounding. Besides which he almost made the anaemic intermezzo interesting, and that if itself is a herculean task. The novelties in the programme were Weingartner's smart instrumentation of the "Invitation to the Dance"—which may be called Weber-up-to-date—and Chabrier's highly colored but not otherwise very impressive Spanish rhapsody.

Life

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

NO VISITING organization receives a warmer welcome in this [illegible] than the Bostonn Symphony Orchestra, whose series of concerts at Music Hall forms a distinctive feature of each musical season. Unlike nearly every other organization appealing to the musical public for support, the attractiveness of its performances rests upon the musicianship and ability of all its members, and not upon the personality or talent of an individual or of a few stars. The fine quality of the performances of this orchestra has long been recognized and each year adds to its prestige. Conductor Paur's programs for the coming season are particularly well chosen, and embrace a variety of orchestral works calculated to suit all tastes.

The first concert of the series will be given next Wednesday evening, November 10. Among the soloists who have been engaged are Mme. Blauvelt, Mr. Bispham, Mr. Joseffy, Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Loeffler.

The sale of season tickets is now progressing. Next Monday the single sale will begin. The program for the first concert is Brahm's Symphony No. 3; two movements from the concerto for violin. (Mr. Kneisel soloist.) Rhapsody for orchestra, "Espana," Chabrier; "Invitation to the Dance," Weber, arranged for orchestra by Felix Weingartner.

* *

News

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Begins Its Thirteenth Season Here Next Wednesday.

Next Wednesday evening at Music Hall the Boston Symphony Orchestra begins its 13th season in this city. "Nothing succeeds like success," and everybody interested in the cause of good music will be gratified to learn of the orchestra's promising outlook for the season, not only at home, but in every city visited, and notably in Philadelphia, where, in the Academy of Music, seating over 3000 people, less than 50 seats remain unsold for the season. This is probably the most phenomenal sale of season tickets ever known in Philadelphia.

In Providence, R. I., where the orchestra has just commenced its 15th season, the Providence Journal, commenting on the opening concert, says: "There was a large audience, showing conclusively that the increase from six to eight concerts this year was a move in the right direction, and one that will command hearty support."

In New York the season sale for the coming season is nearly double that of last year, a very satisfactory showing, considering the large number of entertainments of a similar nature given in that city.

A most interesting programme has been prepared for the first concert, which will be announced in a few days.

The sale of season tickets is still progressing at Albert's, and compares very favorably with the record of past seasons.

Ev'g Sat

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The sale of season tickets for the Boston Symphony concerts is now progressing at Albert's. These affairs are the chief events of Baltimore's musical season, and the sale will no doubt be as large as usual. The concerts will take place at Music Hall, Wednesday evenings, November 10, December 15, Feburary 16 and March 22. Conductor Paur has already prepared the programme for the series, and they will include: Brahms' Symphony No. 3; Raff's Symphony, "Im Walde;" Dvorak's Symphony, "From the New World;" the Symphony No. 3 of Beethoven, and three movements of the Ninth Symphony, by the same composer. The overtures are the 'Benvenuto Cellini," of Berlioz; the Tschaikowsky overture, "1812." The novelties include the "Espagna" of Chabriet, Tschaikowsky's "Italian Caprice,,' a new suite by Massanet, three movements from a suite by Rimsky Korsakoff, and the "Invitation to Dance" of Weber, with a novel and brilliant orchestration by Weingartner. The soloists are: Mme. Lillian Blauvelt, David Bispham Franz Kneisel and C. M. Loeffler. An evening will be devoted to selections from Wagner, as usual. Next Wednesday the first concert takes place, and Mr. Kneisel is the soloist. The programme is the following: Brahm's Symphony No. 3, Goldmark, two movements from concerts for violin. Chabrier, Rhapsodie for Orchestra, "Espana," Weber 'Invitation to the Dance." The single sale begins Monday.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

First Concert of the Season to Be Given Tonight.

It has grown to be an accepted fact in the cities visited by the Boston Symphony Orchestra that the lovers of the best in music are largely dependent upon this organization. Everybody interested in the success of these concerts will be in attendance at the Music Hall tonight when the following programme will be given:

Brahms....................Symphony No. 3.
Goldmark—Two Movements from Concerto for Violin.
(First time at these concerts.)
Chabrier—Rhapsody for Orchestra—"Espana."
(First time at these concerts.)
Weber........"Invitation to the Dance."
(Arranged for Orchestra by Felix Weingartner—First time at these concerts.)
(First time at these concerts.)

This list of works to be performed will please both the lovers of the classical and those who prefer the so-called "light music." Although there is among the majority of the patrons of the orchestra everywhere a sentiment which, of late years, has grown almost to a conviction, that, after all, the orchestra is the attraction, still the management cater to all tastes by furnishing soloists in every way worthy to appear with this organization.

Franz Kneisel, for the past decade the concert-master of the orchestra, will play two movements from Goldmark's beautiful concerto for violin.

Those inclined to criticise the average programme as ultra classical will rejoice in the fact that the last two numbers on the programme are waltzes, orchestrated and elaborated to an extent to make them worthy of an appearance on a symphony programme. Chabrier's beautiful rhapsody for orchestra, "Espana," will readily be recognized by a majority of the patrons of these concerts, although the prediction is ventured that such a rendering of the familiar melody they have never heard before.

Those who recall Weber's exquisite "Invitation to the Dance," with its charming orchestration by Berloiz, which was played at these concerts last year, will have an excellent opportunity to hear the same beautiful theme orchestrated in an entirely unique and brilliant manner by Weingartner, who ranks today as one of the leading orchestral conductors in Europe.

Season tickets for the five concerts, and single tickets for the first concert, Wednesday evening next, now on sale at Albert's, 13 North Charles street.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 17, 1897.

A WEEK full of splendid music has just passed, a week which will not soon be forgotten by those who attended the several affairs of great importance. There is yet something to be said about Brooklyn audiences, and it is that they are not yet eager enough for music for its own sake to fill a house without resorting to the most heroic, titanic measures.

The house which greeted the Boston Symphony on Friday was nothing short of—well, to put it mildly, uncomfortable; that is, it made me uncomfortable, because when Mr. Paur turned and faced the audience I felt a direct question: "Where is that music loving public that the Brooklyn correspondent of THE MUSICAL COURIER talks so much about?" and I can only say that if I have been misrepresenting, inadvertently of course, in the past I will not do so in the future.

Even under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute the house was empty. To educate a public is a very difficult thing. It does not begin when people are old. We are suffering now from the lack of musical atmosphere of thirty years ago. Is it not worth while looking into the future?

With the power to act that the Brooklyn Institute possesses, the educational side of its work might be strengthened materially and it would become philanthropic. Permit me to offer a suggestion which will bear more consideration than a hasty glance.

The Institute knows now as well as it ever will know that the gallery of the Academy of Music never does and never will hold anyone on the afternoon performances (unless Joseffy were to be the soloist). Why not—and I know that Mr. Paur and every man in his grand organization would bear me out—why not give that gallery to one of the public schools each time. I mean give it to the school—invite one school to each afternoon appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to occupy the gallery, and in each young mind the spark for music per se (not because of the soloist) would be kindled, and one might look into a bright future for music instead of a chaotic conglomeration of the fads and fancies of society, where the attraction is not the art but the artist; where it is only a case of "whose turn next?"

In this way the educational side of the Institute would not be a dead letter and contributors to its support would feel that they were doing more with their money than simply making it possible to bring these attractions here for those who wished to attend them.

Detail of the programs of the Boston Symphony is unnecessary, because of the New York reviews, and the programs were much the same, which is rather a pity, as very many come from New York here or go from here there. Suffice it to say that when Mr. Pauer made his appearance the leonine conductor and musician knew he was among his friends. In what a magnificent condition this great orchestra is! What a privilege, what an education to hear it! Mr. Pauer's orchestra is a noble setting for the diamond-like purity of Joseffy's art. His accompaniment of this great Schumann concerto was the most perfect thing conceivable.

What would be left for me to say of Joseffy were it not for the fact that this was the first time that I have ever heard him, and it may be interesting to my readers to know my impresions. To me he was grander in his subserviency and deference to the composer's idea than he could ever have been had he given full play to that impeccable crystalline technic to which nothing within human possibility seems impossible. His tempi, rubati, shadings, crescendi were all essentially musical, poetic, intelligent. Every note, however, proved that he was only serving one master, and that was Music, and yet I cannot help wondering whether Music is not serving one master and that master is Joseffy.

All honor to the man who gives the dignity to the encore that Joseffy does when he gives those dainty little color flashes of Brahms, as he gave here on Saturday night! Such interpretations will not be heard again until Joseffy comes back. A bientot! The house was filled from the foyer to the footlights and from the floor to the ceiling.

On Friday afternoon the soloist was Mrs. Marion Titus, a young soprano, of Boston, whose clear. pure voice will command attention beyond a doubt. Whereas there is nothing in Mrs. Titus' voice to remind one of the amateur, she is so young in the career that one can only realize what time will do for her. She has plenty of dramatic fire, a musical sense and a charming stage presence. Mrs. Titus' studies have all been in America and she is studying with the determination to succeed.

There will be two entertainments in Music Hall this week. The Symphony Orchestra, led by Mr. Paur, will play, the 20th, Mozart's Symphony in D major (without menuet), Dvorák's Suite in D major, Auber's Overture "Part du Diable," and Paderewski's concerto for piano. Mr. Jonás will be the pianist.

The Boston Band.

THE first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last Thursday night in the Metropolitan Opera House, and notwithstanding the inclemency of the weather the house was full. Rafael Joseffy was the solo performer and played the Schumann Concerto with both finesse and breadth, but hardly with romantic intensity. If, however, the note of passion was sometimes missing, the charm and clarity of tone, the delicious quality of touch and the rhythmical elasticity were admirable. The finale was especially brilliant. After many recalls Mr. Joseffy gave a little poem by Brahms—one of the Intermezzi, from op. 116, and in E major—with an intimacy of feeling and subtlety of expression quite amazing. It was the music of some soft star-lit summer night—a true nocturne. Joseffy was then the poet, not the virtuoso.

Mr. Paur and his orchestra played the Third Brahms Symphony in F with musical feeling and consummate virtuosity. The allegretto was read most tenderly. The Grieg "Peer Gynt" suite was faultlessly played and "The Hall of the Mountain King" was redemanded. An access of weakness induced the conductor to repeat it. It is good music for a variety show; that mountain king must be at least thirteen feet high and very lame, that is, to judge from the rhythm of his fabulous stride.

The Chabrier "Espana" is not altogether a novelty, yet it is always welcome for its glittering color, rhythmical swirl and delightful atmosphere of abandon, presented with masterly musicianship, make it a capital ending for a severe program. This first concert of the Boston band was a tremendous success and quite discounted the technically bad performance of the Philharmonic Society.

[42]

HOME JOURNAL.

NEW YORK:
WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 17, 1897.

Boston Symphony.

There are better conductors than Mr. Paur, but no better orchestra than that of Boston. The first concert took place on Thursday evening, and the programme was Brahms, Schumann, Grieg, and Chabrier. Rafael Joseffy was soloist.

Rubinstein used to say that Brahms was langweilig genug to make one bite one's tongue off yawning; but, although he was director of the Symphony concerts in St. Petersburg during my stay there, he let us have plenty of Brahms. When I found something exceptionally fine, I would look over at him inquiringly, but his glance in return was blank. He saw no beauty in Brahms, and he was as careless of acknowledging this as is my friend, H. T. Finck. I can better understand Finck's distaste in the face of his Wagner mania. Brahms, Wagner, and Rubinstein represent three distinct phases of music,—the contrapuntal, the dramatic, and the lyric. Brahms had no dramatic instinct, and he crushed lyricism. Consequently, Finck and Rubinstein want none of him. How sad for Rubinstein and Finck, however! There is a certain thoughtfulness in the music of Brahms that is as attractive as it is unique. There are times when Brahms has little to say, but how tenderly he says that little! It is only one little violet blossom, but the air around one is impregnated with subtle, exquisite perfume. As in Browning, it is the suggestion of thought rather than the thought itself that is beautiful.

The Boston Symphony concert commences at 8.15 precisely. Consequently I missed the first two movements of the Brahms symphony, but the third and fourth, which I was in time for, were excellently given, especially the last. Grieg's ever charming "Peer Gynt" suite met with even better treatment. "The Death of Aase" was surely the most wonderful rendering I have yet heard. The pianissimo effect in the finale was masterly. The last movement, "The Hall of the Mountain King," had to be repeated, in spite of Mr. Paur's unwillingness. The audience were determined to have it again, and were not to be appeased till they had it. Emanuel Chabrier's "Espana" is noisy and not particularly interesting, but excellently orchestrated. Lamoureux plays it all the time in Paris, and I am perhaps tired of it, but in just the ratio that Chabrier has been misjudged by his contemporaries, so seems it to me this piece has been lauded. Except as an example of finished and learned orchestration, I find very little to admire in "Espana."

Raphael Joseffy's rendering of Schumann's A minor Concerto was very beautiful, if a little cold, a little wanting in geniality. Of course, when I write this, I have Rubinstein's rendering in my mind. Joseffy's technique is marvellous, his touch round, his passage-work clear and crisp, and his pedalling superb. He has only one mannerism; in chord-playing he lets his right hand wait over the left. Paderewski falls into this fault, too, at times, and it is as irritating as is the tremolo of singers when indulged in too much. In Schumann I want Rubinstein's grand, rich chord-playing, accurate and united as, for instance, the attack of the Boston Symphony Orchestra itself. Except when playing arpeggi, the two hands of a pianist should obey the one impulse of the brain. It was this in Rubinstein's playing that made it so gorgeous, the color so powerful, the tone so rich. Joseffy should play more often in public. Even if a little cold, there is something exquisitely chaste and refined in his art. He is just the artist to play Beethoven's G major Concerto as it ought to be, but never is, played. His reception was most enthusiastic, and the National Conservatory may be proud in the possession of an artist so superior and so truly great. Surely there is no need of foreign study for American pianists when Joseffy is here.

ALEXANDER MCARTHUR.

Boston Transcri

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 20,

THE COST OF SYMPHONY CONCERT TICKETS.

To the Editor of the Transcript;

In the Transcript of Nov. 13 is a letter, headed "Those Wage-Earner Concerts" signed J. B. W., in which the writer pleads for continuance of the "wage-earner" concerts given by the Cecilia Society, condemns the absence of inexpensive concerts which poor students once enjoyed, and includes the Symphony concerts among those from which "the premium which opulence has consented to pay for the tickets practically excludes all such students and all persons of ordinary means."

This misconception of the Symphony concerts is so unjust to the generous citizen, who gave a moderate fortune every year for several years that these concerts might be established and still makes them possible, without the hand of the giver being seen, that an answer seems called for. Do not hundreds of poor students and others go every Friday afternoon to these concerts at a cost of twenty-five cents apiece and as many more go Saturday evenings at a cost of fifty cents, just as they went five and ten years ago? It is true that a large portion of seats are sold by auction and bring a premium, rich people buying the right to them. But can anyone doubt that the twenty-five and fifty cent seats would also sell at a premium if they could be bid for at public auction and Mr. Higginson did not specifically reserve them for poor students and the like? For the difference between the nominal price of these seats and their value in the open market, Mr. Higginson clearly is personally out of pocket.

Rich people are hardly to be kept away from the concerts, because they are rich, or forbidden to pay part of the expense of providing what comes very near to being the finest orchestral music in the world. But these concerts are and always have been given so largely for persons whose enthusiasm has been out of all proportion to their means that we have grown to be proud of them, as we are proud of Harvard College and our great and beautiful public library, because they embody the intelligent public spirit existing in this community. That anyone can have failed to perceive the steadiness and liberality and success, with which the original purpose of these concerts has been maintained, indicates how custom can dull us to our blessings and how easy it is for public criticism to fritter itself away by falling, like the rain, equally upon the just and upon the unjust.

JOHN F. MOORS.

Nov. 18.

News

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Begins Its Thirteenth Season Here Next Wednesday.

Next Wednesday evening at Music Hall the Boston Symphony Orchestra begins its 13th season in this city. "Nothing succeeds like success," and everybody interested in the cause of good music will be gratified to learn of the orchestra's promising outlook for the season, not only at home, but in every city visited, and notably in Philadelphia, where, in the Academy of Music, seating over 3000 people, less than 50 seats remain unsold for the season. This is probably the most phenomenal sale of season tickets ever known in Philadelphia.

In Providence, R. I., where the orchestra has just commenced its 15th season, the Providence Journal, commenting on the opening concert, says: "There was a large audience, showing conclusively that the increase from six to eight concerts this year was a move in the right direction, and one that will command hearty support."

In New York the season sale for the coming season is nearly double that of last year, a very satisfactory showing, considering the large number of entertainments of a similar nature given in that city.

A most interesting programme has been prepared for the first concert, which will be announced in a few days.

The sale of season tickets is still progressing at Albert's, and compares very favorably with the record of past seasons.

Ev'g Sat

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The sale of season tickets for the Boston Symphony concerts is now progressing at Albert's. These affairs are the chief events of Baltimore's musical season, and the sale will no doubt be as large as usual. The concerts will take place at Music Hall, Wednesday evenings, November [illegible], December 15, Feburary [illegible] and March 22. Conductor Paur has already prepared the programme for the series, and they will include. Brahms' Symphony No. 3; Raff's Symphony, "Im Walde;" Dvorak's Symphony, "From the New World;" the Symphony No. 3 of Beethoven, and three movements of the Ninth Symphony, by the same composer. The overtures are the 'Benvenuto Cellini," of Berlioz; the Tschaikowsky overture, "1812." The novelties include the "Espagna" of Chabrier; Tschaikowsky's "Italian Caprice,,' a new suite by Massanet, three movements from a suite by Rimsky Korsakoff, and the "Invitation to Dance" of Weber, with a novel and brilliant orchestration by Weingartner. The soloists are: Mme. Lillian Blauvelt, David Bispham Franz Kneisel and [illegible]. An evening will be devoted to selections from Wagner, as usual. Next Wednesday the first concert takes place, and Mr. Kneisel is the soloist. The programme is the following: Brahm's Symphony No. 3 Goldmark, two movements from concerts for violin. Chabrier, Rhapsodie for Orchestra, "Espana,' Weber Invitation to the Dance." The single sale begins Monday.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

First Concert of the Season to Be Given Tonight.

It has grown to be an accepted fact in the cities visited by the Boston Symphony Orchestra that the lovers of the best in music are largely dependent upon this organization. Everybody interested in the success of these concerts will be in attendance at the Music Hall tonight when the following programme will be given:

Brahms..................Symphony No. 3.
Goldmark—Two Movements from Concerto for Violin.
(First time at these concerts.)
Chabrier—Rhapsody for Orchestra—"Espana."
(First time at these concerts.)
Weber........"Invitation to the Dance."
(Arranged for Orchestra by Felix Weingartner—First time at these concerts.)
(First time at these concerts.)

This list of works to be performed will please both the lovers of the classical and those who prefer the so-called "light music." Although there is among the majority of the patrons of the orchestra everywhere a sentiment which, of late years, has grown almost to a conviction, that, after all, the orchestra is the attraction, still the management cater to all tastes by furnishing soloists in every way worthy to appear with this organization.

Franz Kneisel, for the past decade the concert-master of the orchestra, will play two movements from Goldmark's beautiful concerto for violin.

Those inclined to criticise the average programme as ultra classical will rejoice in the fact that the last two numbers on the programme are waltzes orchestrated and elaborated to an extent to make them worthy of an appearance on a symphony programme. Chabrier's beautiful rhapsody for orchestra, "Espana," will readily be recognized by a majority of the patrons of these concerts, although the prediction is ventured that such a rendering of the familiar melody they have never heard before.

Those who recall Weber's exquisite "Invitation to the Dance," with its charming orchestration by Berlioz, which was played at these concerts last year, will have an excellent opportunity to hear the same beautiful theme orchestrated in an entirely unique and brilliant manner by Weingartner, who ranks today as one of the leading orchestral conductors in Europe.

Season tickets for the five concerts, and single tickets for the first concert, Wednesday evening next, now on sale at Albert's, 13 North Charles street.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 17, 1897.

A WEEK full of splendid music has just passed, a week which will not soon be forgotten by those who attended the several affairs of great importance. There is yet something to be said about Brooklyn audiences, and it is that they are not yet eager enough for music for its own sake to fill a house without resorting to the most heroic, titanic measures.

The house which greeted the Boston Symphony on Friday was nothing short of—well, to put it mildly, uncomfortable; that is, it made me uncomfortable, because when Mr. Paur turned and faced the audience I felt a direct question: "Where is that music loving public that the Brooklyn correspondent of THE MUSICAL COURIER talks so much about?" and I can only say that if I have been misrepresenting, inadvertently of course, in the past I will not do so in the future.

Even under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute the house was empty. To educate a public is a very difficult thing. It does not begin when people are old. We are suffering now from the lack of musical atmosphere of thirty years ago. Is it not worth while looking into the future?

With the power to act that the Brooklyn Institute possesses, the educational side of its work might be strengthened materially and it would become philanthropic. Permit me to offer a suggestion which will bear more consideration than a hasty glance.

The Institute knows now as well as it ever will know that the gallery of the Academy of Music never does and never will hold anyone on the afternoon performances (unless Joseffy were to be the soloist). Why not—and I know that Mr. Paur and every man in his grand organization would bear me out—why not give that gallery to one of the public schools each time. I mean give it to the school—invite one school to each afternoon appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to occupy the gallery, and in each young mind the spark for music per se (not because of the soloist) would be kindled, and one might look into a bright future for music instead of a chaotic conglomeration of the fads and fancies of society, where the attraction is not the art but the artist; where it is only a case of "whose turn next?"

In this way the educational side of the Institute would not be a dead letter and contributors to its support would feel that they were doing more with their money than simply making it possible to bring these attractions here for those who wished to attend them.

Detail of the programs of the Boston Symphony is unnecessary, because of the New York reviews, and the programs were much the same, which is rather a pity, as very many come from New York here or go from here there. Suffice it to say that when Mr. Pauer made his appearance the leonine conductor and musician knew he was among his friends. In what a magnificent condition this great orchestra is! What a privilege, what an education to hear it! Mr. Pauer's orchestra is a noble setting for the diamond-like purity of Joseffy's art. His accompaniment of this great Schumann concerto was the most perfect thing conceivable.

What would be left for me to say of Joseffy were it not for the fact that this was the first time that I have ever heard him, and it may be interesting to my readers to know my impresions. To me he was grander in his subserviency and deference to the composer's idea than he could ever have been had he given full play to that impeccable crystalline technic to which nothing within human possibility seems impossible. His tempi, rubati, shadings, crescendi were all essentially musical, poetic, intelligent. Every note, however, proved that he was only serving one master, and that was Music, and yet I cannot help wondering whether Music is not serving one master and that master is Joseffy.

All honor to the man who gives the dignity to the encore that Joseffy does when he gives those dainty little color flashes of Brahms, as he gave here on Saturday night! Such interpretations will not be heard again until Joseffy comes back. A bientot! The house was filled from the foyer to the footlights and from the floor to the ceiling.

On Friday afternoon the soloist was Mrs. Marion Titus, a young soprano, of Boston, whose clear, pure voice will command attention beyond a doubt. Whereas there is nothing in Mrs. Titus' voice to remind one of the amateur, she is so young in the career that one can only realize what time will do for her. She has plenty of dramatic fire, a musical sense and a charming stage presence. Mrs. Titus' studies have all been in America and she is studying with the determination to succeed.

There will be two entertainments in Music Hall this week. The Symphony Orchestra, led by Mr. Paur, will play, the 20th, Mozart's Symphony in D major (without menuet), Dvorák's Suite in D major, Auber's Overture "Part du Diable," and Paderewski's concerto for piano. Mr. Jonás will be the pianist.

The Boston Band.

THE first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last Thursday night in the Metropolitan Opera House, and notwithstanding the inclemency of the weather the house was full. Rafael Joseffy was the solo performer and played the Schumann Concerto with both finesse and breadth, but hardly with romantic intensity. If, however, the note of passion was sometimes missing, the charm and clarity of tone, the delicious quality of touch and the rhythmical elasticity were admirable. The finale was especially brilliant. After many recalls Mr. Joseffy gave a little poem by Brahms—one of the Intermezzi, from op. 116, and in E major—with an intimacy of feeling and subtlety of expression quite amazing. It was the music of some soft star-lit summer night—a true nocturne. Joseffy was then the poet, not the virtuoso.

Mr. Paur and his orchestra played the Third Brahms Symphony in F with musical feeling and consummate virtuosity. The allegretto was read most tenderly. The Grieg "Peer Gynt" suite was faultlessly played and "The Hall of the Mountain King" was redemanded. An access of weakness induced the conductor to repeat it. It is good music for a variety show; that mountain king must be at least thirteen feet high and very lame, that is, to judge from the rhythm of his fabulous stride.

The Chabrier "Espana" is not altogether a novelty, yet it is always welcome for its glittering color, rhythmical swirl and delightful atmosphere of abandon, presented with masterly musicianship, make it a capital ending for a severe program. This first concert of the Boston band was a tremendous success and quite discounted the technically bad performance of the Philharmonic Society.

HOME JOURNAL.

NEW YORK:
WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 17, 1897.

Boston Symphony.

There are better conductors than Mr. Paur, but no better orchestra than that of Boston. The first concert took place on Thursday evening, and the programme was Brahms, Schumann, Grieg, and Chabrier. Rafael Joseffy was soloist.

Rubinstein used to say that Brahms was langweilig genug to make one bite one's tongue off yawning; but, although he was director of the Symphony concerts in St. Petersburg during my stay there, he let us have plenty of Brahms. When I found something exceptionally fine, I would look over at him inquiringly, but his glance in return was blank. He saw no beauty in Brahms, and he was as careless of acknowledging this as is my friend, H. T. Finck. I can better understand Finck's distaste in the face of his Wagner mania. Brahms, Wagner, and Rubinstein represent three distinct phases of music,—the contrapuntal, the dramatic, and the lyric. Brahms had no dramatic instinct, and he crushed lyricism. Consequently, Finck and Rubinstein want none of him. How sad for Rubinstein and Finck, however! There is a certain thoughtfulness in the music of Brahms that is as attractive as it is unique. There are times when Brahms has little to say, but how tenderly he says that little! It is only one little violet blossom, but the air around one is impregnated with subtle, exquisite perfume. As in Browning, it is the suggestion of thought rather than the thought itself that is beautiful.

The Boston Symphony concert commences at 8.15 precisely. Consequently I missed the first two movements of the Brahms symphony, but the third and fourth, which I was in time for, were excellently given, especially the last. Grieg's ever charming "Peer Gynt" suite met with even better treatment. "The Death of Aase" was surely the most wonderful rendering I have yet heard. The pianissimo effect in the finale was masterly. The last movement, "The Hall of the Mountain King," had to be repeated, in spite of Mr. Paur's unwillingness. The audience were determined to have it again, and were not to be appeased till they had it. Emanuel Chabrier's "Espana" is noisy and not particularly interesting, but excellently orchestrated. Lamoureux plays it all the time in Paris, and I am perhaps tired of it, but in just the ratio that Chabrier has been misjudged by his contemporaries, so seems it to me this piece has been lauded. Except as an example of finished and learned orchestration, I find very little to admire in "Espana."

Raphael Joseffy's rendering of Schumann's A minor Concerto was very beautiful, if a little cold, a little wanting in geniality. Of course, when I write this, I have Rubinstein's rendering in my mind. Joseffy's technique is marvellous, his touch round, his passage-work clear and crisp, and his pedalling superb. He has only one mannerism; in chord-playing he lets his right hand wait over the left. Paderewski falls into this fault, too, at times, and it is as irritating as is the tremolo of singers when indulged in too much. In Schumann I want Rubinstein's grand, rich chord-playing, accurate and united as, for instance, the attack of the Boston Symphony Orchestra itself. Except when playing arpeggi, the two hands of a pianist should obey the one impulse of the brain. It was this in Rubinstein's playing that made it so gorgeous, the color so powerful, the tone so rich. Joseffy should play more often in public. Even if a little cold, there is something exquisitely chaste and refined in his art. He is just the artist to play Beethoven's G major Concerto as it ought to be, but never is, played. His reception was most enthusiastic, and the National Conservatory may be proud in the possession of an artist so superior and so truly great. Surely there is no need of foreign study for American pianists when Joseffy is here.

ALEXANDER MCARTHUR.

Boston Transcript

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 20, 1897

THE COST OF SYMPHONY CONCERT TICKETS.

To the Editor of the Transcript:

In the Transcript of Nov. 13 is a letter, headed "Those Wage-Earner Concerts" signed J. B. W., in which the writer pleads for continuance of the "wage-earner" concerts given by the Cecilia Society, condemns the absence of inexpensive concerts which poor students once enjoyed, and includes the Symphony concerts among those from which "the premium which opulence has consented to pay for the tickets practically excludes all such students and all persons of ordinary means."

This misconception of the Symphony concerts is so unjust to the generous citizen, who gave a moderate fortune every year for several years that these concerts might be established and still makes them possible, without the hand of the giver being seen, that an answer seems called for. Do not hundreds of poor students and others go every Friday afternoon to these concerts at a cost of twenty-five cents apiece and as many more go Saturday evenings at a cost of fifty cents, just as they went five and ten years ago? It is true that a large portion of seats are sold by auction and bring a premium, rich people buying the right to them. But can anyone doubt that the twenty-five and fifty cent seats would also sell at a premium if they could be bid for at public auction and Mr. Higginson did not specifically reserve them for poor students and the like? For the difference between the nominal price of these seats and their value in the open market, Mr. Higginson clearly is personally out of pocket.

Rich people are hardly to be kept away from the concerts, because they are rich, or forbidden to pay part of the expense of providing what comes very near to being the finest orchestral music in the world. But these concerts are and always have been given so largely for persons whose enthusiasm has been out of all proportion to their means that we have grown to be proud of them, as we are proud of Harvard College and our great and beautiful public library, because they embody the intelligent public spirit existing in this community. That anyone can have failed to perceive the steadiness and liberality and success, with which the original purpose of these concerts has been maintained, indicates how custom can dull us to our blessings and how easy it is for public criticism to fritter itself away by falling, like the rain, equally upon the just and upon the unjust.

JOHN F. MOORS.

Nov. 18.

[42]

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, NOV. 22, 1897.

Return of the Symphony With Fresh Honors.

Our symphony orchestra returns from abroad with more honors than our football team, for it has won a very decided victory in New York and the people of other cities than Boston are beginning to grasp the fact that America possesses a musical organization that is the peer, and possibly the superior, of any European orchestra.

Each successive triumphal tour of our band only makes us wish the more that they might some day go to England, France and Germany, and open the eyes of those trans-Atlantic people who imagine that we are yet in our musical swaddling clothes.

At the beginning of the concert the wind still sat in the classical quarter and a Mozart symphony, the one in D major, without minuet, took up the thread of last century matters about where it had been left, two weeks ago.

One must again pay tribute to the virility with which Mr. Paur interprets Mozart; he does not try to give a naive simplicity which leans toward the infantile, as some conductors do, but brings a manly straight-forwardness, and sometimes a robustness, to bear, that gives the work an attractive strength.

One must not imagine that these old and symmetrical works are so entirely easy, either; their very simplicity constitutes a difficulty, for while in some of the modern turgid and turbid works a dozen errors might escape the general notice, in these limpid specimens of harmony and melody, every error, even the slightest, stands revealed as a flaw in a crystal.

But on this occasion the symphony went with the precision and delicacy of shading of a string quartette and the audience could not but enjoy the pure music and realize once more that the modern school does not abolish its predecessors.

After this there came a new soloist, a Spaniard, Mr. Alberto Jonas, who appeared in Paderewski's Piano Concerto in A minor. As regards the work itself, a second hearing (Paderewski himself played it in these concerts in January, 1893,) confirms the first impression; it is probably Paderewski's best composition, it is "claviermaessig," displays the instrument to excellent advantage, yet avoids the Chopin error of making of a concerto a mere piano work with accompaniment.

A true concerto, such as Beethoven's G major or E flat major, or Brahms' B flat major piano concerto, ought to be a symphony with a thread of obbligato woven into its fabric; if Paderewski does not quite attain this ideal, he at least seems to recognize it and strive for it, for the orchestra is given its just prominence, and the solo instrument frequently but reiterates, emphasizes or embellishes the orchestral thoughts.

Particularly is this the case in the romanza where the piano frequently weaves fioritura around the themes of woodwind or strings.

The work is full of fine contrasts, the melancholy of some of the orchestral touches of the first movement, the sweetness of the second, and the bravura of the finale, are effective foils to each other; the cadenza of the first movement is also a proper development and not too great a display of virtuosity; the solemn character of the second theme of the finale is a dignified touch in the Schumann manner; altogether one feels more than ever that Paderewski has restrained the feelings of the solo pianist and allowed the musician to rule in the structure of the work; it indicates that when the craze over the blonde hair and picturesque personality has passed away Paderewski, although not a Brahms or a Schumenn, will be found to be something more than the mere "curled darling" of society.

Mr. Alberto Jonas was a delightful surprise; coming here without any "reclame," unpuffed and almost unheralded, he proved himself a sterling player with a tendency towards the romantic school. He sometimes lacked in massive power, as for example, in the great double octave passages in the first movement, which were slightly blurred, but his touch was very expressive, and he gave the sentiment of the composition with true poetic instinct.

There was a modesty and artistic earnestness in his interpretation that deserves all praise; perhaps he saved his strength for the bravura ending, for this was commendably strong and virile. If the work had more interest when the composer himself played it, this was none the less the finer interpretation, for the orchestral part was distinctly better on Saturday than when it was heard before, and soloist and conductor worked together admirably. Abundant enthusiasm followed the close and the pianist was recalled many times.

The Dvorak Suite in D major, Op. 39, followed, and was very pleasant to hear; it was "Suite music" that would have made Shakespeare himself "merry." One does not need to bring forth the heavy artillery of rigid criticism against such a pretty suite; it was not deep music but it was enjoyable, and it showed Dvorak at his freest and best in orchestration.

Just a suspicion of Bizet's style was evident in the carillon-like organ-points of the first movement, recalling similar effects in the "Suite Arlesienne." The harmonization of the "Sousedska" (Minuet) was as sensuous as Goldmark. The Romanze with its dialogue between flute and English horn was of pensive beauty and exceedingly well-played. Only the finale seemed a little noisy and blatant, and the constant reiteration of figures (which had been characteristic of the work from its very first movement) became a little tiresome, but, as a whole, it was refreshing to have a relapse to "cakes and ale" and "ginger hot i' the mouth" after our prolonged fit of classical virtue.

Possibly it was to avoid shocking Boston ears that the overture to "Le Part du Diable" received its English appellation of "Carlo Broschi"; when ——rosch in New York gives "The ——nation of Faust" they print the whole matter in full and Boston would not be shocked if the devil received his portion in this particular title.

It was splendidly played, the ensemble was perfect, the muted strings and the horns covered themselves with glory, and the overture, which is a mere "omelette souffiee" of music, is not served up with such daintiness once in a decade.

Louis C. Elson.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CII., NO. 144.
SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 21, 1897.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Soloist Last Evening Was Mr. Alberto Jonas.

Performed a Paderewski Concerto on the Pianoforte and Made a Splendid Impression—Opening Number Was a Mozart Symphony, and Was Brilliantly Rendered.

The programme for last evening's concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall was:

Symphony, No. 7, in D	Mozart
Concerto for pianoforte, op. 17	Paderewski
Suite for orchestra in D, op. 39	Dvorak
Overture, "Le Part du Diable"	Auber

Mr. Alberto Jonas was the soloist.

The Mozart symphony is a perennial delight, and in many respects deserves a place by the side of his last three great ones. The first allegro is surpassingly fine in the beauty of its themes, its exquisite coloring and the finish of its workmanship, while the slow movement is among the most charming andantes the composer ever conceived. The whole work is full of grace and flooded with sunshine. It was interpreted by Mr. Paur with keen sympathy and played by the orchestra with incomparable grace of style and perfection of technique.

The Dvorak suite is chiefly interesting for its orchestration. Its themes are not very pregnant with meaning nor striking in any way except, perhaps, their national color; and the best that can be said of the work as a whole is that it is in the composer's better and more thoughtful vein. Of its performance only superlatives of praise are called for. The romanza especially was given very beautifully.

The Paderewski concerto does not grow upon more familiar acquaintance. It is carefully, even skilfully, put together, but it says very little that was really worth the saying. On a first hearing it was somewhat of a surprise, and one was stirred into giving the composer credit for doing more than was expected from him, but it does not wear well, and now seems thin, vague and perfunctory, without depth of thought, breadth of sentiment or sincerity.

The solo part is little else than so many difficult exercises in technique, original enough in one sense, and dazzling enough in another, but of little, if any, real musical value. It makes immense exactions on the performer. These were wholly met by Mr. Jonas, who has remarkably flexible and apparently tireless fingers, and is decidedly an artist well worth the hearing; so admirable a player, in fact, as to excite a regret that he was not heard in a concerto less persistently monotonous in the piano part, and that afforded him a wider scope for variety in style and in expression. His technique is brilliant, fluent and delightfully clean-cut. He plays with ease, and without unnecessary display, with faultless finish of finger work and with unquestionable taste. His touch is clear and musical, his style is distinctly artistic, his manner at the piano is quiet and unassuming. In his effort of last evening he had little opportunity to show more than mere virtuosity, but it was of a high order. If the performance as a whole was somewhat dry, it may be attributed to the dryness of the task he had undertaken. It was an error in judgment to have chosen such a work for a debut; but so well did he go through the ordeal that it aroused a desire to hear him again under better conditions. The impression he made was wholly favorable. He was applauded with tremendous heartiness, and recalled four times.

The programme for the next concert is: Serenade, Brahms; aria, "Jeanne d'Arc," Tschaikowsky; "Gaelic" symphony, Mrs. H. H. A. Beach; aria from "Rienzi," Wagner; selections from "The Damnation of Faust," Berlioz. Miss Gertrude May Stein is to be the soloist.

There was a tremendous crowd at the symphony rehearsal Friday afternoon. Every one seemed anxious to hear the orchestra again, after being one week without a concert. The prevalence of ermine as coat trimming was very noticeable. One beautiful green velvet blouse jacket, with revers faced with this most becoming of all furs, attracted much admiration. Among the subscribers there were noted Mrs. R. C. Hooper, Mrs. Bayard Thayer, Mrs. Henry Weston, Mrs. Allan Curtis, Mrs. Edgar Pierce, Mrs. W. C. Winslow, Mrs. J. H. Beal, Miss Hunt, Miss Hattie Williams, Miss Alice Parker, Miss Goodwin, Mrs. J. C. Phillips, Mr. Eugene Greenleaf and Mr. Elliot W. Pratt.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, NOV. 21, 1897.

Alberto Jonas, Soloist at Symphony Concert.

The fifth of this season's symphony rehearsals and concerts was given in Music hall, Friday afternoon and last evening. The usual large gatherings of representative music-loving Bostonians were present, and expressed approval of the performance of the following program:

Symphony No. 46, Wolfgang Mozart; concerto for pianoforte, Ignaz J. Paderewski; suite in D major, Antonin Dvorak; overture to "Carlo Broschi," Auber.

Mr Alberto Jonas, a young Spanish pianist, who had not before been heard in Boston, was the soloist. The name of Jonas is not famous in the list of pianists of the day, but with customary courtesy the symphony audiences greeted the player cordially, and gave his performance kindly consideration. Mr Jonas made his first appearance in this country with the Damrosch orchestra, in New York, a year ago, and subsequently gave several recitals, which received approval from New Yorkers. Evidently Mr Jonas is not in the possession of a press agent, otherwise we should have heard much more regarding him.

Mr Jonas made a favorable impression on the Symphony audience. Without granting him rank among the greatest players, who have recently been heard here, he deserves to be welcomed as a thorough artist, a player of intelligence, of sensitive and romantic musical feeling and one who has more than common technical ability. Delicacy and brilliancy of execution are the most notable features of Mr Jonas' playing. He is not a powerful player, but his lack of muscular force is not unwelcome in these days, when piano pounders flourish so amazingly. He has an agreeable personality, and there is a refreshing absence of affectation and self-consciousness in his playing. He is plainly a musician who desires that recognition of his artistic ability shall not be dependent upon any eccentricity of manner or personality.

His performance of the Paderewski concerto was very creditable, but the impression was gained that he would be heard to better advantage without the support of an orchestra. Director Paur was very considerate last evening, but in the forte passages the solo instrument could not cope satisfactorily with the band. The Paderewski concerto was a good selection for Mr Jonas, in that it affords excellent opportunity for display of fluent technique and it was in the finale movement, remarkable for exacting and showy piano pyrotechnics, that Mr Jonas most distinguished himself.

Mr Paur gave a sympathetic and thoroughly enjoyable reading of the Mozart symphony. The five numbers of the Dvorak suite were played with charming effect and won cordially appreciative applause from the audience. Especially delightful was the graceful performance of the minuet and the brilliant finale was given with superb effect. Auber's melodious overture, "Carlo Broschi," could not have been played with better results.

Miss Gertrude May Stein will be the soloist at the next concert, and the program will be as follows: Serenade, Brahms; aria, "Jeanne d'Arc," Tschaikowsky; symphony, Mrs H. H. A. Beach; aria from "Rienzi," Wagner; selections from "The Damnation of Faust," Berlioz.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.
SUNDAY MORNING, NOVEMBER 21, 1897.

(Copyright, 1897, Post Publishing Company.)

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the fifth concert of the season last evening in Music Hall. The orchestral selections included Mozart's symphony in D, No. 46, Dvorak's suite in D, op. 39, and the overture to "La Part du Diable" of Auber. Mr. Alberto Jonas, pianist, was the soloist in the concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, by Paderewski, op. 17, in A minor.

The Mozart symphony, No. 46, is one of three in the key of D, each one "without minuet." This symphony also has a slow introduction to the first movement, a peculiarity not found in many of the symphonies of this composer. It is full of all sorts of contrapuntal and other devices which Mozart knew so well how to employ, and there are places strongly dramatic in character. It is Mozart all through, and the work had an admirable reading by Mr. Paur.

Mr. Jonas made an extremely favorable impression by his excellent performance of the Paderewski concerto. He is a pianist of a high order intellectually, and his technical proficiency was equal to the demand in every way. This concerto seems to be a work which will not lend itself to various interpretations. It has been played here by Mrs. Rive-King, by Paderewski, and now by Mr. Jonas. It has many beauties, and is a work highly modern and original, but it is such a reflex of the unique personality of its composer, that it loses much of its charm by treatment in other hands. There are other concertos that can bear a many-sided view; they seem to lose nothing by being played by pianists of widely varying temperament. But the Paderewski concerto seems not to be of this sort. It is one sided, not many sided. Mr. Jonas is a pianist that we shall all hope to hear again—but in some other work, let it be said.

At the concert and rehearsal of next week Mrs. Beach's "Gaelic symphony," also selections from Berlioz's "Damnation of Ftust" and "Serenade" by Brahms, will be the orchestral selections. Miss Gertrude May Stein will be the soloist in selections from Wagner and Tschaikowsky.

Boston Journal.
SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 21, 1897.

MR. ALBERTO JONAS

Plays the Concerto for Piano by the Ingenious Mr. Paderewski at the Fifth Symphony Concert.

The program of the fifth Symphony concert last evening in Music Hall, Mr. Paur conductor, was as follows:

Symphony No. 46 in D major (K. 504)	Mozart
Concerto in A minor, Op. 17	Paderewski
Suite in D Major, Op. 39	Dvorak
Overture, "Part du Diable"	Auber

If Mr. Jonás had not appeared here for the first time as a pianist, this concert might justly be dismissed with a few lines. There was no new piece produced. Mr. Paur still persists in calling Auber's "Part du Diable" "Carlo Broschi," although in Germany—if he must have a German title—the opera is much better known as "Des Teufel's Antheil," but Mr. Paur evidently does not believe in mentioning the devil to polite ears.

We regret to see that Mr. Paur allows the title "Damnation of Faust" to appear on the program of next Saturday. Why does he not soften the horrid word? "The Darnation of Faust" might be regarded as a tribute to New England dialect.

* * *

The Symphony and the Suite are familiar here. They are pleasant, amiable pieces, and should be played occasionally; for there's no use in going in for thunder and guns and all that twenty-four concerts in the season. There are charming passages in the Suite, which was written when Dvorak was irresponsible, before he was a purveyor of occasional pieces, or a head of a conservatory, or a buyer of gold bricks in the shape of true Congo-Iroquois folk-songs. The spontaneity and the freedom from anxiety make this work the more delightful. No, Madam; this suito is not great music; you are right, as ever; but it is pleasant to hear, and it was written honestly.

* * *

The story of the career of Mr. Jonás is told today in the magazine supplement. Some may say that he was unfortunate in his selection last night, because Mr. Paderéwski himself has played the concerto in Music Hall; and some, no doubt, will go so far as to speak of "presumption," for to them Mr. Paderewski is not a mere mortal, nor is he subject to human infirmities such as perspiration or the craving for food or drink. I myself should have preferred to hear Mr. Jonás in some other concerto, because I fail to recognize any great inherent merit in Mr. Paderewski's concerto. I admit that it is much more interesting and much better made than his Polish Fantasia, which is an audacious mixture of dullness and clap-trap. But such is the authority, such is the hypnotic force of the Polish pianist that when he plays his own pieces you are fortunate if you are not persuaded into thinking at the time that they are mirifick machines.

Mr. Jonás made a favorable impression. Perhaps the distinguishing feature of his performance was its elegance. His extremely well-developed technic did not take you by the throat and compel you to cry out, "Remarkable!" Yet it was constantly in evidence through clearness, accuracy, and a peculiar crispness that was neither hard nor brittle. The technic made no boisterous bid for attention; nor was it unduly modest. It was frank, brilliant, individual, and above all, elegant. And in this concerto it is so easy to be extravagant, pyrotechnical, greedy of applause! Mr. Jonás played with the modesty of the true musician, nor was the audience unappreciative of his worth. And yet I wish Mr. Jonás had played some other concerto.

Philip Hale.

Boston Transcript
TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 23, 1897

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

To the Editor of the Transcript:

I should like to add a few words in corroboration of the letter of a correspondent in last Saturday's Transcript regarding the management of the Symphony concerts. I have heard very many flippant remarks made on this subject, to the effect that people of small means are unable to attend these concerts on account of the high prices asked for the course tickets. These statements, however, seem somewhat inconsistent to one who sees these same fault-finding people spending money on needless fripperies within a short time—say two months—to pay for a season ticket in a part of the hall where, though they may not form conspicuous figures, yet in a locality where their ears will be delighted, and their their hearts uplifted by the finished playing of our great orchestra. And for listening to an orchestra of this size there is not a poor seat in Music Hall. Until the present season there have been many seats in the back part of the hall that did not receive a bid, when they could have been bought for less than ten dollars. Surely if we are enthusiastic lovers of music we can, with quite a moderate income, lay aside (as many do) a small sum from time to time during the year with which to obtain the inspiration that will make us better, nobler men and women. An entire winter's feast of the highest and purest in art is worth making some little sacrifice for. We ought to be eternally grateful to the cultivated gentleman who has made this privilege possible for us.

H. E. WATERMAN.

in the Symphony

Fresh Honors.

Our symphony orchestra returns from abroad with more honors than our football team, for it has won a very decided victory in New York and the people of other cities than Boston are beginning to grasp the fact that America possesses a musical organization that is the peer, and possibly the superior, of any European orchestra.

Each successive triumphal tour of our band only makes us wish the more that they might some day go to England, France and Germany, and open the eyes of those trans-Atlantic people who imagine that we are yet in our musical swaddling clothes.

At the beginning of the concert the wind still sat in the classical quarter and a Mozart symphony, the one in D major, without minuet, took up the thread of last century matters about where it had been left, two weeks ago.

One must again pay tribute to the virility with which Mr. Paur interprets Mozart; he does not try to give a naive simplicity which leans toward the infantile, as some conductors do, but brings a manly straight-forwardness, and sometimes a robustness, to bear, that gives the work an attractive strength.

One must not imagine that these old and symmetrical works are so entirely easy, either; their very simplicity constitutes a difficulty, for while in some of the modern turgid and turbid works a dozen errors might escape the general notice, in these limpid specimens of harmony and melody, every error, even the slightest, stands revealed as a flaw in a crystal.

But on this occasion the symphony went with the precision and delicacy of shading of a string quartette and the audience could not but enjoy the pure music and realize once more that the modern school does not abolish its predecessors.

After this there came a new soloist, a Spaniard, Mr. Alberto Jonas, who appeared in Paderewski's Piano Concerto in A minor. As regards the work itself, a second hearing (Paderewski himself played it in these concerts in January, 1893,) confirms the first impression; it is probably Paderewski's best composition, it is "claviermaessig," displays the instrument to excellent advantage, yet avoids the Chopin error of making of a concerto a mere piano work with accompaniment.

A true concerto, such as Beethoven's G major or E flat major, or Brahms' B flat major piano concerto, ought to be a symphony with a thread of obbligato woven into its fabric; if Paderewski does not quite attain this ideal, he at least seems to recognize it and strive for it, for the orchestra is given its just prominence, and the solo instrument frequently but reiterates, emphasizes or embellishes the orchestral thoughts.

Particularly is this the case in the romanza where the piano frequently weaves floritura around the themes of woodwind or strings.

The work is full of fine contrasts, the melancholy of some of the orchestral touches of the first movement, the sweetness of the second, and the bravura of the finale, are effective foils to each other; the cadenza of the first movement is also a proper development and not too great a display of virtuosity; the solemn character of the second theme of the finale is a dignified touch in the Schumann manner; altogether one feels more than ever that Paderewski has restrained the feelings of the solo pianist and allowed the musician to rule in the structure of the work; it indicates that when the craze over the blonde hair and picturesque personality has passed away Paderewski, although not a Brahms or a Schumenn, will be found to be something more than the mere "curled darling" of society.

Mr. Alberto Jonas was a delightful surprise; coming here without any "reclame," unpuffed and almost unheralded, he proved himself a sterling player with a tendency towards the romantic school. He sometimes lacked in massive power, as for example, in the great double octave passages in the first movement, which were slightly blurred, but his touch was very expressive, and he gave the sentiment of the composition with true poetic instinct.

There was a modesty and artistic earnestness in his interpretation that deserves all praise; perhaps he saved his strength for the bravura ending, for this was commendably strong and virile. If the work had more interest when the composer himself played it, this was none the less the finer interpretation, for the orchestral part was distinctly better on Saturday than when it was heard before, and soloist and conductor worked together admirably. Abundant enthusiasm followed the close and the pianist was recalled many times.

The Dvorak Suite in D major, Op. 39, followed, and was very pleasant to hear; it was "Suite music" that would have made Shakespeare himself "merry." One does not need to bring forth the heavy artillery of rigid criticism against such a pretty suite; it was not deep music but it was enjoyable, and it showed Dvorak at his freest and best in orchestration.

Just a suspicion of Bizet's style was evident in the carillon-like organ-points of the first movement, recalling similar effects in the "Suite Arlesienne." The harmonization of the "Sousedska" (Minuet) was as sensuous as Goldmark. The Romanze with its dialogue between flute and English horn was of pensive beauty and exceedingly well-played. Only the finale seemed a little noisy and blatant, and the constant reiteration of figures (which had been characteristic of the work from its very first movement) became a little tiresome. But, as a whole, it was refreshing [illegible] "cakes and ale" and [illegible] after our pro- [illegible]

[illegible] York gives "The [illegible] of Faust" they print the whole matter in full and Boston would not be shocked if the devil received his portion in this particular title.

It was splendidly played, the ensemble was perfect, the muted strings and the horns covered themselves with glory, and the overture, which is a mere "omelette soufflee" of music, is not served up with such daintiness once in a decade.

Louis C. Elson.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 22, 1897

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The fifth Symphony concert was given in the Music Hall, last Saturday evening, the programme being as follows:

Mozart: Symphony No. 46, in D major.
Paderewski: Concerto for Pianoforte, in A minor, opus 17.
Dvorak: Suite in D major, opus 39.
Auber: Overture to "La Part du Diable."
Mr. Alberto Jonas was the pianist.

The Mozart symphony "without Minuet" is one of the most beautiful of the set; it is hard to see how it is inferior to the more famous "Parisian." The andante is a perfect gem in its way. It might be well to look still further among Mozart's forty-nine symphonies; no doubt many of them are in nowise worth giving, but there must also be treasures among them that would repay the search. Mozart has been too long represented in the symphonic field by the last three great ones, the E-flat major, G minor, and "Jupiter"; and the burden of relieving the monotony of too often repeated performances of these might well be shared by others beside the two without Minuet in D major. The performance last Saturday was excellent.

One is rather in doubt about the value of Dvorak's D major suite; there are charming things in it, but a good deal of it seems rather dull. For matter of that, one could not help suspecting that some parts of the work might be made to sound quite differently from the way they sounded last Saturday evening. The Sousedska Minuet, for instance, lacked its characteristic pungency of rhythmic lilt; and what a mistake to take the Presto Furiant at a mildly ambling allegretto! One wondered whether the word Furiant had lost all its etymological meaning in passing into the Czech language. But the charming Romanze was delightfully played.

Auber's overture to "La Part du Diable"—why, by the way, was it called overture to "Carlo Broschi" on the programme? The opera is oftener known in Germany as "Des Teufels Antheil" than as "Carlo Broschi"; but why call a French work by its German title at all?—this overture, we say, is no particularly good or characteristic example of the composer's genius. It may not be quite so light in character as the overtures to "Fra Diavolo," "La Sirâne," and some others; but it certainly has not their snap and go, let alone their wealth of melodic invention. It was well played, but sounded, upon the whole, rather tame.

Paderewski's concerto, first played here in the season of 1892-93 by the composer, is a work that improves on closer acquaintance. The first movement is in every way [illegible], the Romanza, very charming indeed; about the finale one may feel more doubt, though a bad hitch between orchestra and pianoforte last Saturday took a good deal of the life out of this movement. The use of the pianoforte throughout the work is masterly; Paderewski has here taken a leaf out of Beethoven's and Chopin's book, in making the pianoforte contrast with the orchestra, instead of vying with it; he never makes the pianoforte try to do what the orchestra can do better. The orchestration, too, is exceedingly beautiful. Perhaps the concerto is open to the charge of the musical centre of gravity being too constantly in the orchestra, too seldom in the solo instrument; but que voulez-vous? a composer cannot wrench himself out of his own time. There is hardly a work written nowadays, in which the orchestra figures at all, upon which the same criticism cannot be made.

Mr. Jonas made his first appearance here at this concert. The impression he made was very brilliant. His technique is well up to the modern virtuoso standard, his tone steadily beautiful; he is an exponent of whom Paderewski himself might be proud. His phrasing is admirable in grace and musical solidity, his sentiment natural and artistic; of the more violent and profound phases of passion and thought he showed perhaps little, but the work itself hardly calls these into play. He shows himself plainly as a man who knows how to seize upon the true gist of a composition and reveal it to the listener; he plays with great totality of conception, yet with no slurring over of details. He was loudly applauded and recalled.

The next programme is: Brahms serenade; Tchaikovsky aria, "Jeanne d'Arc;" Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, symphony in E minor, "Gaelic," opus 32; Wagner, scena, "Gerechter Gott!" and aria, "In seiner Blüthe bleicht mein Leben," from "Rienzi;" Berlioz, three selections from "La Damnation de Faust," opus 24. Miss Gertrude May Stein will be the singer.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 21, 1897.

The fifth symphony concert was eminently interesting in the light of its performance. Not that it had not a choice programme; only there was no novelty presented.

It is usually not at all a happy thing for a soloist, especially if he chanches to be a piano player, to have to follow with his concerto a symphony as the opening number. But for once the first work did not displace and injure the succeeding number. For Mozart's forty-sixth symphony—one of the several which have no minuet—is so refreshing, so independent, and really so uplifting, in spite of some passing severities of manner and some unusual rudeness of accent, that it leaves the listener quite free and unprejudiced, ready to entertain what succeeds according to its quality and kind.

This second number was one particularly well able to maintain itself against even a much more domineering and determined symphonic form; for it was Paderewski's A-minor pianoforte concerto, in which the orchestral values are considered and favored no less than the voice and capacity of the solo instrument, which is often set apart to supply only that various ornamentation and illumination which no other instrument can give. The orchestra has to be heard in strenuous ensembles and in lovely, gentle obbligati for many of its more delicate members, and therefore the score can stand up against a symphony, even if it were of modern writing, as many of the classics could not. The player was Mr. Alberto Jonas, whom we understand to be a Spanish artist of large following and high esteem abroad. Of course the programme-book, with its remote indifference to its duties and to the desires of those who now only skim where they would be glad to read, had not one word to say of this musician, who was to present himself as a stranger to an exacting public. Could injustice to the artist and discourtesy to the audience go much farther in an official pamphlet of information? Well, at any rate, Mr. Jonas justified his engagement and conquered easily his hearers. By substantial merit in a clear, distinguished and symmetrical techinique; fine intellectual perception of the composer's thought and purpose; artistic appreciation of the relative consequence of piano and orchestra in the shifting flow of the concerto; and in warm and earnest or brilliant and enhancing delivery, he demonstrated his right to stand among the prominent and to undertake music which such a master of the piano as Paderewski had designed to place his instrument in a noble cooperative position with the orchestra.

The other numbers were Dvorak's suite in D minor, with its organ-fashioned prelude, its romance and its dance-measures, and Auber's lively overture to "Carlo Broschi," doubly welcome because it has been so long unheard and because of its own gay but not trivial spirit. In these, as in the preceding numbers, the orchestral performance was all that could be asked, even of our own Symphony men. The next programme will be this: Brahms, Serenade; Tschaikowsky, Aria, "Jeanne d'Arc"; Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, Symphony; Wagner, Aria from "Rienzi"; Berlioz, Selections from "The Damnation of Faust." Soloist, Miss Gertrude May Stein.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, NOV. 21, 1897.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The season of the Boston Symphony orchestra is proving a very prosperous one, and the patrons are enjoying some of the best concerts which have been known in the history of this Boston institution.

Miss Gertrude May Stein will be the soloist this week at the Friday afternoon rehearsal and the Saturday evening concert.

The programme will be:

Serenade	Brahms
Aria, "Jeanne d'Arc"	Tschaikowsky
Symphony	Mrs. H. H. A Beach
Aria from "Rienzi"	Wagner
Selections from "The Damnation of Faust"	Berlioz

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 24, 1897.

The program of the fifth Symphony concert last night in Music Hall, Mr. Paur conductor, was as follows:

Symphony No. 46 in D major (K. 504)	Mozart
Concerto in A minor, op. 17	Paderewski
Suite in D major, op. 39	Dvorák
Overture, Part du Diable	Auber

This concert was to me dull. The symphony has more than historical interest, but the orchestra did not play it with sufficient care. Academic beauty demands faultless academic technic. However, you may rate Mozart in the list of great composers; you must admit that his works require absolute finish in the performance. Modern symphonic poems and rhapsodies, full of thunder and guns and all that, admit of dropped notes and occasional roughness in outburst, but a symphony or a chamber piece by Mozart is a sensitive plant, that does not brook coarse touch.

The suite of Dvorák is delightful as a rule on account of its spontaneity and almost thoughtless beauty. I often wonder whether Dvorák would not be greater to-day if he had never become a contributor to English music festivals or hunted in this country for the mare's nests of "American folk tunes." But by this hunt he has furnished some of my colleagues with columns of copy, so I suppose it was all for the best.

The more I hear of Paderewski's music the less I like it and the deeper is my conviction of its insincerity. Such is the authority of the Polish pianist that when he plays his own pieces you are persuaded that he really has something to say. His hypnotic power works this spell. But when you hear the concerto played by a pianist of less personal magnetism you are able to judge of the work in a state of comparative coolness.

Now Mr. Jonás, who made his first appearance in Boston last night, is a pianist of indisputable talent. He plays with an authority that is the more convincing on account of his modesty. After hearing him in this concerto I should say that elegance was his distinguishing characteristic; but I should like to hear him in compositions of a more intimate nature, and I hope he will be persuaded to give a recital here. He may well plume himself on his reception last night, for there was warm appreciation of his worth.

* * *

I am glad to say that Miss Stein will sing at the Symphony concert next Saturday. Mr. MacDowell will follow her, and Mr. Kneisel will the week after play Mr. Strube's violin concerto, which he performed for the first time at the last Worcester Festival.

What is the true reason of Mr. Ysaye's non-appearance at a Symphony concert here this season? There are many rumors.

PHILIP HALE.

On the following evening Emil Paur's Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its season in Music Hall with the following program:

Symphony No. 3, F major, op. 90	Brahms
Two movements from concerto for violin and orchestra, A minor, op. 28	Goldmark
Rhapsody for orchestra, España	Chabrier
Invitation to the Dance, op. 65	Weber

Arranged for orchestra by Felix Weingartner.

This is the thirteenth season of the Boston Orchestra's series of concerts in Baltimore. During that period the improvement in the playing of this band has developed from year to year, until one realizes that criticism of its work becomes disarmed. The influence as an educator that this orchestra has exercised upon the musical taste of this community should not be underestimated. Its performances during these thirteen years cover the literature of the old and modern school of the best in orchestral music, and if time and space permitted it would be interesting to follow the varied programs that have been rendered. As a matter of fact, Baltimore has, in the main, had no other opportunity of hearing a first-class orchestra, and it is but natural that the performances of other organizations must necessarily be measured by the high standard set by the Boston Orchestra.

The performance of the November 10 concert was in every respect up to the best work of Mr. Paur's musicians. Mr. Paur's reading and interpretation and the orchestra's playing of the Brahms symphony were especially enjoyable.

The warmth and sincerity of Mr. Kneisel's reception must have convinced him of his deserved popularity, and the enthusiastic applause that followed his masterly playing of the Goldmark concerto attested the audience's appreciation of his virtuosity. There is such true manliness and such freedom from mannerism and affectation in Mr. Kneisel's playing that one feels that he is confronted by a true artist. Mr. Kneisel never played in Baltimore as he played on this occasion, and fully merited the enthusiasm so liberally accorded him.

The new orchestration of "Invitation to the Dance," by Weingartner, is an improvement over any of the former arrangements heretofore heard. The next concert December 15.

EVENING

Return of the Symphony With Fresh Honors.

Our symphony orchestra returns from abroad with more honors than our football team, for it has won a very decided victory in New York and the people of other cities than Boston are beginning to grasp the fact that America possesses a musical organization that is the peer, and possibly the superior, of any European orchestra.

Each successive triumphal tour of our band only makes us wish the more that they might some day go to England, France and Germany, and open the eyes of those trans-Atlantic people who imagine that we are yet in our musical swaddling clothes.

At the beginning of the concert the wind still sat in the classical quarter and a Mozart symphony, the one in D major, without minuet, took up the thread of last century matters about where it had been left, two weeks ago.

One must again pay tribute to the virility with which Mr. Paur interprets Mozart; he does not try to give a naive simplicity which leans toward the infantile, as some conductors do, but brings a manly straight-forwardness, and sometimes a robustness, to bear, that gives the work an attractive strength.

One must not imagine that these old and symmetrical works are so entirely easy, either; their very simplicity constitutes a difficulty, for while in some of the modern turgid and turbid works a dozen errors might escape the general notice, in these limpid specimens of harmony and melody, every error, even the slightest, stands revealed as a flaw in a crystal.

But on this occasion the symphony went with the precision and delicacy of shading of a string quartette and the audience could not but enjoy the pure music and realize once more that the modern school does not abolish its predecessors.

After this there came a new soloist, a Spaniard, Mr. Alberto Jonas, who appeared in Paderewski's Piano Concerto in A minor. As regards the work itself, a second hearing (Paderewski himself played it in these concerts in January, 1893,) confirms the first impression; it is probably Paderewsii's best composition, it is "clavier-maessig," displays the instrument to excellent advantage, yet avoids the Chopin error of making of a concerto a mere piano work with accompaniment.

A true concerto, such as Beethoven's G major or E flat major, or Brahms' B flat major piano concerto, ought to be a symphony with a thread of obbligato woven into its fabric; if Paderewski does not quite attain this ideal, he at least seems to recognize it and strive for it, for the orchestra is given its just prominence, and the solo instrument frequently but reiterates, emphasizes or embellishes the orchestral thoughts.

Particularly is this the case in the romanza where the piano frequently weaves fioritura around the themes of woodwind or strings.

The work is full of fine contrasts, the melancholy of some of the orchestral touches of the first movement, the sweetness of the second, and the bravura of the finale, are effective foils to each other; the cadenza of the first movement is also a proper development and not too great a display of virtuosity; the solemn character of the second theme of the finale is a dignified touch in the Schumann manner; altogether one feels more than ever that Paderewski has restrained the feelings of the solo pianist and allowed the musician to rule in the structure of the work; it indicates that when the craze over the blonde hair and picturesque personality has passed away Paderewski, although not a Brahms or a Schumenn, will be found to be something more than the mere "curled darling" of society.

Mr. Alberto Jonas was a delightful surprise; coming here without any "reclame," unpuffed and almost unheralded, he proved himself a sterling player with a tendency towards the romantic school. He sometimes lacked in massive power, as for example, in the great double octave passages in the first movement, which were slightly blurred, but his touch was very expressive, and he gave the sentiment of the composition with true poetic instinct.

There was a modesty and artistic earnestness in his interpretation that deserves all praise; perhaps he saved his strength for the bravura ending, for this was commendably strong and virile. If the work had more interest when the composer himself played it, this was none the less the finer interpretation, for the orchestral part was distinctly better on Saturday than when it was heard before, and soloist and conductor worked together admirably. Abundant enthusiasm followed the close and the pianist was recalled many times.

The Dvorak Suite in D major, Op. 39, followed, and was very pleasant to hear; it was "Suite music" that would have made Shakespeare himself "merry." One does not need to bring forth the heavy artillery of rigid criticism against such a pretty suite; it was not deep music but it was enjoyable, and it showed Dvorak at his freest and best in orchestration.

Just a suspicion of Bizet's style was evident in the carillon-like organ-points of the first movement, recalling similar effects in the "Suite Arlesienne." The harmonization of the "Sousedska" (Minuet) was as sensuous as Goldmark. The Romanze with its dialogue between flute and English horn was of pensive beauty and exceedingly well-played. Only the finale seemed a little noisy and blatant, and the constant reiteration of figures (which had been characteristic of the work from its very first movement) became a little tiresome, but, as a whole, it was refreshing to have a relapse to "cakes and ale" and "ginger hot i' the mouth" after our prolonged fit of classical virtue.

Possibly it was to avoid shocking Boston ears that the overture to "Le Part du Diable" received its English appellation of "Carlo Broschi"; when ——rosch in New York gives "The ——nation of Faust" they print the whole matter in full and Boston would not be shocked if the devil received his portion in this particular title.

It was splendidly played, the ensemble was perfect, the muted strings and the horns covered themselves with glory, and the overture, which is a mere "omelette souffiee" of music, is not served up with such daintiness once in a decade.

Louis C. Elson.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 22, 1897

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The fifth Symphony concert was given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, the programme being as follows:

Mozart: Symphony No. 46, in D major.
Paderewski: Concerto for Pianoforte, in A minor, opus 17.
Dvorak: Suite in D major, opus 39.
Auber: Overture to "La Part du Diable."
Mr. Alberto Jonas was the pianist.

The Mozart symphony "without Minuet" is one of the most beautiful of the set; it is hard to see how it is inferior to the more famous "Parisian." The andante is a perfect gem in its way. It might be well to look still further among Mozart's forty-nine symphonies; no doubt many of them are in nowise worth giving, but there must also be treasures among them that would repay the search. Mozart has been too long represented in the symphonic field by the last three great ones, the E-flat major, G minor, and "Jupiter"; and the burden of relieving the monotony of too often repeated performances of these might well be shared by others beside the two without Minuet in D major. The performance last Saturday was excellent.

One is rather in doubt about the value of Dvorak's D major suite; there are charming things in it, but a good deal of it seems rather dull. For matter of that, one could not help suspecting that some parts of the work might be made to sound quite differently from the way they sounded last Saturday evening. The Sousedska Minuet, for instance, lacked its characteristic pungency of rhythmic lilt; and what a mistake to take the Presto Furiant at a mildly ambling allegretto! One wondered whether the word Furiant had lost all its etymological meaning in passing into the Czech language. But the charming Romanze was delightfully played.

Auber's overture to "La Part du Diable" —why, by the way, was it called overture to "Carlo Broschi" on the programme? The opera is oftener known in Germany as "Des Teufels Antheil" than as "Carlo Broschi"; but why call a French work by its German title at all?—this overture, we say, is no particularly good or characteristic example of the composer's genius. It may not be quite so light in character as the overtures to "Fra Diavolo," "La Sirâne," and some others; but it certainly has not their snap and go, let alone their wealth of melodic invention. It was well played, but sounded, upon the whole, rather tame.

Paderewski's concerto, first played here in the season of 1892-93 by the composer, is a work that improves on closer acquaintance. The first movement is in every way capital, the Romanza, very charming indeed; about the finale one may feel more doubt, though a bad hitch between orchestra and pianoforte last Saturday took a good deal of the life out of this movement. The use of the pianoforte throughout the work is masterly; Paderewski has here taken a leaf out of Beethoven's and Chopin's book, in making the pianoforte contrast with the orchestra, instead of vying with it; he never makes the pianoforte try to do what the orchestra can do better. The orchestration, too, is exceedingly beautiful. Perhaps the concerto is open to the charge of the musical centre of gravity being too constantly in the orchestra, too seldom in the solo instrument; but que voulez-vous? a composer cannot wrench himself out of his own time. There is hardly a work written nowadays, in which the orchestra figures at all, upon which the same criticism cannot be made.

Mr. Jonas made his first appearance here at this concert. The impression he made was very brilliant. His technique is well up to the modern virtuoso standard, his tone steadily beautiful; he is an exponent of whom Paderewski himself might be proud. His phrasing is admirable in grace and musical solidity, his sentiment natural and artistic; of the more violent and profound phases of passion and thought he showed perhaps little, but the work itself hardly calls these into play. He shows himself plainly as a man who knows how to seize upon the true gist of a composition and reveal it to the listener; he plays with great totality of conception, yet with no slurring over of details. He was loudly applauded and recalled.

The next programme is: Brahms serenade; Tshaikovsky aria, "Jeanne d'Arc;" Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, symphony in E minor, "Gaelic," opus 32; Wagner, scena, "Gerechter Gott!" and aria, "In seiner Blüthe bleicht mein Leben," from "Rienzi;" Berlioz, three selections from "La Damnation de Faust," opus 24. Miss Gertrude May Stein will be the singer.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 21, 1897.

The fifth symphony concert was eminently interesting in the light of its performance. Not that it had not a choice programme; only there was no novelty presented.

It is usually not at all a happy thing for a soloist, especially if he chanches to be a piano player, to have to follow with his concerto a symphony as the opening number. But for once the first work did not displace and injure the succeeding number. For Mozart's forty-sixth symphony—one of the several which have no minuet—is so refreshing, so independent, and really so uplifting, in spite of some passing severities of manner and some unusual rudeness of accent, that it leaves the listener quite free and unprejudiced, ready to entertain what succeeds according to its quality and kind.

This second number was one particularly well able to maintain itself against even a much more domineering and determined symphonic form; for it was Paderewski's A-minor pianoforte concerto, in which the orchestral values are considered and favored no less than the voice and capacity of the solo instrument, which is often set apart to supply only that various ornamentation and illumination which no other instrument can give. The orchestra has to be heard in strenuous ensembles and in lovely, gentle obbligati for many of its more delicate members, and therefore the score can stand up against a symphony, even if it were of modern writing, as many of the classics could not. The player was Mr. Alberto Jonas, whom we understand to be a Spanish artist of large following and high esteem abroad. Of course the programme-book, with its remote indifference to its duties and to the desires of those who now only skim where they would be glad to read, had not one word to say of this musician, who was to present himself as a stranger to an exacting public. Could injustice to the artist and discourtesy to the audience go much farther in an official pamphlet of information? Well, at any rate, Mr. Jonas justified his engagement and conquered easily his hearers. By substantial merit in a clear, distinguished and symmetrical techinique; fine intellectual perception of the composer's thought and purpose; artistic appreciation of the relative consequence of piano and orchestra in the shifting flow of the concerto; and in warm and earnest or brilliant and enhancing delivery, he demonstrated his right to stand among the prominent and to undertake music which such a master of the piano as Paderewski had designed to place his instrument in a noble cooperative position with the orchestra.

The other numbers were Dvorak's suite in D minor, with its organ-fashioned prelude, its romance and its dance-measures, and Auber's lively overture to "Carlo Broschi," doubly welcome because it has been so long unheard and because of its own gay but not trivial spirit. In these, as in the preceding numbers, the orchestral performance was all that could be asked, even of our own Symphony men. The next programme will be this: Brahms, Serenade; Tschaikowsky, Aria, "Jeanne d'Arc"; Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, Symphony; Wagner, Aria from "Rienzi"; Berlioz, Selections from "The Damnation of Faust." Soloist, Miss Gertrude May Stein.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, NOV. 21, 1897.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The season of the Boston Symphony orchestra is proving a very prosperous one, and the patrons are enjoying some of the best concerts which have been known in the history of this Boston institution.

Miss Gertrude May Stein will be the soloist this week at the Friday afternoon rehearsal and the Saturday evening concert.

The programme will be:

Serenade	Brahms
Aria, "Jeanne d'Arc"	Tschaikowsky
Symphony	Mrs. H. H. A. Beach
Aria from "Rienzi"	Wagner
Selections from "The Damnation of Faust"	Berlioz

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 24, 1897.

The program of the fifth Symphony concert last night in Music Hall, Mr. Paur conductor, was as follows:

Symphony No. 46 in D major (K. 504)	Mozart
Concerto in A minor, op. 17	Paderewski
Suite in D major, op. 39	Dvorák
Overture, Part du Diable	Auber

This concert was to me dull. The symphony has more than historical interest, but the orchestra did not play it with sufficient care. Academic beauty demands faultless academic technic. However, you may rate Mozart in the list of great composers; you must admit that his works require absolute finish in the performance. Modern symphonic poems and rhapsodies, full of thunder and guns and all that, admit of dropped notes and occasional roughness in outburst, but a symphony or a chamber piece by Mozart is a sensitive plant, that does not brook coarse touch.

The suite of Dvorák is delightful as a rule on account of its spontaneity and almost thoughtless beauty. I often wonder whether Dvorák would not be greater to-day if he had never become a contributor to English music festivals or hunted in this country for the mare's nests of "American folk tunes." But by this hunt he has furnished some of my colleagues with columns of copy, so I suppose it was all for the best.

The more I hear of Paderewski's music the less I like it and the deeper is my conviction of its insincerity. Such is the authority of the Polish pianist that when he plays his own pieces you are persuaded that he really has something to say. His hypnotic power works this spell. But when you hear the concerto played by a pianist of less personal magnetism you are able to judge of the work in a state of comparative coolness.

Now Mr. Jonás, who made his first appearance in Boston last night, is a pianist of indisputable talent. He plays with an authority that is the more convincing on account of his modesty. After hearing him in this concerto I should say that elegance was his distinguishing characteristic; but I should like to hear him in compositions of a more intimate nature, and I hope he will be persuaded to give a recital here. He may well plume himself on his reception last night, for there was warm appreciation of his worth.

* * *

I am glad to say that Miss Stein will sing at the Symphony concert next Saturday. Mr. MacDowell will follow her, and Mr. Kneisel will the week after play Mr. Strube's violin concerto, which he performed for the first time at the last Worcester Festival.

What is the true reason of Mr. Ysaye's non-appearance at a Symphony concert here this season? There are many rumors.

PHILIP HALE.

On the following evening Emil Paur's Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its season in Music Hall with the following program:

Symphony No. 3, F major, op. 90	Brahms
Two movements from concerto for violin and orchestra, A minor, op. 28	Goldmark
Rhapsody for orchestra, España	Chabrier
Invitation to the Dance, op. 65 Arranged for orchestra by Felix Weingartner.	Weber

This is the thirteenth season of the Boston Orchestra's series of concerts in Baltimore. During that period the improvement in the playing of this band has developed from year to year, until one realizes that criticism of its work becomes disarmed. The influence as an educator that this orchestra has exercised upon the musical taste of this community should not be underestimated. Its performances during these thirteen years cover the literature of the old and modern school of the best in orchestral music, and if time and space permitted it would be interesting to follow the varied programs that have been rendered. As a matter of fact, Baltimore has, in the main, had no other opportunity of hearing a first-class orchestra, and it is but natural that the performances of other organizations must necessarily be measured by the high standard set by the Boston Orchestra.

The performance of the November 10 concert was in every respect up to the best work of Mr. Paur's musicians. Mr. Paur's reading and interpretation and the orchestra's playing of the Brahms symphony were especially enjoyable.

The warmth and sincerity of Mr. Kneisel's reception must have convinced him of his deserved popularity, and the enthusiastic applause that followed his masterly playing of the Goldmark concerto attested the audience's appreciation of his virtuosity. There is such true manliness and such freedom from mannerism and affectation in Mr. Kneisel's playing that one feels that he is confronted by a true artist. Mr. Kneisel never played in Baltimore as he played on this occasion, and fully merited the enthusiasm so liberally accorded him.

The new orchestration of "Invitation to the Dance," by Weingartner, is an improvement over any of the former arrangements heretofore heard. The next concert December 15.

THE AMERICAN HEBREW.
213-215 EAST 44TH STREET,
TELEPHONE, 243 38. NEW YORK.

The following appeared in
THE AMERICAN HEBREW of Nov 26

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its 12th New York season at the Metropolitan Opera House on Thursday, Nov. 11th. First on the programme was Brahm's Symphony No. 3 (F. Major) which was rendered in a manner commensurate with the beauty of the work. The second number was Schumann's Concerto for piano. The manner and ease with which Mr. Rafael Joseffy overcame the difficulties of this piece astonished all, and he was not allowed to go before playing one of Brahm's inter mezzi for an encore. Grieg's suite, "Peter Gynt," was next given by the orchestra and the last part of the suite had to be repeated before the audience would stop applauding. Mr. Paur acceded to the repetition with evident reluctance. The concluding number of the programme, Chabrier's "Espana" Rhapsody for Orchestra, hardly reaches the same standard as the compositions that preceded it, but was brilliantly rendered.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CII., NO. 151.

SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 28, 1897.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Miss Gertrude May Stein the Soloist of Last Evening's Programme.

For the sixth Boston Symphony orchestra concert in Music Hall last evening the programme was:

Serenade No. 1 in D major, op. 11....Brahms
Recitative, "Ja, So Will 's Gott!".......Tschaikowsky
Aria, "Lebt Wohl, Ihr Berge," from "Die Jungfrau von Orleans"...Tschaikowsky
Symphony No. 5 in E minor, "From the New World," op. 95...............Dvorak
Scena, "Gerechter Gott!"............Wagner
Aria, "In Seiner Bluthe," from "Rienzi," Wagner
Menuet des Feu-Follets, from "La Damnation de Faust," op. 24............Berlioz
Valse des Sylphes, from "La Damnation de Faust," op. 24...................Berlioz
Marche Hongroise, from "La Damnation de Faust," op. 24....................Berlioz

The soloist was Miss Gertrude May Stein. The Brahms serenade had not been heard here in some years. In it there is little of the later Brahms. It appeals at once to the understanding by its transparent clearness, and has an easy grace and flow that do not characterize the great bulk of his music.

The opening movement abounds in beauty of theme and of orchestration; the minuets have a delightful charm of simplicity and delicacy, and the closing movement is, for Brahms, almost piquant. Still, there are moments in the serenade that are conducive to somnolence in the hearer, and the work is inordinately long, its performance taking three-quarters of an hour. It was read by Mr. Paur with elaborate care and sympathy, and was beautifully played.

The Dvorak symphony continues to wear well, and, on the whole, is, perhaps, the composer's most pleasing and satisfying work in its kind. It has always been among the orchestra's successes, and its presentation last evening was no exception to the rule.

The Tsckaikowsky aria from his "Joan of Arc," an opera, by the way, which proved a failure, affords the soloist ample opportunity to show her gifts as a dramatic singer; is strong and effective without being particularly interesting on the concert stage.

Miss Stein, who was cordially received and was in excellent voice, declaimed the recitative broadly and with fine emphasis, and gave the aria in a thoroughly impressive manner, displaying artistic intelligence of a marked order, admirable power and a depth of passion of which she had not before given evidence here.

The same virtues were manifested in the meretricious Wagner aria. In both selections she sang with a frankness, a vigor of style, a convincing sincerity and a large appreciation of underlying sentiment of the music that can hardly be overpraised. She was tremendously applauded, and recalled again and again after each effort, and her success was immediate and decisive.

For the next concert the selections are: Indian suite, E. A. Macdowell; Concerto No. 2, for pianoforte, by the same composer, who is to be the soloist of the evening, and Beethoven's Symphony, No. 5.

The Symphony rehearsal Friday afternoon was a perfect jam. The afternoon was so warm that it brought out lightweight costumes again. Both Mrs. Montgomery Sears and Mrs. E. D. Jordan, who are rarely absent from their seats, looked delightfully cool in white silk blouses. Mrs. Sears wore with hers a black skirt and open coat, a large picture hat and a silver gray feather boa. Mrs. Jordan's costume was a brown cloth skirt and coat trimmed with otter, and she wore a smart scarlet velvet toque with black plumes. Miss Gertrude May Stein, the contralto from New York, was the soloist. She was in a bright salmon silk gown, the kilted skirt trimmed with rows of white lace insertion over black. The front of the bodice was of black and white lace and velvet. Her round hat was of black velvet with black plumes. She is a very pretty woman.

[illegible]
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.

MONDAY MORNING, NOV. 29, 1897.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

It was an interesting programme, albeit somewhat too long, that was given in Music Hall on Saturday evening. It began with Brahms' Serenade for full orchestra, the first of the two which he wrote in 1860-1. This work, therefore, represented the earlier Brahms, the Brahms who was swayed by Schubert and Haydn, the composer who had not yet evolved the intricate developments and thematic treatment of the C minor symphony or the gloom of the "Vier Ernste Lieder."

Yet there is figure treatment enough in the first movement, and there is an excess of sombre thought in the Adagio; one would scarcely care to be awakened by such a serenade at night. We may remember, however, that in its application to orchestral music, the term "Serenade" has been employed simply to designate a free suite, and one need not always expect to find amatory or nocturnal characteristics in its measures.

In this composition Brahms makes abundant use of flutes, clarinettes and bassoons, and the horns also have prominent work to do; the wind instruments have more opportunities given them than the strings, and, on this occasion, they bore off the honors; the horn and clarinette in the beginning of the work, the flute and clarinette responses in the Adagio, the peculiar bassoon bass in the first Minuet, the performance of these and many other touches proved how much our band of wind instruments have gained in recent years. It was pleasant to note also how enthusiastically the work was received by the audience; Brahms is not regarded as a musical ascetic or a tonal bore in Boston.

Now followed the vocalist of the concert, Miss Gertrude May Stein. She appeared in this concert in two interesting numbers, the first being the farewell aria of Joan of Arc in Tschaikowsky's opera of that name.

It may be remembered that the Russian's opera has not been a success; almost all the Russian composers seem to be orchestral by nature (Glinka to the contrary notwithstanding), and Tschaikowsky was no exception. The accompaniment is often overladen and the climaxes are largely orchestral ones. Miss Stein's noble breadth of style enabled her to cope successfully with the orchestral burden, and she awakened much enthusiasm in this number.

Her second number was a grand scena by Wagner (who spent all his later life abolishing grand scenas and holding them up to ridicule) and it had especial interest as showing the Wagnerian starting-point. Even in so conventional a form the energy and grandeur which were inherent in the composer occasionally burst forth.

Miss Stein sang this with such dramatic fervor that the audience was aroused to great enthusiasm and the resultant applause was only a well-merited tribute. It may not be generally known that Miss Stein was a pupil of a Boston teacher,—Mr. Charles A. White.

The orchestral work in this number shows a different Wagner from the one who conquered the operatic world; there is here much that is blatant, much that is stilted, and the performance, too, was a trifle marred towards the close.

Yet it is in some degree educational to hear such a work and note the buds which are afterwards to grow into a rich harvest. It might be worth the while of some tenor to resurrect the mad scene of King Arindel in "The Fairies" (which the present writer once had the felicity of hearing, in Munich), where a young Wagner appears who is a diluted Donizetti.

Dvorak's "American Symphony" came in the centre of the programme. We were glad to hear it again. The work ought to be heard over and over again to be thoroughly appreciated; it is one of the greatest and most important musical tributes ever paid to our country, and while one cannot say that it is characteristically American, it indicates a path along which our composers may travel with profit.

Some of the figures used in the first, third and last movements are definitely of plantation flavor. The Largo, which is the most beautiful movement of the whole symphony, is the least native. If Shakespeare put a sea-coast in Bohemia Dvorak certainly put some American negroes there, in this slow movement.

The performance was in "King Cambyses vein," very much bolder, heavier, and more capricious than has ever been accorded to the work before, at least in these concerts. It is right enough that a conductor should have the privilege of his own moods; we have heard Rubinstein play the "Moonlight sonata" with everything from a crescent to a full moon shining over it, and we are glad to see our conductor vary his own readings sometimes; an artist is not a manufacturer, and ought not always to deliver the same wares.

But the regular recurrence of the work places the critic in the same position towards it as he is forced to assume towards the annual performance of the "Messiah," he is forced either to give it short shrift, or to imitate history, and repeat himself. The adagio was beautifully interpreted, the plaintive English horn melody seemed to have more than its ordinary charm and the final shading here was simply marvellous.

The scherzo with its Ninth-Symphony reminiscence and its effective march trio (a march in triple rhythm, such as was used in mediaeval times and such as Schumann used at the end of his "Carnaval") also was especially attractive. The first and last movements were very highly spiced, as if the negroes were working upon a pepper, instead of a cotton plantation, but the brilliancy was exciting nevertheless.

The concert ended with three selections from Berlioz's "Damnation de Faust." All of these were given with a heavy hand, much less attractively and delicately than we have heard them. The "Menuet des Feu-Follets" was not daintily erratic but a succession of very sharp contrasts that suggested prosaic torchlight parades rather than "Will-o'-the Wisps."

The Waltz of the Sylphs was rather ponderous—for Sylphs, and the final Rakoczy March, one of the grandest crescendos in the whole repertoire was little else but noisy; it might have pictured a scene in the present Austro-Hungarian diet, but it was scarcely a true interpretation of Berlioz's awe-inspiring treatment of the Hungarian revolutionary music.

But the excellent work of the Brahms Serenade and the Dvorak Symphony makes one reluctant to mention a shortcoming in Berlioz. Louis C. Elson.

[illegible] NOVEMBER 28, 1897.

* * *

The program of the sixth Symphony concert in Music Hall last evening was as follows:

Serenade No. 1, in D major, Op. 11....Brahms
Recitative, "Ja, so will's Gott!" and Aria, "Lebt wohl, ihr Berge," from "Die Jungfrau von Orleans"..Tschaikowsky
Symphony No. 5, in E minor, "from the New World," Op. 95..............Dvorak
Scena, "Gerechter Gott!" and Aria, "In seiner Bluthe," from "Reinzi".......Wagner
a. Minuet of Will-o'-the-Wisps; b. Waltz of Sylphs; c. Rakoczy March; from "The Damnation of Faust".. Berlioz

Miss Stein is not a stranger in Boston, but last night she appeared for the first time in this city at a Symphony concert. I have written somewhat at length about the career of this woman of passionate voice in the supplement published today. And after hearing her in the arias of Tschaikowsky and Wagner. I find nothing to modify or retract. Her voice is one of surprising range and sumptuous beauty; and each tone is warm with womanhood. Skillfully taught, musically alert, she does not tear passion to tatters; she knows the value of repose, of suggestion; she prepares her climax so that the outburst is inevitable, irresistible.

I confess I do not care for the "Rienzi" aria, but I listened with pleasure to Miss Stein's voice; and Mr. Paur evidently was enwrapped by the atmosphere of the singer, for there was an awkward hitch that came near ruining the very close.

The aria by Tschaikowsky had the advantage of novelty, but I think it would be much more effective in its scenic setting. In 1878 Tschaikowsky went to Paris, where, as Kashkin tells us, he was much preoccupied with the subject of Joan of Arc, and studied all that French writers said about her. The opera was written during the winter of '79-'80. Produced Feb. 23, 1881, at St. Petersburg, it was far from being a success. Nicholas Rubinstein, a warm friend and helpful critic of the composer, considered it as "a retrograde step from such works as 'Vakoula' and 'Eugene Oniègen.' He believed that he saw in it a desire to win the public favor, and added that a mediocre talent might succeed in this respect, but Tschaikowsky—never."

* * *

The Brahms serenade has not been played here for some years. First produced in Vienna, Dec. 7, 1862, under Herbeck, it was coolly received. There was talk of want of freshness and warmth. The two scherzos were omitted last night, and thus the piece seemed more unendurable. To me the opening movement and the menuetto are the finest portions of the work; the latter is very delightful music, exquisit is unaffected simplicity, spontaneous thought, and haunting melody. The Congo Symphony—with its negro-minstrel olio effects of angels singing in the distance to aged contrabands—was played with great fire, force and sweetness. The program was too long—for surburbanites and newspaper men.

Philip Hale.

SATURDAY EVENING
Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 28.

The Symphony Concert.

The sixth concert of the Symphony Orchestra was given in Music Hall last night. The programme was:

Serenade, No. 1 D major..............Brahms
Recitative and aria from "Die Jungfrau von Orleans" ....Tschaikowsky
Symphony No. 5, E minor.............Dvorak
Scena and aria from "Rienzi".........Wagner
Menuet des Feu-Follets, Valse des Sylphs et Marche hongroise from "La Damnation de Faust" .... Berlioz
Soloist, Miss Gertrude May Stein.

The Brahms Serenade was well worth the rehearing, for despite its somewhat dismal length, it is a characteristic and elaborate work, full of charming ideas, strong, forcible and graceful, and developed with cold, severe and elaborate ingenuity and learning. What effect a serenade of this kind would have on a warm-blooded, impulsive woman it would be interesting to speculate, but titles in music are apt to be misleading, and the rose of Brahm's music by any other name would smell as sweet. The Serenade does not appeal to the heart, but it is fully satisfying to the intellect, keeping it on the alert with a thousand and one fanciful designs. It was pleasant listening again to the Dvorak symphony, for here the familiar title gave a stimulus and a large field of choice to an active imagination, and one could see the restless, roving Indian or the Stephen Foster negro, or inhale the odor of limitless prairies according to one's fancy. The music is of the good, solid wearing kind, that will be the better when it has outlasted its explanatory title. A master hand only could have produced it, and it appeals to the heart as well as to the head. The Berlioz selections were interpreted with rare beauty, grace and spirit by Mr. Paur and his orchestra, and it was pleasant and instructive to have specimens of French and German genius on the same programme. As fashion has turned in his direction, it is now allowable to admire Berlioz without being considered odd or perverse, or of having the admiration taken as evidence of disrespect to the classic German composers.

The soloist of the evening was Miss Gertrude Stein, and she is an artist well worth the hearing. Her fine voice and fine method were heard with admirable effect in the Tschaikowsky selections which she sang in large, dignified style, and with impressive, passionate feeling. The "Rienzi" selections were sung with equal dramatic force. feeling and convincing power, and gave ample evidence that Miss Stein is an artist as well as a singer.

The programme for the next concert is Beethoven's Symphony No. 5, Indian Suite and Pianoforte Concerto No. 2, by Mr. E. A. MacDowell, who is also the soloist.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 28, 1897.

Vehemence predominated in the sixth symphony programme. Mrs. Beach's symphony, which had been promised, was withdrawn; and to make the measure good, Mr. Paur inserted instead of it, Dvorak's "From the New World," and four movements from the first Serenade of Brahm's opus 11. The opening allegro of this latter work is loud enough to wake up the whole block; and if all the six movements were performed, a midsummer night would be all too brief for them, as a witty woman remarked. That allegro and the adagio consumed nearly half an hour between them, and the former appeared as prolix as it was noisy, although the treatment was clear enough and often lightly interesting. The two little minuets, for clarinets, flute, bassoon and a few strings, were truly charming, and the rondo finale was thoroughly animated and entirely unreserved in speaking out its mind in vigorous phrases. The Dvorak symphony and the usual fairy dances and Rakoczy march, from "The Damnation of Faust," which ended the concert, are familiar enough, but commanded applause (especially the first) for the light thrown by the performance upon many minor points which we do not remember to have heard so brightly shown.

It was a hard programme for a singer to hold up against, for almost any single voice must sound weak and bodiless at first against the concluding clamors of Brahms and Dvorak. But Miss Stein has strength, resonancy, enthusiasm and ardor, and her composers were Tschaikowsky, in the scene from his "Maid of Orleans" wherein Joan bids farewell to her home, and Wagner, in Adriano's perturbed and excited scene from "Rienzi." The first of these is not only gloomy; it is labored and often overloaded with orchestration which usurps the place which Joan should occupy or surrounds her with an atmosphere quite afar from that of the peaceful joys and simple griefs of Domremy and its peasant maid. Miss Stein sang with earnestness, breadth and mastery, and indicated so decisively and directly the dramatic values of the scenes that one could readily comprehend how she has been sought for an operatic engagement in Germany.

The next programme will have a pronounced MacDowell flavor, as his Indian suite and his second pianoforte concerto will be played, with himself as the soloist. The only other composer admitted is Beethoven, with his fifth symphony.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, NOV. 28, 1897.

FORTY-FOUR PAGES.

Sixth Symphony Concert.

The orchestral numbers of the sixth symphony program comprised Brahms' serenade in D major, Dvorak's "New World" symphony and a minuet, waltz and the "Rakoczy" march from Berlioz "Damnation of Faust." Miss Gertrude May Stein had for her solo numbers a recitative and aria from Tchaikovsky's "Maid of Orleans," and an excerpt from Wagner's opera "Rienzi." Brahms' serenade is less familiar to the general public than are his symphonies, and, although the former work is of a very elaborate nature, to many musicians the deviations from the symphonic form of writing does not necessitate a change from the title given to the latter style of compositions. Possibly a suggestion of dryness in some portions in the earlier movements makes the serenade uninteresting at times, but there are innumerable moments of great beauty in the work in which the composer's fancy is given scope unbiased by his somewhat severe methods of musical expression.

The intricate changes in rhythm in the first movement, the elaborate development of the final theme in the third part, the grotesque scoring of the fourth movement and the scherzo, trio and rondo of the later portions are beautiful examples of the master's conception and illustration, and these were most sympathetically interpreted by the orchestra. The conversations in the fourth movement were exquisite bits of detached instrumentation and the more somber themes were given with due impressiveness.

Miss Stein sang the Joan aria from "Maid of Orleans" very effectively and without an undue sentimentality in the pastoral apostrophes of the opening phrases. Her voice has a beautiful quality and the tones are rich and very true to pitch. The more dramatic Rienzi selection, although less pleasing in its general interpretation, was sung commendably. Miss Stein was most cordially received and her selections were greeted with hearty applause.

The "New World" symphony, by Dvorak, awakened a great deal of discussion when it was first performed, about four years ago, and an analysis of the composition is not necessary now. The orchestra performed the work skilfully and in the spirit intended by the writer and really made classic that which is known as negro melody. The minuet, waltz and march, by Berlioz, were played in a spirited vein, the Rakoczy musical fusilade being most vigorously presented.

Mr E. A. MacDowell will be the soloist this week. The program will comprise his "Indian Suite" and concerto No. 2, for pianoforte, and Beethoven's fifth symphony.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, NOV. 28, 1897.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. E. A. MacDowell will be the soloist at this week's Symphony rehearsal and concert in Music hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, and the programme will contain two of his compositions.

The programme will be:

Indian Suite......................E. A. MacDowell
Concerto for pianoforte, No. 2......................E. A. MacDowell
Symphony No. 5......................Beethoven

[45]

THE AMERICAN HEBREW,
213-215 EAST 44TH STREET,
TELEPHONE, 243 38. NEW YORK.

The following appeared in
THE AMERICAN HEBREW of Nov. 26

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its 12th New York season at the Metropolitan Opera House on Thursday, Nov. 11th. First on the programme was Brahm's Symphony No. 3 (F. Major) which was rendered in a manner commensurate with the beauty of the work. The second number was Schumann's Concerto for piano. The manner and ease with which Mr. Rafael Joseffy overcame the difficulties of this piece astonished all, and he was not allowed to go before playing one of Brahm's inter mezzi for an encore. Grieg's suite, "Peter Gynt," was next given by the orchestra and the last part of the suite had to be repeated before the audience would stop applauding. Mr. Paur acceded to the repetition with evident reluctance. The concluding number of the programme, Chabrier's "Espana" Rhapsody for Orchestra, hardly reaches the same standard as the compositions that preceded it, but was brilliantly rendered.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CII., NO. 151.
SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 28, 1897.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Miss Gertrude May Stein the Soloist of Last Evening's Programme.

For the sixth Boston Symphony orchestra concert in Music Hall last evening the programme was:

Serenade No. 1, in D major, op. 11....Brahms
Recitative, "Ja, So Will 's Gott!"....... Tschaikowsky
Aria, "Lebt Wohl, Ihr Berge," from "Die Jungfrau von Orleans"...Tschaikowsky
Symphony No. 5, in E minor, "From the New World," op. 95.................Dvorak
Scena, "Gerechter Gott!".............Wagner
Aria, "In Seiner Bluthe," from "Rienzi," Wagner
Menuet des Feu-Follets, from "La Damnation de Faust," op. 24............Berlioz
Valse des Sylphes, from "La Damnation de Faust," op. 24....................Berlioz
Marche Hongroise, from "La Damnation de Faust," op. 24....................Berlioz

The soloist was Miss Gertrude May Stein. The Brahms serenade had not been heard here in some years. In it there is little of the later Brahms. It appeals at once to the understanding by its transparent clearness, and has an easy grace and flow that do not characterize the great bulk of his music.

The opening movement abounds in beauty of theme and of orchestration; the minuets have a delightful charm of simplicity and delicacy, and the closing movement is, for Brahms, almost piquant. Still, there are moments in the serenade that are conducive to somnolence in the hearer, and the work is inordinately long, its performance taking three-quarters of an hour. It was read by Mr. Paur with elaborate care and sympathy, and was beautifully played.

The Dvorak symphony continues to wear well, and, on the whole, is, perhaps, the composer's most pleasing and satisfying work in its kind. It has always been among the orchestra's successes, and its presentation last evening was no exception to the rule.

The Tsckaikowsky aria from his "Joan of Arc," an opera, by the way, which proved a failure, affords the soloist ample opportunity to show her gifts as a dramatic singer; is strong and effective without being particularly interesting on the concert stage.

Miss Stein, who was cordially received and was in excellent voice, declaimed the recitative broadly and with fine emphasis, and gave the aria in a thoroughly impressive manner, displaying artistic intelligence of a marked order, admirable power and a depth of passion of which she had not before given evidence here.

The same virtues were manifested in the meretricious Wagner aria. In both selections she sang with a frankness, a vigor of style, a convincing sincerity and a large appreciation of underlying sentiment of the music that can hardly be overpraised. She was tremendously applauded and recalled again and again after each effort, and her success was immediate and decisive.

For the next concert the selections are: Indian suite, E. A. Macdowell; Concerto No. 2, for pianoforte, by the same composer, who is to be the soloist of the evening, and Beethoven's Symphony, No. 5.

The Symphony rehearsal Friday afternoon was a perfect jam. The afternoon was so warm that it brought out lightweight costumes again. Both Mrs. Montgomery Sears and Mrs. E. D. Jordan, who are rarely absent from their seats, looked delightfully cool in white silk blouses. Mrs. Sears wore with hers a black skirt and open coat, a large picture hat and a silver gray feather boa. Mrs. Jordan's costume was a brown cloth skirt and coat trimmed with otter, and she wore a smart scarlet velvet toque with black plumes. Miss Gertrude May Stein, the contralto from New York, was the soloist. She was in a bright salmon silk gown, the kilted skirt trimmed with rows of white lace insertion over black. The front of the bodice was of black and white lace and velvet. Her round hat was of black velvet with black plumes. She is a very pretty woman.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, NOV. 29, 1897.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

It was an interesting programme, albeit somewhat too long, that was given in Music Hall on Saturday evening. It began with Brahms' Serenade for full orchestra, the first of the two which he wrote in 1860-1. This work, therefore, represented the earlier Brahms, the Brahms who was swayed by Schubert and Haydn, the composer who had not yet evolved the intricate developments and thematic treatment of the C minor symphony or the gloom of the "Vier Ernste Lieder."

Yet there is figure treatment enough in the first movement, and there is an excess of sombre thought in the Adagio; one would scarcely care to be awakened by such a serenade at night. We may remember, however, that in its application to orchestral music, the term "Serenade" has been employed simply to designate a free suite, and one need not always expect to find amatory or nocturnal characteristics in its measures.

In this composition Brahms makes abundant use of flutes, clarinettes and bassoons, and the horns also have prominent work to do; the wind instruments have more opportunities given them than the strings, and, on this occasion, they bore off the honors; the horn and clarinette in the beginning of the work, the flute and clarinette responses in the Adagio, the peculiar bassoon bass in the first Minuet, the performance of these and many other touches proved how much our band of wind instruments have gained in recent years. It was pleasant to note also how enthusiastically the work was received by the audience; Brahms is not regarded as a musical ascetic or a tonal bore in Boston.

Now followed the vocalist of the concert, Miss Gertrude May Stein. She appeared in this concert in two interesting numbers, the first being the farewell aria of Joan of Arc in Tschaikowsky's opera of that name.

It may be remembered that the Russian's opera has not been a success; almost all the Russian composers seem to be orchestral by nature (Glinka to the contrary notwithstanding), and Tschaikowsky was no exception. The accompaniment is often overladen and the climaxes are largely orchestral ones. Miss Stein's noble breadth of style enabled her to cope successfully with the orchestral burden, and she awakened much enthusiasm in this number.

Her second number was a grand scena by Wagner (who spent all his later life abolishing grand scenas and holding them up to ridicule) and it had especial interest as showing the Wagnerian starting-point. Even in so conventional a form the energy and grandeur which were inherent in the composer occasionally burst forth.

Miss Stein sang this with such dramatic fervor that the audience was aroused to great enthusiasm and the resultant applause was only a well-merited tribute. It may not be generally known that Miss Stein was a pupil of a Boston teacher,—Mr. Charles A. White.

The orchestral work in this number shows a different Wagner from the one who conquered the operatic world; there is here much that is blatant, much that is stilted, and the performance, too, was a trifle marred towards the close.

Yet it is in some degree educational to hear such a work and note the buds which are afterwards to grow into a rich harvest. It might be worth the while of some tenor to resurrect the mad scene of King Arindel in "The Fairies" (which the present writer once had the felicity of hearing, in Munich), where a young Wagner appears who is a diluted Donizetti.

Dvorak's "American Symphony" came in the centre of the programme. We were glad to hear it again. The work ought to be heard over and over again to be thoroughly appreciated; it is one of the greatest and most important musical tributes ever paid to our country, and while one cannot say that it is characteristically American, it indicates a path along which our composers may travel with profit.

Some of the figures used in the first, third and last movements are definitely of plantation flavor. The Largo, which is the most beautiful movement of the whole symphony, is the least native. If Shakespeare put a sea-coast in Bohemia Dvorak certainly put some American negroes there, in this slow movement.

The performance was in "King Cambyses vein," very much bolder, heavier, and more capricious than has ever been accorded to the work before, at least in these concerts. It is right enough that a conductor should have the privilege of his own moods; we have heard Rubinstein play the "Moonlight sonata" with everything from a crescent to a full moon shining over it, and we are glad to see our conductor vary his own readings sometimes; an artist is not a manufacturer, and ought not always to deliver the same wares.

But the regular recurrence of the work places the critic in the same position towards it as he is forced to assume towards the annual performance of the "Messiah," he is forced either to give it short shrift, or to imitate history, and repeat himself. The adagio was beautifully interpreted, the plaintive English horn melody seemed to have more than its ordinary charm and the final shading here was simply marvellous.

The scherzo with its Ninth-Symphony reminiscence and its effective march trio (a march in triple rhythm, such as was used in mediaeval times and such as Schumann used at the end of his "Carnaval") also was especially attractive. The first and last movements were very highly spiced, as if the negroes were working upon a pepper, instead of a cotton plantation, but the brilliancy was exciting nevertheless.

The concert ended with three selections from Berlioz's "Damnation de Faust." All of these were given with a heavy hand, much less attractively and delicately than we have heard them. The "Menuet des Feu-Follets" was not daintily erratic but a succession of very sharp contrasts that suggested prosaic torchlight parades rather than "Will-o'-the Wisps."

The Waltz of the Sylphs was rather ponderous—for Sylphs, and the final Rakoczy March, one of the grandest crescendos in the whole repertoire was little else but noisy; it might have pictured a scene in the present Austro-Hungarian diet, but it was scarcely a true interpretation of Berlioz's awe-inspiring treatment of the Hungarian revolutionary music.

But the excellent work of the Brahms Serenade and the Dvorak Symphony makes one reluctant to mention a shortcoming in Berlioz. Louis C. Elson.

Boston Journal.
SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 28, 1897.

The program of the sixth Symphony concert in Music Hall last evening was as follows:

Serenade No. 1, in D major, Op. 11....Brahms
Recitative, "Ja, so will's Gott!" and Aria, "Lebt wohl, ihr Berge," from "Die Jungfrau von Orleans"..Tschaikowsky
Symphony No. 5, in E minor, "from the New World," Op. 95.............Dvorak
Scena, "Gerechter Gott!" and Aria, "In seiner Bluthe," from "Reinzi"......Wagner
a. Minuet of Will-o'-the-Wisps; b. Waltz of Sylphs; c. Rakoczy March; from "The Damnation of Faust".. Berlioz

Miss Stein is not a stranger in Boston, but last night she appeared for the first time in this city at a Symphony concert. I have written somewhat at length about the career of this woman of passionate voice in the supplement published today. And after hearing her in the arias of Tschaikowsky and Wagner, I find nothing to modify or retract. Her voice is one of surprising range and sumptuous beauty; and each tone is warm with womanhood. Skillfully taught, musically alert, she does not tear passion to tatters; she knows the value of repose, of suggestion; she prepares her climax so that the outburst is inevitable, irresistible.

I confess I do not care for the "Rienzi" aria, but I listened with pleasure to Miss Stein's voice; and Mr. Paur evidently was enwrapped by the atmosphere of the singer, for there was an awkward hitch that came near ruining the very close.

The aria by Tschaikowsky had the advantage of novelty, but I think it would be much more effective in its scenic setting. In 1878 Tschaikowsky went to Paris, where, as Kashkin tells us, he was much preoccupied with the subject of Joan of Arc, and studied all that French writers said about her. . The opera was written during the winter of '79-'80. Produced Feb. 23, 1881, at St. Petersburg, it was far from being a success. Nicholas Rubinstein, a warm friend and helpful critic of the composer, considered it as "a retrograde step from such works as 'Vakoula' and 'Eugene Oniègen.' He believed that he saw in it a desire to win the public favor, and added that a mediocre talent might succeed in this respect, but Tschaikowsky—never."

* * *

The Brahms serenade has not been played here for some years. First produced in Vienna, Dec. 7, 1862, under Herbeck, it was coolly received. There was talk of want of freshness and warmth. The two scherzos were omitted last night, and thus the piece seemed more unendurable. To me the opening movement and the menuetto are the finest portions of the work; the latter is very delightful music, exquisit is unaffected simplicity, spontaneous thought, and haunting melody. The Congo Symphony—with its negro-minstrel olio effects of angels singing in the distance to aged contrabands—was played with great fire, force and sweetness. The program was too long—for surburbanites and newspaper men.

Philip Hale.

SATURDAY EVENING
Gazette
BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 28.

The Symphony Concert.

The sixth concert of the Symphony Orchestra was given in Music Hall last night. The programme was:

Serenade, No. 1 D major.............Brahms
Recitative and aria from "Die Jungfrau von Orleans" ....Tschaikowsky
Symphony No. 5, E minor.............Dvorak
Scena and aria from "Rienzi".........Wagner
Menuet des Feu-Follets, Valse des Sylphs et Marche hongroise from "La Damnation de Faust" .... Berlioz
Soloist, Miss Gertrude May Stein.

The Brahms Serenade was well worth the rehearing, for despite its somewhat dismal length, it is a characteristic and elaborate work, full of charming ideas, strong, forcible and graceful, and developed with cold, severe and elaborate ingenuity and learning. What effect a serenade of this kind would have on a warm-blooded, impulsive woman it would be interesting to speculate, but titles in music are apt to be misleading, and the rose of Brahm's music by any other name would smell as sweet. The Serenade does not appeal to the heart, but it is fully satisfying to the intellect, keeping it on the alert with a thousand and one fanciful designs. It was pleasant listening again to the Dvorak symphony, for here the familiar title gave a stimulus and a large field of choice to an active imagination, and one could see the restless, roving Indian or the Stephen Foster negro, or inhale the odor of limitless prairies according to one's fancy. The music is of the good, solid wearing kind, that will be the better when it has outlasted its explanatory title. A master hand only could have produced it, and it appeals to the heart as well as to the head. The Berlioz selections were interpreted with rare beauty, grace and spirit by Mr. Paur and his orchestra, and it was pleasant and instructive to have specimens of French and German genius on the same programme. As fashion has turned in his direction, it is now allowable to admire Berlioz without being considered odd or perverse, or of having the admiration taken as evidence of disrespect to the classic German composers.

The soloist of the evening was Miss Gertrude Stein, and she is an artist well worth the hearing. Her fine voice and fine method were heard with admirable effect in the Tschaikowsky selections which she sang in large, dignified style, and with impressive, passionate feeling. The "Rienzi" selections were sung with equal dramatic force, feeling and convincing power, and gave ample evidence that Miss Stein is an artist as well as a singer.

The programme for the next concert is Beethoven's Symphony No. 5, Indian Suite and Pianoforte Concerto No. 2, by Mr. E. A. MacDowell, who is also the soloist.

Boston Courier.
SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 28, 1897.

Vehemence predominated in the sixth symphony programme. Mrs. Beach's symphony, which had been promised, was withdrawn; and to make the measure good, Mr. Paur inserted instead of it, Dvorak's "From the New World," and four movements from the first Serenade of Brahm's opus 11. The opening allegro of this latter work is loud enough to wake up the whole block; and if all the six movements were performed, a midsummer night would be all too brief for them, as a witty woman remarked. That allegro and the adagio consumed nearly half an hour between them, and the former appeared as prolix as it was noisy, although the treatment was clear enough and often lightly interesting. The two little minuets, for clarinets, flute, bassoon and a few strings, were truly charming, and the rondo finale was thoroughly animated and entirely unreserved in speaking out its mind in vigorous phrases. The Dvorak symphony and the usual fairy dances and Rakoczy march, from "The Damnation of Faust," which ended the concert, are familiar enough, but commanded applause (especially the first) for the light thrown by the performance upon many minor points which we do not remember to have heard so brightly shown.

It was a hard programme for a singer to hold up against, for almost any single voice must sound weak and bodiless at first against the concluding clamors of Brahms and Dvorak. But Miss Stein has strength, resonancy, enthusiasm and ardor, and her composers were Tschaikowsky, in the scene from his "Maid of Orleans" wherein Joan bids farewell to her home, and Wagner, in Adriano's perturbed and excited scene from "Rienzi." The first of these is not only gloomy; it is labored and often overloaded with orchestration which usurps the place which Joan should occupy or surrounds her with an atmosphere quite afar from that of the peaceful joys and simple griefs of Domremy and its peasant maid. Miss Stein sang with earnestness, breadth and mastery, and indicated so decisively and directly the dramatic values of the scenes that one could readily comprehend how she has been sought for an operatic engagement in Germany.

The next programme will have a pronounced MacDowell flavor, as his Indian suite and his second pianoforte concerto will be played, with himself as the soloist. The only other composer admitted is Beethoven, with his fifth symphony.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, NOV. 28, 1897.
FORTY-FOUR PAGES.

Sixth Symphony Concert.

The orchestral numbers of the sixth symphony program comprised Brahms' serenade in D major, Dvorak's "New World" symphony and a minuet, waltz and the "Rakoczy" march from Berlioz' "Damnation of Faust." Miss Gertrude May Stein had for her solo numbers a recitative and aria from Tchaikovsky's "Maid of Orleans," and an excerpt from Wagner's opera "Rienzi." Brahms' serenade is less familiar to the general public than are his symphonies, and, although the former work is of a very elaborate nature, to many musicians the deviations from the symphonic form of writing does not necessitate a change from the title given to the latter style of compositions. Possibly a suggestion of dryness in some portions in the earlier movements makes the serenade uninteresting at times, but there are innumerable moments of great beauty in the work in which the composer's fancy is given scope unbiased by his somewhat severe methods of musical expression.

The intricate changes in rhythm in the first movement, the elaborate development of the final theme in the third part, the grotesque scoring of the fourth movement and the scherzo, trio and rondo of the later portions are beautiful examples of the master's conception and illustration, and these were most sympathetically interpreted by the orchestra. The conversations in the fourth movement were exquisite bits of detached instrumentation and the more somber themes were given with due impressiveness.

Miss Stein sang the Joan aria from "Maid of Orleans" very effectively and without an undue sentimentality in the pastoral apostrophes of the opening phrases. Her voice has a beautiful quality and the tones are rich and very true to pitch. The more dramatic Rienzi selection, although less pleasing in its general interpretation, was sung commendably. Miss Stein was most cordially received and her selections were greeted with hearty applause.

The "New World" symphony, by Dvorak, awakened a great deal of discussion when it was first performed, about four years ago, and an analysis of the composition is not necessary now. The orchestra performed the work skilfully and in the spirit intended by the writer and really made classic that which is known as negro melody. The minuet, waltz and march, by Berlioz, were played in a spirited vein, the Rakoczy musical fusilade being most vigorously presented.

Mr E. A. MacDowell will be the soloist this week. The program will comprise his "Indian Suite" and concerto No. 2, for pianoforte, and Beethoven's fifth symphony.

THE BOSTON TIMES
BOSTON, SUNDAY, NOV. 28, 1897.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. E. A. MacDowell will be the soloist at this week's Symphony rehearsal and concert in Music hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, and the programme will contain two of his compositions.

The programme will be:

Indian Suite.................E. A. MacDowell
Concerto for pianoforte, No. 2.........E. A. MacDowell
Symphony No. 5...........................Beethoven

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.
SUNDAY MORNING, NOVEMBER 28, 1897.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The sixth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given in Music Hall last evening. The orchestral selections were Brahms's Serenade in D, op. 11; Dvorak's Symphony No. 5, "From the New World," and the Rakoczy March, Minuet of Will-o'-the-Wisps, and Waltz of Sylphs, from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust." Miss Gertrude May Stein was the soloist. Her selections were a recitative and aria from Tschaikowsky's opera, "Maid of Orleans," and a scene and aria from Wagner's opera "Rienzi."

The Brahms' Serenade in D was given at a Symphony concert, under Mr. Henschel, in 1882. This is believed to be the only performance in Boston, previous to the one last evening. It is to all intent a new work to those who heard it. This serenade was one of the first compositions of Brahms' to be heard in England, and it practically introduced the serious side of this composer to us in this country. The work is rather long, and in five movements, of which four were played.

It is interesting as an example of Brahms's early style, and because our musical public is much better acquainted with the master's later compositions than with the earlier. Thus here is a chance for comparison. There is much to admire in all the movements, especially the first and fourth, and the finale is a spirited rondo. But it is undoubtedly true that many will be unable to find this serenade very enjoyable, for excellent reasons. It is more for the student of music than for the average listener. The performance was fully adequate in all respects, and the same can be said as to the performance of the Dvorak symphony. It seems to improve every time it is heard. The work is abundant in melody, brilliant as to coloring, and the ingenuity of the trained musician is always apparent. It is many-sided and may represent many things to those who listen to its performance. But the fact remains that there is a wonderful unity of spirit in the whole work, and there is a constant growth towards a powerful and logical conclusion.

The selections from the "Damnation of Faust" are excellent to hear, after a symphony, and Berlioz is at his best in such as these. And how beautifully they were played! Nothing could seem finer.

Miss Stein made a most favorable impression, and her singing was in all respects highly artistic and enjoyable. Recalls were numerous.

At the next rehearsal and concert, Mr. E. A. MacDowell will play his own concerto No. 2 for pianoforte and orchestra. His "Indian Suite" will also be performed, and, together with Beethoven's fifty symphony in C minor, these make up the programme.

The Boston Traveler
PUBLISHED BY THE
BOSTON TRAVELER CO.,
ORREY E. WARDNER, President.
MONDAY, NOVEMBER 29, 1897.

The Symphony.

eventeenth season Boston Symphony Orchestra; sixth concenrt. Miss Gertrude May Stein, soloist. The programme:

erenade No. 1, in D major, op. 11......Brahms ecitative, "Ja, So Will 's Gott!" Aria, "Lebt Wohl, Ihr Berge," from "Die Jungfrau von Orleans".......Tschaikowsky ymphony No. 5, in E minor, "From the New World"........................Dvorak cena, "Gerechter Gott!" Aria, "In Seiner Bluthe," from "Rienzi" ....Wagner enuet des Feu-Follets, Valse des Sylphes, Marche Hongroise, from "La Damnation de Faust"....................Berlioz

The Brahms serenade is over-long, but it has any moments of rare beauty and Brahmsesque elicacy and tenderness. It was read by Mr. Paur with his invariable sympathy with this composer, and played with the usual virtuosity. Miss Stein sang with a noble breadth and intelligence that shows her constant improvement n her art. The Teschaikowsky aria from his 'Maid of Orleans," is neither very striking nor ttractive. Nor is the weak aria of 'Rienzi" alculated to inspire any respect for the early Wagner. But both selections were admirably iven by Miss Stein.

The Dvorak "New World" symphony is as much a delight as ever, and is certain to go into the future as the composer's best large work. Whether it stands the test of "American" motives or not—and it does not in many respects—it is wonderfully melodious, beautifully orchestrated and interesting from start to finish. Its playing was superb.

The three selections from "The Damnation of Faust" proved anew what a consummate master of clear and telling orchestration was Berlioz. The most magnificent and exciting effects are obtained, but there is never a blur on the ear, never the slightest suspicion of muddiness in all the tumult. The "Waltz of the Sylphs" remains as the most airy and fantastic little piece of orchestral lace-work ever given to the world. The trio of gems was given marvellously.

WILDER D. QUINT.

Boston Transcript
MONDAY, NOVEMBER 29, 1897

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The programme of the sixth symphony concert, given in Music Hall last Saturday evening, was:

Brahms: Serenade No. 1, in D major, opus 11 (four movements).
Tchaikovsky: Recitative, "Ja, so will's Gott!" and aria, "Lebt wohl, ihr Berge," from "Die Jungfrau von Orleans."
Dvorak: Symphony No. 5, in E minor, "From the New World," opus 95.
Wagner: Scena, "Gerechter Gott!" and aria, "Im seiner Blüthe," from "Rienzi."
Berlioz:
a. Menuet des Feu-Follets, } From "La Damnation de Faust," opus 24.
b. Valse des Sylphes,
c. Marche Hongroise,
Miss Gertrude May Stein was the singer.

The most interesting programme of the season, so far, as it seemed to us; though perhaps a little over-long. What it would have been, had all six movements of the Brahms serenade been played, need not be calculated; and yet one wishes that this serenade might have been placed on a programme which would have admitted of its being given entire. So delightful a work had best not be dismembered, even though omitting a movement or two do not harm it so much as if it had been a symphony. The four movements given—Allegro molto; Adagio non-troppo; Menuetti I. and II.; Rondo, Allegro—were admirably read and played. If we mistake not, this serenade was the first orchestral work by Brahms ever played in Boston—way back in the old Harvard Musical days; it was then heard without any of the terror engendered by the C minor symphony a few years later. Now it sounds fresher and more beautiful than ever.

Dvorak's American symphony seems finer and finer, the more one hears it. When the work was first brought out here, a good deal in it seemed rather cheap and flimsy; but better acquaintance has revealed its true character as an intrinsically poetic work, full of imagination and containing much of exquisite musical beauty. We are not yet quite reconciled to a moment or two of quasi-inarticulate fury in the last movement, moments that seem musically ugly and merely theatrical in expression; but, for the most part, the symphony is singularly beautiful. It should be said, however, that the style of performance has greatly improved with each successive repetition; the playing last Saturday was as near perfection as could well be desired. It were hard to imagine the symphony being more finely and sympathetically read than it was by Mr. Paur on this occasion.

Berlioz's tricksy will-o'-the-wisp minuet, too, was admirably played and made a superb effect; how capitally the whole orchestra kept its head and heels while whistling that Presto burlesque of Méphisto's serenade! It is good to hear a genuine Presto once in a while. The Waltz of Sylphs, on the other hand, seemed to lack something of its native airy grace and winsomeness; and the Rakoczy March made hardly any effect. It was played all to nonchalantly!

Miss Stein showed herself as a dramatic singer of unusually high quality: She has voice, method, fire, and noble breadth of style. Here is a singer who has something to say to you, and something worth hearing! Moreover, she has a certain large dignity of expressiveness that is essentially tragic, far removed from the more everyday passionateness of most singers of "temperament" today. It was this breadth of style and nobility of feeling that saved the Tchaikovsky aria from seeming wholly commonplace and unworthy of the text—which latter is only so far altered from Schiller's as to make it fit the music, originally written to Russian words.

There is a good deal to like in Adriano's aria in "Rienza;" the melodic pharse has a distinction not too often found in Wagner's earlier works. That stroke, too, of leading back to the return of the theme in the tonic (G major) by a ritornello on the same phrase in B-flat major is not devoid of subtlety. However well Wagner's cuts in the aria—made after the first performances of the opera in Dresden—are calculated to improve it as a scene in the opera, it seems to us that one of them weakens it as a concert-piece. The original closing vivace movement may be thought conventional and commonplace, but it does bring the whole aria to a well-prepared and stirring musical close. Omitting this movement, and letting the aria end after the Maestoso, brings it to one of those "quick exit" conclusions which are particularly dangerous in dramatic concert arias. The well-nigh countless failure on the part of admirable singers to make the close of Bethoven's "Ah! perfido!" effective are good earnest of this danger. Wagner's aria, as it now stands, seems to us quite as perilous; unless you can see Adriano rush bodily off the stage after the last "Mein heilig Amt!" the sudden ending has no sense. Miss Stein sang the aria superbly, in a way to show forth its full meaning. She was warmly applauded and recalled after both her selections.

The next programme is: MacDowell, suite No. 2, in E minor, "Indian," opus 48; McDowell, pianoforte concerto No. 2; Beethoven, symphony No. 5, in C minor, opus 67. Mr. Edward MacDowell will be the pianist.

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL
THURSDAY, DECEMBER 2, 1897.

Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was heard in Infantry Hall last evening for the second time this season. There was another large and enthusiastic audience. It seems good to see the hall well filled at the concerts of this unequalled organization. Many new faces are to be seen in the audience this season, while the old guard, faithful through so many years, is always in evidence. The applause is cordial and spontaneous and nearly always discriminating, showing that the bulk of the listeners are there for the music's sake and not merely because it is the correct thing to go to the Symphony concert. Last night there was no special drawing card in the shape of renowned prima donna or world-famous solo player, but the audience was as large, if indeed not larger, than usual, and at one point a most determined effort was made to get that unprocurable thing at a Symphony concert, an encore. The programme included the following numbers:

Symphony No. 5, in E minor, "From the New World," op. 95........Antonin Dvorak
I. Adagio (E minor).
Allegro molto (E minor).
II. Largo (D-flat major).
III. Scherzo: Molto vivace (E minor).
IV. Allegro con fuoco (E minor).
Two movements from Concerto for violin, in E minor, op. 64. Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy
II. Andante (C major).
III. Allegretto non troppo (E minor).
Allegro molto vivace (E major).
a. Minuet of Will-o'-the-Wisps.
b. Waltz of Sylphs.
c. Rakoczy March.
From "The Damnation of Faust," op. 24.. ....Hector Berlioz
Italian Capriccio, for orchestra, op. 45..... ....Peter Tchaikovsky
(First time.)

The programme must be called a modern one, for neither Mendelssohn or Berlioz, though men of a couple of generations ago, are far enough away from us in point of time to be ranked among the elders, even if the style of their music would admit of any different classification. But a "modern" programme may be made to present almost any desired degree of contrast, as was conclusively shown in the numbers played last night.

Dvorak's symphony "From the New World" is a work that was written for a purpose. The endless discussion aroused at its first production four years ago has left no one interested in musical affairs ignorant as to what that purpose was. Dr. Dvorak proposed to show American composers that they were in error in thinking that this country offered nothing in the way of characteristic thematic material. After a diligent comparison of popular ballads, Indian and negro melodies, he fixed upon the latter as—or, at least, as the nearest approach to—the American folk-song, and wrote this symphony to illustrate and justify his choice. The listener who, possessed of this much information, goes to hear this work expecting to recognize the familiar strains of the "Suwannee River" or "Old Black Joe," is doomed to disappointment. For, in spite of the fact that these and similar songs are popularly supposed to be negro melodies, they are nothing of the sort. They are only psuedo-negro tunes, brought into vogue by the old-time popular "nigger minstrel" troupes, and no nearer the real article than the burnt-corked faces of their authors.

Dvorak went to the Southern plantations for his themes, which are in kind like unto the weird melodies sung through the North by the various bands of "Jubilee singers." Almost without exception they are based on a sort of pentatonic scale, and in no case do they conform to the modern style of tonality. They are characteristic enough, there is no doubt of that, but of what? Dvorak says of America, because he found them here, but it will take more than the fiat of a composer, however great, to make this a fact. Really they are no more characteristic of America than they are of Africa, or Norway, or Ireland, or Wales, where their counterparts can readily be found either in present use or in the ancient and traditionally preserved melodies. The discussion thus provoked is practically without end.

Of more present interest is the question of what Dvorak did with his thematic material after he procured it. Anything from the pen of the great Bohemian composer is entitled to respectful consideration. But it must be owned that the symphony, as a whole, bears the ear-marks of its educational purpose. It was written to order and cannot help showing it. Moreover, the themes seem puerile when forced upon the attention by constant repetition and the process of "working out." They do not fit easily into the clothes with which modern tonality and instrumentation invest them. The most interesting number of the symphony is the scherzo, which is bright and full of originality, and at the same time presents almost nothing of the peculiar "American" flavor so painstakingly imparted to the other movements. The work, as a whole, is characterized by the forceful and original genius of the greatest living composer, but it is not spontaneous.

The charming music from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust" was given with wonderful brilliancy and delicacy of execution. It was here that the attempt to coax an encore from Mr. Paur was made. The final number by Tchaikovsky, the novelty of the programme, was in that composer's familiar style, highly colored as to instrumentation and full of broad and striking contrast. It was enjoyable and superbly played by the band, as indeed was the whole programme.

The soloist was Mr. Isador Schnitzler, one of the first violins of the orchestra and a most excellent player. He gave a brilliant rendering of Mendelssohn's familiar work, showing finished technical ability and artistic sense. He was loudly and deservedly applauded.

The next concert of the Symphony series will be given on Wednesday evening, Dec. 29.

THE WASHINGTON POST
SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 7,

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

An Enjoyable Programme Announced for Next Tuesday's Concert.

It has grown to be an accepted fact in the cities visited by the Boston Symphony Orchestra that the lovers of the best in music are largely dependent upon this organization. Everybody interested in the success of these concerts will be in attendance at the Lafayette Square Opera House next Tuesday afternoon at 4:15 o'clock, when the following attractive programme will be rendered:

Brahms.............................Academic overture
Schumann....................Concerto for pianoforte
Haydn.............. ....
Symphony in C major, "L'Ours" ("The Bear.")
(First time at these concerts.)
Chabrier........Rhapsody, for orchestra, "Espana."
(First time at these concerts.)
Weber.....................'Invitation to the Dance'
Arranged for orchestra by Felix Weingartner.
(First time at these concerts.)

This list of works to be performed appeals to the devotees of both the old and new schools in music. For old masters we have Schumann and Haydn, and for new, Brahms, Chabrier, and Weber. Although there is among the majority of the patrons of the orchestra everywhere a sentiment, which of late years has grown almost to a conviction, that, after all, the orchestra is the attraction, still the management cater to all tastes by furnishing soloists in every way worthy to appear with this organization. Of Mr. Joseffy and his faultless rendering of the Schumann concerto, nothing further need be said. Those inclined to criticise the average programme as ultra classic will rejoice in the fact that the last two numbers on the programme are waltzes, orchestrated and elaborated to an extent to make them worthy of an appearance on a Symphony programme. Chabrier's beautiful rhapsody for orchestra, "Espana," will readily be recognized by a majority of the patrons of these concerts, although the prediction is ventured that such a rendering of the familiar melody they had never heard before. Those who recall Weber's exquisite "Invitation to the Dance," with its charming orchestration by Berlioz, which was played at these concerts last year, will have an excellent opportunity to hear the same beautiful theme orchestrated in an entirely unique and brilliant manner by Weingartner, who ranks to-day as one of the leading orchestral conductors in Europe.

Season tickets for the five matinees and single tickets for the first matinee, next Tuesday afternoon, are now on sale at the box office of the Lafayette Square Opera House.

E WASHINGTON POST,

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The First Concert of the Season to Be Given Next Tuesday Afternoon.

Next Tuesday afternoon at the Lafayette Square Opera House the Boston Symphony Orchestra begins its thirteenth season in this city.

The usual method at all theaters is to book an attraction for less than a week or more, and local managers are disinclined to break a week by giving even such a strong organization as the Boston Symphony Orchestra a single night. This fact and the lack of a suitable audience room in this city outside the theaters will explain the selection of matinees instead of evenings. In deference to the large patronage from the government departments the hour for beginning the concerts has been fixed at a quarter past 4. So many evenings are taken up by the social requirements of a Washington season, it is hoped by the management that the selection of matinees will prove acceptable to a majority of the patrons.

The concert next Tuesday afternoon will be 1,511th performance by the orchestra, and the fifty-third in Washington. This enormous number of concerts in sixteen years will go far toward explaining the almost perfect ensemble of this now famous organization. Everybody interested in the cause of good music will be gratified to learn of the orchestra's promising outlook for the season, not only at home, but in every city visited, and notably in Philadelphia, where, in the Academy of Music, seating over 3,000 people, less than fifty seats remained unsold for the season. This is probably the most phenomenal sale of season tickets ever known in Philadelphia. It is interesting to note that the programme of the first concert, which will be shortly announced, contains three selections which will have their first performance in this city. Joseffy will be the soloist.

THE NEWS.
DAILY AND WEEKLY.
Providence, Rhode Island.
WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 1, 1897.

The Symphony Concert.

The second concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will delight a large audience in Infantry hall this evening, because the program will provoke the full vigor of the superb orchestra. It will include:

Dvorak—Symphony No. 5, "From the New World."

Mendelssohn—Two movements from Concerto for violin.

Berlioz—(a) Minuet of Will-o'-the-Wisps, (b) Waltz of Sylphs. (c) Rakoczy March, from "The Damnation of Faust."

Tchaikovsky—Italian Capriccio, for orchestra (first time).

"From the New World" made a deep impression when it was heard at a symphony concert a couple of years ago, and it will come like a welcome friend this evening. The Italian Capriccio, which will be heard for the first time here, will also be a charming addition to memory and call to mind its gifted composer, but recently dead. The soloist for the evening will be Mr. I. Schnitzler, one of the first violinists of the orchestra, who is regarded as a powerful and brilliant artist. Altogether the concert promises to be a rare musical treat.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 1, 1897.

The program of the sixth Symphony concert, given last night in Music Hall, was as follows:

Serenade No. 1, in D major, op. 11 .... Brahms
Recitative, Ja, so will 's Gott! and aria, Lebt wohl, ihr Berge, from Die Jungfrau von Orleans .... Tschaikowsky
Symphony No. 5, in E minor, From the New World, op. 95 ... Dvorák
Scena, Gerechter Gott! and aria, In seiner Blüthe, from Rienzi .... Wagner
Menuet des Feu-Follets ..
Valse des Sylphes .... } La Damnation de Faust .... Berlioz
Marche Hongroise ......

Miss Gertrude May Stein sang for the first time at a Symphony concert in Boston; and the Tschaikowsky aria was a novelty. I admired the singer more than the aria, although the latter would no doubt gain if it were heard in its proper place. The opera was not a success when it was performed at St. Petersburg, February 23, 1881, and Nicholas Rubinstein said that he considered it a retrogade step from such works as "Vakoula" and "Eugene Onegin." "He believed that he saw in it a desire to win the public favor, and added that a mediocre talent might succeed in this respect, but Tschaikowsky—never." And yet the composer was mightily interested in the story of the famous hysterical maiden who dreamed dreams and saw visions, and when he was in Paris in 1878 he studied the books of French writers concerning her.

* * *

I tried to remember any opera entitled Joan of Arc that won great renown; or any scena or orchestral piece suggested by her that is world famous. No composer has apparently struck twelve with this name. Dear Lord, as Vance Thompson would say, the material! Here is an incomplete catalogue:

OPERAS.

"Giovanna d'Arco," by Andreozzi, Vicenza, 1789.

"Jeanne d'Arc à Orleans," by Rudolph Kreutzer, Paris, May 10, 1790. His first opera.

"Mädchen von Orleans," Volckert, Vienna, 1817.

"Jeanne d'Arc à Orleans," Carafa, Paris Opéra Comique, March 10, 1821.

"Giovanna d'Arco," Vaccai, Venice, 1827.

"Giovanna d'Arco," Pacini, Milan, March 14, 1830. Meric-Lalande was the heroine. Rubini and Tamburini were in the cast. The verdict was " Mediocre."

"Joan of Arc," Balfe, London, November 30, 1837, dedicated to Queen Victoria. "It was too high above the heads of the public, and they did not care to crane their necks in a position uncomfortable to themselves to admire beauties beyond their comprehension," and the honey-daubing biographer quotes this wise-ass opinion with the air of a man conferring a favor. Miss Romer was the leading woman.

"Johanna d'Arc," Hoven (pseudonym for von Püttlingen), Vienna, December 30, 1840. Hasselt was the heroine. The opera found an enthusiastic reception at Dresden in 1845.

"Giovanna d'Arco," Verdi, Milan, February 15, 1845. Erminia Frezzolini was the heroine. " In the flower of her springtime she was the ideal creature to impersonate in her physical and moral purity the chaste heroine of Vaucouleurs." After her voice failed her, Verdi was loath to allow performance of the opera. Adelina Patti sang the part in Paris for the first time there March 28, 1868. It was not a success. Verdi afterward put the overture as prelude to "The Sicilian Vespers," and again he used it in "Aroldo." In Palermo, in 1847, the censor would not allow the title or the story of the heroine, who became a compatriot of Sappho, and the piece was called "Orietta di Lesbo." In Paris there was a howl against "the slandering of patriotism." A few days after the first performance mentioned above the Maiden's Tower, that had stood for 400 years at Compiègne, fell suddenly with a mighty crash.

"Jungfrau von Orleans," Langert, Coburg, December 25, 1860.

"Jean d'Arc," Duprez, October 24, 1865, with Miss Brunetti as the heroine. The first performance was really October 12, but Miss Brunetti was taken sick, and the curtain was rung down. The undertaking cost the composer over 60,000 frs. For a dismal account of a dismal failure see his "Souvenirs d'un Chanteur," pp. 228 to 234.

"Jeanne d'Arc," Mermet, April 5, 1876, Paris Opéra, with Krauss as the heroine, Faure as the King and Salomon as Gaston de Metz.

The opera of Tschaikowsky above mentioned.

"Jungfrau von Orleans," Reznicek, Prague, June 19, 1887.

* * *

CANTATAS, &C.

"Jeanne d'Arc," lyric scene in two parts, by Beaulieu, Paris, 1853.

"Johanna d'Arc," for solo voices, chorus, orchestra, by Louis Lee, Hamburg, 1860.

"Joan of Arc," cantata by A. R. Gaul, Birmingham, 1887.

"Jeanne d'Arc," lyric scene, by Gaston Serpette, Paris, performed at the Opéra November 24, 1871. The composer won the Prix de Rome by this piece.

"Jeanne d'Arc," cantata, by Charles Poisot, Paris, Salle Erard, May 3, 1874.

"Jeanne d'Arc à Rouen," aria, by Luigi Bordese, sung at a Philharmonic concert, New York, April 23, 1853, by Rosa Jaques.

"La Vision de Jeanne d'Arc," aria, by Luigi Bordese.

"Mort de Jeanne d'Arc," by H. Bemberg, composed in 1887.

"Jeanne d'Arc," by Louis Lacombe, composed for a festival at Orleans, but not performed there.

* * *

BALLETS.

Reeve (London, 1798), Brambilla, Lichenthal and Vigano (Milan, August 15, 1821), Gallenberg (Vienna, February, 1821).

* * *

THEATRE MUSIC.

Schiller's "Jungfrau von Orleans," music by B. A. Weber (Berlin, November 23, 1801, for orchestra and chorus); Franz Destouches (Weimar, April 23, 1803, score lost in the burning of the theatre in 1825, the farewell monologue, "Lebt wohl, ihr Berge," was published in 1810); G. A. Schneider (Berlin, 1825, still used in the Berlin Theatre in 1886); Max Seifriz (Stuttgart, May 15, 1872, for grand orchestra, highly praised); Leopold Damrosch (Weimar, March 26, 1857); Max Bruch (Cologne, April 4, 1859, unpublished); J. A. Södermann (written for the Swedish version, "Orleanska Jungfrun;" the overture and the coronation march enjoy a concert life).

"Jeanne d'Arc," drama, by Jules Barbier, music by Gounod, Paris, Gaité, November 8, 1873. The music of the Page was sung by Miss Perret. Offenbach was the conductor. The partition includes orchestral pieces, choruses, a ballet, two songs. The air of the Page is in imitation of an ancient tune. In the second act fragments of the "Marseillaise," "Chant du Depart," "Chant des Girondins," are introduced patriotically and anachronously. This music, revived January 3, 1890, for performance at the Porte Saint-Martin, with Sarah Bernhardt as La Pucelle, was written in England and dedicated to Henry and Georgina Weldon.

"Jeanne d'Arc," drama by Faber, music by Godard, Paris, Châtelet, January 27, 1891. Music for solo voices, chorus and orchestra. Godard looked upon Joan as the visionary rather than the heroine. An Angelus was accompanied by a bell whose tone made a part of all the harmonies. The ballad of Jean Renaud was introduced. Godard sought to preserve the mediæval thought in modern expression.

"Jeanne d'Arc," pantomime at the Hippodrome, Paris, June 25, 1890, music by Widor. "Musique hippique!" Pastorale, vision, ballet under the walls of Orléans, the Execution. Typical melodies sound in the heroine's ears while she marches to the stake. Patriotic hymn for finale, which is sung about the statue of Joan, which rises suddenly from the flames.

* * *

ORCHESTRAL MUSIC.

"Johanna d'Arc," symphonic poem by Moszkowsky, op. 19, first performed at Berlin, February 23, 1877, under Mannstädt.

Symphonic illustrations to Schiller's play by Hermann Thadewalt, first performed at Dresden March 13, 1886, under the leadership of the composer.

Symphonic Poem, by Paul Vidal, Paris, at a Colonne concert, January 25, 1891.

Overture in D minor, by Karl Wagner, composed in the early twenties at Darmstadt.

Overture, by Moscheles, first performed at London in 1835, under the leadership of the composer.

Overture, by Joseph Klein, first performed under Heinrich Dorn, at Cologne, 1843-4.

Overture, by H. H. Pierson, performed about 1870 at Leipsic.

Overture in F major, by Gustav Strube, dedicated to Emil Paur, and first performed in Boston by the Symphony Orchestra February 16, 1895.

"Vision de Jeanne d'Arc," for solo violin and orchestra, by Gounod. Written for the centenary at Rheims in 1885, and dedicated to Marteau.

* * *

MISCELLANEOUS.

"Messe à la Mémoire de Jeanne d'Arc," for solo voices, chorus, organ, eight trumpets, three trombones, harps. No credo. Rheims, July, 1887.

"Die Jungfrau son Orleans," piano sonata, by Sterndale Bennett, A flat major, op. 46. Published in 1876 by Kistner.

Coronation march by H. Geisler (four hands, 1825); Franz Mair (four hands 1867); Von Dertzen (two hands).

Joan's farewell monologue "Lebt Wohl, ihr Berge," has been set to music by Zumsteeg (composed in January, 1802; finished by Winzingerode); J. F. Reichardt; J. H. C. Bornhardt (with guitar); Von Wickede.

The Coronation monologue "Die Waffen ruhn" has been set to music by C. Schulz (1801), J. F. Reichardt, Andreas Romberg (1810, with orchestra).

* * *

I have no doubt that there are many other works which were inspired by Joan. I shall thank anyone for supplementary information. I do not believe so full a list has been drawn up before this, and now that I have ransacked shelves and bored men of statistical minds I begin to think the game was not worth the candle.

* * *

Miss Stein gave great pleasure by the luscious richness and surprising range of her voice, the strength of her interpretation and the ease of her technic. Her growth has been a steady one ever since she was a choir singer in Albany nobly discontented. She has won her success honorably and righteously.

* * *

It is my impression that the serenade of Brahms has not been played here since the reign of Gericke. Last night the two scherzos were omitted. I was prepared to find the work dull, not because I am "agin" Brahms on general principles, but I recollected the criticisms passed on the work by Herbeck, who led it when it was first produced in Vienna. I found much to admire, and I found the menueto, or rather the brace of menuets, of surpassing beauty in their unaffected simplicity.

Seldom has this orchestra been heard in a higher state of tonal beauty and splendor than last night in Dvorák's "Congo Symphony." I understand that the work was played without rehearsal. This fact may account for the supreme excellence of the performance. More and more am I convinced that Dvorák wrote the slow movement after seeing "Uncle Tom's Cabin" or Milt G. Barlowe "in his great impersonation of the aged contraband." Mr. Paur and the orchestra should use burnt cork at the next performance of this pleasing work. PHILIP HALE.

THE NEWS.
DAILY AND WEEKLY.
Providence, Rhode Island.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 2, 1897.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Brilliant Audience Listened With Unfeigned Delight.

Dvorak's Symphony "From the New World," Arlis ically Rendered.

The second concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry hall last evening attracted the usual brilliant audience of music lovers who listened with unfeigned delight to the following program embracing considerable of what is termed modern or new music:

Antonin Dvorak, Symphony No. 5, in E minor, "From the New World," Op. 95.
I. Adagio (E minor)
Allegro molto (E minor)
II. Largo (D-flat major)
III. Scherzo; Molto vivace (E minor)
IV. Aellgro con fuoco (E minor)
Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, two movements from Concerto for violin, in E minor, Op. 64.
II. Andantee (C major)
III. Allegretto non troppo (E minor)
Allegro molto vivace (E major)
Hector Berlioz, a. Minuet of Will-o'-the-Wisps, b. Waltz of Sylphs, c. Rakokczy March, from "The Damnation of Faust," Op. 24; Peter Tchaikovsky, Italian Capriccio, for orchestrr, Op. 45.

The beauty of the new is that it once was old. Perhaps this might be applied to Dvorak's Symphony which began the concert. The Bohemian composer, admitted to be the greatest now living, when he came to this country to direct the energies of the National Conservatory of Music in New York, had something to say about the possibilities for characteristic music in the new world, and to the reviewers he imparted his secret, which was to the effect that plantation melodies of the South were the hope of the new music, especially in North America.

This excited a great deal of comment and it was pointed out that so-called plantation melodies were not the product of the negro but an evolution, an output of white man's brains who blacked up to entertain the public with characteristics of the colored man in slavery days. This was undoubtedly true and the composer's mistake was a natural one because the European, the modern composer, had absorbed the idea that the weird melodies emanated from the darkey "way down in Dixey."

Uncouth tourists, suddenly rich, from the west, running over the old country, maintained the impression that the people of this country were still Indians, and Americans abroad, who knew better, constantly came in contact with Europeans who believed that the inhabitants of the United States were yet buffalo hunters and strutted about in war paint and feathers. Of course, they were on the wrong scent.

The greater composer, however, stuck to his original idea and the symphony was written in the summer of 1893, not a great while after he had established himself in this country. It is maintained that its thematic material is made up largely of negro melodies from Southern plantations, but the work does not suggest this to trained ears. There is really no lingering recollection of "Way Down in Dixey" and the Southern darkey is not suggested in the symphony with anything like the vigor that he is presented in the present popular wave of "coon" song strikingly represented by "I Love Yer, Ma Honey, Yes I Do," and Ther're Other Coons as Warm as You."

The symphony, however, does strongly suggest "Yankee Doodle" with variations in the scherzo movement, which by the way is the most interesting part of the work. Dvorak went deeper in his task than the accepted scheme of plantation melodies, commonly understood, and produced music that would stand for any country. Of course, it is good music, but it does not represent the highest type, even considering the purpose of the composer to be original, a mark he did not attain in this symphony. In the hands of a musical band of the best standard, forgetting the pinnacle of art and skill attained by the matchless Boston organization, "From the New World" would prove tiresome because of its repetition. It may be said in passing, that anything worthy, or unworthy for that matter, of a place on the program presented by this company of artists, would be interesting and instructive whether from tone or visual music. The native symphony, for so it may be called because it was written in America, especially for Americans, was superbly played by the much beloved orchestra and it won its share of admiration and praise from the fine and discriminating audience.

The selections from Berlioz "The Damnation of Faust," were more familiar and they were rendered in top-notch method. It is the most popular of the works by this brilliant master and that fact stands unquestioned at the present time. It was first presented in Paris in 1846 and it was not considered a success. Subsequently its originality and beauty impressed the world and while there may be a few objectors the musical verdict is that its place has been fairly won. The impressive characteristic of this work is brightness against a background of darkness and the contrast is charming. The characterists were wonderfully illuminated by the orchestra, and the dainty waltz was rendered so beautifully that the enthusiasm of the audience came near getting a repetition of the number. Conductor Paur, who appeared to be much pleased, bowed half a dozen times and then went on with the final orchestral number.

The Tchaikovsky Italian Capriccio, heard for the first time in this city, excited considerable interest, first because it was new and second because of the author who is much admired by the general music public. There was no disappointment because the new work was in the composer's most characteristic vein, brilliant as to color and impressively striking in wonderful contrasts. It required the skill of musicians of the first rank to convey its full power and it was rendered magnificently. That peculiar feeling, mutely saying, this is the best that can possibly be done, touched every one.

Mr. I. Schnitzler, the soloist and a member of the first violin energy of the orchestra, demonstrated that he was a violinist of great capacity and he rendered Mendelssohn's familiar concerto with beautiful effect. The third movement which is exceedingly elaborate and brilliant was played with remarkable precision and skill and the player appeared to be master of his instrument and his work.

The next musical banquet by the Boston Symphony orchestra will take place in Infantry hall, Wednesday evening, December 29. This will make two concerts in December. If they came every week the pleasure of a large number of citizens would be materially increased.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 1, 1897.

The program of the sixth Symphony concert, given last night in Music Hall, was as follows:

Serenade No. 1, in D major, op. 11....................Brahms
Recitative, Ja, so will 's Gott! and aria, Lebt wohl, ihr Berge, from Die Jungfrau von Orleans..........Tschaikowsky
Symphony No. 5, in E minor, From the New World, op. 95...Dvorák
Scena, Gerechter Gott! and aria, In seiner Blüthe, from Rienzi....................Wagner
Menuet des Feu-Follets.. }
Valse des Sylphes........ } La Damnation de Faust..........Berlioz
Marche Hongroise....... }

Miss Gertrude May Stein sang for the first time at a Symphony concert in Boston; and the Tschaikowsky aria was a novelty. I admired the singer more than the aria, although the latter would no doubt gain if it were heard in its proper place. The opera was not a success when it was performed at St. Petersburg, February 23, 1881, and Nicholas Rubinstein said that he considered it a retrogade step from such works as "Vakoula" and "Eugene Onegin." "He believed that he saw in it a desire to win the public favor, and added that a mediocre talent might succeed in this respect, but Tschaikowsky—never." And yet the composer was mightily interested in the story of the famous hysterical maiden who dreamed dreams and saw visions, and when he was in Paris in 1878 he studied the books of French writers concerning her.

* * *

I tried to remember any opera entitled Joan of Arc that won great renown; or any scena or orchestral piece suggested by her that is world famous. No composer has apparently struck twelve with this name. Dear Lord, as Vance Thompson would say, the material! Here is an incomplete catalogue:

OPERAS.

"Giovanna d'Arco," by Andreozzi, Vicenza, 1789.

"Jeanne d'Arc à Orleans," by Rudolph Kreutzer, Paris, May 10, 1790. His first opera.

"Mädchen von Orleans," Volckert, Vienna, 1817.

"Jeanne d'Arc à Orleans," Carafa, Paris Opéra Comique, March 10, 1821.

"Giovanna d'Arco," Vaccai, Venice, 1827.

"Giovanna d'Arco," Pacini, Milan, March 14, 1830. Meric-Lalande was the heroine. Rubini and Tamburini were in the cast. The verdict was "Mediocre."

"Joan of Arc," Balfe, London, November 30, 1837, dedicated to Queen Victoria. "It was too high above the heads of the public, and they did not care to crane their necks in a position uncomfortable to themselves to admire beauties beyond their comprehension," and the honey-daubing biographer quotes this wise-ass opinion with the air of a man conferring a favor. Miss Romer was the leading woman.

"Johanna d'Arc," Hoven (pseudonym for von Püttlingen), Vienna, December 30, 1840. Hasselt was the heroine. The opera found an enthusiastic reception at Dresden in 1845.

"Giovanna d'Arco," Verdi, Milan, February 15, 1845. Erminia Frezzolini was the heroine. "In the flower of her springtime she was the ideal creature to impersonate in her physical and moral purity the chaste heroine of Vaucouleurs." After her voice failed her, Verdi was loath to allow performance of the opera. Adelina Patti sang the part in Paris for the first time there March 28, 1868. It was not a success. Verdi afterward put the overture as prelude to "The Sicilian Vespers," and again he used it in "Aroldo." In Palermo, in 1847, the censor would not allow the title or the story of the heroine, who became a compatriot of Sappho, and the piece was called "Orietta di Lesbo." In Paris there was a howl against "the slandering of patriotism." A few days after the first performance mentioned above the Maiden's Tower, that had stood for 400 years at Compiègne, fell suddenly with a mighty crash.

"Jungfrau von Orleans," Langert, Coburg, December 25, 1860.

"Jean d'Arc," Duprez, October 24, 1865, with Miss Brunetti as the heroine. The first performance was really October 12, but Miss Brunetti was taken sick, and the curtain was rung down. The undertaking cost the composer over 60,000 frs. For a dismal account of a dismal failure see his "Souvenirs d'un Chanteur," pp. 228 to 234.

"Jeanne d'Arc," Mermet, April 5, 1876, Paris Opéra, with Krauss as the heroine, Faure as the King and Salomon as Gaston de Metz.

The opera of Tschaikowsky above mentioned.

"Jungfrau von Orleans," Reznicek, Prague, June 19, 1887.

* * *

CANTATAS, &c.

"Jeanne d'Arc," lyric scene in two parts, by Beaulieu, Paris, 1853.

"Johanna d'Arc," for solo voices, chorus, orchestra, by Louis Lee, Hamburg, 1860.

"Joan of Arc," cantata by A. R. Gaul, Birmingham, 1887.

"Jeanne d'Arc," lyric scene, by Gaston Serpette, Paris, performed at the Opéra November 24, 1871. The composer won the Prix de Rome by this piece.

"Jeanne d'Arc," cantata, by Charles Poisot, Paris, Salle Erard, May 3, 1874.

"Jeanne d'Arc à Rouen," aria, by Luigi Bordese, sung at a Philharmonic concert, New York, April 23, 1853, by Rosa Jaques.

"La Vision de Jeanne d'Arc," aria, by Luigi Bordese.

"Mort de Jeanne d'Arc," by H. Bemberg, composed in 1887.

"Jeanne d'Arc," by Louis Lacombe, composed for a festival at Orleans, but not performed there.

* * *

BALLETS.

Reeve (London, 1798), Brambilla, Lichenthal and Vigano (Milan, August 15, 1821), Gallenberg (Vienna, February, 1821).

* * *

THEATRE MUSIC.

Schiller's "Jungfrau von Orleans," music by B. A. Weber (Berlin, November 23, 1801, for orchestra and chorus); Franz Destouches (Weimar, April 23, 1803, score lost in the burning of the theatre in 1825, the farewell monologue, "Lebt wohl, ihr Berge," was published in 1810); G. A. Schneider (Berlin, 1825, still used in the Berlin Theatre in 1886); Max Seifriz (Stuttgart, May 15, 1872, for grand orchestra, highly praised); Leopold Damrosch (Weimar, March 26, 1857); Max Bruch (Cologne, April 4, 1859, unpublished); J. A. Södermann (written for the Swedish version, "Orleanska Jungfrun;" the overture and the coronation march enjoy a concert life).

"Jeanne d'Arc," drama, by Jules Barbier, music by Gounod, Paris, Gaité, November 8, 1873. The music of the Page was sung by Miss Perret. Offenbach was the conductor. The partition includes orchestral pieces, choruses, a ballet, two songs. The air of the Page is in imitation of an ancient tune. In the second act fragments of the "Marseillaise," "Chant du Depart," "Chant des Girondins," are introduced patriotically and anachronously. This music, revived January 3, 1890, for performance at the Porte Saint-Martin, with Sarah Bernhardt as La Pucelle, was written in England and dedicated to Henry and Georgina Weldon.

"Jeanne d'Arc," drama by Faber, music by Godard, Paris, Châtelet, January 27, 1891. Music for solo voices, chorus and orchestra. Godard looked upon Joan as the visionary rather than the heroine. An Angelus was accompanied by a bell whose tone made a part of all the harmonies. The ballad of Jean Renaud was introduced. Godard sought to preserve the mediæval thought in modern expression.

"Jeanne d'Arc," pantomime at the Hippodrome, Paris, June 25, 1890, music by Widor. "Musique hippique!" Pastorale, vision, ballet under the walls of Orléans, the Execution. Typical melodies sound in the heroine's ears while she marches to the stake. Patriotic hymn for finale, which is sung about the statue of Joan, which rises suddenly from the flames.

* * *

ORCHESTRAL MUSIC.

"Johanna d'Arc," symphonic poem by Moszkowsky, op. 19, first performed at Berlin, February 23, 1877, under Mannstädt.

Symphonic illustrations to Schiller's play by Hermann Thadewalt, first performed at Dresden March 13, 1886, under the leadership of the composer.

Symphonic Poem, by Paul Vidal, Paris, at a Colonne concert, January 25, 1891.

Overture in D minor, by Karl Wagner, composed in the early twenties at Darmstadt.

Overture, by Moscheles, first performed at London in 1835, under the leadership of the composer.

Overture, by Joseph Klein, first performed under Heinrich Dorn, at Cologne, 1843-4.

Overture, by H. H. Pierson, performed about 1870 at Leipsic.

Overture in F major, by Gustav Strube, dedicated to Emil Paur, and first performed in Boston by the Symphony Orchestra February 16, 1895.

"Vision de Jeanne d'Arc," for solo violin and orchestra, by Gounod. Written for the centenary at Rheims in 1885, and dedicated to Marteau.

* * *

MISCELLANEOUS.

"Messe à la Mémoire de Jeanne d'Arc," for solo voices, chorus, organ, eight trumpets, three trombones, harps. No credo. Rheims, July, 1887.

"Die Jungfrau son Orleans," piano sonata, by Sterndale Bennett, A flat major, op. 46. Published in 1876 by Kistner.

Coronation march by H. Geisler (four hands, 1825); Franz Mair (four hands 1867); Von Dertzen (two hands).

Joan's farewell monologue "Lebt Wohl, ihr Berge," has been set to music by Zumsteeg (composed in January, 1802; finished by Winzingerode); J. F. Reichardt; J. H. C. Bornhardt (with guitar); Von Wickede.

The Coronation monologue "Die Waffen ruhn" has been set to music by C. Schulz (1801), J. F. Reichardt, Andreas Romberg (1810, with orchestra).

* * *

I have no doubt that there are many other works which were inspired by Joan. I shall thank anyone for supplementary information. I do not believe so full a list has been drawn up before this, and now that I have ransacked shelves and bored men of statistical minds I begin to think the game was not worth the candle.

* * *

Miss Stein gave great pleasure by the luscious richness and surprising range of her voice, the strength of her interpretation and the ease of her technic. Her growth has been a steady one ever since she was a choir singer in Albany nobly discontented. She has won her success honorably and righteously.

* * *

It is my impression that the serenade of Brahms has not been played here since the reign of Gericke. Last night the two scherzos were omitted. I was prepared to find the work dull, not because I am "agin" Brahms on general principles, but I recollected the criticisms passed on the work by Herbeck, who led it when it was first produced in Vienna. I found much to admire, and I found the menueto, or rather the brace of menuets, of surpassing beauty in their unaffected simplicity.

Seldom has this orchestra been heard in a higher state of tonal beauty and splendor than last night in Dvorák's "Congo Symphony." I understand that the work was played without rehearsal. This fact may account for the supreme excellence of the performance. More and more am I convinced that Dvorák wrote the slow movement after seeing "Uncle Tom's Cabin" or Milt G. Barlowe "in his great impersonation of the aged contraband." Mr. Paur and the orchestra should use burnt cork at the next performance of this pleasing work. PHILIP HALE.

THE NEWS.
DAILY AND WEEKLY.
Providence, Rhode Island.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 9, 1897.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Brilliant Audience Listened With Unfeigned Delight.

Dvorak's Symphony "From the New World," Ariis ically Rendered.

The second concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry hall last evening attracted the usual brilliant audience of music lovers who listened with unfeigned delight to the following program embracing considerable of what is termed modern or new music:

Antonin Dvorak, Symphony No. 5, in E minor, "From the New World," Op. 95.
I. Adagio (E minor)
Allegro molto (E minor)
II. Largo (D-flat major)
III. Scherzo; Molto vivace (E minor)
IV. Aellgro con fuoco (E minor)
Felix Mendelsschn-Bartholdy, two movements from Concerto for violin, in E minor, Op. 64.
II. Andantee (C major)
III. Allegretto non troppo (E minor)
Allegro molto vivace (E major)
Hector Berlioz, a. Minuet of Will-o'-the-Wisps, b. Waltz of Sylphs, c. Rakokczy March, from "The Damnation of Faust," Op. 24; Peter Tchaikovsky, Italian Capriccio, for orchestrr, Op. 45.

The beauty of the new is that it once was old. Perhaps this might be applied to Dvorak's Symphony which began the concert. The Bohemian composer, admitted to be the greatest now living, when he came to this country to direct the energies of the National Conservatory of Music in New York, had something to say about the possibilities for characteristic music in the new world, and to the reviewers he imparted his secret, which was to the effect that plantation melodies of the South were the hope of the new music, especially in North America.

This excited a great deal of comment and it was pointed out that so-called plantation melodies were not the product of the negro but an evolution, an output of white man's brains who blacked up to entertain the public with characteristics of the colored man in slavery days. This was undoubtedly true and the composer's mistake was a natural one because the European, the modern composer, had absorbed the idea that the weird melodies emanated from the darkey "way down in Dixey."

Uncouth tourists, suddenly rich, from the west, running over the old country, maintained the impression that the people of this country were still Indians, and Americans abroad, who knew better, constantly came in contact with Europeans who believed that the inhabitants of the United States were yet buffalo hunters and strutted about in war paint and feathers. Of course, they were on the wrong scent.

The greater composer, however, stuck to his original idea and the symphony was written in the summer of 1893, not a great while after he had established himself in this country. It is maintained that its thematic material is made up largely of negro melodies from Southern plantations, but the work does not suggest this to trained ears. There is really no lingering recollection of "Way Down in Dixey" and the Southern darkey is not suggested in the symphony with anything like the vigor that he is presented in the present popular wave of "coon" song strikingly represented by "I Love Yer, Ma Honey, Yes I Do," and Ther're Other Coons as Warm as You."

The symphony, however, does strongly suggest "Yankee Doodle" with variations in the scherzo movement, which by the way is the most interesting part of the work. Dvorak went deeper in his task than the accepted scheme of plantation melodies, commonly understood, and produced music that would stand for any country. Of course, it is good music, but it does not represent the highest type, even considering the purpose of the composer to be original, a mark he did not attain in this symphony. In the hands of a musical band of the best standard, forgetting the pinnacle of art and skill attained by the matchless Boston organization, "From the New World" would prove tiresome because of its repetition. It may be said in passing, that anything worthy, or unworthy for that matter, of a place on the program presented by this company of artists, would be interesting and instructive whether from tone or visual music. The native symphony, for so it may be called because it was written in America, especially for Americans, was superbly played by the much beloved orchestra and it won its share of admiration and praise from the fine and discriminating audience.

The selections from Berlioz "The Damnation of Faust," were more familiar and they were rendered in top-notch method. It is the most popular of the works by this brilliant master and that fact stands unquestioned at the present time. It was first presented in Paris in 1846 and it was not considered a success. Subsequently its originality and beauty impressed the world and while there may be a few objectors the musical verdict is that its place has been fairly won. The impressive characteristic of this work is brightness against a background of darkness and the contrast is charming. The characterists were wonderfully illuminated by the orchestra, and the dainty waltz was rendered so beautifully that the enthusiasm of the audience came near getting a repetition of the number. Conductor Paur, who appeared to be much pleased, bowed half a dozen times and then went on with the final orchestral number.

The Tchaikovsky Italian Capriccio, heard for the first time in this city, excited considerable interest, first because it was new, and second because of its author who is much admired by the general music public. There was no disappointment because the new work was in the composer's most characteristic vein, brilliant as to color and impressively striking in wonderful contrasts. It required the skill of musicians of the first rank to convey its full power and it was rendered magnificently. That peculiar feeling, mutely saying, this is the best that can possibly be done, touched everyone.

Mr. I. Schnitzler, the soloist and a member of the first violin energy of the orchestra, demonstrated that he was a violinist of great capacity and he rendered Mendelssohn's familiar concerto with beautiful effect. The third movement which is exceedingly elaborate and brilliant was played with remarkable precision and skill and the player appeared to be master of his instrument and his work.

The next musical banquet by the Boston Symphony orchestra will take place in Infantry hall, Wednesday evening, December 29. This will make two concerts in December. If they came every week the pleasure of a large number of citizens would be materially increased.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 6, 1897.

McDowell's Indian Suite—Great Work of the Symphony.

At the seventh concert of this season's programme of the Symphony, a large and enthusiastic audience was in evidence. The McDowell numbers were evidently the attraction of the evening, and as far as the good will of his auditors was concerned, it is safe to say that the pianist-composer had no doubts, in view of the many demands for his recall, as shown by the vigorous and prolonged applause, which apparently overwhelmed him. These recalls did not, however, have their desired effect of inducing the composer to return to the piano, for he merely bowed generously but with evident modesty, at each recall, and then withdrew.

Director Paur was generous to American music in the selection of the programme, as out of the three numbers the first was the Indian suite of McDowell and the second the McDowell concerto in D minor, with the composer at the piano.

It is due in this connection also to say that the present director of the orchestra has shown a broadness and an international courtesy in his selections of concert pieces that prove him to be free from prejudices of any kind. That very impartiality has gone far towards making him so popular and so admittedly and strikingly successful in his leadership of the orchestra.

Of the Indian suite, it is to be said that nothing developed to change the criticism that was made in these columns about 20 months ago, on the occasion of the first presentation of that work by the orchestra. The fact of the matter is that it is doubtful if Beethoven himself could have accomplished the task which Mr. McDowell apparently set himself. It may be inferred that the composer's idea was to write that still undiscovered work—the great American symphony. Therefore he chose themes which all must admit are American—unless indeed they were brought over from Asia with the first migration of the aborigines.

Logically, Mr. McDowell was correct. From a musical standpoint he was wrong. The very essence of Indian music is its absolute monotony, gained by the constant, incessant repetition of a short musical theme. Cases in point are abundant. The Cherokee ball song "Higanuyahi;" the "Waich ee" of the Vancouvers; the war song "Ige, ige, ige honi he" of the Iroquois Indians, or any of the chants still used by the Pueblo Indians, afford a study of different themes, but they are practically identical in this respect: that they are melodic only in a technical sense, and they gain whatever effect they may produce simply by their monotonous iteration and reiteration.

Mr. McDowell has taken these themes and has treated them correctly, so far as the rules of the schools go. He has handled them gracefully, prettily, soberly and sometimes dramatically; but he has wrought something which is as different from Indian music as the English sparrow is different from the eagle.

His work probably stands the test of harmonic rules: but it is not American in any real sense, beyond the fact that the composer was born in New York. Outside of the opening chords in each movement (with the exception of some small part in the "dirge" the effect would have been unchanged and the title might have been more fitting if he had called the symphony "In the Fenway," or "Among the Everglades."

In the second number, however, Mr. McDowell was generally and often brilliantly successful. In the concerto he has made no such distinctive test for his music, which was graceful, pleasant, and sometimes remarkably impressive.

In his work at the piano there was so much to praise and so little to criticise that the long and vehement applause which followed may be characterized as well and fairly earned. Beyond a tendency to such extreme force in lower notes of the keyboard as sometimes to obscure slightly the brilliancy of the following notes of the upper keyboard, his technic was admirable throughout.

Each of the McDowell numbers presented had been given in Boston by the orchestra once before; the concerto about 8½ years ago and the Indian suite in the early part of last year. They had not been presented together, however, until last night. They were both well received, and the piano-work of the composer evidently took his audience by storm.

As has been said, the demands for his recall followed one another in such tumultuous fashion that there could be no doubt as to the pleasure and enthusiasm of his audience.

Regarding the work of the orchestra in the two McDowell numbers, as well as in the Fifth Beethoven Symphony, in C minor, it was absolutely artistic throughout, and might almost be called faultless. It may be doubted whether ever before, in recent years at least, has the symphony been given by any orchestra in a manner so closely approaching absolute perfection.

After such a rendering, it may easily come to be a general inquiry why this symphony, though heard now and then in a somewhat perfunctory fashion, is not among the most popular of the Beethoven symphonies. Its effects, from the standpoint of musical theory or from that of the mere pleasure of the listener, are wonderful. It is a great musical work; and the artistic performance of the orchestra gave the gem in a fit setting.

Every music-lover of Boston who was numbered among the large audience in Music Hall must have felt not only a keen sense of personal enjoyment, but also a little thrill of local pride, over the thoroughly sympathetic and masterly rendition of the symphony.

Boston Journal.
SUNDAY, DECEMBER 5, 1897.

MR. MACDOWELL

As Pianist and Composer at the Seventh Symphony Concert Last Night in Music Hall, Emil Paur Conductor.

The program of the Seventh Symphony concert was as follows:

Suite No. 2, in E minor, "Indian," Op. 48.......MacDowell
Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 2, in D minor, Op. 23.......MacDowell
Symphony No. 5, in C minor......Beethoven

It is often stated that Mr. MacDowell's "Indian Suite" was inspired in a measure by the popular success of Dvořák's so-called American symphony. When this Suite was played in Chicago Nov. 13, Mr. Arthur Mees, whose program-books are at the same time scholarly, sane and interesting, fell into this error, and wrote that "Mr. MacDowell was undoubtedly influenced in turning to aboriginal American melodies by Dvořák's counsel, precept and example."

Now as a matter of fact Mr. MacDowell had almost finished the Suite before Mr. Dvořák landed at New York.

⁂

I have discussed the Indian Suite twice at least in the Journal at considerable length, and I do not think it necessary to go over the same ground again.

Yet the temptation to speak of the fresh beauties in the detail revealed at each repeated hearing is strong, for the imaginative strength and the superb workmanship are not to be fully appreciated after one hearing. It is not a work that will be popular at once; I doubt if it will ever be popular in the common meaning of the term, for it is free from everything that is meretricious; it is without any taint of sentimentalism; it is without forced bizarrerie, and it avoids any panoramic detail that is dear to the superficial. But I know of few more remarkable pages of music than the unutterably sinister interruption in the movement entitled "In War Time," and the dirge that might well serve for the final In Memoriam of a once mighty race. In many respects, as in the higher qualities, as depth of thought and sustained flight of imagination, I place this work among the noblest compositions of modern times.

⁂

The concerto in D minor is also more or less familiar here, but I have never heard it played with so much dash and splendor as at the performance last night.

Early in November of this year Teresa Carreno played it in Berlin with overwhelming success. The scherzo was encored, a rare occurrence in that city. And so great was the enthusiasm excited by the work, as well as by Mrs. Carreno's performance, that we find the critics of Berlin wondering why this concerto has been overlooked by players of the first rank, when, as Mr. Lessmann puts it, "there is not a superfluity of musically important and 'pianistically' interesting compositions of this species."

I do not hesitate to say that this concerto must be given a very high place in the literature of the piano. Its construction is logical and admirable from beginning to end. The granitic solidity of the introduction combined with the rare beauty of following passages in the same movement; the grace, the charm, the elegance of the scherzo with its refreshing and impressive contrasts; the fiery finale; the brilliance of the piano part and the sumptuousness of the orchestration; and above all the amazing spontaneity of the work, which leads the hearer to think it was conceived at white heat, stamp the composer as a man of supreme talent, just as the Indian suite stamps him as a genius.

⁂

The performance of these works was dazzling and memorable. Mr. Paur led with the warmest appreciation, and the happiest results. The orchestra in ensemble and solo was worthy of its highest reputation. Mr. MacDowell played with commanding virility, extreme elegance, and irresistible dash.

A night long to be remembered!

⁂

You smile perhaps, and say, "But why this enthusiasm?"

I am enthusiastic over the triumph of a great composer, who has worked steadily and courageously in the face of discouragement; who has never courted by trickery or device the favor of the public; who never fawned upon those who might help him; who in his art has kept himself pure and unspotted.

I say in the magazine of today that I believe Mr. MacDowell is one of the greatest composers now living. I do not say "American composers;" for I include all composers in this statement, and in Art there should be no parochialism or chauvinism.

My belief is only riveted by the performance of last night, one that Mr. Paur, as well as Mr. MacDowell, may well remember with pride in years to come.

Philip Hale.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CII., NO. 158.
SUNDAY, DECEMBER 5, 1897.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Large Audience Present at the Seventh of the Season.

Mr. Edward MacDowell, the Soloist, Proves a Success as a Composer and a Pianist—Mr. Paur and the Orchestra Give Faultless Support—A Beethoven Symphony.

Last evening the seventh concert of the season by the Boston Symphony orchestra was given in Music Hall, the programme being:

Suite No. 2, in E minor, "Indian"........ E. MacDowell
Concerto for piano, No. 2, in D minor.... E. MacDowell
Symphony No. 5, in C minor.........Beethoven

Mr. Edward MacDowell was the soloist.

A very large audience was in attendance. The "Indian" suite, with its rich, often piquant and always effective orchestration, and its peculiar and exhaustively developed themes, has become a standard work, and has taken a place in the repertories of the leading orchestras here and abroad. It is steadily attractive and interesting in the beauty and contrasts of tone color, of its instrumentation, and for the mastery it shows over the resources of the modern orchestra. The third movement, "In War Time," and the fifth, "Village Festival," are perhaps the best portions of the work; but the whole is full of character, power and admirable musicianship, and it wears remarkably well. Mr. Paur and his artists did it full justice, and gave what may be confidently proclaimed the most thorough and convincing interpretation that the suite has obtained here. It seemed to take a strong hold on the sympathies of the audience, which applauded vigorously, and would not be satisfied until the composer came forward and bowed his acknowledgments.

The Beethoven symphony was brilliantly and finely read by Mr. Paur, without departing to any radical extent from conventionality. It is true that in the opening phrase, and on its every repetition, Fate knocked at the door with something overmuch of slow deliberation; but the exaggeration was not as excessive and as disturbing as it has been under the lead of more innovating conductors. The interpretation of this phrase has been so much and so thoroughly debated that it is quite unnecessary to resume the dispute, but as it has been disproved that Beethoven ever made the much-quoted remark about Fate thus knocking at the door, and as there is no authority in the score for beginning with a breach of the time indication, allegro con brio, and as, moreover, Beethoven was scrupulously particular in marking all the effects he intended and was savagely intolerant of any departure from his markings, and, finally, as this retarding of the time is purely a modern device, which it would not be difficult to demonstrate is an interruption that mars rather than improves the passage, especially in its formal repetition every time it reappears, the argument would seem to lie in favor of the older, and doubtless the correct, traditional method.

It was a pleasure to hear Mr. MacDowell's fine concert again, particularly the delightfully original and sparkling second movement. It was played by the composer with immense spirit, and a vigorous rhythmical accent that was fairly stirring. The performance was remarkable in its sincerity, its frank, artistic earnestness and its sustained virility. His success was very great, as was indicated by the tempest of plaudits that was thundered at him and by the four wild recalls to which he was compelled to respond.

Mr. Paur and the orchestra afforded him faultless support.

The programme for the next concert is: Suite "Scheherazade," Rimsky-Korsakoff; concerto for violin, Gustav Strube; symphony, "In the Woods," Raff. Mr. Franz Kneisel is to be the soloist.

Gazette
ESTABLISHED 1813.
BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 12.

The Symphony Orchestra.

The seventh Concert of the season was given by the Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall last night. The programme was:

Suite No. 2, E minor, op. 48...E. MacDowell
Concerto for Pianoforte No. 2, D minor.... E. MacDowell
Symphony No. 5, C minor..........Beethoven
Soloist, Mr. Edward MacDowell.

But little is called for in the way of criticism for this concert, the works given, both those by Mr. MacDowell and Mr. Beethoven are well known by this time, though in the way of opus numbers the latter composer has the advantage of the former. The end-of-the-century musician, however, is not as recklessly lavish as his predecessors in this matter; instead of spreading his ideas over wide space in operas, symphonies, quintets, quartets, trios, piano pieces, etc., like Mozart, he concentrates his ideas into an occasional suite or an odd concerto or so, and thus saves his publisher and the future historian of music from much trouble. The modern romanticist differentiates himself from the classic composer by doing little and doing it in a laborious manner.

The "Indian" suite is a charming little work, but several hearings of it do not correct the first feeling that it is somewhat "choppy" in ideas, which are hinted at rather than developed; it is the work of an undoubted artist, but one who believes that the mysticism brought about by setting down ideas obscurely is the same thing as the mysticism born of deep spiritual insight. The fine concerto was finely played by the composer, who was greeted with warm enthusiasm.

The programme for the next concert is suite "Scheherazade" Rimsky-Korsakoff; concerto for violin, Strube; symphony, "In the Woods," Raff. Mr. Franz Kneisel will be the soloist.

Boston Courier.
SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 5, 1897.

The seventh symphony programme began with Mr. E. A. MacDowell's "Indian" suite, in which Mr. Krehbiel, writing a long article in the New York Tribune, seemed to discover chiefly an exploitation of themes taken in modified form from legendary melodies of the North Western tribes. But the composer evidently regards his work as (not unlike Longfellow's "Hiawatha" in its way) an attempt to intimate his particular feeling for various typical moods of aboriginal life. He now names his movements thus: "Legend," "Love Song," "In War Time, Dirge," "Village Festival." And each section is therefore distinctly assigned to just such an exposition as we felt we recognized in it at the first performance, a season ago. The reading by the orchestra was much better than the original one, and the suite evidently made a profoundly favorable impression. There were calls for the author, but his appearance was reserved until he came forward, a moment later, to take the solo part in his own second pianoforte concerto.

Even had the programme not named the authorship, this would have revealed itself in the close kinship with the suite which was displayed in many hints of feeling and in the scheme of tone-color in the first movement. The concerto has obtained a merited place among standard works of the time for its breadth, nobility, force and ardor of expression, and for its learned and elaborate scoring in the emphatic and highly charged modern manner. It has its merrier moments and it sometimes implies rather than announces a passing emotion of softer nature. The orchestra evidently enjoyed it and played with enthusiasm to eminent effect. Mr. MacDowell is a man whose personal equation has a touch of genius in it, and whose individuality in thought and art is unquestionable. He always writes piquantly and positively, even if not always clearly and convincingly. His power cannot go unfelt. It is too dominant for that. So, too, in his playing there is a forcefulness which often comes near overstepping the lines of beauty in tone and persuasion in statement. He bears a heavy hand over the instrument, and too often massiveness of style degenerates into muscularity. It is true that his concerto is scored so strongly that in keeping a performance up to the full orchestral possibilities, even the superb Steinway sonority is driven beyond its capacity for purity. It would be better to diminish the voluminousness of many long passages and lower the scale of sound, rather than to produce the almost unavoidable feeling that pianist and band are trying to drown each other out. In Mr. MacDowell's playing there were distinctness, energy, insistence and luminousness and speed; but one felt a lack of temperateness and grace.

Beethoven's fifth symphony—so cool, quieting, refreshing and bland after the restless, heated mood of the concerto—ended the programme in a reading which was conservative in spirit and delicately developed in detail.

The next programme names only three numbers—Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade" suite, Raff's "Wood" symphony, and Mr. Strube's violin concerto, written for Mr. Kneisel, and to be played by him here, as it was when first performed at the Worcester Festival in September last.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, DEC. 5, 1897.

Mr MacDowell Plays with Symphony Orchestra.

Mr Edward A. MacDowell was the soloist at last week's symphony concerts. The program was made up of his "Indian" suite and D minor concerto for pianoforte and Beethoven's fifth symphony. The young American composer was received with the heartiest of welcomes when he came upon the stage, and the applause and recalls with which he was greeted at the close of his concerto was sufficiently demonstrative to have disturbed the equipoise of a less modest performer than the artist who has so long been identified with the best musical interests of Boston and who now is lost to us, as it were, in the west.

His "Indian" suite was first given at these concerts in February, 1896. The score is dedicated to the Boston symphony orchestra and Mr Emil Paur, and the first performance here was from manuscript. Mr MacDowell's thematic material was suggested by Indian melodies, but his tone pictures are not barbaric to the extent of roughness, and the originality of treatment shown in the different movements entitles him to rank with the foremost writers of the higher class of music. The quaint rhythms and melodies, with the underlying suggestions of an aboriginal origin, were splendidly interpreted by the orchestra, a sympathy existing between the men and the composer which accentuated the enjoyment of the performance.

Mr MacDowell's second piano concerto, while not as full of bizarre effects as his first, contains several melodic innovations well adapted to display his grand powers as executant as well as composer. The cadenza in the first part and the subsequent rippling passage work, were rendered with wonderful nerve and clearness, the solo instrument standing out in good relief against the orchestral background. Mr MacDowell's finger work in the second movement was as delicate and crisp as the most fastidious critic could reasonably desire, the beautiful dance themes and their developments being played with a brilliancy and daintiness that fairly charmed his auditors. The last movement which is of a more dramatic nature than the others, was interpreted in magnificent style, the elaborations of the themes deserving special commendation.

Beethoven's fifth symphony was well played by the orchestra. Mr Franz Kneisel will be the soloist at this week's concerts. The program will be as follows: Suite "Scheherazade," Rimsky-Korsakoff; concerto for violin, Strube; symphony, "In the Woods," Raff.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 6, 1897.

McDowell's Indian Suite—Great Work of the Symphony.

At the seventh concert of this season's programme of the Symphony, a large and enthusiastic audience was in evidence. The McDowell numbers were evidently the attraction of the evening, and as far as the good will of his auditors was concerned, it is safe to say that the pianist-composer had no doubts, in view of the many demands for his recall, as shown by the vigorous and prolonged applause, which apparently overwhelmed him. These recalls did not, however, have their desired effect of inducing the composer to return to the piano, for he merely bowed generously but with evident modesty, at each recall, and then withdrew.

Director Paur was generous to American music in the selection of the programme, as out of the three numbers the first was the Indian suite of McDowell and the second the McDowell concerto in D minor, with the composer at the piano.

It is due in this connection also to say that the present director of the orchestra has shown a broadness and an international courtesy in his selections of concert pieces that prove him to be free from prejudices of any kind. That very impartiality has gone far towards making him so popular and so admittedly and strikingly successful in his leadership of the orchestra.

Of the Indian suite, it is to be said that nothing developed to change the criticism that was made in these columns about 20 months ago, on the occasion of the first presentation of that work by the orchestra. The fact of the matter is that it is doubtful if Beethoven himself could have accomplished the task which Mr. McDowell apparently set himself. It may be inferred that the composer's idea was to write that still undiscovered work—the great American symphony. Therefore he chose themes which all must admit are American—unless indeed they were brought over from Asia with the first migration of the aborigines.

Logically, Mr. McDowell was correct. From a musical standpoint he was wrong. The very essence of Indian music is its absolute monotony, gained by the constant, incessant repetition of a short musical theme. Cases in point are abundant. The Cherokee ball song "Higanuyahi;" the "Waich ee" of the Vancouvers; the war song "Ige, ige, ige honi he" of the Iroquois Indians, or any of the chants still used by the Pueblo Indians, afford a study of different themes, but they are practically identical in this respect: that they are melodic only in a technical sense, and they gain whatever effect they may produce simply by their monotonous iteration and reiteration.

Mr. McDowell has taken these themes and has treated them correctly, so far as the rules of the schools go. He has handled them gracefully, prettily, soberly and sometimes dramatically; but he has wrought something which is as different from Indian music as the English sparrow is different from the eagle.

His work probably stands the test of harmonic rules; but it is not American in any real sense, beyond the fact that the composer was born in New York. Outside of the opening chords in each movement (with the exception of some small part in the "dirge" the effect would have been unchanged and the title might have been more fitting if he had called the symphony "In the Fenway," or "Among the Everglades."

In the second number, however, Mr. McDowell was generally and often brilliantly successful. In the concerto he has made no such distinctive test for his music, which was graceful, pleasant, and sometimes remarkably impressive.

In his work at the piano there was so much to praise and so little to criticise that the long and vehement applause which followed may be characterized as well and fairly earned. Beyond a tendency to such extreme force in lower notes of the keyboard as sometimes to obscure slightly the brilliancy of the following notes of the upper keyboard, his technic was admirable throughout.

Each of the McDowell numbers presented had been given in Boston by the orchestra once before; the concerto about 8½ years ago and the Indian suite in the early part of last year. They had not been presented together, however, until last night. They were both well received, and the piano-work of the composer evidently took his audience by storm.

As has been said, the demands for his recall followed one another in such tumultuous fashion that there could be no doubt as to the pleasure and enthusiasm of his audience.

Regarding the work of the orchestra in the two McDowell numbers, as well as in the Fifth Beethoven Symphony, in C minor, it was absolutely artistic throughout, and might almost be called faultless. It may be doubted whether ever before, in recent years at least, has the symphony been given by any orchestra in a manner so closely approaching absolute perfection.

After such a rendering, it may easily come to be a general inquiry why this symphony, though heard now and then in a somewhat perfunctory fashion, is not among the most popular of the Beethoven symphonies. Its effects, from the standpoint of musical theory or from that of the mere pleasure of the listener, are wonderful. It is a great musical work; and the artistic performance of the orchestra gave the gem in a fit setting.

Every music-lover of Boston who was numbered among the large audience in Music Hall must have felt not only a keen sense of personal enjoyment, but also a little thrill of local pride, over the thoroughly sympathetic and masterly rendition of the symphony.

Boston Journal.
SUNDAY, DECEMBER 5, 1897.

MR. MACDOWELL

As Pianist and Composer at the Seventh Symphony Concert Last Night in Music Hall, Emil Paur Conductor.

The program of the Seventh Symphony concert was as follows:

Suite No. 2, in E minor, "Indian," Op. 48..........MacDowell
Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 2, in D minor, Op. 23..........MacDowell
Symphony No. 5, in C minor......Beethoven

It is often stated that Mr. MacDowell's "Indian Suite" was inspired in a measure by the popular success of Dvořák's so-called American symphony. When this Suite was played in Chicago Nov. 13, Mr. Arthur Mees, whose program-books are at the same time scholarly, sane and interesting, fell into this error, and wrote that "Mr. MacDowell was undoubtedly influenced in turning to aboriginal American melodies by Dvořák's counsel, precept and example."

Now as a matter of fact Mr. MacDowell had almost finished the Suite before Mr. Dvořák landed at New York.

⁂

I have discussed the Indian Suite twice at least in the Journal at considerable length, and I do not think it necessary to go over the same ground again.

Yet the temptation to speak of the fresh beauties in the detail revealed at each repeated hearing is strong, for the imaginative strength and the superb workmanship are not to be fully appreciated after one hearing. It is not a work that will be popular at once; I doubt if it will ever be popular in the common meaning of the term, for it is free from everything that is meretricious; it is without any taint of sentimentalism; it is without forced bizarrerie, and it avoids any panoramic detail that is dear to the superficial. But I know of few more remarkable pages of music than the unutterably sinister interruption in the movement entitled "In War Time," and the dirge that might well serve for the final In Memoriam of a once mighty race. In many respects, as in the higher qualities, as depth of thought and sustained flight of imagination, I place this work among the noblest compositions of modern times.

⁂

The concerto in D minor is also more or less familiar here, but I have never heard it played with so much dash and splendor as at the performance last night.

Early in November of this year Teresa Carreno played it in Berlin with overwhelming success. The scherzo was encored, a rare occurrence in that city. And so great was the enthusiasm excited by the work, as well as by Mrs. Carreno's performance, that we find the critics of Berlin wondering why this concerto has been overlooked by players of the first rank, when, as Mr. Lessmann puts it, "there is not a superfluity of musically important and 'pianistically' interesting compositions of this species."

I do not hesitate to say that this concerto must be given a very high place in the literature of the piano. Its construction is logical and admirable from beginning to end. The granitic solidity of the introduction combined with the rare beauty of following passages in the same movement; the grace, the charm, the elegance of the scherzo with its refreshing and impressive contrasts; the fiery finale; the brilliance of the piano part and the sumptuousness of the orchestration; and above all the amazing spontaneity of the work, which leads the hearer to think it was conceived at white heat. stamp the composer as a man of supreme talent, just as the Indian suite stamps him as a genius.

⁂

The performance of these works was dazzling and memorable. Mr. Paur led with the warmest appreciation, and the happiest results. The orchestra in ensemble and solo was worthy of its highest reputation. Mr. MacDowell played with commanding virility, extreme elegance, and irresistible dash.

A night long to be remembered!

⁂

You smile perhaps, and say, "But why this enthusiasm?"

I am enthusiastic over the triumph of a great composer, who has worked steadily and courageously in the face of discouragement; who has never courted by trickery or device the favor of the public; who never fawned upon those who might help him; who in his art has kept himself pure and unspotted.

I say in the magazine of today that I believe Mr. MacDowell is one of the greatest composers now living. I do not say "American composers;" for I include all composers in this statement, and in Art there should be no parochialism or chauvinism.

My belief is only riveted by the performance of last night, one that Mr. Paur, as well as Mr. MacDowell, may well remember with pride in years to come.

Philip Hale.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CII., NO. 158.
SUNDAY, DECEMBER 5, 1897.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Large Audience Present at the Seventh of the Season.

Mr. Edward MacDowell, the Soloist, Proves a Success as a Composer and a Pianist—Mr. Paur and the Orchestra Give Faultless Support—A Beethoven Symphony.

Last evening the seventh concert of the season by the Boston Symphony orchestra was given in Music Hall, the programme being:

Suite No. 2, in E minor, "Indian"........E. MacDowell
Concerto for piano, No. 2, in D minor....E. MacDowell
Symphony No. 5, in C minor.........Beethoven

Mr. Edward MacDowell was the soloist.

A very large audience was in attendance. The "Indian" suite, with its rich, often piquant and always effective orchestration, and its peculiar and exhaustively developed themes, has become a standard work, and has taken a place in the repertories of the leading orchestras here and abroad. It is steadily attractive and interesting in the beauty and contrasts of tone color, of its instrumentation, and for the mastery it shows over the resources of the modern orchestra. The third movement, "In War Time," and the fifth, "Village Festival," are perhaps the best portions of the work; but the whole is full of character, power and admirable musicianship, and it wears remarkably well. Mr. Paur and his artists did it full justice, and gave what may be confidently proclaimed the most thorough and convincing interpretation that the suite has obtained here. It seemed to take a strong hold on the sympathies of the audience, which applauded vigorously, and would not be satisfied until the composer came forward and bowed his acknowledgments.

The Beethoven symphony was brilliantly and finely read by Mr. Paur, without departing to any radical extent from conventionality. It is true that in the opening phrase, and on its every repetition. Fate knocked at the door with something overmuch of slow deliberation; but the exaggeration was not as excessive and as disturbing as it has been under the lead of more innovating conductors. The interpretation of this phrase has been so much and so thoroughly debated that it is quite unnecessary to resume the dispute, but as it has been disproved that Beethoven ever made the much-quoted remark about Fate thus knocking at the door, and as there is no authority in the score for beginning with a breach of the time indication, allegro con brio, and as, moreover, Beethoven was scrupulously particular in marking all the effects he intended and was savagely intolerant of any departure from his markings, and, finally, as this retarding of the time is purely a modern device, which it would not be difficult to demonstrate is an interruption that mars rather than improves the passage, especially in its formal repetition every time it reappears, the argument would seem to lie in favor of the older, and doubtless the correct, traditional method.

It was a pleasure to hear Mr. MacDowell's fine concert again, particularly the delightfully original and sparkling second movement. It was played by the composer with immense spirit, and a vigorous rhythmical accent that was fairly stirring. The performance was remarkable in its sincerity, its frank, artistic earnestness and its sustained virility. His success was very great, as was indicated by the tempest of plaudits that was thundered at him and by the four wild recalls to which he was compelled to respond.

Mr. Paur and the orchestra afforded him faultless support.

The programme for the next concert is: Suite "Scheherazade," Rimsky-Korsakoff; concerto for violin, Gustav Strube; symphony, "In the Woods," Raff. Mr. Franz Kneisel is to be the soloist.

Gazette
ESTABLISHED 1813.
BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 12.

The Symphony Orchestra.

The seventh Concert of the season was given by the Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall last night. The programme was:

Suite No. 2, E minor, op. 48...E. MacDowell
Concerto for Pianoforte No. 2, D minor....E. MacDowell
Symphony No. 5, C minor..........Beethoven
Soloist, Mr. Edward MacDowell.

But little is called for in the way of criticism for this concert, the works given, both those by Mr. MacDowell and Mr. Beethoven are well known by this time, though in the way of opus numbers the latter composer has the advantage of the former. The end-of-the-century musician, however, is not as recklessly lavish as his predecessors in this matter; instead of spreading his ideas over wide space in operas, symphonies, quintets, quartets, trios, piano pieces, etc., like Mozart, he concentrates his ideas into an occasional suite or an odd concerto or so, and thus saves his publisher and the future historian of music from much trouble. The modern romanticist differentiates himself from the classic composer by doing little and doing it in a laborious manner.

The "Indian" suite is a charming little work, but several hearings of it do not correct the first feeling that it is somewhat "choppy" in ideas, which are hinted at rather than developed; it is the work of an undoubted artist, but one who believes that the mysticism brought about by setting down ideas obscurely is the same thing as the mysticism born of deep spiritual insight. The fine concerto was finely played by the composer, who was greeted with warm enthusiasm.

The programme for the next concert is suite "Scheherazade" Rimsky-Korsakoff; concerto for violin, Strube; symphony, "In the Woods," Raff. Mr. Franz Kneisel will be the soloist.

Boston Courier.
SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 5, 1897.

The seventh symphony programme began with Mr. E. A. MacDowell's "Indian" suite, in which Mr. Krehbiel, writing a long article in the New York Tribune, seemed to discover chiefly an exploitation of themes taken in modified form from legendary melodies of the North Western tribes. But the composer evidently regards his work as (not unlike Longfellow's "Hiawatha" in its way) an attempt to intimate his particular feeling for various typical moods of aboriginal life. He now names his movements thus: "Legend," "Love Song," "In War Time, Dirge," "Village Festival." And each section is therefore distinctly assigned to just such an exposition as we felt we recognized in it at the first performance, a season ago. The reading by the orchestra was much better than the original one, and the suite evidently made a profoundly favorable impression. There were calls for the author, but his appearance was reserved until he came forward, a moment later, to take the solo part in his own second pianoforte concerto.

Even had the programme not named the authorship, this would have revealed itself in the close kinship with the suite which was displayed in many hints of feeling and in the scheme of tone-color in the first movement. The concerto has obtained a merited place among standard works of the time for its breadth, nobility, force and ardor of expression, and for its learned and elaborate scoring in the emphatic and highly charged modern manner. It has its merrier moments and it sometimes implies rather than announces a passing emotion of softer nature. The orchestra evidently enjoyed it and played with enthusiasm to eminent effect. Mr. MacDowell is a man whose personal equation has a touch of genius in it, and whose individuality in thought and art is unquestionable. He always writes piquantly and positively, even if not always clearly and convincingly. His power cannot go unfelt. It is too dominant for that. So, too, in his playing there is a forcefulness which often comes near overstepping the lines of beauty in tone and persuasion in statement. He bears a heavy hand over the instrument, and too often massiveness of style degenerates into muscularity. It is true that his concerto is scored so strongly that in keeping a performance up to the full orchestral possibilities, even the superb Steinway sonority is driven beyond its capacity for purity. It would be better to diminish the voluminousness of many long passages and lower the scale of sound, rather than to produce the almost unavoidable feeling that pianist and band are trying to drown each other out. In Mr. MacDowell's playing there were distinctness, energy, insistence and luminousness and speed; but one felt a lack of temperateness and grace.

Beethoven's fifth symphony—so cool, quieting, refreshing and bland after the restless, heated mood of the concerto—ended the programme in a reading which was conservative in spirit and delicately developed in detail.

The next programme names only three numbers—Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade" suite, Raff's "Wood" symphony, and Mr. Strube's violin concerto, written for Mr. Kneisel, and to be played by him here, as it was when first performed at the Worcester Festival in September last.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, DEC. 5, 1897.

Mr MacDowell Plays with Symphony Orchestra.

Mr Edward A. MacDowell was the soloist at last week's symphony concerts. The program was made up of his "Indian" suite and D minor concerto for pianoforte and Beethoven's fifth symphony. The young American composer was received with the heartiest of welcomes when he came upon the stage, and the applause and recalls with which he was greeted at the close of his concerto was sufficiently demonstrative to have disturbed the equipoise of a less modest performer than the artist who has so long been identified with the best musical interests of Boston and who now is lost to us, as it were, in the west.

His "Indian" suite was first given at these concerts in February, 1896. The score is dedicated to the Boston symphony orchestra and Mr Emil Paur, and the first performance here was from manuscript. Mr MacDowell's thematic material was suggested by Indian melodies, but his tone pictures are not barbaric to the extent of roughness, and the originality of treatment shown in the different movements entitles him to rank with the foremost writers of the higher class of music. The quaint rhythms and melodies, with the underlying suggestions of an aboriginal origin, were splendidly interpreted by the orchestra, a sympathy existing between the men and the composer which accentuated the enjoyment of the performance.

Mr MacDowell's second piano concerto, while not as full of bizarre effects as his first, contains several melodic innovations well adapted to display his grand powers as executant as well as composer. The cadenza in the first part and the subsequent rippling passage work, were rendered with wonderful nerve and clearness, the solo instrument standing out in good relief against the orchestral background. Mr MacDowell's finger work in the second movement was as delicate and crisp as the most fastidious critic could reasonably desire, the beautiful dance themes and their developments being played with a brilliancy and daintiness that fairly charmed his auditors. The last movement which is of a more dramatic nature than the others, was interpreted in magnificent style, the elaborations of the themes deserving special commendation.

Beethoven's fifth symphony was well played by the orchestra. Mr Franz Kneisel will be the soloist at this week's concerts. The program will be as follows: Suite "Scheherazade," Rimsky-Korsakoff; concerto for violin, Strube; symphony, "In the Woods," Raff.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, DECEMBER 6, 1897

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The programme of the seventh symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

MacDowell: Suite No. 2, in E minor, "Indian," opus 48.
MacDowell: Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 2, in D minor, opus 23.
Beethoven: Symphony No. 5, in C minor, opus 67.
Mr. Edward MacDowell was the pianist.

A McDowell evening, with the fifth symphony to join the audience in singing "Io triumphe!" at the end! As for ourselves, we own that it is a rare pleasure to have to do with a composer whom we are beginning to understand. It took us some time to see daylight in Mr. MacDowell's writing; at first he was wholly incomprehensible to us—like Brahms and Schumann, not to go back to Beethoven's eighth symphony. Light began to dawn upon us with the "Sonata tragica;" it was "glad, confident morning" with the "King Arthur" sonata. Clouds came again with "Hamlet and Ophelia" and the "Indian" suite; but with the D minor concerto it is now the full blaze of noon. As in all such cases, the process has been an arduous one, but none the less delightful; challenging genius on the composer's side, willing acceptance of the challenge on ours, made the task of understanding a labor of love. And now we have our reward!

We have twice before spoken of the "Indian" suite, so let us now keep most of our words for the concerto—the work which, when first we heard it some years ago, seemed the most perplexing of all, and now seems the finest. It is a curious feeling one has, when one begins to understand a hitherto incomprehensible composition; all seems so clear, such plain sailing, that one wonders where the obscurity was found at first. It seems almost as if the composition itself must have changed, and not the listener. Last Saturday evening—to be sure, we had had a good day's study of the score before the concert—this D minor concerto of Mr. MacDowell's seemed a thing of perfect clarity, symmetry of form, and freshness of melodic invention. More than this, a thing of high, entrancing poetic imaginativeness. With what genial ease Mr. MacDowell has here allowed himself to be new and unconventional, yet with no impertinent slap in the face of the old! In the formal planning out of his work he has bound himself to the strict letter of no traditional law; but the structure of the composition is so based upon the essence of traditional formal principles that one can almost believe that the gist of these principles will be eternal in music, that no wholly new ones will ever be discovered. Here is true originality: not a wanton subversion of the old and a frantic premeditated voyage in search of the north pole of the new; but a free, instinctive application of the old in a new way. Without going into further speculative generalities, let us say at once that this D-minor concerto of Mr. MacDowell's seems to us now one of the most entirely fine productions of its sort in our day.

His playing of the work was a marvel of virtuoso brilliancy, warm beauty of feeling and compelling mastery. There was something in the man's whole presence and bearing—modest, self-concentrated, almost as if he wished, in his heart of heart, that the audience were out of the way—that brought one immediately into touch with him. One could not but feel the sure magnetism of his command over the accompanying orchestra and its conductor; he was like Bülow, who, as was once said of him, "played the pianoforte part and all, when he played a concerto." Everything went just right; he himself must have been all but satisfied. It is not often that one feels himself so palpably in the immediate atmosphere of genius. Only one point in Mr. MacDowell, as a pianist, still disturbs us—the more so, perhaps, in that it seems quite irreconcilable with all else in him: this is the dry hardness of his touch in all but rapid-running passages. That a man so poetic in temperament, so sensitive to beauty of tone-color, one whose bodily movements are all so curvilinear, a man without an apparent sharp corner to him, should play cantilena and strong chords so dryly, so angularly, is hard to understand. But in rapid-running passages his touch recoups itself; here he has a crisp brilliancy of "jeu perlé" such as we have never heard excelled: he seems to strike sparks from the instrument! That a thorough artist should show both totality of conception and due elaborateness in detail-work, while playing his own composition, is not surprising. Both composition and performer carried everything before them last Saturday. One is proud of belonging to the same race and nation as Mr. MacDowell.

The "great fifth" was, upon the whole, magnificently played. We do not like that portentous broadening-out of the characteristic figure in the first movement every time it leads up to a "hold;" we abominate that super-sentimental toying with the rhythm in the Andante. We think, too, that the whole first movement ought to go faster. But these are matters of individual opinion and feeling. Suffice it that Mr. Paur carried out his idea of the work with compelling force and brilliancy, and that the orchestra played superbly. It is long since we have heard the C minor symphony with so much pleasure.

The next programme is: Rimsky-Korsakoff, symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," opus 35; Gustav Strube, concerto for violin, in A minor, opus 13 (MS., first time in Boston); Raff, symphony No. 3, in F. major, "Im Walde," opus 153. Mr. Franz Kneisel will be the violinist.

The Boston Traveler
PUBLISHED BY THE
BOSTON TRAVELER CO.,
TORREY E. WARDNER, President.

MONDAY, DECEMBER 6, 1897.

The Symphony.

Seventeenth season Boston Symphony Orchestra; seventh concert. Mr. MacDowell, soloist. The programme:

"Indian" suite in E minor.....MacDowell
Concerto for pianoforte in D minor. ....MacDowell
Symphony No. 5 in C minor....Beethoven

There was a great deal of MacDowell in the concert, but fortunately the great merit of that composer and his large and wholesome variety of inspiration prevented any feeling of satiety. On the other hand, the event was a fine and memorable one. The "Indian" suite gains in beauty and richness with each hearing; it loses more and more its bizarre qualities; it becomes the appealing farewell cry of a disappearing people. This suite will live long in musical annals, I doubt not,—perhaps as long as Dvorak's admirable "New World" symphony.

The concerto is a noble work that has won deserved recognition abroad. With never a trivial or flimsy phrase, it appeals to the heart and mind at once, and stamps itself as the product of a master in music. Mr. MacDowell played it with great solidity and dignity, if lacking somewhat in technical grace and charm.

The noble Fifth Symphony was played with eminent brilliancy by Mr. Paur's men. Its reading was in the calmer vein calmer than that gorgeous performance of Mr. Nikisch, I mean—but there was enough stir and passion in the last glorious movement to furnish the requisite thrills of emotion.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, DECEMBER 5, 1897.
(Copyright, 1897. Post Publishing Company.)

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The seventh in the series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given in Music Hall last evening. The programme consisted of E. A. MacDowell's "Indian" suite No. 2, Op. 48, and his pianoforte concerto No. 2 in D minor, Op. 23, also Beethoven's Symphony No. 5 in C minor, Op. 67.

Mr. E. A. MacDowell was the soloist. This concert was interesting and important as well. Mr. MacDowell, from his long residence in this city, is well known to our musical public, both as a composer and pianist, and his excellence in both respects is fully appreciated.

The pianoforte concerto, which was admirably performed by the composer, is a work of which there can be no doubt, for it is one of the best of its class written in recent years. In places it is suggestive of St. Saens's G minor concerto, but for all that it is full of originality. Recent proof of its excellence is the fact that it was played recently in Berlin by Mme. Carreno with great success. It is truly among the best of Mr. MacDowell's compositions. The composer received a warm welcome, and his reception was a worthy tribute to his excellence as a composer and pianist. The orchestra did finely in both these numbers.

Next week the soloist is to be Mr. Kneisel, and he will play a new violin concerto by Mr. Gustav Strube, who is a member of the orchestra. The other selections as announced are Raff's "Im Walde" symphony and Rimsky-Korsahoff's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade."

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, DECEMBER 12, 1897.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of the eighth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall last evening included Rinsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," Op. 35; concerto for violin and orchestra in G major (manuscript) of Gustav Strube, and Raff's symphony No. 3 in F, "In the Woods," Op. 153. Mr. Franz Kneisel was the soloist.

Mr. Kneisel gave a highly finished performance of the violin concerto of Mr. Strube, which was conducted by the composer. The work is dedicated to Mr. Kneisel, and it had its first performance at these concerts. It is not easy to judge much of such a work at a first hearing, but the first impressions given are that it is well written, with a thorough knowledge of the possibilities of the violin.

There will be no rehearsal and concert next week. As Christmas will fall upon Saturday of the week following, the rehearsal will be given on Wednesday afternoon, the 22d, and the concert on Thursday evening, the 23d. The next programme includes Beethoven''s symphony No. 2 in D, Bizet's suite L'Arlesienne, No. 1, and other works by Bach, Grieg and Humperdinck. No soloist is anounced.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CII., NO. 165.

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 12, 1897.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

First Performance in Boston of Mr. Strube's Concerto.

A Fine Work, Reflecting Great Credit on the Young Composer—Splendidly Played by Mr. Franz Kneisel — Korsakoff's Brilliant Suite Given Again.

Last evening the eighth concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra was given in Music Hall, with this programme:

Symphonic suite, "Scheherazade"......... Rinsky-Korsakoff
Concerto for violin in G, op. 13..Gustav Strube
Symphony No. 8, "In the Woods".........Raff

Mr. Franz Kneisel was the soloist.

The Korsakoff suite, which was heard at the concerts last season, did not arouse any more enthusiasm on a second hearing than it did on a first. It is strange music, full of oriental languor and warmth in its gentler themes, and in the orchestral color imparted to them, and they vary all the way in flavor from the faintly sugary to the thickly syrupy, attaining now and then to the more solidly caramelic. This saccarhine quality at last palls on the palate, and as the brief themes are repeated again and again through the whole four movements, they at length impart an almost irritating monotony to the work.

In this suite Korsakoff treats a theme as a cat does a rat, playing with it, worrying it, letting it escape for a moment, only to pounce on it again, the only difference in treatment being that he never kills it. The work is opulent in tone colors of the most gorgeous hues. It foams over with clever instrumentation, often of peculiarly striking originality. The composer's skill in making much out of very little is really extraordinary, but it is toujours perdrix.

As a whole, it suggests an operatic ballet on a huge scale; effective enough in all regards, but as empty as a soapbubble, and with all the iridescence of that fragile thing. The rhythms are piquant, and from time to time a dash of paprika is provided by way of contrast to the sugar; the pretty merges into the ugly; but there is overmuch of "damnable iteration," and when at the close of the feast the scraps are gathered and presented in a warmed-up form, one feels a sensation of uncomfortable repletion. It is an immensely ingenious bit of glowing and artistically-made patchwork—a species of sumptuous "crazy-quilt."

It was brilliantly and splendidly read and played, and the rare virtuosity of the orchestra was displayed at its highest point.

Mr. Strube's concerto had its first performance at the latest Worcester festival, at which time a consideration of its great worth was fully recognized in these columns. On a second hearing it wholly sustained the fine impression it then made. As the work of a young composer, it may be justly commended in every way. It is charming in its themes and the musicianly skill with which they are treated.

Not the least of its merits is that it is merely a medium for the soloist to exemplify the deftness of his fingers, but is a well-planned composition in which the orchestra and the solo instrument are of equal importance, and the orchestration is always thoughtful, effective and able. The adagio is very beautiful, and its treatment, in purity of taste, grace of sentiment, artistic discretion and tender dignity, would reflect credit on any composer.

The concerto is brimful of talent, and is a valuable addition to the scanty list of really good modern works in its kind. Such faults as it may have arise out of the exuberance of youth; but they are easily condoned, for they never offend refined taste, nor descend to weakness, and are rather a sign of too much than of too little inspiration.

Mr. Kneisel, to whom the concerto is dedicated, played it con amore and with that exquisite finish of style, purity of intonation, mastery of technique and perfect refinement of taste that always make his performance so wholly delightful.

Nothing could be more fascinating than the largeness, the warmth and the depth of sincere feeling with which he read the adagio, nor more brilliant than his playing of the other movements, especially the finale, which was given with a dainty piquancy in its quieter moments, and a vigorous emphasis and fire in its more florid that should have made the composer, to whom Mr. Paur with kind consideration resigned the task of conducting the work, completely happy.

The cadenza written by Mr. Kneisel for the finale was in admirable keeping with the spirit of the movement, and the themes were recalled with equal skill and judgment and at just the proper length, and were, moreover, used in a thoroughly musicianly manner. Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Strube were received with great cordiality, and at the close of the concerto there was a tempest of plaudits for composer and soloist, who were recalled three or four times with immense enthusiasm. The success of both was emphatic.

The symphony, probably the best in the long line of achievements in its kind by Raff, has been made familiar here through numerous performances, and its rendering on this occasion need not be dwelt on further than to state that it was worthy in every way of the conductor and the orchestra.

There will be no public rehearsal and concert this week. The following week, as Saturday is Christmas day, the public rehearsal will be on Wednesday afternoon, Dec. 22, and the concert on Thursday evening, Dec. 23. The programme on these occasions will be: Symphony No. 2, Beethoven; Pastorale, Bach; Two Norwegian Melodies, Grieg; Suite "L'Arleseenne," No. 1, Bizet; overture, "Hansel and Gretel," Humperdinck.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 12, 1897.

STRUBE AND KNEISEL.

Composer and Virtuoso at the Eighth Symphony Concert in Music Hall Last Evening, Emil Paur Conductor.

The program of the 8th Symphony concert was as follows:

"Scheherazade" ....Rimsky-Korsakoff
Concerto for violin, G major, Op. 13....Strube
Symphony, "Im Walde"....................Raff

Mr. Gustav Strube's violin concerto (ms.), dedicated to Mr. Franz Kneisel, and adorned with a cadenza by that eminent violinist, was first performed by Mr. Kneisel at the Worcester Festival of this year, Sept. 22. The work was then reviewed at length in the Journal. Since the first performance, Mr. Strube has revised the finale extensively, has in fact practically rewritten it, and has strengthened the tuttis throughout. The concerto is improved thereby. At Worcester the orchestral background in the finale was rather vague, rhythmically indistinct and halting and pale in color. As it stands today the concerto is an admirable work one that gives pleasure to amateur and musician, and one that must be grateful to violinists.

For this music is tuneful and at the same time firmly built; it is fresh without deliberate endeavor; it is original, but without eccentricity or youthful desire to startle. Mr. Strube knows what he wishes to say, says it, and, having said it, makes modestly his exit, not staying awkwardly to pump your hand or indulge in remarks that would be more appropriate as a deathbed farewell. Ah, men and brethren, the art of knowing when to stop is a precious gift, appreciated by an audience.

The adagio, which is connected with the first movement, is thougful and frankly beautiful; to me it is the finest portion of the work, although the first movement is charming by reason of its spontaneous melody and sure but unostentatious workmanship in the development. The orchestration is discreet and therefore effective. Each instrument when introduced in solo or imitation has something to say, has an excuse for its appearance.

When Mr. Kneisel played this concerto at Worcester I spoke of his labor of love, his appreciation of the genuine talent of his colleague in the orchestra. He again last night showed the utmost care and interest, and surely the composer, who conducted, must have been proud of his interpreter. I have written a few words in the magazine supplement of today about Mr. Kneisel's career in Vienna, Berlin and Boston. I have not discussed his rare artistic gifts at length, because they are so well konwn and admired so honestly by all that to vex the language of eulogy might seem impertinent to his admirers and to the modesty of the man himself. Think for a moment of the activity of this violinist! Think of the number of works that he has introduced as soloist and as quartet leader! His conscientiousness, his fidelity to the composer, his gift of divining the intention of the composer, are as conspicuous as his eminent qualities as a virtuoso. That Mr. Kneisel played Mr. Strube's concerto—that he will play it again in New York—is a higher compliment to Mr. Strube than any that can be paid by a hearer. And when it is said the work was played by Mr. Kneisel you know at once the interpretation was all that Mr. Strube could desire.

Player and composer were applauded and recalled heartily and frequently.

⁂

It may seem ungracious to complain, for there was very much in this concert to give pleasure; but, surely the program was arranged unwisely, and the concert was too long.

Rimsky-Korsakoff's Symphonic Suite "Scheherazade," performed here last spring, has many trying passages for solo violin. To put this work immediately before a violin concerto was a mistake; for the element of freshness in hearing the solo violin in a concerto was impossible; the effect had been discounted. An overture would have been more to the purpose.

A second hearing of the suite confirms the impression made in April. 'Tis a gorgeous work, interesting throughout, on account of the wildness of imagination as well as the supreme individuality displayed in the orchestration. The composer built on Berlioz rather than on Wagner; but he has produced effects that would have excited the amazement of Berlioz himself. Rimsky-Korsakoff, an officer of marines, knows his ocean, and compared to his musical storm, that of Wagner in "The Flying Dutchman," or that of Rubinstein, the symphonist, seems a squall sweeping across a mill-pond. The only pages that are to be put by the side of Rimsky-Korsakoff's are those of Paul Gilson, the Belgian, whose symphonic poem was mutilated cruelly here by Mr. Nikisch.

Do you find the liking of the Oriental tunes an acquired taste? To me they were a relief after so many concerts this season where smug, complacent Occidentalism prevailed. But this work of the Russian with a terrible name does not rest solely upon the character of his tunes; it rests upon imagination, sentiment, virility, workmanship, and in these qualities I put "Scheherazade" far above "Thus Spake Zarathustra" by Mr. Richard Strauss, metaphysician in music. Nor do I know of any German now living who approaches this Russian in his mastery of orchestration.

⁂

The "Im Walde" symphony is a work of extreme beauty. "If you should leave the hall during the performance," a musician once said, "walk around the block and return, you would find something to charm you, no matter which page of the score was about to be turned." And this musician spoke the truth.

Philip Hale.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, DECEMBER 13, 1897

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its eighth symphony concert in Music Hall last Saturday evening, the programme being as follows:

Rimsky-Korsakoff: Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade," opus 35.
Gustav Strube: Concerto for Violin, in G major (MS.), opus 13.
(Cadenza by Mr. Franz Kneisel.)
(First time in Boston.)
Raff: Symphony No. 3, in F major, "Im Walde," opus 153.

Mr. Franz Kneisel was the violinist.

Yes, Mr. Kneisel was the violinist in more than the ordinary sense; he played the very prominent and important solo violin part in the "Scheherazade," he played the principal part in Mr. Strube's new concerto; had Richard Strauss's "Zarathustra" been substituted for Raff's "Im Walde," nothing would have been wanting to make it a Kneisel concert all through. But no one has ever had too much of Mr. Kneisel yet.

When Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade" made its resounding success last season, we, who enjoyed the new work as much as anybody, had a feeling—not unnatural, when a wholly new work in a new style seems to hit the bull's-eye at once—that all this delight might be too good to be true, too splendid to last. But this renewed hearing goes far to reassure us; the work seems as brilliant, poetic and imaginative as ever, and gives well-nigh convincing evidence of genuineness. As pure music it can be compared with very little that we have ever had here before; what beauty it has, of melodic outline, form, development, color, is wholly individual and its own. Think what it means, in the way of originality, for a composer in this last part of the nineteenth century to come forward with an entirely new style of orchestration! Yes, it certainly does seem as if this "Scheherazade" had really come to stay with us.

With Raff's "Im Walde," on the other hand, one is in doubt whether it be not packing up to go. If so, it stands ill with Raff, for the "Im Walde" is surely the one of his symphonies which can best hold up its head nowadays, the only one which has the faintest hope of a future. The "Lenore" has gone the way of all flesh; and as for the others, who even thinks of them now? If the "Im Walde" goes, Raff dies all over in the orchestral field. Remember the days when Raff was new here; how very new he seemed, how "zukünftig!" The classicists would none of him; the come-outers hailed him as the rising sun, as the man to make romanticism gleam and glow in pure music, as Wagner was making her glow and gleam in the music-drama. He was the man to give Mendelssohn his quietus, and put an end to pedantry. Fond hopes! It seems as if the classicists were right, for once. Mendelssohn lives more vigorously in the orchestral repertory today than Raff; it was reserved for Brahms, not for Raff, to uphold the standard of pure music against the Wagnerian invasion. Hardly another so prominent composer in all history has had so short a day as he.

As for the "Im Walde," however, we still have our doubts. Even admitting that the work has arrived at a questionable stage, this stage is not worse than questionable. The symphony makes very different impressions at different times. When last we heard it here, it seemed young, fresh and vigorous; now it seems for the most part pretty old and wrinkled—almost like the "Lenore." That morning dawn and sunrise in the last movement, with that sentimentally beautiful return of the theme from the first movement at the close, seems admirably poetic and enchanting as ever. But the rest sounds far weaker; the "Wild Hunt" appears like slightly improved Liszt, the "Largo" trivial and salon-like. "The Dance of Dryads," charming, if you will, but a trifle light as air. The first movement shines by its workmanship more than by anything else.

The manner in which both suite and symphony were played was simply superb; the performance of these two works was a triumph for conductor and orchestra. It was a concert to invite a stranger to.

Of Mr. Strube's concerto we are not sure, after but a single hearing; and we are free to own that this uncertainty of ours speaks more strongly for the work than against it. As we have already hinted, the works that please and satisfy at the first onset seldom have much in them. Of one thing, however, we are quite sure; the concerto is not in the least "Kapellmeistermusik," it shows no mere conventional ambling along well-beaten paths where there are no flowers left to pluck. Mr. Strube treats musical form as a means of expression that should be adapted to the idea to be expressed, not as a Procrustes bed to which all ideas should be made to fit, with more or less of violence. He treats it freely, but not iconoclastically. We found many moments of delight in the work, frequent evidences of freshness of invention, imaginative poetry of feeling, skill in treatment. Nothing sounded worn and trite. The hang-together of the thing still eludes us; but insight into this may well come with time. Mr. Kneisel's playing of it was superb at every point, the playing of a complete master. Happy the city that has such an one to do its violin-playing for it! To listen to Mr. Kneisel is to have a fine example of complete confidence not deceived. Mr. Strube conducted his own work with aplomb and authority. Both composer and performer were repeatedly recalled with the warmest enthusiasm.

The next programme—for Wednesday afternoon, Dec. 22, and Thursday evening, Dec. 23 (there will be no rehearsal nor concert this week)—is: Beethoven, symphony No. 2, in D major, opus 36; Bach, Pastorale from the "Christmas Oratorio;" Grieg, two Norwegian melodies; Bizet, suite No. 1 from "L'Arlésienne;" Humperdinck, overture to "Hänsel und Gretel."

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Joseffy to Be the Soloist on Wednesday Night at Music Hall.

Joseffy will be the soloist at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall next Wednesday night. Mr. Emil Paur will conduct. The programme will be as follows:

Raff—Symphony No. 3, "In the Woods." Part I.—In the Daytime. Impressions and Sensations. Part II.—At Twilight. (a) Revery, (b) Dance of the Dryads. Part III.—At Night. Silent rustling of the woods at night. Entrance and exit of the Wild Hunt with Frau Holle (Hulda) and Wotan. Daybreak.

Schumann—Concerto for Pianoforte, in A minor, Op. 54.

Grieg—Suite, "Peer Gynt." Daybreak. The Death of Aase. Anitra's Dance. The Hall of the Mountain King. The Imps are chasing "Peer Gynt."

Auber—Overture to "Carlo Broschl."

Raff's third symphony is regarded as one of the best illustrations of symphonic musical composition. It is divided into three parts, the first of which, "In the Daytime," gives impressions and sensations. In the second movement the theme is a twilight revery, introducing the "Dance of the Dryads." The final movement opens with the silent murmuring of the woods at night. This is a mysterious fanissimo theme in the 'celli and double-basses alone, which is made the subject of the exposition of a four-part fugue of imitation, in which is described the entrance and exit of the Wild Hunt with Frau Holle (Hulda) and Wotan. This Wild Hunt is worked out with great elaboration and vigor; it swells to fortissimo, then dies away again in the distance, to make way for a picturesque orchestral picture of the gray morning dawn and sunrise.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

A Fine Programme Artistically Rendered—Rafael Joseffy Is the Soloist.

It may have been fortunate or unfortunate that the programme of last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Music Hall led off with Joachim Raff. Taking the view that it is well to serve the best wine last, the selection was fortunate. Raff has produced some compositions that are good, and a great deal that is indifferent—a characteristic largely due to the hurry with which he wrote. But he happens to represent the transition between the old order and the new or dramatic school of music. Such a position is seldom satisfactory. His third symphony belongs to the best of his works. It contains many beauties, but the excellence is not sustained, and the entire work suffers in consequence. Hence, while the moderately large audience applauded warmly, there was no enthusiasm.

It remained for Joseffy to establish a sympathetic bond with the Schumann concerto in A minor, opus 54. This artist possesses one great virtue. His method is always dignified. Never does he yield to the temptation of subordinating clearness to mere exhibitions of technique. Mechanical skill he commands in abundance, but he refrains from parading it in an ostentatious manner to the disadvantage of the intellectual qualities. Simple and unaffected, Joseffy is none the less a true artist, and his virtuosity enabled him to capture the audience completely—a difficult achievement considering the peculiarities of the concerto, which is written almost throughout in the medium of the instrument and places limitations upon brilliancy. Joseffy has retained all of his former limpidness, and has added to its strength. When he had ended a storm of applause swept over the house. Again and again he bowed his acknowledgements, but the clapping would not subside until he had consented to play an encore, for which he chose a transcription of a Schubert song.

The balance of the programme was made up of the well-known "Peer Gynt" suite, by Grieg, and Aubert's overture to "Carlo Broschi." The former got by far the best reception. Its rhythm and melody, its daintiness and charm proved irresistible. Especially noteworthy in an artistic sense was the interpretation of the second movement, representing the death of Aase. There was in the muted notes of the violin a storm of suppressed grief and anguish. The audience seemed most impressed with the fantastical, bizarre effects of the last movement, a vivid characterization of the imps chasing "Peer Gynt."

The Auber overture seems rather light, considering the subject matter of the opera, its chief quality being gracefulness. It was well given.

Those who attend the second Boston Symphony Orchestra performance at Music Hall next Wednesday evening will be privileged once again to hear Rafael Joseffy, the pianist, whose temporary enforced retirement from the concert stage was learned with so much regret by lovers of fine piano-playing. Mr. Joseffy stands easily in the front rank of living pianists, and as the soloist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has elicited warm praise from all the musical critics in both New York and Boston. He will play, with orchestral accompaniment, Schumann's Concerto in A minor, Opus. 54. As is well known, this work, written in 1845, has done much toward the perpetuation of the composer's fame for writings of this character.

It has been commented upon that, in spite of the enormous brilliancy of most of the work, the pianoforte part is written almost throughout in the medium of the instrument, thus gaining little strength from the heavy lower register, and little brilliancy from the upper register thereof. In the rendition by Joseffy this criticism is shorn of its strength, for a performance more beautiful in its clarity and quality of tone, its perfect comprehension of the composer's meaning, its exquisite and unfailing correct adjustment of the technics of piano-playing to the revelation of that meaning, and its respect for the character of the solo instrument, it would be hard to imagine.

There are two other gems in Wednesday night's programme which, as rendered by this finely-trained musical organization, cannot fail to elicit grtification and approval from the cultured audiences which alway attend these concerts. The first of these, and the initial number on the programme, is Raff's Third Symphony "In the Woods," Opus. 153. Raff was undoubtedly one of those geniuses to whom almost constant, and at times extreme, poverty was a real and lasting evil. He was a man of the highest, and, for his time, somewhat new, aims in art. Notwithstanding his rather fragmentary professional education, he was conspicuously a master of the technique of composition—in fact, very few of his cotemporaries possessed his enormous facility in conquering difficulties, nor his often astonishing ease of style. He was a real force in his day, and his influence upon German music and musical thought was conspicuous. This symphony, "In the Woods," is one of the best specimens of pure symphonic writing known to modern composition.

The second of the noteworthy numbers on the programme is Edward Hagernp Greig's suite, "Peer Gyut," Opus. 46. Greig, like Chopin and the Russian composers, Dvorak and Tschaikowsky, gets his inspiration from national sources. Ole Bull may be said to have discovered Greig, for it was he who, on hearing the boy of 15 play the pianoforte, insisted that he be sent at once to Leipzig. Norkraak's songs, Kjerulf's romances, Ole Bull's "Visit to the Sater," and afterward Bjornson's poems and the dramas of Henrik Ibsen have had an ineffaceable influence on Greig's music. The dramatic poem of "Peer Gynt" was written by Ibsen at the midway period of his career—in 1867. Peer Gyut is a Norwegian Faust, whose superabundance of imagination will bring him to destruction if he is not saved by a woman. The synopsis of this poem or allegory by Greig was among the greatest successes of his career as a musician.

* * *

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

An Appreciative Audience Greets the Famed Musicians at Music Hall.

Mr. Rafael Joseffy was the soloist last night at the concert of the Boston Orchestra in Music Hall in Schumann's concerto in A minor (opus 54). This concerto is one of Schumann's greatest and most natural works. Like all his compositions, it is noted for its originality and brilliancy. Schumann thoroughly understood the piano. He knew its limitations and its power. Mr. Joseffy's rendering of the concerto was masterly. As he worked his way into the composition, he warmed up to his work. The last two movements were played with splendid fire and brilliancy, the climax being worthy of the work. Mr. Joseffy's execution was virile, clean-cut and artistic at every point. His soul appeared to be in his work. The applause that followed was so long continued that Director Paur broke his rule, and the pianist gave an encore.

It was a dainty melody of Schubert, arranged by Listz almost in the style of a reverie. It was charmingly played.

The symphony was Raff's "Forest" Symphony, a descriptive work divided into "Daytime," "Twilight" and "Night." Music that is intended to be descriptive of impressions is not always satisfying. Raff has, however, in this symphony developed many beautiful things. Much of the orchestration is rich and of charming color. The reverie, which is a splendidly melodious movement, is the best. The symphony was superbly played.

Grieg's suit, "Peer Gynt," which is full of weird Norse thoughts, so delighted the audience that it was redemanded, but Mr. Paur declined. Curious and marvelous effects are produced with the muted strings. The "Death of Aase"—the second movement—was rendered in the nicest artistic style, and the dance movement that followed was played so beautifully that the contrast was exceedingly effective. The Boston Orchestra has reached a stage of development when it is apparently equal to any task that may be set before it. The concert closed with Auber's overture to "Carlo Broschi."

Mr. Kneisel, the concert master, was not present. Mr. Adamowski was in his place. The whole orchestra worked together with the greatest precision.

The audience was large and gave unstinted evidence of appreciation.

The Bos[illegible]ization, With Rafael Jos[illegible]oloist, Delights A [illegible] Audience.

The concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have become so integral a part of the social season that failure to attend them amounts almost to a breach of social etiquette. Music Hall was filled last night with a large, brilliant audience, representing the cultivated and artistic part of Baltimore society. Many of the ladies were dressed in light gowns, which added bright bits of color to the scene. A few evening bonnets were worn, but the custom of removing hats or bonnets at all evening entertainments is steadily gaining in favor.

The programme yesterday evening consisted of the Raff "Im Walde" symphony; the Schumann piano-concerto in A minor, opus 54; Grieg's "Peer Gynt" suite, and Auber's overture to "Carlo Broschi." Mr. Rafael Joseffy was the soloist. The Raff symphony is descriptive and picturesque, yet adheres closely to classic symphonic forms. The first movement, Allegro, is called: "In the Daytime; Impressions and Sensations."

The second movement pictures a twilight revery and a dance of dryads. The dance of the wood nymphs is in scherzo form, and its orchestration is suggestive of Berlioz's Romeo and Juliet symphony. The last movement opens with a description of the silent murmuring of the woods at night, but the quiet of the night is broken by the sound of hunting horns and the entrance of Hulda and Tootan and their wild hunting train. Raff's warmth of feeling and mastery of the technique of composition have left their impress upon German musical thought, and while his "Lenore" symphony is the more popular of the two, the "Im Walde" symphony is greatly admired by musicians. The audience last night was most enthusiastic over the Largo, the twilight revery.

The Schumann piano concerto is written almost entirely in the middle register of the instrument, and with the exception of an unaccompanied cadence in the first movement there is no opportunity for brilliant work on the part of the soloist until the second movement, the intermezzo. This movement is in simple romanza form. In the latter part of it a succession or cantabile phrases by the strings, is accompanied by brilliant piano arpeggios. Mr. Joseffy's clear accurate touch, his marvelous technique and artistic interpretation have made him a favorite wherever he has played. He was recalled several times after the concerto, and finally gave what is most unusual at these concerts, a little encore.

The Peer Gynt suite has been heard several times at these concerts and loses nothing of its charm from frequent repetition. Like the Raff symphony, the suite is descriptive, but it is different in character. It is based upon Ibsen's poem of the same name, which describes the character of this Norwegian Faust.

The originality, and what Grieg himself called the "Scandinavianism" of the suite, make it a specially attractive number. The orchestra gave it much more sympathetic treatment than they gave to the Raff symphony, which was played rather coldly. There was no lack of warmth, however, in the treatment of both the concerto and the closing number, the light brilliant overture to Carlo Broschi.

THE EVENING STAR.

WASHINGTON.

SATURDAY.........December 11, 1897.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra will present at the Lafayette Square Theater next Tuesday afternoon one of the most attractive programs that it has ever been the good fortune of Washingtonians to hear from this most estimable musical organization. The first number, Dvorak's latest symphony, "From the New World," will doubtless excite much comment and criticism. It will be remembered that Dvoark made a special trip to this country to see if he could not find something to embody in his work and went back with the report that outside of the southern negro melodies there was absolutely nothing he could use. The symphony is, of course, based principally on these negro themes, and the orchestration worked out from them is said to be most beautiful. At any rate one fact is known, and that is that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play the composition in the best of style, and that those who hear it will get in absolutely without flaw, so far as the orchestra is concerned. In contrast to the first number and coming under the head of the "lighter" sort of musical works, Grieg's suite, "Peer Gynt," will doubtless make a hit. The "Peer Gynt" suite is a beautiful creation, written in one of Grieg's happiest veins, and is especially adapted to contrast with a heavier symphony. Beethoven's overture, "Egmont," will close the program. This is well remembered by musicians as one of the very best overtures written. Mr. Staudigi, one of the leading bassos of the Damrosch-Ellis Opera Company, will be the soloist of the occasion. He will sing an aria from "Acis and Galatea" and a second aria from "Spohr's "Faust."

PUBLIC LEDGER

Philadelphia, Tuesday, Dec. 14, 1897.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra—"The Idol's Eye"—"The Geisha"—"The Belle of New York"—Mr. Sothern in Comedy—Vaudeville and Melodrama.

In the presence of a brilliant audience that might well have proved an inspiration to both orchestra and conductor, the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening gave the second concert of the season's series at the Academy of Music. At the head of the programme came Dvorak's E minor ("New World") symphony, which was practically a novelty, though performed before in the Academy. Repeated hearings of this work are convincing as to one thing about it, and that is, that as an epoch-marking composition it is not promising. Dvorak, it may be remembered, became convinced that if America were to have a distinctive school of music it would have to be through the evolution of the primitive strains of the slavery negro, just as other great schools have been formed upon and built up from their respective national folksongs. Hence the "New World" symphony (E minor) as a sort of start. There are many themes from that source throughout the symphony, but the workmanship is Bohemian. It is questionable whether anyone in the audience last night felt the music of any portion of the symphony with the idea that it was American or domestic in any sense. It had much more of the Slavonic suggestion in it. Despite a great deal that seems very like fustian there is an abundance of beauty in the work, the scoring is full, rich and finely wrought, and as an example of music pure and simple it will survive on its merits. As an illustration of what may be done in the direction of creating a school of American music based upon the negro song it is practically valueless. The whole work was superbly played and conducted. Paur was compelled to acknowledge many rounds of applause in consequence, particularly after the beautiful largo (third) movement.

The rest of the orchestral programme comprised Grieg's "Peer Gynt" suite and the "Will-o'-the-Wisps" minuet, "Sylphs" waltz and "Rakoczy" march from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust." Perhaps there is nothing in the whole range of superior programme music more familiar to Academy audiences than these. Whether or not this fact heightened their enjoyment of them last evening is a question; they were played with the perfection of technical finish, but as to whether the real value of the music was not often lost in mere virtuosity is another point.

David Bispham was the soloist of the evening, and he conformed fully to the high standard of the concert. His "Non piu Andrai," from Mozart's "Figaro," was a model of baritone solo singing, both as to his noble intonation and artistic style. He did not make so fine an impression later in an aria from Marschner's "Hans Heiling," but that was chiefly because it was not so well suited to the occasion. He sang the latter aria in the original, and, by the way, his pronunciation was occasionally a little unusual, as, for example, his "Ish liebe dish" for "Ich liebe dich." There was nothing defective about his tone and method, however, and that was the main thing.

The next concert is to be on Monday, January 17.

The Times

PHILADELPHIA, DECEMBER 14, 1897.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

A Large Audience to Listen to the Boston Orchestra at the Academy.

The second concert of the Boston Syyphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music attracted an audience which filled the building to repletion. The Dvorak New World symphony was first on the programme and a rehearing of it but emphasizes the pleasure which the first three movements provide, and the disappointment which the final movement brings. The climax, when it is reached, seems to be arrived at without resort to any unusual methods or novelty of either arrangement or invention, and dispels any anticipation which the previous scoring may have suggested that a realization of their insinuated beauties will be proclaimed. In short the final movement seems to lack all novelty in both instrumentation and construction, and is lacking in the inspiration which abounds throughout the previous movements and especially in the largo. The "Peer Gynt" suite of Grieg and the three selections from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust," all familiar to concert goers, were played with wonderful precision, and were read by Mr. Paur, when the opportunity presented itself, with greater enthusiasm than has ever heretofore been noted, a memorable example of this being the Rakveyz march.

The accompaniments which were played to the songs of Mr. Bispham lacked elasticity and confined the soloist to a metrenome precision which altogether prevented the poetry one expected in his delivery. Mr. Bispham sang Mozart's ever classic "Non Piu Andrai" and Marschner's Hans Heiling aria, "In Janem Tag." The latter has been heard here but seldom, and although rather light, is a fairly pleasing example of melody. Mr. Bispham's work was characterized by manly straightforwardness and convincing tone and he was enthusiastically applauded by an audience that had evidently been brought at last to appreciate his artistic standing.

The reference to Mr. Apthorp's programme notes which refer to Dvorak's symphony being "made up largely from negro melodies from Southern plantations," is a misstatement. Dvorak has stated that he was not even thinking of negro melodies when he conceived the themes for his slow movement. The melody is not a negro tune and the only instance when Dvorak is known to have used a folk song is in the "Husitka" overture when he employed a phrase of the Hussites' Battle Hymn.

The Philadelphia Press.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 14, 1897.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Dvorak's "New World" Symphony Interpreted—Mr. Bispham the Soloist.

If the audience at the Academy of Music last evening, that filled every available space, was not wholly satisfied with Mr. Paur's programme, it was perhaps because it got too little of the orchestra and too little of Mr. Bispham; or, perhaps so far as the orchestra is concerned, not enough variety, since the selections did not as a whole call for all those qualities that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is capable of, for, though there was much of the "lightness of the zephyr," there was not the corresponding weight of authority in full orchestra. Still, the programme was very agreeable and the perfection of execution turns even what may seem trifling into an impressive selection.

The performance of Dvorak's "New World" Symphony, which the literary accompanist declares is made up, so far as thematic material goes, "largely of negro melodies from Southern plantations," has again stirred up Mr. Krehbiel who declares with emphasis: "This is not the case. We are aware that a writer of negro songs is going about the country with the assertion that the principal subject of the slow movement of the symphony is a melody which he sent to the composer through a newspaper reporter, but we do not consider the story worth believing, even for a moment. That melody is not a negro tune, and to use folk-tunes is not the habit of Dr. Dvorak, even in his Bohemian compositions. Beside, if Dr. Dvorak is to be believed, he was not even thinking of negro life when he conceived the themes of his slow movement and worked them out."

This ought to settle the matter, but even Mr. Krehbiel will perhaps admit that in the largo, scherzo and final allegro theme are melodies and rhythms which quaintly suggest plantation songs, although in the adagio and allegro molto and elsewhere certain other melodies recall what passes for East Indian or even African themes in the operatic and programme music of the day. Whatever Dvorak intended, the symphony is so beautiful, particularly the largo, that it should become the favorite with American audiences. Naturally the orchestra gave the shading with exquisite refinement to the subtlest of pianissimos, while the color effects and the more stirring finales were given with beauty of tone and fine spirit.

In the Peer Gynt suite of Grieg, the same refinement was displayed, but the dance of goblins in the ball of mountain trolls was worked up to a fine fury. The Berlioz numbers concluded the orchestral programme, which was brief.

Mr. Bispham, without whom no concert is complete this year, was given a chance to show his humor in a jocoserie of "Figaro's" from the "Marriage of Figaro," and his love-born tendencies in a selection from Marschner's "Hans Heiling." The "Figaro" aria sung is not so well-known as Rossini's "Figaro" aria, since we hear the "Barber" oftener than we do the "Nozze," nor is it so popular as "Leporello's" solos. It has, however, all the graceful humor and tunefulness that is Mozart's, and Mr. Bispham phrased it delightfully. As he had to say "Ich Liebe Dich" over and over again in the Marschner aria, he of course, was in his element, but seemed not to be so distraught with love as is his wont. The art of the singer is, however, so restful that he is the vogue is but due reward to one who is not a stranger within the gates.

Philadelphia Inquirer

UESDAY - - - - DECEMBER 14,18

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

A Delightful Program at the Academy Last Evening.

The second symphony concert of the season took place last night at the Academy of Music. The program was an unusual one, and was in all respects delightful. The numbers were:

"From the New World" Symphony	Dvorak
Aria from the "Marriage of Figaro"	Mozart
"Pier Gynt" Suite	Grieg
Aria from Hans Heilung	Marschner
"Damnation of Faust," three numbers	Berlioz

Soloist—Mr. David Bispham.

Dvorak's symphony has been heard here twice before. It was first given by the Damrosch Orchestra, then by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Nikisch, and last night by the same organization under Director Paur. With all due respect to the annotator of the program there is little in the symphony to suggest his theory that its thematic material is made up of negro melodies. In the first movement there is a theme in a minor key which might be called a negro melody, and might as well be called anything else. The symphony was written soon after Dr. Dvorak's arrival in this country, and most of it was composed in a village in Iowa. There is quite as much of prairie pastoral in it as of negro melody—probably more. The symphony is entirely in E minor, with the exception of the Largo in D flat major, and this last is the most beautiful of all. It is seldom one hears a more pleasing composition of its kind. Each hearing adds to one's appreciation of the symphony, which is not at all times equally enjoyable. The first two movements are the most delightful, and the last is the least so of all. The working out is not highly satisfactory, and the conclusion is far from convincing. Nevertheless it is the most dignified and most important composition to which this country has given birth, and it was played splendidly, saving the conclusion of the scherzo (third movement).

The "Peer Gynt" suite is one of the most fantastic of compositions. It varies in scope, theme and tempo, concluding with the most humorous number in orchestral scores. The "Faust" numbers were given with daintiness and decision.

Mr. Bispham was warmly received, as was proper in his old home. He sang with charming grace and faultless method. Recently he has had an unusual amount of work. He sang in Baltimore Thursday, in this city Saturday afternoon—both times in opera—and Saturday night had the burden of solo work in the Orpheus Club concert. Nevertheless he was in excellent voice last night, and received deserved encomiums. It was an unusually delightful concert.

The North American

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 14, 1897.

MUSIC AT THE ACADEMY.

The Second Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

There was the usual brilliant crowd at the Academy of Music last evening, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Emil Paur, and with the valuable assistance of Mr. David Bispham, gave its second concert for the present season. An attractive programme had been prepared for the occasion, and as the playing of the orchestra is simply the perfection of orchestral performance, the evening was one of unalloyed enjoyment. The symphony was that by Antonin Dvorak in E minor, entitled "From the New World," an inspired and noble work, whose beauty and significance become more apparent and impressive at each fresh hearing. There has been much discussion as to the precise purpose sought to be attained by the composer in his score, and upon this subject a good deal has been written which he would be likely, if put to the question, promptly and emphatically to disavow. The trouble is that there are always those who insist upon precision in matters where no precision is possible or to be desired. Certainly the symphony is not, as some have insisted, an apotheosis of the negro melody, nor does it represent an attempt at the creation or embodiment of an aboriginal musical type. It is enough to accept it as an exposition in musical terms of the impression made upon a sensitive and artistic mind by an experience of life on this side of the Atlantic, an exposition full of poetry, eloquence and charm.

But, after all, the music needs no commentary. It speaks for itself, and its melting, moving, melody-breathing accents, appeal to every heart. Each of its four numbers has its own message and its own beauty, and all four are admirable; but of the four, the largo, with its deep underlying pathos and its wonderful suggestion of a hushed and darkened landscape, and the song as of a nightingale, most musical, most melancholy, is that which lingers longest in the ear. If, as is said, this was written on an Indiana prairie, the sentiment for which it stands is intelligible enough. It was equisitely rendered amid the absolute silence of an intently-listening audience. The other orchestral selections were Grieg's "Peer Gynt" suite and three numbers from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust," all brilliantly interpreted. There was a persistent attempt to force an encore of the closing movement of the suite, which Mr. Paur very properly resisted. At these concerts no encores should be the invariable rule. Mr. Bispham sang with great good taste, splendid sonority and flexibility of voice and faultless method the "Non piu andrai" from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro" and a melodious aria from Marschner's opera of "Hans Heiling."

The date of the third concert is January 17.

NEW YORK HERALD.

NEW YORK, FRIDAY, DECEMBER 17, 1897.

"Thus Spake Zarathustra" Produced with Success by Boston's Famous Orchestra.

The second concert of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Mr. Emil Paur's direction, took place at the Metropolitan Opera House last night. There were two novelties on the programme—Richard Strauss' symphonic poem "Thus Spake Zarathustra" and a violin concerto by Strube, played by Mr. Franz Kneisel. Both were very favorably received.

Strauss' symphonic poem is one of the most important orchestral novelties that has been heard here in many years. It is to music what a tragedy like Ibsen's "Ghosts" is to drama. "Ghosts" is a problem play, with hopeless insanity as the tragic solution of the problem.

"Thus Spake Zarathustra" is a problem symphony, based on a philosophical treatise of the same title by Friedrich Nietzsche, the German philosopher—a few years ago a leader of modern German thought, now the inmate of a madhouse.

Nietzsche's system of philosophy attacks Christianity as an enervating religion, made for weaklings, and apotheosizes strength, physical vitality and courage. His "Thus Spake Zarathustra" (Zoroaster) is part prose-poem, part fiction, part essay, and the Zarathustra who speaks out of it is Nietzsche himself.

Strauss is a master of all the resources of modern instrumentation, and this symphonic poem is a brilliant piece of orchestration. It has a broad, noble introduction and is full of original motives which are worked out in a thoroughly effective manner. It was superbly played.

The violin concerto was a pleasant Boston Symphony family affair. Mr. Kneisel stepped from his place as concertmeister and Mr. Strube, the composer, advanced from further back in the orchestra to the conductor's desk, while Mr. Paur sat down among the violins and listened. The concerto is pretty and in places even brilliant, and was very well played.

Beethoven's fifth symphony (Beethoven was born December 16, 1770). Weingartner's orchestral arrangement of Weber's "Invitation to the Dance" and Auber's "Carlo Broschi" overture completed the programme.

The Sun.

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 17, 1897.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Second Concert of Its Season Here Given Last Night.

The Boston Symphony Concert given last evening, the second of this season's series, had a somewhat important programme, certainly one that claimed deep attention on account of two works never before heard in New York. These were Johann Strauss's Symphonic Poem entitled "Thus Spake Zarathustra," and a violin concerto composed by Mr. Gustav Strube, a member of the orchestra. The concerto was sympathetically and pleasingly interpretrd by Mr. Kneisel, and had a goodly measure of success, notwithstanding the fact that Mr. Strube's work can by no means be accorded a place among any but that sort of music which is valuable from local interest alone.

It does not possess sufficient beauty to be able to delight with more than a passing and very ephemeral charm, and, although it conforms to set rules of composition and is an intelligent exposition of often formulated ideas, yet it remains only an echo of familiar phrases neatly arranged and but slightly transcribed. The opening theme of the last movement is the single point of spontaneously pretty melody. The concerto is well instrumented, showing knowledge and skill, and is agreeable to the ear. It does not, however, add to the store of musical literature one grain of weight that was not there before from what has up to this time been invented.

Of quite another calibre is the really great work by that man of undoubted genius, Johann Strauss. We use genius in the seuse of extraordinary talent, and not meaning creative power. All that Strauss has as yet done Richard Wagner had accomplished before him, and better. Strauss has not added a ray of light to the world that Wagner had not long ago illuminated it with. In Strauss's writing there is the constant show of intellectual effort which no magic veil of inspiration either decorates or hides. But in contrapuntal skill he is a giant, as he is also in fertility of thought. He is even more wonderful in his unbounded cleverness of orchestration, possessing in this regard a mixture of the qualities of Berlioz and Wagner, the two most remarkable men in this department of art that ever lived.

"Zarathustra" annihilates form and rhythm, unless the restless flow of waves in midocean can be said to have these qualities. But with what splendid effects of color does Strauss paint his tone poem, laid on his canvas in startling brilliancy and with infinite variety. Besides this he contrives to give sensations of heaviness, of lightness, of height and depth—and he is able to play upon every human feeling and emotion at will, as one would upon a cathedral organ.

Without the elucidation given in the programme pamphlet from the competent pen of H. Reimann of Berlin, scarcely any mortal could imagine just what Strauss intended to convey of intense thought and high philosophy in his involved musical themes and sentences. With this guide, however, all becomes plain—that is to say, as plain as Nietsche, whose frenzied abnormal poem Strauss has here illustrated, will allow things to become. Not every one would care to ascend to such dizzy heights of bewildering imagination as Nietsche and Strauss invite to in their work. And yet the subject—man's never-ending, ever-fruitless search for happiness and peace—is surely the most vitally absorbing one to be found. Nietsche, who has been insane, seems to linger upon the borderland separating lunacy and soundness of mind. At least his "Zarathustra" demands the contemplation of wildest imaginings to an unhealthful degree—and it is a question open to discussion whether music has not been asked to go out of its true and legitimate sphere when it is made to illustrate incoherent delirious fancies.

Mr. Kneisel and his men never showed their admirable powers of interpretation to fuller advantage than in this symphonic poem. They gave a magnificent rendering to it and to all the music of their scheme. Beethoven's Symphony No. 5 had the very spirit of the old master upon it, while Weingartner's arrangement of Weber's lovely "Invitation to the Dance" and Auber's overture had their own peculiar necessary lightness and buoyancy in ample degree.

The Evening Sun.

Subscriptions by Mail, Post Paid.

THE EVENING SUN, per month	.20
THE EVENING SUN, per year	$2.00

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 17, 1897.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Emil Paur conducting, gave its second concert of the season at the Metropolitan Opera House last evening. On the stage a huge wreath of green commemorated Beethoven's birth on Dec. 16, 1770, and the composer's fifth symphony was the opening number on the programme. It was finely played. The A-flat andante movement was received with almost religious earnestness by the musical audience. Two pieces of music were new. A manuscript concerto for violin by Gustav Strube, member of the orchestra, made an excellent impression. Graceful, singing melodies and judicious instrumentation were its features. Kneisel played the solo and Strube himself came from the back row of first violins to take the conductor's stand. Herr Paur meanwhile sat facing the audience and smiled good naturedly, his big, boyish head always nodding to the measures of Herr Strube. Of the second new piece, Richard Strauss's Symphonic Poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," the critics will talk more than the general public. It is a distressing attempt to make an opera-without-words based on a prose-poem by a German philosopher who is now in a madhouse. The orchestra did wonders and the lucid intervals of music afforded some really beautiful tone-pictures. The Wagnerian style was often apparent, and of course there was provided the usual "diagram" of motives, translated from mystical German. But "Zarathustra" was in music what in another field is called a "purple cow"; it was monstrous. The relief of Weber's "Invitation to the Dance" and Auber's overture to "Carlo Broschi" was welcomed by the intelligent and critical audience that heard last evening's concert.

THE MAIL AND EXPRESS,
Broadway and Fulton St., New York
FRIDAY EVENING, DEC. 17, 1897.

THE WORLD OF MUSIC.

Richard Strauss's "Thus Spake Zarathustra" Played by the Boston Orchestra—Musical Art Society.

To what limits programme music may reach the present generation may not be able to tell, and yet Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," which the Boston Symphony Orchestra played last night in the Metropolitan Opera House for the first time in New York, gave warning that the bounds were not far away and that people could hardly listen seriously to music that encroached further on the province of literature and philosophy. A first impression, though not always of much value, is yet an index to the sensation that an average audience undergoes, some of the time at least, during every orchestral concert. It is permissible, therefore, to set down such an impression regarding a new work, provided it be understood that it is a first impression. "Thus Spake Zarathustra," then, seemed last night to sound the doom of attempts to make music go further toward the expression of things in which it has no concern. It is difficult to believe that Strauss or any other man could find a more recondite subject to inspire a composition. As was hinted at in this column on Wednesday, Nietzsche's philosophy laid powerful hands on the young composer. The analysis which was printed in the programme books last evening was such an indispensable guide to the understanding of the music that it is given, in part, herewith. It is the work of Dr. H. Riemann, the noted German musical writer, and was published originally in the programme book of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra in the season of 1896-97. It is translated by William F. Apthorp. Dr. Riemann says:

"Fr. Nietzsche's 'Thus spake Zarathustra' is, in language, form and contents, far more a poetic than a philosophical work. 'It is,' as Wiegand says, 'a grandiose symbolical thought-poem.' This fact, which is admitted also by other connoisseurs of Nietzsche, and indeed by the best of them, is not only a general justification of a composer's drawing incitement to a tone-creation from that work, but specifically contradicts the suspicion, openly expressed before hearing this tone-poem of Strauss's, that this new 'sensational' composition was to have to do with 'philosophy set to music,' that is, with 'musical philosophizing.'

"Nietzsche's 'Zarathustra,' which has only its name in common with the founder of the Persian religion, of whom history tells us, is the idealistic concrete presonification of Nietzsche's views on Life, his own reckless and boundless Individualism clothed in a symbolic form.

"Strauss has preceded his score with the first section of Zarathustra's preface. As it most clearly reveals Zarathustra's individuality in 'diamond splendor of speech,' let it be communicated here:

"'When Zarathustra was 30 years old, he left his home and the lake of his home and went into the mountains. Here he enjoyed his mind and his solitude, and did not tire thereof for ten years. But at last his heart changed—and one morning he rose with the dawn, stood before the sun, and spoke thus to it:

"'Thou great star! What were thy happiness, hadst thou not him upon whom thou shinest! For ten years hast thou come up here to my high place: thou wouldst have had enough of thy light and thy path, without me, my eagle, and my serpent.

"'But we awaited thee every morning, took from thee of thy superfluity and blessed thee therefor.

"'Behold, I am tired of my wisdom, like the bee that has gathered too much honey; I need hands to stretch forth. I would fain give away and divide, till the wise among men shall once more rejoice in their folly, and the poor in their riches.

"'For this I must climb down to the depths; as thou dost of evenings, when thou goest behind the sea and bringest thy light to the Nether World, thou over-rich star!

"'I must, like thee, go down, as men call it, to whom I would descend. So bless me, then, thou calm Eye, that can see an all too great happiness without envy. Bless the goblet that longs to overflow, that water may run golden therefrom and bear the reflection of thine ecstasy to the ends of the earth! Behold, this goblet would fain once more be empty, and Zarathustra would become a man again.'

"'—Thus began Zarathustra's downfall—'

"From the mountains Zarathustra goes down to men and preaches: 'I teach you the Over-man. Man is something that must be overcome. What have ye done to overcome him? * * * The Over-man is the meaning of the Earth * * * Man is a rope, made fast between the Beast and the Over-man—a rope over an abyss. A dangerous passing-over, a dangerous on-the-way, a dangerous staying-behind, a dangerous shuddering and standing-still. What is great in Man is that he is a bridge and not a purpose; what can be loved in Man is that he is a transition and a downfall. * * * What good and eivl is, that no one yet knows, unless it be he who creates! But this one is he who creates Man's goal and gives the Earth its meaning: he alone creates it that something shall be good and evil.'

The great problem that Zarathustra tries o solve in his speech is: to teach men the eification of Life; all human values must e 'transvalued,' and therewith a new order f the universe created, 'beyond good and vil.' Zarathustra himself is this 'world beond,' he is the freest of the free, ho descries in all Becoming only a yearnng after his own self and teaching, which yearning alone can overcome the 'simian' world and 'simian' Mankind, slaves of conventional tradition, and offer to Man—not the Happiness of Life, for there is no such thing—but the 'Fulness of Life,' in the joy of the senses, in the triumphant exuberance of vitality, in the pure, lofty naturalness of the Antique, in short, in the fusion of God, World and Ego. This art of life of Zarathustra's shall be shared by Mankind; herein shall Zarathustra be dissolved in Mankind and 'go down!' Thus are also to be explained the significant closing words of the fourth chapter of 'Twilight of the Idols.' 'Mid-day: the moment of the shortest shadow; the end of the longest error. The culminating point of Humanity: Incipit Zarathustra.'

"Strauss has planned out his tone-poem 'freely after Nietzsche.' Beside the already quoted portion of the preface, which is appended to the score, the composer has put captions to separate divisions of his work, borrowed from Nietzsche's book. A cursory glance at the Zarathustra captions suffices to show that he made his selections by no means from a philosophical, but rather from a purely musical point of view. It almost seems to me as if Strauss had given a far more natural and less remote—and hence an intrinsically anti-Nietzschesque—interpretation to 'Of Joys and Passions.' At all events, the composer has made Yearning the fundamental trait in his work: a struggle and wrestling after one highest ideal—such as is, in this way at least, quite foreign to Nietzsche. Then there is a Faust-like streak in the whole, and the musician feels himself the while (and because thereof!) on familiar ground. The work must therefore be looked upon as an attempt to re-echo in tones certain strong, we will even say, overwhelming psychical impressions which the composer had received from Nietzsche's Zarathustra poem. The work itself will have to stand the test of being rightly judged according to its own character, even without any Zarathustra programme (and, with all the modest reserve which my position as analyst imposes upon me, I would say, nevertheless, that it will be able to stand this test).

"An introduction of rare simplicity and grandeur opens the work. Dull, soft roll of the bass drum with tremolo of the double basses on low C and the long-sustained lowest tone of the organ, which is reinforced by the double bassoon; then in the fifth measure a solemn motive of the four trumpets, consisting of the elementary tones; fundamental, fifth and octave; then tutti in C major, with an immediate change to C minor (followed forthwith by the reverse transformation from C minor to C major). When the call of the trumpets has sounded for the third time, the orchestra closes the period with a cadence that gradually rises to a climax of elemental force. "Thus spake Zarathustra" —the Over-man, the mysterious solver of the World-riddle!"—H. Riemann.

Dr. Riemann's analysis goes on to give the captions and the corresponding themes. The captions are "Of the Dwellers in the Rear World," "Of Joys and Passions," "Of Science," and "The Convalescent," the motives attempting to express yearning and a number of other feelings, some amenable to musical treatment and some distinctly rebellious. A fugue, of more skill than beauty, and a waltz of cheap quality are part of the development. The analyst classifies twenty-one different themes, and these are combined, sometimes three or four at a time, with the technique of a master. The beginning and ending are by all odds the most valuable parts of Strauss's composition. Really impressive is that long pedal note from the organ and though the bizarre, the simply curious, preponderates to an extent that the Nietzsche text justifies, though nothing else does, yet it is conceivable that one might enjoy the work as far as the beginning of the fugue, from the point of view of pure music, and irrespective of programme books. The themes would no doubt grow less perplexing and unsatisfying after further hearing, and the structure would seem more coherent. The dissonances would probably soften into their proper places in one's perceptions, and the novelty of the orchestration would cease to cause amusement, as it did last evening. The richness of some of the motives in suggestions for development and the ingenious and altogether original ways in which Strauss extracts from them their contents, arouse admiration and respect for the composer's powers, although one may still believe that he could have exerted those powers in a more useful direction.

The fugue is not interesting, save as a feat of technique. It seems to bear little upon the rest of the tone poem, and, although it is successful enough as illustrating Zarathustra's notions about science, to which task it is assigned, it does not come nearer to proving that science and music should be mixed. The waltz is downright commonplace, and not until the end is in sight, and twelve strokes of a bell (or rather, of cymbals), have sounded, does the enjoyment begin again. The ending is a conflict between the tonalities of B major and C major, and is disconcerting, though effective. It seems to leave the questions about which Zarathustra has concerned himself as far from solution as before.

The orchestration is a step in advance of anything yet heard in New York, or, probably, anything that has yet been written, unless it be that of "Till Eulenspiegel," the "musical joke," by the same composer, which was brought forward here a year ago. If Strauss should ever throw overboard his notions as to what music can or cannot be made to express, and should have anything definite and idiomatically musical to say, he has a vocabulary that is certainly barely surpassed. But although Herr Strauss is only 33 years old, it is to be feared that there is not much hope for him. It is probably a useful undertaking to mark out musical limits already too capacious, but Strauss is a man who can ill be spared for such a job, especially by arid Germany. If Strauss had written a music drama and this sort of music had occurred in it, it is possible that the stage action might have helped carry the music, though the drama would of necessity have been extraordinary. But it is incredible that a composition that needs a programme book to make it even tolerable should live. Everything is sacrificed to gain expression.

Mr. Paur and his orchestra played "Thus Spake Zarathustra" with amazing skill. Its qualities were set forth in as favorable a light as possible. It was genuinely interesting to hear this much-discussed work.

Another novelty was on the programme in the shape of Gustave Strube's violin concerto, which was conducted by the composer, who is a member of the orchestra, and of which the solo part was played by Mr. Franz Kneisel. The concerto was finished a year ago, and was first heard at the Worcester Music Festival this fall. It is well worth hearing, for it contains sound and valuable musical ideas, and the composer has developed them with a good deal of strength and coherence. The orchestration is generally effective, although in the middle of the third movement the solo instrument seems to hang in mid-air without support. Mr. Strube conducted his concerto with good taste, and Mr. Kneisel played admirably the cadenza, his own, being more than the mere usual flourish of trumpets.

The other numbers last night were the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven, the Von Weber "Invitation to the Dance" (Weingartner's arrangement), and Auber's overture to "Carlo Broschi."

The World
ed by the Press Publishing Company, 53 to 63 PARK
New York.

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 17, 1897.

RADICALISM IN MUSIC.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Introduces Strauss's Extraoidinary "Thus Spake Zarathustra."

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second New York concert at the Metropolitan Opera-House last evening As usual the programme was one of curious constitution. It commenced with a Beethoven symphony—the Fifth. This was followed by a violin concerto composed by a young musician who keeps his compositions in the privacy of manuscript form. Then the orchestra introduced Richard Strauss's "Thus Spake Zarathustra," the very last word in radical music; and having given to the audience one of the most extraordinary compositions ever written, to think, reflect and ponder over, disturbed the mood with Weber's "Invitation to the Dance" and one of Auber's overtures. The symphony was superbly played. Mr. Paur's reading was strictly conservative and traditional. He did not play havoc with the tempi and the spirit of the work as other conductors have recently done with Beethoven's music.

The violin concerto is by Gustav Struhe, a young German musician who has been one of the first violins in the Boston Orchestra since 1891. The opus is an admirable composition, in which the violinist-composer has plainly expressed his adoration for his instrument and his full knowledge of its possibilities. It has three movements—two allegros joined by an adagio. The adagio is exquisitely melodious. There is in the concerto, too, the feeling of an enthusiastic musician, the freshness and vitality of healthy youth and a very extensive knowledge of orchestration. Mr. Franz Kneisel, to whom the concerto is dedicated, played it with rare care, with great polish and with affection. The composer conducted, and the fraternity which exists in this model body of musicians and is one of the important factors in its pre-eminence was well exhibited by the association.

It is impossible to form a definite and fixed opinion of the Strauss composition after one hearing. It is a tremendous composition in which a man of extraordinary talent, possessing a marvellous command of orchestral detail, revelling in color effects that become gross from mere exaggeration, audacious in his desire to be original, radical in his defiance of the established in harmony, aiming at the unusual and the sensational to emphasize his points, and yet withal a true musician at heart, has sought to express in music the significance of what has been called in literature "a grandiose symbolical thought-poem."

The first impression of this symphonic poem is a mixed one. The melodic vein exploited is one of beauty; the elaboration is that of a composer who hardly knows his great strength and abuses of it. At times the color is exquisite; and then again it is laid on thick, in splashes and blots. In his treatment of the instruments Strauss has devised combinations which are sometimes strokes of genius and sometimes puerile. Genius pervades the work, but it is genius that has yet to find the proper stability.

The performance of this opus was the apotheosis of the orchestra. It has hardly its equal in its technical requirements. It can be played only by an orchestra of virtuosi such as these men from Boston.

The Evening Post.
New York, Friday, Dec. 17, 1897.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Emil Paur has won the distinction of being considered the most eccentric and uninteresting programme-maker of the time, and, unluckily, at last evening's metropolitan concert of the Boston Orchestra he beat his own record. Indeed, he seems to have a special grudge against quondam New York, for the programmes he arranges for the Borough of Brooklyn are usually much more tempting. There, for instance, he plays to-morrow evening a symphonic suite by the Russian, Rimsky-Korsakoff, which we should have liked to hear, and Raff's poetic and shamefully neglected Forest Symphony, while the New York programme contained Beethoven's fifth symphony (its 375,916th performance, or thereabouts), a concerto by a Boston violinist, Richard Strauss's absurd "Thus Spake Zarathustra," a Weber waltz, and an Auber overture—a most extraordinary hodge-podge.

To be made interesting at the present day, Beethoven's symphonies need to be interpreted with a great deal more nuance of expression than the Boston Orchestra bestows on them under its present leader. Bostonians, as a rule, are not educated up to expression in music (they like it mathematical and intellectual purely), but we New Yorkers are, and we miss it when we do not get it. There was, too, a curious harshness in the band's tone last evening, and in the last movement there was a passage where the orchestral groups were at sixes and sevens, so that it seemed for a moment as if some disaster would come to pass. Had such a thing happened to a New York orchestra, a great hullabaloo would have been raised in the press; but when it happens to the Boston folk, not a word is said. We are very polite, don't you know, to visitors.

The violin concerto was by Mr. Gustav Strube, a member of the Boston Orchestra. It was a welcome relief from the dreary round of the five or six conventional concertos. It is admirably written for the solo instrument, beautifully orchestrated, and while the musical invention is not always up to concert pitch, there are many dainty details, especially in the slow movement. Mr. Kneisel played the solo part with that consummate art which has endeared him to all lovers of good music, and the composer conducted the work personally. It was well received.

Strauss's new symphonic poem was then played, for the first time in New York, and it is to be sincerely hoped the last time. It is intended to be an illustration in tones of some of the features of Nietzsche's "Thus Spake Zarathustra." Nietzsche, though he lives in a lunatic asylum, is one of Germany's favorite philosophers just at present, and his crazy, rambling works have even been translated into English. He is a man whom Austria's most eminent surgeon, the late Dr. Billroth, characterized as "a poor devil who, impotent to create anything himself, abuses everybody. . . . Because he is diseased in body and mind, he pronounces everything that is healthy in man disease, mistakes progress for decadence, liberty for imbecility, everything that is noble for senility. . . . That such books can reach a second edition is indeed a sign of degeneration in our literary and artistic taste." We may add that it is also a sign of degeneration to have composers attach their productions to such mystic rubbish as Nietzsche's book. Strauss, like Nietzsche, is impotent to create anything new, but as you cannot abuse people in music, he abuses the divine art itself, by taking unwarranted liberties with it. His mind seems to be an absolute desert as regards tangible musical thoughts (original melodies); what he does invent is new cacophonies and new tricks of orchestration. In that last respect he resembles Berlioz. There are not a few new touches of coloring in this symphonic poem, but they are bizarre and sensational rather than beautiful and touching, or dramatic. Richard Strauss has as amazing technical ingenuity as Brahms—though of a different sort altogether—but that is a very different thing from genius. There is more genius in a waltz of Johann Strauss than in a dozen such elaborate works by his namesake. New York was of course bound to hear this score, and Mr. Paur and his men played it with astounding virtuosity; but let us be thankful that the trial is over.

Mr. Paur pursued his perverseness nearly to the end of his programme, for he chose Weingartner's new arrangement of Weber's "Invitation to the Dance" in place of Berlioz's, which is infinitely more poetic and true to the spirit of Weber than the German's, which even takes liberties with the text. However, Weingartner's arrangement is highly spoken of by no less an authority than Weingartner himself, who does not like Berlioz's. That settles it, of course. "Whoso bloweth not his own horn, the same shall not be blown," as Mr. Charles Black has remarked.

The Commercial Advertiser.

By The Commercial Advertiser Association.

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, DEC. 17, 1897.

There are moments during the performance of Richard Strauss's symphonic poem, Thus Spake Zarathustra, when the listener is ready to call it a "shilling shocker." There are other moments, though much fewer, when he is equally ready to use the word sublime. There are still other moments when he is prone to cry out with wonder at the mastery of polyphony and instrumentation that Strauss reveals. At times even, he is half willing to believe the gossipping tales that have drifted hither from Munich that the composer is not altogether sound in mind. No man that was quite sane, would seemingly have attempted the task that he has at moments set himself, and no sane man could have achieved it with such surety and authority. There is power in abundance in Thus Spake Zarathustra, often misused, perverted and failing of its end, but remaining power still.

In conception and in execution the symphonic poem is huge—almost stupendous. Stripped of Nietzsche's bewildering nomenclature, it is the enduring human aspiration toward a receding ideal, the incessant strivings and longings and dissatisfaction of the sons of men, and the varied and empty rewards of their quest that Strauss would embody in it. He intended it, if what seems an inspired analysis is to be trusted, as a kind of epic of the restlessness of certain minds in these last years of the nineteenth century. In execution, he strove to achieve mighty feats of polyphony, and to prove the capacity of the modern orchestra to the utmost. A mere list of his orchestral apparatus is impressive—one piccolo flute, three flutes, three oboes, one English horn, one E-flat clarinet, two ordinary clarinets, one bass clarinet, three bassoons, one double bassoon, six horns, four trumpets, three trombones, two bass tubas, one pair of kettledrums, bass drum, cymbals, triangle, glockenspiel, one low bell, two harps, the usual strings, and an organ. In the Boston orchestra, last evening, in its second concert for the winter in the Metropolitan Opera House, there were all the instruments that Strauss demanded. Mr. Paur has diligently and intelligently studied the music, and there have been endless rehearsals and two previous public performances of it. Its difficulties and intricacies give wondering pause; but the conductor read it with sympathetic penetration, and his men played it like little masters.

There is no doubt that Strauss has tried to force and to overpass the limits of music in Thus Spake Zarathustra. It can reflect mental states; but it cannot reveal mental processes. Tones cannot reason, if by a liberal extension of the term Zarathustra can be said to reason at all. Yet to say that Strauss has tried to set forth in his symphonic poem the philosophy of Nietzsche is to do him some injustice. His Zarathustra is a poem, and it is the moods that long meditation upon it inspires in Strauss, rather than its teachings, that the composer tries to reflect in his work. He is even willing that his hearers should listen to it and judge of it as absolute music; but, without such a detailed analysis as appeared in the programme books last night, it is to be feared that they would find little in it but a riot of polyphony and instrumentation. Even with a programme, their impressions are likely to be exceedingly confused and obscure. Nietzsche's bizarre and rhapsodic views of life, which his disciples like to call his philosophy, are unknown to most of us that even pretend to some acquaintance with such things. Music is not only an unfit but an impossible vehicle for their proclamation. The average listener must, perforce, hear Strauss's symphonic poem as absolute music, colored by such moods of the composer and of Nietzsche as he can guess. If he must put a philosophic interpretation upon it, he may find that suggested in the preceding paragraph.

As absolute or as programme music, the beginning of Thus Spake Zarathustra is almost sublime. In Nietzsche's poem he stands on the heights of his mountain solitude and salutes the rising sun before he descends into the world beneath, to his downfall. In Strauss's music, with the utmost nobility, simplicity, breadth and even grandeur, the bass drum, the double-basses and the organ form a dark and surging background; above them the trumpets thrice give out an austere and elemental theme. There are full orchestral chords, and with them the short introduction rises to thrilling climax. Zarathustra is ready to speak; but naught that he says approaches the majesty of the passage that introduces him. Throughout his sayings the mystery of life, the great and gnawing discontent, the vain pursuit of the ideal beset him. "The great yearning" Nietzsche and Strauss call it, and the motive by which the composer typifies it returns again and again in endless guises and combinations. Zarathustra seeks solace among those that find their peace in religion, mirrored by a sombre fragment of the Gregorian setting of the creed of the Church. He turns to "joy and passions," but in rude pleasures the "great yearning" is still unsatisfied. He mocks, he sneers, he laughs, he dances madly; he hears the song of lovers of night; he has recourse to science and meditates upon the death of things, and each phase of his quest has its theme or themes. Yet still there is no solution, no solace. There are intermittent glimpses, indeed, of relief and peace; but they flicker and fade. Hear the conclusion of the whole matter, Strauss seems to say at the end, there is no answer, no rest. Men must go on forever and a day with their vain strivings. Higher and higher and softer and softer, the motive of "the great yearning" rises in delicate harmonies in the violins. A dissonant chord in the trombones lacerates them like a jagged knife. The double basses hint at the old questionings. The keys of B major and C major vex each other and the hearer. And so in harassing dissonance the symphonic poem ends.

The climax of Thus Spake Zarathustra is—to make a paradox—its beginning. Nowhere in it does Strauss rise to such a height, musical or poetical, as he there attains. In effectiveness the despairing, torturing ending of the whole is perhaps as admirable, but it is not to be compared with the might and majesty of the opening measures. There is sombre beauty and moving breadth in what may be called the andante of the pietists. There is high imagination in the voices of the night. There is a perverse ingenuity and eccentricity in the dance that carries probably exactly the bizarre and sardonic impression that the composer would convey. On the other hand, the fugue, in which science offers its solace, is a sorry thing as absolute music, and the measures "of joy and of passion" are mere sound and fury. Time and again, there is noise seemingly only for noise's sake; perversity only to surprise and to shock; ugliness that has no apparent purpose but to slap the listener in the face.

Yet underneath all and over all, as Nietsche himself might say, there is the impression of Strauss's tremendous, but unbalanced and hollow power. There are miracles of modulation and combination in Thus Spake Zarathustra; at moments Strauss's polyphony is gigantic; but the musical and emotional result is pathetically disproportionate to the means by which he achieves it. There is instrumentation in the symphonic poem that moves the listener to amazed admiration, that makes his head reel by its opulence, its brilliance, its perverse originality, its striking felicity and its unflagging vigor. If an orchestra could set forth and develop Nietzsche's philosophy, Richard Strauss, above all other men, could make its instruments do it. Yet even he cannot achieve the impossible. His instrumentation is as disproportionate as his polyphony to the results that he gains, and he lacks the sense of humor, to say nothing of reserve, that would save him from pitiably ludicrous attempts to make trumpets snicker and bassoons sneer. Nietzsche is now in a madhouse; the gossips whisper that Strauss is not wholly sane; and Thus Spake Zarathustra is the voice of such an unbalanced pair.

In strongest possible contrast with the Boston Symphony concert was that of the Musical Art Society in Carnegie Hall last night. At the one the listeners were alternately dazed and beaten down, as it were, with wonder and amazement, and uplifted and enthralled by the mystical and well-nigh incomprehensible work of the most modern of modern musicians, who called upon their minds no less than on their emotions. At the other it was the unmixed pleasure of purely sensuous enjoyment that comes from that melody in voices in which the old masters excelled that was the reward of the hearing. Rarely has a clash in dates been so regrettable as that between the Boston Orchestra and the Musical Art Society, for the lover of music could ill afford to miss either, and whatever choice he made would not free him from regrets that nature had not allowed him to be in two places at the same time.

The New York Times.

"All the News That's Fit to Print."

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.

NEW YORK, FRIDAY, DEC. 17, 1897.

IN THE WORLD OF MUSIC

Second Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

NEW WORK BY RICHARD STRAUSS

"Thus Spake Zarathustra" Is a Puzzle—A New Violin Concerto by Gustav Strube.

The second concert of the twelfth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this city, which took place at the Metropolitan Opera House last night, was one which gave music lovers abundant food for thought. The programme, which was extremely generous in its length, contained two novelties, one of them of a nature to make people sit up and think, which is not a congenial occupation to most concert-goers. The list was as follows: Symphony in C minor, Beethoven; concerto for violin, (first time in New York.) Gustav Strube; symphonic poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," (first time in New York,) Richard Strauss; "Invitation to the Dance," Weber, orchestration by Felix Weingartner, and overture to "Carlo Broschi," Auber.

Mr. Strube is a member of the orchestra, and his concerto has been played by Franz Kneisel at the Worcester festival and in Boston. Richard Strauss is a member of the remarkable Munich coterie, and other compositions from his pen have been heard here. His "Thus Spake Zarathustra" has been played in Boston. It was heard last night by an audience of evident refinement with silent wonder. At its conclusion there was some courteous applause for the splendid performance, one of the most stupendous conquests of difficulty ever achieved by Mr. Paur and his men, but there was no evidence of public joy.

It is altogether improbable that any hearer would be able to form any idea of the purpose of "Thus Spake Zarathustra" without the aid of the programme notes. Mr. W. F. Apthorp, who writes these notes for the Boston Orchestra, has translated the notes of Herr Reimann, who prepares the programme books for the Berlin Philharmonic concerts. A reading of these translations is sufficient to fill one with wonder and amazement. Not every one has read the reflective rhapsodies of Friederich Nietsche, a German writer, beside whom Nordau is as Mozart beside Wagner. Nietsche's Zarathustra is conceived to be the "mysterious solver of the world-riddle"—whatever that may be. He discourses first of the "dwellers in the rear world," who seek for the solution in religion. Mr. Strauss having announced the personality of Zarathustra in a motive consisting of C, G, and C, ascending, proceeds to indicate the religious fraternity by a "Credo." Then follows a passage designed to indicate yearning, after which the composer deals with Zarathustra's words, "Sing with boisterous song." There is no question about the boisterousness.

The next division of the work is entitled "Of Joys and Passions," and this contains some of Mr. Strauss's most brilliant writing. To attempt to follow his scheme through all its details would only confuse the reader, but it may be said that he works out his different motives with great skill. The division called "Of Science" is, of course, fugal, out the yearning motive returns and leads to a dance-melody, which is brilliantly written. Mr. Strauss next discourses of "The Convalescent," who is supposed to laugh in clarinets, oboes, and trumpets, and to sing a "dance song" in the strings. The dance song breaks into a waltz, in which solo violins are used with uncommonly fine effect. After the convalescent period we are treated to a "Song of the Night Wanderer," in which cymbals, bass drums, and a whole seacoast battery of percussion instruments strike midnight. After this comes the coda, a curiously effective piece of writing.

"Thus Spake Zarathustra" is not a composition that courts analysis in print. No doubt a person thoroughly familiar with Nietsche's book will find in it a grandiose musical embodiment of the moods of the work. But to any one who has not read the book this composition must remain a tonal riddle, to which the title offers no key. As a piece of music it presents itself to the hearer as an immensely brilliant piece of orchestration. All the resources of modern instrumentation are employed with masterly skill, and the massive tutti effects are indeed noble. Furthermore, it must be noted that in the working together of his various themes, Mr. Strauss has displayed a masterly grasp of the art of polyphonic writing. His scholarship is beyond dispute. His melodic invention is at times feeble, but its feebleness is well concealed by an enormous vigor of movement and the breathless strenuousness of the orchestration.

The chief musical beauties of the composition are to be sought in the magnificent proclamation of the opening measures, one of the broadest of all extant pieces of orchestral writing, in the really beautiful religious andante and in the dance part, which is a most original treatment of a waltz movement. In some of the other portions of the work out-and-out ugliness reigns supreme, and for prolix tiresomeness nothing could exceed the lace-work fugue, which has all the energy of a turtle and the movement of a snail.

As a whole "Thus Spake Zarathustra" is not a successful work. It leans altogether too heavily upon thought outside of itself. It undertakes altogether too much. Music is incapable of definite story telling, and when it tries to illustrate purely mental processes, as it does over and over again in this work, it is bound to fail. Who can construct from this composition either the personality or the thought of Zarathustra? One can recognize alternating moods of sombre gloom, tragic despair and equally tragic rejoicing. But what is it all about?

Mr. Strauss owes something to Wagner. He has borrowed some rhythms, some melodic progresssions, and some instrumental diction from him. You shall hear, if you attend, the voices of Tannhäuser, Tristan, and the strident Valkyrie [illegible] work. But they had text to explain their song, and there was an organic union which resulted in complete information for the listener. But Strauss has endeavored to effect an organic union with a scheme of thought dissociated from his music and unknown to the hearer. He has neglected to observe the boundaries that lie between music and poetry. He has striven with thunders of sound and intricate tricks of instrumentation to convey to us the feelings of a Zarathustra whom we do not know and who is not a typical being anyhow. We are puzzled, troubled, amazed, if we think at all. If we do not, we are stunned by the fury of it all. We are left in the dark. We cannot solve this world-riddle of music. Perhaps that is the state in which Strauss aimed to leave us. He has done it.

Of a very different style is the charming violin concerto of Mr. Strube. This is an unpretentious work, kept within the limits of musical sanity as well as within those of the solo instrument. It is compact, concise, clear, and delightfully unaffected in style. Its first movement is brief, even laconic, and the composer speedily comes to his point, which is to make the violin sing, not declaim. This he does most admirably in the second movement, which follows the first without a break. This second movement is an adagio of moderate slowness and of rare beauty. It must be highly grateful to any solo violinist who is intimate with his instrument's resources of expression to play such a movement. The solo part stands out clearly and yet is supported and lent contrast by a most exquisitely well-balanced orchestral accompaniment.

The last movement is an allegro in common time, and is built on a clear cut rhythmical theme of fascinating simplicity and melodic piquancy. Mr. Strube's practical acquaintance with the instrument has enabled him to place the melody most advantageously and to work out its treatment in a series of developments that come clearly out over the orchestral part. In this movement comes the cadenza, which is the work of Mr. Kneisel. It is brief and thoroughly in keeping with the general character of the concerto. Mr. Strube's orchestration is admirable, except in one spot in the last movement, where he has written some awkward and ineffective passages for the trumpet. But he orchestrates with solidity and richness of tint. He conducted his own work and was most warmly applauded. As for Mr. Kneisel, it is only necessary to say that he played in his best style, which in such a work as that of Mr. Strube, cannot be excelled by any living player. His heart was in the performance and it was a joy to hear him.

There is little to be said about the other numbers. Mr. Paur conducts the fifth symphony of Beethoven with much more assurance than he did at his first appearance in America. Perhaps he has more faith in his glorious instrument now. At any rate it does not often fall to the lot of a New York audience to hear the andante played with so much finish as it was played last night, while the finale was given in a most inspiring manner. Its entrance, after the mysterious conclusion of the scherzo, had the arousing effect which Beethoven designed it to have. The work was played in memory of its composer, who was born Dec. 16, 1770.

The Weingartner arrangement of the "Invitation to the Dance," which is far more interesting than that of Berlioz, was a welcome relief after the Strauss tone-puzzle. It afforded the orchestra an opportunity for one of those displays of virtuosity with which it astonishes and delights our audiences. The performance was loudly applauded.

New-York Daily Tribune.

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 17, 1897.

YESTERDAY'S CONCERTS.

Two affairs, both of first-class importance, occupied the attention of the lovers of high-class music last night. A collision of dates between two such institutions as the Musical Art Society and the Boston Symphony Orchestra was deplorable, especially when, as last night, there were novel features in both programmes, which commanded the interest of all who wish to keep informed of the newest developments in the art, and strongly invited that of the simply curious. A stronger contrast between two schemes could scarcely be imagined. At the Metropolitan Opera House, Mr. Paur offered the first opportunity which New-York has had to get acquainted with what may safely be set down as an exemplification of the extreme limit reached by the modern tendency in metaphysical programme music—Richard Strauss's symphonic poem, entitled "Also Sprach Zarathushtra" ("Thus Spake Zarathushtra," or, to call him by a name better known, though the likeness between the characters stops with the name—Zoroaster). The composition has provoked much discussion in Germany, and would do the same here, in all likelihood, were the Metropolitan audiences and their mentors in America more disposed to take a serious view of the doings of the Muse. As it is, Herr Strauss's radical composition will receive a few passing comments, presumably of a derogatory nature, with some humor thrown in, and will then be forgotten for the time being. That Mr. Paur thinks it worthy of more serious treatment he demonstrated yesterday in a twofold manner—first, though he played it but recently in Boston after ample preparation, he devoted a special rehearsal to it, to which he invited the music reviewers for the New-York newspapers; second, he made of its performance the most striking exhibition of orchestral playing that New-York has heard, let us say, to be safe, for a considerable term of years. It is not a composition to be disposed of flippantly, yet, as indication of one way in which it may be viewed, we doubt if many who heard it last night, and heard it with a reverent attention that was in itself a phenomenon, will be disposed to quarrel with any reviewer who should say that the work comes nearer than anything that has yet been heard in New-York to exemplifying what was in the fantastic mind of the English actor who once asked Alfred Millin to give him some music descriptive of an Englishman who had gone abroad, changed his religion and forgotten his umbrella. Doubtless to many who were at the Metropolitan Opera House last night, and who have not been educated up to the point of believing that the expressive capacity of music has reached such a point, a much greater pleasure was provided by the violin concerto by Mr. Strube, of the orchestra, which was played by Mr. Kneisel.

But there is no time to enter upon the discussion suggested by such a comparison. This, like a review of the concert of the Musical Art Society, must wait for a season when greater deliberation will be possible. Let the record suffice for the present that a remarkably fine audience in Carnegie Hall heard a remarkably fine concert, one that called for simple enjoyment of beautiful music and presented no metaphysical questions for solution.

Some Important Features in American Music Life.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

GEORGE HENSCHEL.

Boston has always been musical, even from the last century, and not only has it established the greatest American orchestra, but the honor of founding the earliest orchestra in our country also belongs to the Hub. In 1798 a wandering musician named Gottlieb Graupner came to Boston. He had been an oboist in a Hanoverian regiment in Germany, he had been the oboist under Haydn in the great symphonic performances of the last century in London, and after straying up and down this continent from Prince Edwards Island to Charleston he finally settled in Boston. Around this pioneer gathered the amateurs of instrumental music in the little town of Boston (as it was then) and the Philharmonic Orchestra was the result, a crude gathering which played at Gyrowetz's Symphonies for a steady diet, and took up Haydn only as something requiring exceptional effort. From 1810 until about 1821 this symphonic orchestra of about a dozen members upheld the standard of classical instrumental music in Boston.

In 1833 there came an amateur orchestra of larger dimensions through the efforts of the so-called "Academy of Music," an organization formed for the advancement of the divine art generally. This orchestra aimed at higher results than had been attained up to that time in America, and in 1840–1 first made our public acquainted with the Symphonies of Beethoven, beginning with the First and the Fifth Symphonies. After the demise of this orchestra, in 1846, there arose the "Musical Fund Concerts" led by "Tom" Comer (as everybody called him) which gave rather lighter music for charitable purposes. Under the subsequent conductorship of Mr. George J. Webb more ambitious works were given,—"Aber fragt mich nur nicht wie!" These concerts terminated in 1855.

Meanwhile a much better musical material had come into America; the revolution of 1848 had driven many young musicians to these shores; some had been concerned in revolt and were forced to flee, others found music sadly languishing in those exciting days abroad and their dwindling pocket-books sent them into voluntary exile. From these elements Messrs. Carl Lenshow and Carl Bergmann formed the finest orchestra that had yet been heard in our country, and Boston was the home of this first great American symphonic organization—The Germania Orchestra—which, however, like the present Boston orchestra, used to give many concerts in other cities, becoming a factor in our national musical life. Beginning with 23 musicians this orchestra gradually enlarged its ranks until it numbered 50 performers. It gave nearly 90 concerts in Boston alone, and the programs included many of the greatest Symphonies, even the great Ninth Symphony being given. In 1854 this important orchestra disbanded. There had been in its ranks a tall young flute-player who now became conductor of a new orchestra. This flute-player was to exert much influence on music in America; his name is Carl Zerrahn. In 1855 he founded the Philharmonic Orchestra, a much larger affair than the pioneer orchestra which had originally born this name. This classical orchestra lasted from 1855 until 1863. There now followed a hiatus of three years, but in 1866 Mr. Zerrahn was again at the head of a large orchestra now under the auspices of the Harvard Musical Association, an offshoot of the Pierian sodality of Harvard college. This association had fostered Boston's music in many ways, by musical lectures, by founding a musical library, by establishing chamber concerts, glee clubs and what not, and now it was to make its greatest venture by giving Boston regular orchestral concerts. Mr. Zerrahn was its only conductor during all its years of existence. The conservative character of its programs began to evoke opposition in the camp of the musical radicals; there were by this time many resident musicians in Boston who had received their education in Germany and were strongly tinged with the modern taste; they revolted against the constant diet of Beethoven, Mozart and Haydn, and the result was that an opposition orchestra was soon established. This was called "The Philharmonic Orchestra," the third of that name which Boston had possessed.

Behold Boston, therefore, in 1879 and 1880, revelling in two classical orchestras, antipathetic to each other, and a very decided orchestral quarrel brewing. Out of the wrangling that ensued was born the finest orchestra that America has ever possessed—the Boston Symphony orchestra of the present. Both orchestras were losing money, and in order to make the losses as light as possible rehearsals were seldom held, and the players not having any incentive to devote themselves chiefly to symphonic playing, sought their livelihood in sporadic engagements ranging from picnic and parade to concerts. To advance the cause of symphonic music properly it was necessary to offer the men permanent employment in the higher field, but, while all acknowledged that this was a consummation devoutly to be wished, nobody knew how such a result could be brought about. Mr. Zerrahn of the Harvard (he also conducted the Philharmonic one season) and Mr. Bernhard Listemann and Dr. Louis Maas who had conducted the Philharmonic sought in vain to bring about a higher standard, but nothing could be done unless some Maecenas should open his purse very widely. At just this moment the public benefactor came. Mr. Henry L. Higginson, a wealthy banker and a man who had showed his public spirit in many other ways than in music, suddenly cut the Gordian knot. He assumed the responsibility of founding a permanent orchestra, one in which the players should have but one duty,—that of giving good classical concerts. Adequate rehearsals were to be held, the men were to be assured of steady support if their work was of adequate standard; in order to prove that there was no desire to antagonize the two existing orchestras, Saturday nights, (which had never been used for concerts in Boston) were chosen for the symphonic events, and on the evening of October 22, 1881, the Boston Symphony Orchestra began its career. Beethoven's "Weihe des Hauses" was the first work given, a species of musical invocation that fittingly ushered in a new instrumental regime for America. Mr. George Henschel was the conductor. Although at that time he had not had great experience in orchestral conducting (this inexperience showed itself in some queer experiments in placing the men—which were afterwards abandoned) he deserved great credit for the catholicity of his programs. The old school was present on the programs, but the new school was never ignored. Boston was for the first time placed abreast of Europe in the character of its orchestral programs, even though the performance was not yet of highest European standard, but musical Rome was not built in a day nor in a season.

WILHELM GERICKE.

Even from the first, however, a higher standard was attained than Boston had ever heard save in the concerts of Theodore Thomas and his orchestra. There were 67 members in the orchestra during this first season which consisted of 20 concerts. The third season 26 concerts were given, but since that time the regular seasons have consisted of 24 concerts. Each of these concerts was preceded, on Friday afternoons, by a public rehearsal, practically a concert, and oddly enough these rehearsals at once became more fashionable than the concerts themselves, and have continued so ever since, although the houses are crowded on all occasions. During the first seasons Beethoven's Ninth Symphony was the regular culmination of matters at the last concert, but this is no longer the custom.

ARTHUR NIKISCH.

In 1884 Mr. Henschel went abroad and with the advent of a superb Viennese conductor matters took a great step forward. Mr. Henschel had in the kindness of his heart kept on very many of the regular musicians who had played in Boston's concerts for generations. Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, who became the second conductor, began to weed these out root and branch. He brought new men, great musicians, from abroad, young men most of them, who were to grow up with the orchestra so that the personnel would not need to change during many years. The plan has proved very successful, for the changes have been few and far between since Mr. Gericke's time, and the young men whom he brought to us have become the body and blood of the orchestra. If Mr. Higginson was the financial founder of the orchestra, Mr. Gericke was certainly its musical founder, and his reforms, and his stern yet musicianly drillmastership, first made the orchestra the peer of European organizations.

He was the perfection of gentility in music. He detested blatancy, and sometimes erred on the side of too great reserve, but he first taught Boston what a perfect ensemble in orchestral playing meant and he made the concerts educational in the highest degree. He constantly maintained that his orchestra sounded best in the Academy of Music, in Philadelphia, (he considered this the best acoustical auditorium in America) and frequently desired the writer of this article to journey to Philadelphia with the orchestra on one of its tours, that he might hear the organization at its very best. But it certainly sounded well enough in Boston Music Hall. Mr. Gericke established trumpet playing (instead of the wretched American substitution of cornet) in our orchestra, and in pursuance of this he brought over one of the finest of the world's trumpeters, M. Pierre Mueller, who is still with the orchestra.

Among other excellent artists that he added to the orchestra may be mentioned, M. Sautet, the oboist, Mr. Svecenski, viola, Mr. Roth, violin, and Mr. Schuecker, the superb harpist, all of whom are still prominent members of the forces of to-day. But, most important of all, he imported a new concertmeister (chief violinist)—Mr. Franz Kneisel, who speedily made his influence felt in the band. Out of these additions sprang another great factor of Boston's music, for the Kneisel String Quartet was speedily formed and gave as great an impetus to our chamber concerts as the orchestra had done to symphonic music in America—a wheel within a wheel. Most of these sweeping reforms took place in 1886.

Mr. Gericke left, regretted by everbody; his farewell concert was made the occasion of a spontaneous outburst such as has seldom been seen in an American concert-room; as he entered the hall the whole audience rose silently to their feet and remained standing for some minutes; only when the orchestra began blowing a "Tusch" (a triumphal fanfare) did the applause burst forth and then it seemed as if it would never cease. It was one of the most memorable concerts ever given by the orchestra.

After Mr. Gericke, in 1889, came Mr. Arthur Nikisch, also one of the world's famous conductors, a man who has received the commendation of Tschaikowsky and who is now a most prominent conductor in Berlin and Leipzig. Mr. Nikisch is what may be termed an orchestral virtuoso; he plays upon the orchestra as a Paderewski might manipulate a keyboard, he gives his own caprice and fantasies to every work, he is poetic and bizarre to the highest degree; but he proved to be less successful as a drill-master than any of the conductors of the organization, and, while the interpretations were always remarkable and generally spicy, the discipline of the forces began visibly to deteriorate, the glorious ensemble was no longer present. He left, rather abruptly, after four years of service, leaving two camps, of adherents and adversaries, behind him.

In 1893 there came to the orchestra the very man to restore what had been lost. Mr. Emil Paur was a musician who would not tamper with the old traditions, he read the classics as their composers intended them to be interpreted and never interjected any of his own personality into the performances; he was an indefatigable rehearser, a drill-master of the sternest stuff, and his influence was almost immediately felt to be a healthy one. Naturally enough King Stork, coming after King Log, made plenty of enemies, and many of the musicians writhed under the stricter regime. The best compliment that can be paid to Mr. Paur is to state that he has outlived all these enmities and has placed the Boston Symphony Orchestra upon a pedestal higher than it has ever occupied before; it has now become the peer of any orchestra in the world and the superior of most of the European orchestras. This result, under careful guidance, was to be expected, for during the last 16 years the men have been playing together, (counting all rehearsals, concerts in Boston and on tour, etc.) some thousands of times. Here is the Boston record alone, as compiled by Mr. Fred. R. Comee a year ago :—

EMIL PAUR.

Performances	752
Total number of composers	163
Total number of selections	3,313
Orchestral selections	2,270
Solo selections	1,043
Instrumental solos	543
Vocal solos	500

Germany	79	composers,	2,245	selections.
France	17	"	164	"
Hungary	3	"	296	"
Russia	6	"	132	"
Bohemia	3	"	104	"
America	12	"	88	"
Poland	7	"	80	"
Italy	18	"	74	"
Norway	2	"	36	"
England	7	"	34	"
Denmark	2	"	28	"
Belgium	4	"	22	"
Holland	2	"	6	"
Scotland	1	"	4	"

With such a record the organization of about 90 men (varying in numbers of course in different works) has become a flawless machine. It would be a fitting sequel to such a phenomenal record that the orchestra should go to Europe for at least a single tour, and if this hope should ever be fulfilled it is a foregone conclusion that the laurels of the foreign orchestras will be somewhat imperilled.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.
NEW YORK WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 22, 1897.

RENEW AND REHEARSE.

WE dislike repetition, but after the playing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last week we feel impelled to cry aloud: "Oh, men of the Philharmonic Society, renew yourselves, not by fasting and prayer, but by the simple process of ceasing your ancestor worship; pack np your old idols, get new, live young men in their place, and after this renewal rehearse, rehearse, and again rehearse."

But don't expect rehearsing alone will ever make the Philharmonic Orchestra the superior, or even the peer, of the Boston band. New and competent material is the only hope for the future of the Philharmonic Society. Then rehearse, and perhaps you may have a chance. Not otherwise.

ASIDE from all other aspects of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts and their effect on musical culture wherever this organization of instrumental artists performs the intellectual work of the conductor, Emil Paur must be recognized with the stamp of unanimous approval on the part of all healthy minded critics. No man in the musical field has grown so rapidly and has embraced a more versatile comprehension of the demands of the hour than Paur. He is equally liberal to all schools and tendencies, and the result of his activities have made his orchestra one of the few great instrumental bodies on the globe.

GRIEG NOT A NATIONALIST IN MUSIC.

WHAT'S this, what's this? Grieg repudiating the editorial utterances of the Century Magazine. Grieg not declaring for nationalism in music. This letter appeared in the Times last Sunday:

To the Editor of the New York Times:

To my article on Mozart in the November number of The Century the editor has prefixed an introductory note which contains two or three statements that are apt to create some confusion in the minds of those who may read the article, and at the same time likely to place me in a false position in the musical world. I am therefore anxious to correct these statements as early as possible, and shall feel obliged if you will allow me to does through the medium of your esteemed paper.

To begin with, I am not an exponent of "Scandinavian" music, but only of Norwegian. The national characteristics of the three peoples—the Norwegians, the Swedes and the Danes—are wholly different, and their music differs just as much.

Second—My artistic convictions and principles are not in any way "opposed to the Wagnerian propaganda." I have pointed out the mistaken tactics of the Wagnerians with regard to Schumann* and Mozart, but I myself make propaganda for Wagner wherever I can, without being an adherent of the so-called Wagnerism. I am, in fact, no believer in any kind of "isms." I am neither more nor less than an admirer of Wagner—so ardent an admirer, indeed, that there can scarcely be a greater.

Third—My estimate of Mozart is not, as the editor of The Century assumes, "more sympathetic because Mozart, in awakening the spirit of German music, did what Grieg proposed to himself and accomplished for his native land." Such an assumption I must decidedly protest against. My unbounded admiration for Mozart is raised above all considerations of nationality. Moreover, it is not correct to state, as if it were Mozart's chief achievement, that he "awakened the spirit of German music." It was Bach, before Mozart's time, and later Beethoven and Wagner, who in a far greater degree did this. EDVARD GRIEG.

LONDON, December 8, 1897.

A sensible, manly letter, this of Dr. Grieg's and one that should settle the claims of the nationalists in music. Grieg is Norwegian, Chopin stands for Polish, Liszt does not stand for Hungarian, Dvorák stands for Bohemia, but Beethoven is for the world, just as Händel is for the English. Mozart, too, is universal and so is Wagner. All good music, all great music is never map music, music bounded by geographical limits. And Grieg knows this, even if his gift is a limited and charming one.

Finck—for we all recognize the paw of the lion—knows Boston and its inhabitants; he has summered and wintered with us, he has been through us with a dark lantern. The wisest thing for us to do is to quiver quietly under the awful blow.

* * *

I agree fully with Mr. Finck in his opinion of Mr. Paur as a program maker. But I have looked at programs of orchestral concerts given in Berlin by Mr. Nikisch and at programs of Richter concerts in London, and at the prospectus of concerts to be given by Richter in Vienna, and they are dreary, very dreary.

And now for a little digression. The New York Evening Post of December 17 commented somewhat severely on the choice by Mr. Paur of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, "its 375,916th performance, or thereabouts," for the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York December 16.

To be made interesting at the present day, Beethoven's symphonies need to be interpreted with a great deal more nuance of expression than the Boston Orchestra bestows on them under its present leader. Bostonians, as a rule, are not educated up to expression in music (they like it mathematical and intellectual purely), but we New Yorkers are, and we miss it when we do not get it.

Poor Mr. Paur, remembering that Beethoven was baptized December 17, 1770, and therefore probably was born the day before of that year, thought to observe the anniversary by performing a symphony that is considered by some to be a work of considerable strength.

"Bostonians, as a rule, are not educated up to expression in music (they like it mathematical and intellectual purely), but we New Yorkers are." There's no argument against this statement couched in Paterian English. Mr.

Boston Symphony Concert.

THE second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given at the Metropolitan Opera House, Thursday evening of last week, brought us two welcome novelties, as may be seen by this curiously constructed program:

Symphony No. 5, in C minor, op. 67..........Beethoven
Concerto for Violin in G major (MS.), op. 13..........Gustave Strube
(Cadenza by Franz Kneisel.)
Moderato (in G major).
Allegro non troppo, ma energico (G major).
Adagio, ma non troppo lento (B flat major).
Finale: Allegro (G major).
(First time in New York.)
Symphonic Poem: "Thus Spake Zarathustra," op. 30..........Richard Strauss
(First time in New York.)
"Invitation to the Dance," op. 65..........Von Weber Overture to "Carlo Broschi"..........
Daniel Francois-Esprit Auber
Soloist, Franz Kneisel.

The symphony was put on to commemorate an anniversary—the one hundred and twenty seventh of Beethoven's birth. The finale of the scheme was a mistake on Mr. Paur's part; it contained one number too many. Either the Weingartner or the Auber should have been omitted, and, for our part, we could have put up with the loss of the valse with fortitude. As a matter of fact, the first three numbers were all sufficing, any composer—save, perhaps, his namesake, of Vienna—would be an anticlimax after such a prodigious portent as the new symphonic poem. A Strauss valse would have solved the tonal riddle of the younger man, although the sunny melodies of the Frenchman were no mean substitute. We merely wish to emphasize our contention that three, or at the most four, numbers constitute the scheme of a serious evening of music. One symphony, one concerto, one overture or symphonic poem, and the auditor has enough to digest for a week. Theodore Thomas as a program maker still leads Messrs. Seidl, Paur and Damrosch.

But it was an enjoyable evening, and Mr. Paur and his men easily demonstrated the superiority of this band to our lazy Philharmonics. But we are weary of making this contention. The symphony, let it be said at once, was not passionately played; it was not cold; it was muscular, vigorous and clean, but lacked imaginative lift, grandeur, and in the middle movement, poetry. It was a performance that was fine and satisfying in many senses, for it was sane and well-balanced, but it was line and not color. Technically it was admirable. The contrabass in the trio of the scherzo were almost sculptural in the purity, lucidity and firmness of outline. Such virtuosity! Yet one felt the loss of something, the Beethoven spirit, the Promethean fire were absent. Possibly a prolonged rehearsal in the morning after a night spent on sleeping cars told on the nerves of the orchestra.

The new violin concerto proved welcome, for it is a pleasure to hear a work of this sort, that does not do to the dreary death double thirds, batteries of octaves, piping harmonics, shrieking skips and sliding sixths. We are tired with old-fashioned piano gymnastics, but more wearisome are the efforts of violin virtuosi to convince us that velocity is virility, that a melody is improved by being carved into wonderful splinters. Mr. Strube has written manly melodies, idyllic rather than dramatic, and has painted for them a background of charming colors and lively rhythms. Not a profound but an unaffected and sweet work, the adagio being the best conceived. The finale is not strong and is more in the popular vein, the orchestra not being as well handled as in the preceding movements. There is no mistaking the genuineness of the workmanship, and the sincerity of the composer. He sings, not alone with the solo instrument, but with the entire band. Mr. Kneisel's cadenza is in the best possible taste and his reading was a delight; so unobtrusive, so commanding—the two qualities are not contradictions—so musical. Mr. Strube conducted with skill. Mr. Hale has told us of the success of his overture, "The Maid of Orleans," and his symphony, the scherzo of which has won special praise.

The composer is one of the first violins of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and this concerto was finished a year next Christmas. We extend our congratulations to Mr. Strube.

And now having cleared the ground for the event of the evening—indeed for the event of the musical season of 1897-8—let us beg our readers to remember that the new Strauss music must be approached, not from the point of philosophy, but simply viewed as absolute music. Its style, melodic content, workmanship, its poetic scope are to be first considered, and not if it interprets Nietzsche's profoundly individualistic philosophy. It is a symphonic poem of rather loose construction, and, as to outline, but rigorously logical in its presentment of thematic material, and in its magnificent weaving of the contrapuntal web. There is organic unity, and the strenuousness of the composer's ideas almost blind his hearers to their tenuity, and sometimes a squat ugliness. Strauss has confessed to not following a definite scheme, a precise presentation of the bacchante philosophy of Nietzsche. Why, then, is Riemann's pretentious analytical program tolerated? It is confusing and misleading. Why a program at all? The title is all-sufficing, for Strauss is too clever a man not to realize the boundaries of music. Nietzsche was a lyrical rhapsodist, a literary artist first, perhaps a philosopher afterward. It is the lyric side of him that Strauss seeks to interpret. Yet certain mental states that are almost philosophical may be hinted at by music. The sublimity of the idea of creation might be suggested in tone, and almost is, by a man of this composer's resources. However, it is better not to read into the music's esoteric meanings. Simply as absolute music it is astounding enough—astounding in its scope, handling and execution. It is not as realistic as you imagine, not as realistic for instance as the "Don Juan" and "Til Eulenspiegel." Strauss is here an idealist striving after the impossible, yet compassing the hem of grandeur, and often a conscious seeker after the abnormally ugly. Yet we hesitate to call his an abnormal brain. Abnormal it may be in its manifestation of eccentric power, but it is not evil in its tendency, and a brain that can construct such a mighty tone structure is to be seriously counted with.

As a mere matter of musical politics we do not believe in program music. Wagner, and before him, Beethoven, fixed its boundaries. Liszt, in his Faust symphony, and Wagner, in his Faust overture, read into pure music as much meaning as its framework could endure without calling in the aid of the sister arts. That Wagner did, while Liszt begat Saint-Saëns, Tschaikowsky and Richard Strauss. Each of these men pushed realism to a frantic degree, Strauss in particular giving us in his "Death and Apotheosis" the most minute memoranda. But in "Also Sprach Zarathustra" he has deserted surface imitations. The laughter of the convalescent, and the slow, creeping fugue betray his old tendencies. There is an uplifting roar in the opening that is really elemental. Those tremendous chords alone proclaim Strauss a man of genius, and their naked simplicity gives his fee simple to the heritage of Beethoven. But this grandeur is not maintained throughout. The A flat section is notably melodious and luscious in color. "Of Joys and Passions" is gloriously brilliant and passionate. Here is profound energy not again exhibited. The five voice fugue is ugly yet masterful, and the dance music exhilarating, indeed, intoxicating. It is furious in its abandonment, corybantic in its disheveled revelry. Such laughter has never been heard in an orchestra before!

The close is enigmatic, and the juggling with the tonality is fruitful of suspense, bewilderment. Yet it does not plunge the listener into the gloomy abysmal gulf of Tschaikowsky's last movement of the B minor symphony. It is not so simple nor yet so cosmical. Strauss has the grand manner at times, but he cannot maintain as did Brahms in his "Requiem," or Tschaikowsky in his last symphonic work.

The narrative and declamatory style is often violently interrupted by passages of great descriptive power; the development of the themes seems coincidental with some program in Strauss' mind and the contrapuntal ingenuity displayed is just short of the miraculous. There is a groaning and a travailing spirit, a restless, uneasy aspiring which is Faust-like, and suggests a close study of "Eine Faust Overture," but there is more versatility of mood, more hysteria and more febrile agitation in the Strauss score. It is a sheaf of moods bound together with rare skill, and in the most cacaphonous portions there is no suspicion of writing for the sake of mere wilful eccentricity. Strauss is ugly because the mood he attempts to portray happens to be an ugly one. And here is brought up the question of the purely decorative element in music, a question not to be lightly solved. There were reminiscences more in color than form of "Tristan," of "Walküre," "Die Meistersinger," and once there was a sugestion of Gounod, but the composer's style is his own despite his Wagnerian affiliations.

Strauss is a man of rare and powerful imagination; the tentacles of his imagination are restlessly feeling and thrusting forward and grappling with material on most dangerous territory. The need of expression of definite modes of thought, of more definite modes of emotion, is a question that has perplexed every great composer. With such an apparatus as the modern orchestra—in Strauss' hands an eloquent, plastic and palpitating instrument—much may be ventured, and while the composer has not altogether succeeded—it is almost a superhuman task he sets himself to achieve—he has made us think seriously of a new trend in the art of discoursing music. Formalism is abandoned—Strauss moves by episodes, now furiously swift, now ponderonsly lethargic, and one is lost in amazement at the loftiness, the solidity and general massiveness of his structure. More amazing still is the critical distrust with which a work of this stupendous proportion is received. One need not admire the subject matter, one may be a Brahmsite and clamor against the lack of formal beauty, but that admirers of Berlioz, Wagner and Liszt or Tschaikowsky should cavil at Strauss and his tendencies is incredible. The man's scholarship is so profound, almost as profound as Brahms, his genius for the orchestra so marked, his color and rhymthic sense so magnificently developed that the general effect of his rhetoric is, perhaps, too blazingly brilliant. He has more to say than Berlioz and says it better, is less magniloquent and more poetically than Liszt, is as clever as Saint-Saëns, but in thematic invention he is miles behind Wagner.

His melodies, it must be confessed, are not always remarkable or distinguished in quality, setting aside the question of ugliness altogether. But the melodic curve is big and passional. Strauss can be tender, dramatic, bizarre, poetic and humorous, and it is the noble art of simplicity he sadly lacks—for art it is. His themes in this poem are often simple; indeed, the waltz is distinctly commonplace, but it is not the Doric, the bald simplicity of Beethoven. It is rather a brutal plainness of speech. Of lascivious pleasing for the sake of aural voluptuousness there is not a trace.

Strauss is too deadly in earnest to trifle or to condescend to ear tickling devices. The tremendous sincerity of the work will be its saving salt for many who violently disagree with the whole scheme. No one present could have failed to be impressed last Thursday night, while perhaps not a dozen in the audience understood the composition, and of the twelve not six were in sympathy with it.

Wait five years.

The performance was a memorable one. Mr. Paur had the music at his finger tips and his enthusiasm, energy the greatest feat of orchestral virtuosity ever accomplished in this city, and even when the very foundations of the deep were breaking up, the structural lines of the work remained intact. On the fine frenzy, of the velocity of the sonority of the performance, it is useless to dwell. It was breathless, exciting and wonderful. The orchestra was composed as follows: One piccoli-flute, three flutes (the third of which is interchangeable with a second piccolo), three oboes, one English horn, one E flat clarinet, two ordinary clarinets, one bass clarinet, three bassoons, one double bassoon, six horns, four trumpets, three trombones, two bass tubas, one pair of kettledrums, bass drum, cymbals, triangle, Glockenspiel, one low bell, two harps, the usual strings, and organ.

Mr. Wallace Goodrich presided at the organ.

The house was full and displayed no enthusiasm until Weingartner's shallow and showy paraphrase was played. That was understood.

It was highly gratifying to see a much larger audience present at the magnificent matinee concert of the Boston Symphony on Friday, when a superb program was presented. There is an interesting feature to record which grew out of a suggestion from this column made some weeks ago, and which only brought forth a result which, while highly commendable, is not permanent or just to the point which I meant to reach. Seven gentlemen, wishing their names withheld, purchased 260 seats in the family circle and presented them to the training school of teachers, who turned out en masse and enjoyed the kind act immensely.

The audience was rather less apathetic than usual, but considering the works presented and the manenr in which they were done, it would have been more than even a Brooklyn audience could do to remain cold.

The Korsakoff symphonic suite "Scheherazade" was given for the first time here. It is a splendid composition and appealed at once to those capable of judging an orchestral work. It is musical, lucid, absolutely coherent, and the instrumentation is fine. The Raff Symphony No. 3 was also heard as a novelty, and an interesting one.

David Bispham has been heard before in Brooklyn, and had an established reputation, but he eclipsed every expectation with such an orchestral accompaniment in a magnificent aria from Heinrich Marshner's "Hans Heiling," which was well calculated to show the richness and purity of his superb voice and which gave him the opportunity to give free rein to his dramatic fire without seeming out of place on the concert stage. He had six or seven recalls.

On Saturday night Campanari, who was to have been the soloist, was unable to get here in time and the substitution of Bispham seemed in every way perfectly satisfactory. He sang an aria from "La Noce de Figaro" by Mozart, and "Lungi dal Caro Bene" by Secchi, who was contemporaneous with Mozart. The orchestration, which was made by Henry Waller, did not arrive in time, and Mr. Waller played a piano accompaniment instead. Bispham also sang with fine effect an aria from "Die Meistersinger." His reception was most hearty, and although he did not accord any encores he had many recalls.

The program of Saturday night was of a lighter nature than on Friday afternoon, for notwithstanding the renown of the Dvorák "New World" symphony, with the exception of the largo movement, it is not to me a truly serious work, and if any of our own American composers had indulged in this humorous badinage, what luscious morsels they would have made for our charitable concert-goers, for those who do not go to the concerts but sit at home and criticise just the same, and last and unfortunately not least for the newspapers.

The other numbers were Grieg's "Peer Gynt" suite and a group from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust." Paur was magnificent and imposing in his readings, and the verve of his conducting has as magnetic an effect upon his audience as upon his orchestra. There were many affairs of minor importance and of a social nature.

Standard Union

IN THE WORLD OF MUSIC.

At the violin recital, which Ysaye will give at the Academy of Music, Wednesday evening, Dec. 29, Carlos Sofrino, pianist, will assist.

The programme will be as follows:

Sonate, Op. 105—A minor.......Schumann
Mit Leidenschaftlichem Ausdruck.
Allegretto. Lebhaft.
Fourth Concerton—D minor...Vieuxtemps
Introduction—Cadenza.
Adagio religioso. Finale con brio.
Piano—Fantasie, Op. 49...........Chopin
Sonate in A major (continuo by F. A. Gebaert) ....Handel
Adagio cantabile. Largo assai.
Allegro deciso. Allegro (Giga).
(a) "Du bist die Ruh"....Schubert—Liszt
(b) Venezia e Napoli Tarantelle......Liszt
(a) Romance ....Kess
(b) Rondo ....Guirand

The next Chamber Music Concert in the Brooklyn Institute series will be given by the Richard Arnold String Sextet on Wednesday evening, Dec. 22, at Association Hall. Following is the programme:

Quintet for Strings, two violins, two violas and violoncello, Op. 87, Mendelssohn
(a) Allegro vivace,
(b) Andantino scherzando.
(c) Adagio e lento.
(d) Allegro con fuoco.
Sextet for Strings, Op 28.........F. Ries
(a) Andante con variazioni.
(b) Intermezzo—Vivace.
Serenade for String Sextet, Op. 48 Tschaikowsky
(a) Andante non troppo—Allegro moderato.
(b) Walzer.
(c) Elegie.
(d) Finale—Theme Russe.

THE ARNOLD SEXTETTE PROGRAM.

The full programme of the Richard Arnold String Sextette concert, the fourth in the Brooklyn Institute's chamber music course, at Association Hall, next Wednesday evening, consists of Mendelssohn's quintette for strings, Op. 87, Ries' sextette for strings, Op. 28, and Tschaikowsky's serenade for string sextette, Op. 48, the first and last for four movements each, and the second of two. The sextette is composed of Richard Arnold, first, and E. C. Bauck, second violin; Herman Kuhn, violin and viola; Emil Gram, viola and violin; Leo Taussig, 'cello, and August Kalkhof, double bass.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A more numerous audience greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the second matinee at the Academy of Music yesterday afternoon than at the opening concert last month. David Bispham was the soloist. He is a singer whose popularity keeps on growing, but the artistic standards of a city cannot be of the highest when one singer can attract a larger audience than the grandest orchestra in the world. Maybe yesterday's orchestra programme appealed more to music-lovers than the one for the previous concert. Raff's beautiful symphony, "Im Walde" (In the woods), is a work which musicians prefer to any other by this composer, who, in his day was a most prolific although not always a scholarly writer. No faults can be found with this composition. In construction and theme it ranks with some of the best things written by the greatest composers. Imaginative, poetic, it depicts a world's day in the heart of nature. First the impressions and sensations of the daytime are unfolded. Then the twilight hour is introduced, and last the night. In the finale the composer seeks to describe the influence of Hulda, the goddess of love, and spring in the mythology of Scandinavia. It was Hulda who is accused of tempting Tannhauser to enter the Venus Mountain where he came near losing his soul. After the introduction of Christianity, Hulda was regarded as an evil spirit. Her leadership of a wild hunt is vividly and picturesquely brought out by the orchestra. The scherzo of the symphony, or third movement, gives the dance of the "Dryads." There the melody is carried by the wood-wind instruments, while the accompanying is done by the violins. A symphonic suite by a modern Russian composer, Nicolai Rimsky-Korsakoff, entitled, "Scheherazade," proved an interesting part of the concert. Scheherazade was one of the wives of the Sultan Schahriar. William F. Apthorp, who writes the analysis of the works played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, tells briefly the story of the suite: "Sultan Schahriar, persuaded of the falseness and faithlessness of women, had sworn to put every one of his wives to death. The Sultana Scheherazade saved her life by interesting the Sultan in the stories she told him during 1,001 nights. Nettled by curiosity, the Sultan put off his wife's execution from day to day, and at last gave up his bloody plan entirely."

Some of the marvelous tales related by the Sultana form the themes of the suite. The first one tells about the sea and Sindbad's ship. The sea-wave motive is most realistic. The tumult and restlessness of the waters are presented with startling effect. The Scheherazade motive is soothing, and charmingly carried by Kneisel's magic violin. (By the way, Mr. Paur, Brooklyn would appreciate a solo by your concert master at the next concert.) Mr. Rimsky-Korsakoff was fortunate to have his work presented in Brooklyn for the first time by this orchestra. Beautiful tonal expression and technical thoroughness must make any fairly decent composition acceptable to an audience. From Mr. Paur the work received sincere and intelligent reading. In some portions of the work the orchestration echoed the Wagnerian style. But it may not be fair to charge every composer who knows how to compose music for the brasses and drums with copying after the great author of the Nibelungen trilogy. Between the suite and symphony, Mr. Bispham sang more vigorously than tenderly the love aria from Heinrich Marschner's old German opera, "Hans Heiling." He was recalled four times, but as there was no piano on the stage the inevitable encore had to be omitted. Mr. Bispham's admirers may hear him again at to-night's concert. He is to be the soloist in place of Campanari, who was advertised, but for some cause is unable to keep his engagement. Mr. Bispham's numbers will be an aria of Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," an aria from Wagner's "Meistersinger," and an aria by Secchi, orchestra by Henry Waller. The orchestral numbers for to-night will be certain to delight all tastes. They include Dvorak's Symphony, "From the New World"; Grieg's Suite, "Peer Gynt," and three parts from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust."

Friday afternoon, Jan. 21, is the date of the next matinee, and Saturday evening, Jan. 22, the date of the next evening concert.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CII., NO. 172.

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 19, 1897.

The Symphony Orchestra's New York Performance.

It Did Not Receive Mr. Finck's Approval, but Other Critics Accorded Warm Praise—"The Messiah" Tonight—"Half a King" at the Tremont This Week—Notes.

The concert given by the Boston Symphony orchestra in New York last week attracted another huge audience. The programme included Strauss' "Thus Spake Zarathustra," and Beethoven's Fifth symphony. The performances of the orchestra were enthusiastically lauded by the critical press, especially for its wonderful virtuosity in the Strauss work. There was but one discordant voice, and it was that of Mr. Finck, who, in the Evening Post, showed what painful results have followed the severe attack of Seidlitis to which he has succumbed. He objected to the presence of the Beethoven symphony, to which he alluded with characteristic Finckiscitous humor as "its 375,916th performance, or thereabouts." He sets forth the proposition that "to be made interesting at the present day, Beethoven symphonies need to be interpreted with a great deal more nuance of expression than the Boston orchestra bestows on them under its present leader." After this, Mr. Finck, with a strong but misguided feeling of local pride, proceeds as follows: "Bostonians, as a rule, are not educated up to expression in music (they like it mathematical and intellectual purely), but we New Yorkers are, and we miss it when we do not get it." The probabilities are, however, that "we New Yorkers" did get it, and that Mr. Finck, metaphysically absorbed in contemplation of the latest small German town in which a Wagner opera has been successfully produced, and in awe-inspiring consideration of the almost superhuman power of Mr. Anton Seidl as an "educator up to expression in music," and, possibly casting a contemptuous side-thought in the direction of the late lamented Mr. Brahms' shortcomings in regard to writing for the piano in "the Chopinesque arpeggiated style," became oblivious to the facts of the case. Mr. Finck appears to be a very amiable and well-meaning person, but he has of late "cabined, cribbed and confined" his naturally broad and sweeping intellect within Wagnerian and Seidlian limitations to an extent that will not permit him to do himself justice in other directions. It is an unfortunately fateful thing to strap oneself to a hobby horse; it is worse to strap oneself to two hobby horses, for it is almost impossible to ride them successfully, owing to lack of a sufficient number of legs on the part of rider to perform that method of equitation with all desirable success. If Mr. Finck had read his programme he would have discovered that the Beethoven symphony played on this occasion the "315,916th time, or thereabouts," was performed as a tribute to the memory of the master, owing to the coincidence between the date of the performance, Dec. 16, and Beethoven's birthday. It is to be regretted that some of Mr. Finck's friends do not discourse convincingly to him of the virtues of liver pills taken judiciously, according to the directions on the label. They might not cure him of his extreme sufferings from Wagneritis and Seidlitis, but they might put him in a more expanded state of mind, and induce him to let out, so to speak, the too tightly buckled back trousers-strap of his now unduly compressed intellect. And as for the misfortune that Boston is not, as New York is, educated up to expression in music, some effort must be made at once to put this city on a level with the metropolis that misses it when it does not get it. Mr. Paur will please at once make a note of this, and give his days and nights to the study of Seidl—and perhaps Damrosch.

The other papers were less exacting than was Mr. Finck, and were enthusiastic in laudation of Mr. Paur and the playing of the orchestra—even in the Beethoven sypmhony. The chances are, however, that, although New Yorkers, the pleased critics were not as fully educated up to expression in music as is Mr. Finck. The Strauss work made no more satisfying impression than it made here. Its orchestration astonished and its performance aroused wonder by its brilliancy and its technical perfection. It is pleasing to be able to add that Mr. Strube's concerto and Mr. Kneisel's playing of it were cordially praised.

ME JOURNAL.

NEW YORK:
WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 22, 1897.

Boston Symphony Concert.

When Richard Strauss's symphonic poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," written to give musical expression to the sentiments of Nietzsche's philosophical prose-poem, was first presented in Boston by the Symphony Orchestra of that city, Franz Kneisel, the first violinist, meeting as he left the hall a musical acquaintance whom he knew to be an admirer of Nietzsche, asked him with a twinkle in his eye: "Don't you think that would have gone as well under another name?" A similar query must have arisen in the mind of many an auditor who heard and enjoyed Conductor Paur's interpretation of Strauss's extraordinary work at the Metropolitan Opera House last Thursday. Certainly, no project could be more quixotic than that of creating an analytical and detailed musical parallel to Nietzsche's mental processes as developed in his masterpiece. It would be an easier task to write a thousand poems all of which, though differing widely in character and content, would fit loosely and broadly the music which Strauss has composed than to write a single tone-poem fitting with even approximate accuracy the course of Nietzsche's grandiose philosophical conceptions. Nevertheless, purpose aside, and considering the work simply as absolute music, Strauss is to be credited with a wonderful achievement. In some parts as petty as it is grand in others, and continually oscillating between the sublime and the ridiculous, it harrows, delights, and astounds the hearer, and its technical complexities make its execution a task whose difficulties an orchestra in any degree inferior to the Boston Symphony would find it almost impossible to surmount.

Another novelty, but less unconventional, was the violin concerto written by Gustav Strube, a member of the orchestra, and played with Mr. Kneisel as soloist, which won for both those gentlemen deserved and hearty applause.

Beethoven's fifth symphony, given in commemoration of the composer's birthday, which was also honored by a large wreath at the back of the stage (the same wreath, by the way, did service the following evening at Mendelssohn Hall), was played marvellously, especially the glorious andante; and selections from Weber and Auber served to send the audience home in lighter mood, after the puzzling intricacies of Strauss.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 22, 1897.

The vast auditorium of the Music Hall was filled on Wednesday evening—the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Joseffy as soloist. Raff's symphony "Im Walde," Schumann's A minor piano concerto, Grieg's Peer Gynt Suite, and Auber's overture to "Carlo Broschi," made up a program that satisfied the popular taste, and to which the management seems to be more generally catering.

So far as the work of the orchestra was concerned, it goes without saying that the entire performance measured up to its usual high standard. The event of the evening, and the musical performance par excellence of the season, was Joseffy's rendition of the Schumann concerto. I have heard many performances of this concerto, but none that equalled that of last Wednesday evening. A storm of applause followed the close of this brilliant performance, and the modest and unassuming virtuoso was compelled to appear again and again bow his acknowledgments.

colo), three oboes, one English horn, one E flat clarinet, two ordinary clarinets, one bass clarinet, three bassoons; one double bassoon, six horns, four trumpets, three trombones, two bass tubas, one pair of kettledrums, bass drum, cymbals, triangle, Glockenspiel, one low bell, two harps, the usual strings, and organ.

Mr. Wallace Goodrich presided at the organ.

The house was full and displayed no enthusiasm until Weingartner's shallow and showy paraphrase was played. That was understood.

It was highly gratifying to see a much larger audience present at the magnificent matinee concert of the Boston Symphony on Friday, when a superb program was presented. There is an interesting feature to record which grew out of a suggestion from this column made some weeks ago, and which only brought forth a result which, while highly commendable, is not permanent or just to the point which I meant to reach. Seven gentlemen, wishing their names withheld, purchased 260 seats in the family circle and presented them to the training school of teachers, who turned out en masse and enjoyed the kind act immensely.

The audience was rather less apathetic than usual, but considering the works presented and the manenr in which they were done, it would have been more than even a Brooklyn audience could do to remain cold.

The Korsakoff symphonic suite "Scheherazade" was given for the first time here. It is a splendid composition and appealed at once to those capable of judging an orchestral work. It is musical, lucid, absolutely coherent, and the instrumentation is fine. The Raff Symphony No. 3 was also heard as a novelty, and an interesting one.

David Bispham has been heard before in Brooklyn, and had an established reputation, but he eclipsed every expectation with such an orchestral accompaniment in a magnificent aria from Heinrich Marshner's "Hans Heiling," which was well calculated to show the richness and purity of his superb voice and which gave him the opportunity to give free rein to his dramatic fire without seeming out of place on the concert stage. He had six or seven recalls.

On Saturday night Campanari, who was to have been the soloist, was unable to get here in time and the substitution of Bispham seemed in every way perfectly satisfactory. He sang an aria from "La Noce de Figaro" by Mozart, and "Lungi dal Caro Bene" by Secchi, who was contemporaneous with Mozart. The orchestration, which was made by Henry Waller, did not arrive in time, and Mr. Waller played a piano accompaniment instead. Bispham also sang with fine effect an aria from "Die Meistersinger." His reception was most hearty, and although he did not accord any encores he had many recalls.

The program of Saturday night was of a lighter nature than on Friday afternoon, for notwithstanding the renown of the Dvorak "New World" symphony, with the exception of the largo movement, it is not to me a truly serious work, and if any of our own American composers had indulged in this humorous badinage, what luscious morsels they would have made for our charitable concert-goers, for those who do not go to the concerts but sit at home and criticise just the same, and last and unfortunately not least for the newspapers.

The other numbers were Grieg's "Peer Gynt" suite and a group from Berlioz' "Damnation of Faust." Paur was magnificent and imposing in his readings, and the verve of his conducting has as magnetic an effect upon his audiences as upon his orchestra. There were many affairs of minor importance and of a social nature.

IN THE WORLD OF MUSIC.

At the violin recital, which Ysaye will give at the Academy of Music, Wednesday evening, Dec. 29, Carlos Sofrino, pianist, will assist.

The programme will be as follows:

Sonate, Op. 105—A minor.......Schumann
  Mit Leidenschaftlichem Ausdruck.
  Allegretto. Lebhaft.
Fourth Concerton—D minor...Vieuxtemps
  Introduction—Cadenza.
  Adagio religioso. Finale con brio.
Piano—Fantasie, Op. 49...........Chopin
Sonate in A major (continuo by F. A. Gebaert) ....Handel
  Adagio cantabile. Largo assai.
  Allegro deciso. Allegro (Giga).
(a) "Du bist die Ruh"....Schubert—Liszt
(b) Venezia e Napoli Tarantelle......Liszt
(a) Romance ....Kess
(b) Rondo ....Guirand

The next Chamber Music Concert in the Brooklyn Institute series will be given by the Richard Arnold String Sextet on Wednesday evening, Dec. 22, at Association Hall. Following is the programme:

Quintet for Strings, two violins, two violas and violoncello, Op. 87, Mendelssohn
  (a) Allegro vivace,
  (b) Andantino scherzando.
  (c) Adagio e lento.
  (d) Allegro con fuoco.
Sextet for Strings, Op 28..........F. Ries
  (a) Andante con variazioni.
  (b) Intermezzo—Vivace.
Serenade for String Sextet, Op. 48 Tschaikowsky
  (a) Andante non troppo—Allegro moderato.
  (b) Walzer.
  (c) Elegie.
  (d) Finale—Theme Russe.

THE ARNOLD SEXTETTE PROGRAM.

The full programme of the Richard Arnold String Sextette concert, the fourth in the Brooklyn Institute's chamber music course, at Association Hall, next Wednesday evening, consists of Mendelssohn's quintette for strings, Op. 87, Ries' sextette for strings, Op. 28, and Tschaikowsky's serenade for string sextette, Op. 48, the first and last for four movements each, and the second of two. The sextette is composed of Richard Arnold, first, and E. C. Bauck, second violin; Herman Kuhn, violin and viola; Emil Gram, viola and violin; Leo Taussig, 'cello, and August Kalkhof, double bass.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A more numerous audience greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the second matinee at the Academy of Music yesterday afternoon than at the opening concert last month. David Bispham was the soloist. He is a singer whose popularity keeps on growing, but the artistic standards of a city cannot be of the highest when one singer can attract a larger audience than the grandest orchestra in the world. Maybe yesterday's orchestra programme appealed more to music-lovers than the one for the previous concert. Raff's beautiful symphony, "Im Walde" (In the woods), is a work which musicians prefer to any other by this composer, who, in his day was a most prolific although not always a scholarly writer. No faults can be found with this composition. In construction and theme it ranks with some of the best things written by the greatest composers. Imaginative, poetic, it depicts a world's day in the heart of nature. First the impressions and sensations of the daytime are unfolded. Then the twilight hour is introduced, and last the night. In the finale the composer seeks to describe the influence of Hulda, the goddess of love, and spring in the mythology of Scandinavia. It was Hulda who is accused of tempting Tannhauser to enter the Venus Mountain where he came near losing his soul. After the introduction of Christianity, Hulda was regarded as an evil spirit. Her leadership of a wild hunt is vividly and picturesquely brought out by the orchestra. The scherzo of the symphony, or third movement, gives the dance of the "Dryads." There the melody is carried by the wood-wind instruments, while the accompanying is done by the violins. A symphonic suite by a modern Russian composer, Nicolai Rimsky-Korsakoff, entitled, "Scheherazade," proved an interesting part of the concert. Scheherazade was one of the wives of the Sultan Schahriar. William F. Apthorp, who writes the analysis of the works played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, tells briefly the story of the suite: "Sultan Schahriar, persuaded of the falseness and faithlessness of women, had sworn to put every one of his wives to death. The Sultana Scheherazade saved her life by interesting the Sultan in the stories she told him during 1,001 nights. Nettled by curiosity, the Sultan put off his wife's execution from day to day, and at last gave up his bloody plan entirely."

Some of the marvelous tales related by the Sultana form the themes of the suite. The first one tells about the sea and Sindbad's ship. The sea-wave motive is most realistic. The tumult and restlessness of the waters are presented with startling effect. The Scheherazade motive is soothing, and charmingly carried by Kneisel's magic violin. (By the way, Mr. Paur, Brooklyn would appreciate a solo by your concert master at the next concert.) Mr. Rimsky-Korsakoff was fortunate to have his work presented in Brooklyn for the first time by this orchestra. Beautiful tonal expression and technical thoroughness must make any fairly decent composition acceptable to an audience. From Mr. Paur the work received sincere and intelligent reading. In some portions of the work the orchestration echoed the Wagnerian style. But it may not be fair to charge every composer who knows how to compose music for the brasses and drums with copying after the great author of the Nibelungen trilogy. Between the suite and symphony, Mr. Bispham sang more vigorously than tenderly the love aria from Heinrich Marschner's old German opera, "Hans Heiling." He was recalled four times, but as there was no piano up the stage the inevitable encore had to be omitted. Mr. Bispham's admirers may hear him again at to-night's concert. He is to be the soloist in place of Campanari, who was advertised, but for some cause is unable to keep his engagement. Mr. Bispham's numbers will be an aria of Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," an aria from Wagner's "Meistersinger," and an aria by Secchi, orchestra by Henry Waller. The orchestral numbers for to-night will be certain to delight all tastes. They include Dvorak's Symphony, "From the New World"; Grieg's Suite, "Peer Gynt," and three parts from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust."

Friday afternoon, Jan. 21, is the date of the next matinee, and Saturday evening, Jan. 22, the date of the next evening concert.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CII., NO. 172.
SUNDAY, DECEMBER 19, 1897.

The Symphony Orchestra's New York Performance.

It Did Not Receive Mr. Finck's Approval, but Other Critics Accorded Warm Praise—"The Messiah" Tonight—"Half a King" at the Tremont This Week—Notes.

The concert given by the Boston Symphony orchestra in New York last week attracted another huge audience. The programme included Strauss' "Thus Spake Zarathustra," and Beethoven's Fifth symphony. The performances of the orchestra were enthusiastically lauded by the critical press, especially for its wonderful virtuosity in the Strauss work. There was but one discordant voice, and it was that of Mr. Finck, who, in the Evening Post, showed what painful results have followed the severe attack of Seidlitis to which he has succumbed. He objected to the presence of the Beethoven symphony, to which he alluded with characteristic Finckiscitous humor as "its 375,916th performance, or thereabouts." He sets forth the proposition that "to be made interesting at the present day, Beethoven symphonies need to be interpreted with a great deal more nuance of expression than the Boston orchestra bestows on them under its present leader." After this, Mr. Finck, with a strong but misguided feeling of local pride, proceeds as follows: "Bostonians, as a rule, are not educated up to expression in music (they like it mathematical and intellectual purely), but we New Yorkers are, and we miss it when we do not get it." The probabilities are, however, that "we New Yorkers" did get it, and that Mr. Finck, metaphysically absorbed in contemplation of the latest small German town in which a Wagner opera has been successfully produced, and in awe-inspiring consideration of the almost superhuman power of Mr| Anton Seidl as an "educator up to expression in music," and, possibly casting a contemptuous side-thought in the direction of the late lamented Mr. Brahms' shortcomings in regard to writing for the piano in "the Chopinesque arpeggiated style," became oblivious to the facts of the case. Mr. Finck appears to be a very amiable and well-meaning person, but he has of late "cabined, cribbed and confined" his naturally broad and sweeping intellect within Wagnerian and Seidlian limitations to an extent that will not permit him to do himself justice in other directions. It is an unfortunately fateful thing to strap oneself to a bobby horse; it is worse to strap oneself to two hobby horses, for it is almost impossible to ride them successfully, owing to lack of a sufficient number of legs on the part of rider to perform that method of equitation with all desirable success. If Mr. Finck had read his programme he would have discovered that the Beethoven symphony played on this occasion the "315,916th time, or thereabouts," was performed as a tribute to the memory of the master, owing to the coincidence between the date of the performance, Dec. 16, and Beethoven's birthday. It is to be regretted that some of Mr. Finck's friends do not discourse convincingly to him of the virtues of liver pills taken judiciously, according to the directions on the label. They might not cure him of his extreme sufferings from Wagneritis and Seidlitis, but they might put him in a more expanded state of mind, and induce him to let out, so to speak, the too tightly buckled back trousers-strap of his now unduly compressed intellect. And as for the misfortune that Boston is not, as New York is, educated up to expression in music, some effort must be made at once to put this city on a level with the metropolis that misses it when it does not get it. Mr. Paur will please at once make a note of this, and give his days and nights to the study of Seidl—and perhaps Damrosch.

The other papers were less exacting than was Mr. Finck, and were enthusiastic in laudation of Mr. Paur and the playing of the orchestra—even in the Beethoven sypmhony. The chances are, however, that, although New Yorkers, the pleased critics were not as fully educated up to expression in music as is Mr. Finck. The Strauss work made no more satisfying impression than it made here. Its orchestration astonished and its performance aroused wonder by its brilliancy and its technical perfection. It is pleasing to be able to add that Mr. Strube's concerto and Mr. Kneisel's playing of it were cordially praised.

HOME JOURNAL.
NEW YORK:
WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 22, 1897.

Boston Symphony Concert.

When Richard Strauss's symphonic poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," written to give musical expression to the sentiments of Nietzsche's philosophical prose-poem, was first presented in Boston by the Symphony Orchestra of that city, Franz Kneisel, the first violinist, meeting as he left the hall a musical acquaintance whom he knew to be an admirer of Nietzsche, asked him with a twinkle in his eye: "Don't you think that would have gone as well under another name?" A similar query must have arisen in the mind of many an auditor who heard and enjoyed Conductor Paur's interpretation of Strauss's extraordinary work at the Metropolitan Opera House last Thursday. Certainly, no project could be more quixotic than that of creating an analytical and detailed musical parallel to Nietzsche's mental processes as developed in his masterpiece. It would be an easier task to write a thousand poems all of which, though differing widely in character and content, would fit loosely and broadly the music which Strauss has composed than to write a single tone-poem fitting with even approximate accuracy the course of Nietzsche's grandiose philosophical conceptions. Nevertheless, purpose aside, and considering the work simply as absolute music, Strauss is to be credited with a wonderful achievement. In some parts as petty as it is grand in others, and continually oscillating between the sublime and the ridiculous, it harrows, delights, and astounds the hearer, and its technical complexities make its execution a task whose difficulties an orchestra in any degree inferior to the Boston Symphony would find it almost impossible to surmount.

Another novelty, but less unconventional, was the violin concerto written by Gustav Strube, a member of the orchestra, and played with Mr. Kneisel as soloist, which won for both those gentlemen deserved and hearty applause.

Beethoven's fifth symphony, given in commemoration of the composer's birthday, which was also honored by a large wreath at the back of the stage (the same wreath, by the way, did service the following evening at Mendelssohn Hall), was played marvellously, especially the glorious andante; and selections from Weber and Auber served to send the audience home in lighter mood, after the puzzling intricacies of Strauss.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.
NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 22, 1897.

The vast auditorium of the Music Hall was filled on Wednesday evening—the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Joseffy as soloist. Raff's symphony "Im Walde," Schumann's A minor piano concerto, Grieg's Peer Gynt Suite, and Auber's overture to "Carlo Broschi," made up a program that satisfied the popular taste, and to which the management seems to be more generally catering.

So far as the work of the orchestra was concerned, it goes without saying that the entire performance measured up to its usual high standard. The event of the evening, and the musical performance par excellence of the season, was Joseffy's rendition of the Schumann concerto. I have heard many performances of this concerto, but none that equalled that of last Wednesday evening. A storm of applause followed the close of this brilliant performance, and the modest and unassuming virtuoso was compelled to appear again and again bow his acknowledgments.

The Independent

130 FULTON STREET.

NEW YORK, December 23, 1897.

Music.

"Thus Spake Zarathustra."

BY E. IRENÆUS STEVENSON.

At the admirable concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was introduced to our public, on last Thursday evening, one of the season's few musical sensations. It was "Thus Spake Zarathustra," a "symphonic poem" by Richard Strauss, a score yet new to Germany.

The compositions of Richard Strauss—to be called at least remarkable ones—have been discussed more than once in this journal and by the present reviewer. The composer is still a young man. He is identified with Munich, as a composer and conductor. He has no family connection with the Viennese dance-music writers of like name. He is perhaps the finest musical decadent of this age of music's brilliant decadence. Powerfully under Wagnerian convictions, and, along with Bruckner, among the most masterly technical followers and imitators of Wagner, he has carried musical realism and musical intellectuality to the extreme in such scores as his "Death and Glorification," "Macbeth," and the like. He is the latest mark and boundary of orchestration as orchestration. No other brain seems able to see such perspectives in instrumental effects and can work out such complex and bewildering musical pages. As a realist, Strauss can be vulgar and crude. As an intellectualist in music he can be incoherent. He has been spoken of as insane or half-insane by his own family and familiars. There is no doubt that he is a great musical wit allied to madness. But he is not to be slighted off. In the present work he has seen fit to set to music the psychologic and religious poem of a madman, Friedrich Nietzsche.

Nietzche's poem does not have anything more to do with Zarathustra (Zoroaster) and with his life and religious work than by using the great Persian teacher's name. A reviewer would need two columns to set forth all that, instead, Nietzsche has hung to it. We have "The Man and the Over-Man"—the author's "own reckless and boundless Individualism"—the "Great Yearning"—the error of the "Dwellers in the Rear World,—the "Holiness of Laughter"—the "Cu[illegible]nating of Humanity"—the "Star of Promise"—the "World Riddle Unsolved"—all this, and much not according to Nietzche, but according to the variants of the Strauss imagination. Never did music-maker have a stranger inspiration to his fancy! Surely a composer who must needs put all these deep things into music has his work cut out for him! But Strauss attacks it with a Titanic good faith and resolution. His score is as bulky as a symphony. To explain its thematic bearings and its awe-ful inner meanings we have a mental and musical guide by Riemann as long as a [illegible]te in Murray's Baedeker. Down sits the hearer and is expected to [illegible]urage the welter of a chaos of philosophy in his soul, while his ears are full of one of the richest—technically—and most complicated even of our latter-day orchestral works.

This seems a formidable predicament. But, after all, how easy and how just it is to look at Strauss's score and at many others built up on the same ridiculous and false principles! We need not read even Riemann to get an estimate of them with little trouble. Let us cast to the winds all the composer's philosophy, all his wish to be didactic in music, all such baggage—such rubbish. The simple question is—what sort of music does "Thus Spake Zarathustra" give us? Is it enjoyable, impressive, original, strong? Does it justify itself as mere music? We are not necessarily concerned a whit with Strauss's inspirations. Suppose we knew nothing of them?

So considered, in the light of musical art and common sense, "Thus Spake Zarathustra" is a vastly complex, very rich, interesting modern musical score. It is written with such a knowledge of orchestral color as relatively few composers ever have possessed and none have surpassed. It is written at times loftily and at times vulgarly and ad captandum. It has beautiful passages and lovely developments of a technical kind. It has dull and unlovely ones—tho not many. All the colors of the musician's pallet are a-rioting in it. By them we are held in our seats. Its melodic side is neither strong nor original. The consummate working-up of the thing as by a kind of maniacal genius, interests, fascinates and, in a way, impresses us. We are tolerant; as the dazzling color of a picture largely incoherent by a crazy painter, a Turner out-Turnered, might make us forgive wild drawing, an insane perspective. Strauss's new work is quite of a piece with his others—showing indisputable lordship over music's material, with no clear inspiration as an emotional musician, or as a melodist, or as a musician having an original and divine call. He is a clay-footed colossus. "Thus Spake Zarathustra" and its fellows will be forgotten when Beethoven's "Seventh Symphony" is as beloved as ever. But in the meantime "Thus Spake Zarathustra" is a work well worth the hearing and even the favor of contemporary audiences, on the strength of whatever in it is sensuously beautiful as mere musical sound.

"Thus Spake Zarathustra" received a magnificently careful, lucid and expressive performance from the Boston players. Mr. Paur's indefatigable labor was not ill-expended so far as concerned such a laudable result.

Established 1813.

The Official Paper of the State.

The Official Paper of the City.

FRIDAY MORNING, DEC. 24, 1897.

A Symphony Orchestra Concert on Thursday Night.

A Programme in Keeping With the Holiday Season.

To listen to a Boston Symphony concert on Thursday night seemed as sacrilegious to the average Bostonian as to present the Sunday beans in the middle of the week; but the exigencies of the holiday season rule above all other laws, and the concert seemed not a whit less enjoyable because thrown out of its regular orbit.

It may have recalled the fact to some of the older concert-goers that Saturday night used to be considered as part of the Sabbath, in Boston, and that theatre and concert were always relegated to some other part of the week, in olden days

The concert partook of the nature of an orchestral Christmas tree, with pretty presents for everybody, with abstruse problems for none. Metaphysical Strauss, complex Brahms, and all ascetic composers, were set aside for the time being, and a programme of lightness and popularity, suited to the holiday season, was given.

It began with a Beethoven symphony, to be sure, but with the second one, which is light and easily comprehended. This symphony, although a distinct advance upon the first one, is still very Haydnish when compared with the "Eroica," which followed it; the first, third, sixth and eighth are the "popular" ones of the Beethoven list.

Nevertheless, there are startling innovations in this same symphony; the abolition of the Minuet is in itself a momentous affair.

In the first symphony we find Beethoven following Haydn even to the writing of a Minuet as third movement, but he writes a Minuet that goes far beyond Haydn's dreams, a Minuet that shows a giant tugging at his chains. In this second symphony he throws the outgrown form overboard, and the first symphonic Scherzo appears, a Scherzo that is more of a Minuet, however, than the Minuet of the fourth symphony.

The innovation of a Scherzo causes a change in the finale also. Up to this time the finale of the symphony was, like the finale of the Suite, a rollicking and jovial movement, to put the audience in a good humor, after having patiently listened to the movements of a cycle form.

Here, however, the finale deserts the merry-making vein and becomes brilliant and resolute, rather than merely jovial. It is altogether a more earnest symphony than almost any that preceded it, yet it is not in any sense abstruse or complicated.

It was played in the direct and genial manner which suited its character, and formed a pleasant opening of a programme that was popular all through. At first, in the introduction, there was a trifle of roughness, but this soon vanished, and a commendably good "Beethoven reading" was given, for which Mr. Paur deserves thanks.

Bach's "Symphony" from the "Christmas Oratorio" recalls the fact that the word "Symphony" before Haydn's time meant prelude, postlude, or interlude; this work is a pleasing interlude in the old composer's Christmas music, picturing the shepherds going to the Saviour's cradle, accompanied chiefly by two oboi da caccia (obsolete instruments which are now replaced by English horns), a twin picture to the so-called "Pastoral Symphony" which Handel used as interlude in the "Messiah."

Of course the number was admirably fitted to the Christmas season, and the two chief instruments were played with great beauty and clearness by Messrs. Sautet and Mueller.

A more beautiful, tender and finely-scored work of Bach (it is filled out by Robert Franz) it would be impossible to imagine; it is as perfect as anything we possess in the instrumental forms by this composer, and it was pleasant to note that the audience seemed to appreciate its worth.

The prelude to Humperdinck's "Haensel and Gretel" was another concession to the Christmas season, for of course it was appropriate to listen to a fairy tale around the Christmas tree, and the story of the two children sleeping in the forest is told, prettily enough, in this charming number.

Humperdinck combines Wagnerian strength of harmony with Mozartish beauty of melody, and the success of the combination might well set some of our modern composers, who are chasing the tuneless "Melos," earnestly thinking.

The abolition of melody and form, as attempted in modern music, is a blemish,—unless one has Wagner's genius. The composer of the future will unite good tunes with rich tone-coloring and broad harmonic treatment,—as Humperdinck does. The interweaving of the "Song of the Angels" through the prelude is most skilful, and the effect was brought out clearly in the interpretation.

Now followed two works for string orchestra, by Grieg; "Heartwounds" and "Spring," tinged with the sweet melancholy of the North, and very finely harmonized.

The strings of our orchestra are "hors concours," their superiority to anything of the kind in America being now generally conceded, but one can venture to compliment the manner in which they took the difficult high-position passages, nevertheless.

Bizet's "Suite Arlesienne," No. 1, ended the concert in the same melodious manner that had been its chief characteristic in the preceding numbers.

This Suite is common ground where musician and non-musician can meet; the work contains enough of development and musicianly harmony to satisfy even the pedant, while its tunes are so clear that even those who worship only the whistling muse, must enjoy themselves.

This Suite establishes Bizet's reputation almost as decisively as "Carmen" itself; it is one succession of spontaneity and beauty. Yet only those who know what each number pictures in Daudet's dramatic production, can fully understand the power, the fitness and the charm of Bizet's movements. Lovely as they are in the abstract, they are still greater as examples of the dramatic instinct which was so strong a characteristic of the great Frenchman.

That was an "Allegro Deciso" in good earnest at the beginning! full of virility and force, and the saxaphone color was in exquisite keeping with the subsequent

---

[illegible] the epitaph of Schubert to the almost [illegible]ly brief career of Bizet,—

"Fate has buried here a rich possession—
But yet greater promise."

Louis C. Elson.

Boston Journal.

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 24, 1897.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Ninth of the Series Was Given in Music Hall Last Evening, Mr. Emil Paur, Conductor.

The program of the 9th Symphony concert was as follows:

Symphony No. 2, in D major.....Beethoven
Sinfonia (Shepherds' Music) from the
"Christmas Oratorio" ....Bach
Prelude to "Haensel und Gretel"........
Humperdinck
(First time at these concerts.)
Two Northern Melodies for Strings,
Op. 63 ....Grieg
(a) Herzwunden.
(b) Der Frühling.
"L'Arlésienne," Orchestral Suite No. 1..Bizet

The Symphony audience has waited some time for Humperdinck's overture. The piece was first played in this country by the orchestra under Mr. Damrosch, Dec. 7, 1894. There was an imperfect performance of it in Boston April 30, 1895, by the Boston Woman's Orchestra, under Mr. A. W. Thayer; I say imperfect because the orchestra was not that demanded by the composer's score. Nor was the performance of the overture satisfactory when the opera was given at the Hollis Street Theatre, Jan. 21, 1896, under Mr. W. G. Dietrich. The Dream Pantomime from the same opera was played by the Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall, Nov. 2, 1895. The piece itself is simple in thematic idea, but it is made pretentious by swollen orchestration. Humperdinck's recipe is by this time familiar: take a folk-tune that every German child knows and serve it with Wagner sauce. Here again enters the law of association of ideas. To the German child, twelve or sixty years old, the tune has a specific meaning, or it brings up a host of recollections. To an American audience the tune is merely a theme more or less musical. The interest, therefore, in the opera when it was performed here was to most of us such as is awakened by any opera in which familiar themes are not used as leit-motivs. The overture is a pleasing example of homage paid to Wagner by an adoring disciple. But Wagner did this sort of thing better.

⁂

The rest of the program calls for little attention. Handel in a simpler manner did that which Bach tried to do in the Christmas Shepherds' music.

The introduction of Beethoven's Symphony was distinguished by a lack of precision, and there were ragged passages in the allegro that follows; but the larghetto was sung expressively, and the finale was spirited.

The Norwegian tunes by Grieg were performed with an attention that they hardly deserve. Folk-tunes are delightful when their naiveté is preserved; a tinker comes along and tries to improve them; whether his name be Grieg or Brahms, or that of some equally ingenious gentleman, the thing of rustic, savage, or wild beauty is conventionalized and citified and prepared for acceptable appearance in a drawing-room furnished by contract.

The first movement of the suite from Bizet's music to Daudet's play was played admirably, although in the variation where the bassoons indulge in counterpoint, the counterpoint might have been brought out in bolder relief. The last movement was also effective. The Minuetto has been played here with greater elasticity. The adagietto, an exquisite page, was given with true sentiment.

⁂

The next concert will be on Saturday evening, Jan. 1. The program will include Tschaikowsky's 5th Symphony, Entr'acte from Chabrier's "Gwendoline," Auber's overture "Le Domino Noir." Mr. Staudigl of the Damrosch and Ellis Opera Company will sing arias from "Acis and Galatea" and "Euryanthe."

Philip Hale.

Dec BOSTON POST, 24

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The ninth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given in Music Hall last evening. There was no soloist. The orchestral selections were Beethoven's Symphony No. 2 in D; the Shepherds music from Bach's "Christmas Oratorio"; two melodies for string orchestra, Grieg; prelude to "Hansel and Gretel," Humperdinck, and Bizet's "Suite Arlesienne," No. 1.

The work of the orchestra was so uniformly good throughout that it is difficult to point out any one number that was better than the others. The beauty of the strings was never more apparent than in the Grieg melodies, and the performance of the "Larghetto" of the symphony was one long to be remembered.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CII, NO. 177.

FRIDAY, DEC. 24, 1897.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Varied and Pleasing Programme Delightfully Played Throughout.

The ninth of this season's concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last evening in Music Hall, the selections being:

Symphony No. 2....................Beethoven
Sinfonca, from "Christmas Oratorio".....Bach
Prelude to "Hansel and Gretel"..Humperdinck
"Herzwunden" and "Der Fruekling," for strings ....Grieg
"L'Arlesienne," suite No. 1...............Bizet

The Humperdinck prelude was the only novelty. It had been heard in Boston before, but not at these concerts. The performances, with the exception of a somewhat loosely-jointed giving forth of the opening of the first allegro of the symphony, were delightful throughout. For a brief moment the orchestra seemed to be lacking in spirit, but it speedily recovered. Very beautiful indeed were the reading and playing of the ever-charming slow movement. The Bach "Shepherds' music" was taken at an admirable pace; not the slow, drawling and ineffective tempo to which it is usually subjected, and the result was that it did not drag, but flowed freely, and with the proper phrasing. The Humperdinck prelude was heard to better advantage than at any of its earlier renderings here. It was read, not as a bit of profundity, but for just what it is—an introduction to a tuneful opera—and the effect was graceful and interesting. The Bizet suite, though familiar enough, wears finely, and its charms of harmony and of orchestration are as delightful as ever. Mr. Paur read it very sympathetically, and it was exquisitely played, the minuet and the adagietto with particular finish and delicacy. The programme for the next concert is; Symphony No. 5, Tschaikowsky; air from "Acis and Galatea," Handel; entr'acte "Gwendoline," Charbrier; air from "Euryanthe," Weber; overture, "Le Domino Noir," Auber. Mr. Staudigl is to be the soloist.

The Boston Traveler

PUBLISHED BY THE
BOSTON TRAVELER CO.,
TORREY E. WARDNER, President.

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 24, 1897.

THE SYMPHONY.

The Concert Last Night Was One of General Excellence and Interest.

Seventeenth season Boston Symphony Orchestra; ninth concert. The programme:

Symphony No. 2, in D major.—Beethoven
Sinfonia (Shepherds' Music) from the
"Christmas Oratorio"..... ......Bach
Prelude to "Haensel und Gretel"...
Humperdinck
(First time at these concerts.)
Two Northern Melodies for Strings,
Op. 63............... ....Grieg
(a) Herzwunden.
(b) Der Fruhling.
"L'Arlesienne," Orchestral Suite No.
1....... ....Bizet

The concert was one of even merit throughout and of such general excellence as to draw the full attendance, even in the midst of all the holiday bustle, and that too without the attraction of any soloist. Conductor Paur was in his best vein, and led in his usual masterly manner.

The opening number, the Beethoven symphony, though many times severely criticized, is now generally accepted as a particularly fine composition. After last night's interpretation it is a wonder that any other opinion than the latter could have been held regarding it. Opening with a delightful little prelude, gradually swelling into the full orchestra and then some of the most effective violin playing replete with daintiness and grace. The what may be termed duo between the violin and flute is one of the prettiest parts of the symphony. The play given the 'cello in the number brings out this instrument in its best form. The somewhat light frivolous third movement is a rather sharp transition from the second, but prepares the way for the rondo, which closed the symphony.

Bach's Shepherds' Music was more in keeping with the usual impression of what this music should be like. It was given with a little more dash than heretofore, which added not a little to its charm.

The Humperdinck selection, given for the first time at these concerts, is one of those refreshing bits of composition which tells its own story, with all the charm and grace imaginable. It was finely played and enthusiastically received.

The Grieg melodies lose none of their charm, and with their pastoral like movement will ever be a delight. The part for the 'celli in the first of these melodies is a very pretty bit of writing.

The Bizet selection, with which the concert closed, affords some choice moments with the wood-wind instruments, and grand ensemble work.

BROOKLYN LIFE

VOL. XVI. BROOKLYN, N. Y., DEC. 25, 1897. No. 408.

If people of moderate means cannot afford to attend the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts at the Academy in numbers sufficient to fill the big house, and the well-to-do do not care for music of the first water, the latter class would do well to follow a worthy example set last week (Friday afternoon). Seven gentlemen, who do not desire their names made public, clubbed together and purchased two hundred and fifty seats for the matinee concert, donating them to the girls of the Brooklyn Training School for Teachers and their instructors. It was a very graceful act, done without ostentation, and I am quite sure that the recipients will enjoy none of their Christmas presents any more than they did the opportunity to hear the new "Scheherazade" symphony, Raff's exquisite "Im Walde" and the splendid voice of David Bispham.

[57]

The Independent

130 FULTON STREET.

NEW YORK, December 23, 1897.

Music.

"Thus Spake Zarathustra."

BY E. IRENÆUS STEVENSON.

AT the admirable concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was introduced to our public, on last Thursday evening, one of the season's few musical sensations. It was "Thus Spake Zarathustra," a "symphonic poem" by Richard Strauss, a score yet new to Germany.

The compositions of Richard Strauss—to be called at least remarkable ones—have been discussed more than once in this journal and by the present reviewer. The composer is still a young man. He is identified with Munich, as a composer and conductor. He has no family connection with the Viennese dance-music writers of like name. He is perhaps the finest musical decadent of this age of music's brilliant decadence. Powerfully under Wagnerian convictions, and, along with Bruckner, among the most masterly technical followers and imitators of Wagner, he has carried musical realism and musical intellectuality to the extreme in such scores as his "Death and Glorification," "Macbeth," and the like. He is the latest mark and boundary of orchestration as orchestration. No other brain seems able to see such perspectives in instrumental effects and can work out such complex and bewildering musical pages. As a realist, Strauss can be vulgar and crude. As an intellectualist in music he can be incoherent. He has been spoken of as insane or half-insane by his own family and familiars. There is no doubt that he is a great musical wit allied to madness. But he is not to be slighted off. In the present work he has seen fit to set to music the psychologic and religious poem of a madman, Friedrich Nietzsche.

Nietzche's poem does not have anything more to do with Zarathustra (Zoroaster) and with his life and religious work than by using the great Persian teacher's name. A reviewer would need two columns to set forth all that, instead, Nietzsche has hung to it. We have "The Man and the Over-Man"—the author's "own reckless and boundless Individualism"—the "Great Yearning"—the error of the "Dwellers in the Rear World,—the "Holiness of Lau[illegible]er"—the "Cu[illegible]ating of Humanity"—the "Star of Promise"—the "World Riddle Unsolved"—all this, and much not according to Nietzche, but according to the variants of the Strauss imagination. Never did music-maker have a stranger inspiration to his fancy! Surely a composer who must needs put all these deep things into music has his work cut out for him! But Strauss attacks it with a Titanic good faith and resolution. His score is as bulky as a symphony. To explain its thematic bearings and its awe-ful inner meanings we have a mental and musical guide by Riemann as long as [illegible]te in Murray [illegible]aedeker. Down sits the hearer and is expected to [illegible] urage the welter of a chaos of philosophy in his soul, while his ears are full of one of the richest—technically—and most complicated even of our latter-day orchestral works.

This seems a formidable predicament. But, after all, how easy and how just it is to look at Strauss's score and at many others built up on the same ridiculous and false principles! We need not read even Riemann to get an estimate of them with little trouble. Let us cast to the winds all the composer's philosophy, all his wish to be didactic in music, all such baggage—such rubbish. The simple question is—what sort of music does "Thus Spake Zarathustra" give us? Is it enjoyable, impressive, original, strong? Does it justify itself as mere music? We are not necessarily concerned a whit with Strauss's inspirations. Suppose we knew nothing of them?

So considered, in the light of musical art and common sense, "Thus Spake Zarathustra" is a vastly complex, very rich, interesting modern musical score. It is written with such a knowledge of orchestral color as relatively few composers ever have possessed and none have surpassed. It is written at times loftily and at times vulgarly and ad captandum. It has beautiful passages and lovely developments of a technical kind. It has dull and unlovely ones—tho not many. All the colors of the musician's pallet are a-rioting in it. By them we are held in our seats. Its melodic side is neither strong nor original. The consummate working-up of the thing as by a kind of maniacal genius, interests, fascinates and, in a way, impresses us. We are tolerant; as the dazzling color of a picture largely incoherent by a crazy painter, a Turner out-Turnered, might make us forgive wild drawing, an insane perspective. Strauss's new work is quite of a piece with his others—showing indisputable lordship over music's material, with no clear inspiration as an emotional musician, or as a melodist, or as a musician having an original and divine call. He is a clay-footed colossus. "Thus Spake Zarathustra" and its fellows will be forgotten when Beethoven's "Seventh Symphony" is as beloved as ever. But in the meantime "Thus Spake Zarathustra" is a work well worth the hearing and even the favor of contemporary andiences, on the strength of whatever in it is sensuously beautiful as mere musical sound.

"Thus Spake Zarathustra" received a magnificently careful, lucid and expressive performance from the Boston players. Mr. Paur's indefatigable labor was not ill-expended so far as concerned such a laudable result.

[illegible] DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

The Official Paper of the State.

The Official Paper of the City.

FRIDAY MORNING, DEC. 24, 1897.

A Symphony Orchestra Concert on Thursday Night.

A Programme in Keeping With the Holiday Season.

To listen to a Boston Symphony concert on Thursday night seemed as sacrilegious to the average Bostonian as to present the Sunday beans in the middle of the week; but the exigencies of the holiday season rule above all other laws, and the concert seemed not a whit less enjoyable because thrown out of its regular orbit.

It may have recalled the fact to some of the older concert-goers that Saturday night used to be considered as part of the Sabbath, in Boston, and that theatre and concert were always relegated to some other part of the week, in olden days

The concert partook of the nature of an orchestral Christmas tree, with pretty presents for everybody, with abstruse problems for none. Metaphysical Strauss, complex Brahms, and all ascetic composers, were set aside for the time being, and a programme of lightness and popularity, suited to the holiday season, was given.

It began with a Beethoven symphony, to be sure, but with the second one, which is light and easily comprehended. This symphony, although a distinct advance upon the first one, is still very Haydnish when compared with the "Eroica," which followed it; the first, third, sixth and eighth are the "popular" ones of the Beethoven list.

Nevertheless, there are startling innovations in this same symphony; the abolition of the Minuet is in itself a momentous affair.

In the first symphony we find Beethoven following Haydn even to the writing of a Minuet as third movement, but he writes a Minuet that goes far beyond Haydn's dreams, a Minuet that shows a giant tugging at his chains. In this second symphony he throws the outgrown form overboard, and the first symphonic Scherzo appears, a Scherzo that is more of a Minuet, however, than the Minuet of the fourth symphony.

The innovation of a Scherzo causes a change in the finale also. Up to this time the finale of the symphony was, like the finale of the Suite, a rollicking and jovial movement, to put the audience in a good humor, after having patiently listened to the movements of a cycle form.

Here, however, the finale deserts the merry-making vein and becomes brilliant and resolute, rather than merely jovial. It is altogether a more earnest symphony than almost any that preceded it, yet it is not in any sense abstruse or complicated.

It was played in the direct and genial manner which suited its character, and formed a pleasant opening of a programme that was popular all through. At first, in the introduction, there was a trifle of roughness, but this soon vanished, and a commendably good "Beethoven reading" was given, for which Mr. Paur deserves thanks.

Bach's "Symphony" from the "Christmas Oratorio" recalls the fact that the word "Symphony" before Haydn's time meant prelude, postlude, or interlude; this work is a pleasing interlude in the old composer's Christmas music, picturing the shepherds going to the Saviour's cradle, accompanied chiefly by two oboi da caccia (obsolete instruments which are now replaced by English horns), a twin picture to the so-called "Pastoral Symphony" which Handel used as interlude in the "Messiah."

Of course the number was admirably fitted to the Christmas season, and the two chief instruments were played with great beauty and clearness by Messrs. Sautet and Mueller.

A more beautiful, tender and finely-scored work of Bach (it is filled out by Robert Franz) it would be impossible to imagine; it is as perfect as anything we possess in the instrumental forms by this composer, and it was pleasant to note that the audience seemed to appreciate its worth.

The prelude to Humperdinck's "Haensel and Gretel" was another concession to the Christmas season, for of course it was appropriate to listen to a fairy tale around the Christmas tree, and the story of the two children sleeping in the forest is told, prettily enough, in this charming number.

Humperdinck combines Wagnerian strength of harmony with Mozartish beauty of melody, and the success of the combination might well set some of our modern composers, who are chasing the tuneless "Melos," earnestly thinking.

The abolition of melody and form, as attempted in modern music, is a blemish,—unless one has Wagner's genius. The composer of the future will unite good tunes with rich tone-coloring and broad harmonic treatment,—as Humperdinck does. The interweaving of the "Song of the Angels" through the prelude is most skilful, and the effect was brought out clearly in the interpretation.

Now followed two works for string orchestra, by Grieg; "Heartwounds" and "Spring," tinged with the sweet melancholy of the North, and very finely harmonized.

The strings of our orchestra are "hors concours," their superiority to anything of the kind in America being now generally conceded, but one can venture to compliment the manner in which they took the difficult high-position passages, nevertheless.

Bizet's "Suite Arlesienne," No. 1, ended the concert in the same melodious manner that had been its chief characteristic in the preceding numbers.

This Suite is common ground where musician and non-musician can meet; the work contains enough of development and musicianly harmony to satisfy even the pedant, while its tunes are so clear that even those who worship only the whistling muse, must enjoy themselves.

This Suite establishes Bizet's reputation almost as decisively as "Carmen" itself; it is one succession of spontaneity and beauty. Yet only those who know what each number pictures in Daudet's dramatic production, can fully understand the power, the fitness and the charm of Bizet's movements. Lovely as they are in the abstract, they are still greater as examples of the dramatic instinct which was so strong a characteristic of the great Frenchman.

That was an "Allegro Deciso" in good earnest at the beginning! full of virility and force, and the saxaphone color was in exquisite keeping with the subsequent theme

---

The Carillon of the end too [illegible] with just the festive effect that [illegible] and Bizet demanded; it is an organ-point of genius. The work causes one to apply the epitaph of Schubert to the almost equally brief career of Bizet,—

> "Fate has buried here a rich possession—
> But yet greater promise."

Louis C. Elson.

Boston Journal.

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 24, 1897.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Ninth of the Series Was Given in Music Hall Last Evening, Mr. Emil Paur, Conductor.

The program of the 9th Symphony concert was as follows:

Symphony No. 2, in D major......Beethoven
Sinfonia (Shepherds' Music) from the "Christmas Oratorio" ....Bach
Prelude to "Haensel und Gretel"........ Humperdinck
(First time at these concerts.)
Two Northern Melodies for Strings, Op. 63 ....Grieg
(a) Herzwunden.
(b) Der Frühling.
"L'Arlésienne," Orchestral Suite No. 1..Bizet

The Symphony audience has waited some time for Humperdinck's overture. The piece was first played in this country by the orchestra under Mr. Damrosch, Dec. 7, 1894. There was an imperfect performance of it in Boston April 30, 1895, by the Boston Woman's Orchestra, under Mr. A. W. Thayer; I say imperfect because the orchestra was not that demanded by the composer's score. Nor was the performance of the overture satisfactory when the opera was given at the Hollis Street Theatre, Jan. 21, 1896, under Mr. W. G. Dietrich. The Dream Pantomime from the same opera was played by the Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall, Nov. 2, 1895. The piece itself is simple in thematic idea, but it is made pretentious by swollen orchestration. Humperdinck's recipe is by this time familiar: take a folk-tune that every German child knows and serve it with Wagner sauce. Here again enters the law of association of ideas. To the German child, twelve or sixty years old, the tune has a specific meaning, or it brings up a host of recollections. To an American audience the tune is merely a theme more or less musical. The interest, therefore, in the opera when it was performed here was to most of us such as is awakened by any opera in which familiar themes are not used as leit-motivs. The overture is a pleasing example of homage paid to Wagner by an adoring disciple. But Wagner did this sort of thing better.

⁂

The rest of the program calls for little attention. Handel in a simpler manner did that which Bach tried to do in the Christmas Shepherds' music.

The introduction of Beethoven's Symphony was distinguished by a lack of precision, and there were ragged passages in the allegro that follows; but the larghetto was sung expressively, and the finale was spirited.

The Norwegian tunes by Grieg were performed with an attention that they hardly deserve. Folk-tunes are delightful when their naiveté is preserved; a tinker comes along and tries to improve them; whether his name be Grieg or Brahms, or that of some equally ingenious gentleman, the thing of rustic, savage, or wild beauty is conventionalized and citified and prepared for acceptable appearance in a drawing-room furnished by contract.

The first movement of the suite from Bizet's music to Daudet's play was played admirably, although in the variation where the bassoons indulge in counterpoint, the counterpoint might have been brought out in bolder relief. The last movement was also effective. The Minuetto has been played here with greater elasticity. The adagietto, an exquisite page, was given with true sentiment.

⁂

The next concert will be on Saturday evening, Jan. 1. The program will include Tschaikowsky's 5th Symphony, Entr'acte from Chabrier's "Gwendoline," Auber's overture "Le Domino Noir." Mr. Staudigl of the Damrosch and Ellis Opera Company will sing arias from "Acis and Galatea" and "Euryanthe."

Philip Hale.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The ninth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given in Music Hall last evening. There was no soloist. The orchestral selections were Beethoven's Symphony No. 2 in D; the Shepherds music from Bach's "Christmas Oratorio"; two melodies for string orchestra, Grieg; prelude to "Hansel and Gretel," Humperdinck, and Bizet's "Suite Arlesienne," No. 1.

The work of the orchestra was so uniformly good throughout that it is difficult to point out any one number that was better than the others. The beauty of the strings was never more apparent than in the Grieg melodies, and the performance of the "Larghetto" of the symphony was one long to be remembered.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CII., NO. 177.

FRIDAY, DEC. 24, 1897.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Varied and Pleasing Programme Delightfully Played Throughout.

The ninth of this season's concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last evening in Music Hall, the selections being:

Symphony No. 2......................Beethoven
Sinfonca, from "Christmas Oratorio".....Bach
Prelude to "Hansel and Gretel"..Humperdinck
"Herzwunden" and "Der Fruekling," for strings ....Grieg
"L'Arlesienne," suite No. 1.............Bizet

The Humperdinck prelude was the only novelty. It had been heard in Boston before, but not at these concerts. The performances, with the exception of a somewhat loosely-jointed giving forth of the opening of the first allegro of the symphony, were delightful throughout. For a brief moment the orchestra seemed to be lacking in spirit, but it speedily recovered. Very beautiful indeed were the reading and playing of the ever-charming slow movement. The Bach "Shepherds' music" was taken at an admirable pace; not the slow, drawling and ineffective tempo to which it is usually subjected, and the result was that it did not drag, but flowed freely, and with the proper phrasing. The Humperdinck prelude was heard to better advantage than at any of its earlier renderings here. It was read, not as a bit of profundity, but for just what it is—an introduction to a tuneful opera—and the effect was graceful and interesting. The Bizet suite, though familiar enough, wears finely, and its charms of harmony and of orchestration are as delightful as ever. Mr. Paur read it very sympathetically, and it was exquisitely played, the minuet and the adagietto with particular finish and delicacy. The programme for the next concert is: Symphony No. 5, Tschaikowsky; air from "Acis and Galatea," Handel; entr'acte "Gwendoline," Charbrier; air from "Euryanthe," Weber; overture, "Le Domino Noir," Auber. Mr. Staudigl is to be the soloist.

The Boston Traveler

PUBLISHED BY THE
BOSTON TRAVELER CO.,
TORREY E. WARDNER, President.

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 24, 1897.

THE SYMPHONY.

The Concert Last Night Was One of General Excellence and Interest.

Seventeenth season Boston Symphony Orchestra; ninth concert. The programme:

Symphony No. 2, in D major.—Beethoven
Sinfonia (Shepherds' Music) from the "Christmas Oratorio"..... ......Bach
Prelude to "Haensel und Gretel".... Humperdinck
(First time at these concerts.)
Two Northern Melodies for Strings, Op. 63................ ....Grieg
(a) Herzwunden.
(b) Der Fruhling.
"L'Arlesienne," Orchestral Suite No. 1........ ....Bizet

The concert was one of even merit throughout and of such general excellence as to draw the full attendance, even in the midst of all the holiday bustle, and that too without the attraction of any soloist. Conductor Paur was in his best vein, and led in his usual masterly manner.

The opening number, the Beethoven symphony, though many times severely criticized, is now generally accepted as a particularly fine composition. After last night's interpretation it is a wonder that any other opinion than the latter could have been held regarding it. Opening with a delightful little prelude, gradually swelling into the full orchestra and then some of the most effective violin playing replete with daintiness and grace. The what may be termed duo between the violin and flute is one of the prettiest parts of the symphony. The play given the 'cello in the number brings out this instrument in its best form. The somewhat light frivolous third movement is a rather sharp transition from the second, but prepares the way for the rondo, which closed the symphony.

Bach's Shepherds' Music was more in keeping with the usual impression of what this music should be like. It was given with a little more dash than heretofore, which added not a little to its charm.

The Humperdinck selection, given for the first time at these concerts, is one of those refreshing bits of composition which tells its own story, with all the charm and grace imaginable. It was finely played and enthusiastically received.

The Grieg melodies lose none of their charm, and with their pastoral like movement will ever be a delight. The part for the 'celli in the first of these melodies is a very pretty bit of writing.

The Bizet selection, with which the concert closed, affords some choice moments with the wood-wind instruments, and grand ensemble work.

BROOKLYN LIFE

VOL. XVI. BROOKLYN, N. Y., DEC. 25, 1897. No. 408.

IF people of moderate means cannot afford to attend the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts at the Academy in numbers sufficient to fill the big house, and the well-to-do do not care for music of the first water, the latter class would do well to follow a worthy example set last week (Friday afternoon). Seven gentlemen, who do not desire their names made public, clubbed together and purchased two hundred and fifty seats for the matinee concert, donating them to the girls of the Brooklyn Training School for Teachers and their instructors. It was a very graceful act, done without ostentation, and I am quite sure that the recipients will enjoy none of their Christmas presents any more than they did the opportunity to hear the new "Scheherazade" symphony, Raff's exquisite "Im Walde" and the splendid voice of David Bispham.

A Symphony Orchestra Concert on Thursday Night.

A Programme in Keeping With the Holiday Season.

To listen to a Boston Symphony concert on Thursday night seemed as sacrilegious to the average Bostonian as to present the Sunday beans in the middle of the week; but the exigencies of the holiday season rule above all other laws, and the concert seemed not a whit less enjoyable because thrown out of its regular orbit.

It may have recalled the fact to some of the older concert-goers that Saturday night used to be considered as part of the Sabbath, in Boston, and that theatre and concert were always relegated to some other part of the week, in olden days

The concert partook of the nature of an orchestral Christmas tree, with pretty presents for everybody, with abstruse problems for none. Metaphysical Strauss, complex Brahms, and all ascetic composers, were set aside for the time being, and a programme of lightness and popularity, suited to the holiday season, was given.

It began with a Beethoven symphony, to be sure, but with the second one, which is light and easily comprehended. This symphony, although a distinct advance upon the first one, is still very Haydnish when compared with the "Eroica," which followed it; the first, third, sixth and eighth are the "popular" ones of the Beethoven list.

Nevertheless, there are startling innovations in this same symphony; the abolition of the Minuet is in itself a momentous affair.

In the first symphony we find Beethoven following Haydn even to the writing of a Minuet as third movement, but he writes a Minuet that goes far beyond Haydn's dreams, a Minuet that shows a giant tugging at his chains. In this second symphony he throws the outgrown form overboard, and the first symphonic Scherzo appears, a Scherzo that is more of a Minuet, however, than the Minuet of the fourth symphony.

The innovation of a Scherzo causes a change in the finale also. Up to this time the finale of the symphony was, like the finale of the Suite, a rollicking and jovial movement, to put the audience in a good humor, after having patiently listened to the movements of a cycle form.

Here, however, the finale deserts the merry-making vein and becomes brilliant and resolute, rather than merely jovial. It is altogether a more earnest symphony than almost any that preceded it, yet it is not in any sense abstruse or complicated.

It was played in the direct and genial manner which suited its character, and formed a pleasant opening of a programme that was popular all through. At first, in the introduction, there was a trifle of roughness, but this soon vanished, and a commendably good "Beethoven reading" was given, for which Mr. Paur deserves thanks.

Bach's "Symphony" from the "Christmas Oratorio" recalls the fact that the word "Symphony" before Haydn's time meant prelude, postlude, or interlude; this work is a pleasing interlude in the old composer's Christmas music, picturing the shepherds going to the Saviour's cradle, accompanied chiefly by two oboi da caccia (obsolete instruments which are now replaced by English horns), a twin picture to the so-called "Pastoral Symphony" which Handel used as interlude in the "Messiah."

Of course the number was admirably fitted to the Christmas season, and the two chief instruments were played with great beauty and clearness by Messrs. Sautet and Mueller.

A more beautiful tender and finely-scored work of Bach (it is filled out by Robert Franz) it would be impossible to imagine; it is as perfect as anything we possess in the instrumental forms by this composer, and it was pleasant to note that the audience seemed to appreciate its worth.

The prelude to Humperdinck's "Haensel and Gretel" was another concession to the Christmas season, for of course it was appropriate to listen to a fairy tale around the Christmas tree, and the story of the two children sleeping in the forest is told, prettily enough, in this charming number.

Humperdinck combines Wagnerian strength of harmony with Mozartish beauty of melody, and the success of the combination might well set some of our modern composers, who are chasing the tuneless "Melos," earnestly thinking.

The Carillon of the end too was given with just the festive effect that Daudet and Bizet demanded; it is an organ-point of genius. The work causes one to apply the epitaph of Schubert to the almost equally brief career of Bizet,—

> "Fate has buried here a rich possession—
> But yet greater promise."

Louis C. Elson.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 26, 1897.

The program of the Symphony concert next Saturday will include Tschaikowsky's 5th symphony, entr'acte from Chabrier's "Gwendoline," and the overture to Auber's "Le Domino noir." Mr. Staudigl, a member of the Damrosch and Ellis Opera Company, will sing arias from "Acis and Galatea" and "Euryanthe."

Mr. Joseph Staudigl was born at Vienna, March 18, 1850. A son of the famous bass singer of the same name (1807-1861), he began his career as a pupil of Rokitansky at the Vienna Conservatory. For ten years he was a member of the Karlsruhe Opera Company and in that city he was made chamber singer to the Grand Duke. He first visited the United States in 1884-85 as a member of the New York Metropolitan Opera House Company, when he sang such parts as the Count in "The Prophet," the King in "Lohengrin," Wotan in "[illegible] Walkure," Wolfram in "Tannhäuser," Pizarro in "Fidelio." He [illegible] again in 1885-86. He sang Pogner in "[illegible] Meistersinger," and he sang [illegible]," at New York, Dec

---

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 24, 1897.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The programme of the ninth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last evening, was as follows:

Beethoven: Symphony No. 2, in D major, opus 36.
J. S. Bach: Sinfonia (Shepherds' Music) from the "Christmas Oratorio."
Humperdinck: Prelude to "Hänsel und Gretel."
(First time at these concerts.)
Grieg: Two Northern Melodies for Strings, opus 63.
Bizet: "L'Arlésienne," Orchestral Suite No. 1.

This programme, in itself, was pretty cannily put together, considering the amount of ground it covered historically. Beethoven's "perfect" symphony could not be misplaced at the beginning of any programme; however much some of Beethoven's orchestral works may suffer in our over-large modern halls by contrast with the more brilliant and far-carrying instrumentation of some more recent compositions, the beginning of a concert offers them a tabula rasa, on which no rivalry is to be feared; for you cannot snuff out a work retroactively by what follows it. It would have been hard, too, to find a better preparation for Bach's Christmas Sinfonia than this very symphony; the quiet, pastoral character of the Bach movement was in just the right contrast to the brilliant dash and bustle of Beethoven's final Rondo; the connection of keys was, moreover, peculiarly felicitous and still further accentuated this contrast, the tranquil G major of the pastoral coming, as it did, immediately after the flashing D major of the symphony. These two works gave one enough, but not too much, of classisism in its earlier phases. The extreme modern sensuousness of Humperdinck's prelude came as a welcome change of atmosphere without, however, any too garish contrast; for, whatever this prelude of Humperdinck's may be, it is in no sense garish. Grieg's two Northern melodies kept up the vein of sensuous prettiness, if in more modest coloring; and Bizet's alternately brilliant and dreamy suite, full of poetry and Gallic cleverness, wound up the whole as brilliantly as possible. The only flaw to be detected was that the Humperdinck prelude and the Grieg melodies, between them, worked the folk-song vein perhaps a little too hard, and one began to tire a bit of that atmosphere of innocent niaiserie before Grieg had got to his last cadence; especially as folk-songs, worked up by people like Grieg and Humperdinck, are not quite so innocent as Adam and Eve before the Fall, though they manage to preserve their niaiserie bravely. But this may be hypercritical.

Beethoven's D major, heard as it was last evening, is a thing of pure joy; time has had only one effect upon it; to change its hierarchic status. We no longer look upon it, as people did when it was first brought out in Vienna, as too much of a "grand" symphony, as overstepping the true symphonic limit; the "Eroica," not to mention other later works, has well knocked that idea out of the public head. Indeed, we no longer look upon it as a "grand" symphony at all; but there is no need of everything's being "grand;" Liszt's motto, "Qu'il faut toujours faire grand," has found no very copious echo in the hearts of music-lovers in general, and, as "only the Ancients could be always classic," so was it probably Liszt alone who could feel quite at home in the saddle only when mounted on the highest of high horses. There is not a measure in the D major symphony that does not betray true genius and the most inexhaustible wealth of invention; it is as perfect in its way as anything in all music. And "first manner" though it be for the most part, what a wonderful vista it throws open upon Beethoven's latest and most individual style in portions of the Finale!

Bach's Pastoral is another bit of high inspiration, made the most of by genius and technique; perfect all over! It looks innocent enough; but we think few members of the orchestra will differ with us when we estimate it as one of the most difficult movements, if not the very most difficult, they have ever had to cope with; the Siciliano rhythm in that transparent counterpoint—not our friend, the Sage's "bargain-counterpoint"—offers technical difficulties to concerted playing of a quite different nature from those to be found in Richard Strauss's "Zarathustra" or Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade." Upon the whole, Sebastian Bach is perhaps the most difficult composer in the whole list to play or sing perfectly. Mozart runs him hard for second place.

There is little positive to be said against Humperdinck's prelude to his fairy opera, "Hänsel und Gretel;" he Wagnerizes a little slavishly in it, perhaps, but shows a fine sense for color and no mean poetic imagination. Only, as far as we are concerned, the time for this prelude has not yet come; it is all very well to say that the Wagnerian orchestra is now universal, the "standard orchestra" of contemporary composition, and that men like Richard Strauss and Maler have even gone far beyond it, when they want to "faire grand;" this may be all true enough. But we, especially we older ones, still instinctively and inevitably associate it only with the grandiose vein; it is still full of "Nibelungen" and "Tod und Verklärung" associations for us, and we cannot yet bring ourselves to feel its appositeness to subjects like a Grimm fairy story. We cannot help feeling that it unduly magnifies pretty little children and evil-minded old witches, people whose very gist is their baby proportions, their nursery atmosphere, and turns the Meissonier touch into panoramic hugeness. We feel like calling for some oboe or flageolet Jack the Giant Killer to make a handsome end of those huge trombones and tubas. And it is not the ponderous orchestration merely, but the composer's whole point of view in treating his theme, that reminds us unpleasantly of Liszt's turning such things as "Kennst du das Land?" and "Ich weiss nicht was soll es bedeuten" into full-fledged opera scenas, and calling them "songs." Both style and vehicle are too big for the idea.

[illegible] It is [illegible] polished, too [illegible] odors, and the style too portentous. Of Bizet's first "Arlésienne" we can say nothing new; it is perfect as ever.

The playing last evening was for the most part admirable. The next programme is: Tchaikovsky, Symphony No. 5, in C minor, opus 64; Handel, air from "Acis and Galatea;" Chabrier, entr'acte from "Gwendoline;" Weber, aria from "Euryanthe;" Auber, overture to "Le Domino Noir." Mr. Staudigl (of the Damrosch & Ellis opera company) will be the singer.

Dec 11/97
Balto. Life.

AMUSEMENTS.

MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. } JOSEFFY.

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

SECOND CONCERT,
Wednesday Evening, December 15th, at 8.15.
PROGRAMME.

Raff..............Symphony No. 3, "In the Woods."
Part I.—In the daytime. Impressions and sensations.
Part II—At tw light. (a) Revery. (b) Dance of Dryads.
Part III.—At night. Silent rustling of the woods at night. Entrance and exit of the wild hunt, with Frau Holle (Hulda) and Wotan. Daybreak.

Schumann, { Concerto for Pinaforte, in A minor, Op. 54.

Grieg..........................Suite, "Peer Gynt."
Daybreak. The death of Aase. Anitra's dance. The hall of the mounta'n king. The im,s are chasing "Peer Gyntt."

Auber...... ....Overture to "Carlo Broschl."

TICKETS AT ALBERT'S.

F. R. COMEE, Asst. Mgr. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

* * *

MUSIC HALL.

THE second concert in the series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Music Hall, is announced for Wednesday evening, December 15. The programme is an unusually attractive one, commencing with Raff's most beautiful symphony, "In the Woods."

The second orchestral number will be the famous "Peer Gynt" Suite of Grieg, comprising four movements, each in itself distinctive, and all equally beautiful.

It will be a most welcome announcement that Rafael Joseffy is to be the soloist, and will play in his own masterly fashion the Schumann Concerto for Piano-forte in A minor, Op. 54. The simple announcement of Mr. Joseffy's appearance should serve to attract one of the largest audiences of the season, and his recent appearances with the Orchestra elsewhere have called forth the most enthusiastic praises, a striking evidence that he is at the very zenith of his powers.

* * *

Balto. American
Dec. 15/97.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony series will take place at Music Hall this evening. The subscription sale for the performances by this orchestra, now acknowledged to be the finest and best-trained organization in the United States for the rendition of symphonic music, is large. The great capacity of the hall, however, leaves many choice seats at the disposal of purchasers of single tickets.

The program offered upon this occasion is one of unusual excellence, the management fully realizing that nothing short of the best will fully satisfy the critical taste of those who patronize concerts of this character in this city. The initial number, Raff's third symphony in F major, "In the Woods," ranks among the best pieces of symphonic writing by this renowned composer, and as rendered by the Boston Orchestra not only affords more pleasure to the cultured musician, but is a concord of sweet sounds which delights every listener. The same may be said also of Greig's musical synopsis of the Ibsen poem of "Peer Gynt," and Auber's familiar overture to "Carlo Broschi."

When to these gems the added announcement is made that Mr. Rafael Joseffy, the eminent pianist, will play Schumann's concerto in A minor, opus 54, a program is formed which cannot fail to meet the approval of the most exacting. The recent noteworthy success of grand opera in Baltimore gives assurance that liberal patronage may always be confidently expected here by organizations capable of a high order of musical entertainment.

Jewish Comment

MUSIC HALL, MT. ROYAL AVENUE.

SECOND CONCERT,
Wednesday Evening, Dec. 15, at 8.15.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA | JOSEFFY, JOSEFFY, JOSEFFY.

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

Tickets at Albert's 13 N. Charles Street.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Dec 18/97
Herald

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

This evening the second of this season's concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Music Hall.

The programme chosen for this concert is an exceptionally fine selection of symphonic writings, and when to this it is added that the soloist will be Mr. Rafael Joseffy the assurance is given without reservation of a very enjoyable evening. Mr. Joseffy's style has lost none of its clean crispness of touch, or its delicate shadings by reason of his comparatively lengthy retirement from the concert stage. On the contrary, it has gained immensely in breadth and authority. Where there was formerly only beauty there is now added strength. He will play, with orchestral accompaniment, Schumann's Concerto in A minor, opus 54. Of this composition, published in 1845, a leading musical critic said:

"It has often been commented on that, in spite of the enormous brilliancy of most of this concerto, the pianoforte part is written almost throughout in the medium of the instrument, thus gaining little strength from the heavy lower register and little brilliancy from the upper register thereof. This keeping the piano part so nearly constantly in the modest medium register of the instrument tends so to throw it into the shade that Liszt once said jokingly of the work, 'So now we have a concert sans piano, too!'—in allusion to Schumann's F minor sonata opus 14, which was originally published as a concerto without orchestra.'

Every Sat. Review

Music Hall—Boston Symphony Orchestra

The second concert in the series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall is announced for Wednesday evening, December 15. The programme is an unusually attractive one, commencing with Raff's most beautiful symphony "In the Woods." Whenever this Symphony is mentioned it recalls a memorable night several years ago, which will be readily remembered by those who have been the patrons of these concerts from the very beginning. It was in Concordia Hall, and that famous but eccentric exponent of Chopin—De Pachmann—had aroused the audience to a tremendous enthusiasm by his wonderful interpretation of this favorite composer. It seemed as if the soloist was to appropriate to himself the glory of the concert, but there followed such a masterly production of Raff's exquisite symphony that a second time the audience gave way to even more emphatic applause than before, and the Orchestra had indeed held its own as against the soloist. The second orchestral number will be the famous "Peer Gynt" Suite of Greig, comprising four movements, each in itself distinctive and all equally beautiful. It was this selection which created a tremendous furore at the New York concert by the Orchestra in November. Of the closing orchestral number we quote from a recent issue of the Boston Advertiser:

Music Hall.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given on next Wednesday evening, December 15, at the Music Hall. The following programme, with Mr. Joseffy as soloist, will be rendered: Rafe, Symphony No. 3, "In the Woods." Part I—In the Daytime. Impressions and Sensations. Part II—At Twilight. (a) Revery, (b) Dance of Dryads. Part III—At Night. Silent rustling of the woods at night. Entrance and exit of the Wild Hunt, with Frau Holle (Hulda) and Wotan. Daybreak. Schumann — Concerto for Pianoforte, in A minor, Op. 54. Grieg, Suite. "Peer Gynt." Daybreak. The Death of Aase. Anitra's Dance. The Hall of the Mountain King. The Imps are chasing "Peer Gynt." Auber, overture to "Carlo Broschol." Tickets at Albert's.

Balto. American
Dec. 15/97

Amusements.

MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA | Joseffy

MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.
SECOND CONCERT.
WEDNESDAY EVENING, Dec. 15, at 8:15.
PROGRAM:

RAFF—Symphony No. 3, "In the Woods." Part I.—In the Daytime. Impressions and Sensations. Part II.—At Twilight. (a) Revery, (b) Dance of Dryads. Part III.—At Night. Silent rustling of the woods at night. Entrance and exit of the Wild Hunt with Frau Holle (Hulda) and Wotan. Daybreak.
SCHUMANN—Concerto for Pianoforte in A minor, Op. 54. GRIEG—Suite, "Peer Gynt." Daybreak. The Death of Aase. Anitra's Dance. The Hall of the Mountain King. The Imps are chasing "Peer Gynt." AUBER—Overture [illegible]
TICKETS AT ALBERT'S.

BOSTON EVENING RECO[illegible]

A Symphony Orchestra Concert o' Thursday Night.

A Programme in Keeping With the Holiday Season.

To listen to a Boston Symphony concert on Thursday night seemed as sacrilegious to the average Bostonian as to present the Sunday beans in the middle of the week; but the exigencies of the holiday season rule above all other laws, and the concert seemed not a whit less enjoyable because thrown out of its regular orbit.

It may have recalled the fact to some of the older concert-goers that Saturday night used to be considered as part of the Sabbath, in Boston, and that theatre and concert were always relegated to some other part of the week, in olden days

The concert partook of the nature of an orchestral Christmas tree, with pretty presents for everybody, with abstruse problems for none. Metaphysical Strauss, complex Brahms, and all ascetic composers, were set aside for the time being, and a programme of lightness and popularity, suited to the holiday season, was given.

It began with a Beethoven symphony, to be sure, but with the second one, which is light and easily comprehended. This symphony, although a distinct advance upon the first one, is still very Haydnish when compared with the "Eroica," which followed it; the first, third, sixth and eighth are the "popular" ones of the Beethoven list.

Nevertheless, there are startling innovations in this same symphony; the abolition of the Minuet is in itself a momentous affair.

In the first symphony we find Beethoven following Haydn even to the writing of a Minuet as third movement, but he writes a Minuet that goes far beyond Haydn's dreams, a Minuet that shows a giant tugging at his chains. In this second symphony he throws the outgrown form overboard, and the first symphonic Scherzo appears, a Scherzo that is more of a Minuet, however, than the Minuet of the fourth symphony.

The innovation of a Scherzo causes a change in the finale also. Up to this time the finale of the symphony was, like the finale of the Suite, a rollicking and jovial movement, to put the audience in a good humor, after having patiently listened to the movements of a cycle form.

Here, however, the finale deserts the merry-making vein and becomes brilliant and resolute, rather than merely jovial. It is altogether a more earnest symphony than almost any that preceded it, yet it is not in any sense abstruse or complicated.

It was played in the direct and genial manner which suited its character, and formed a pleasant opening of a programme that was popular all through. At first, in the introduction, there was a trifle of roughness, but this soon vanished, and a commendably good "Beethoven reading" was given, for which Mr. Paur deserves thanks.

Bach's "Symphony" from the "Christmas Oratorio" recalls the fact that the word "Symphony" before Haydn's time meant prelude, postlude, or interlude; this work is a pleasing interlude in the old composer's Christmas music, picturing the shepherds going to the Saviour's cradle, accompanied chiefly by two oboi da caccia (obsolete instruments which are now replaced by English horns). a twin picture to the so-called "Pastoral Symphony" which Handel used as interlude in the "Messiah."

Of course the number was admirably fitted to the Christmas season, and the two chief instruments were played with great beauty and clearness by Messrs. Sautet and Mueller.

A more beautiful tender and finely-scored work of Bach (it is filled out by Robert Franz) it would be impossible to imagine; it is as perfect as anything we possess in the instrumental forms by this composer, and it was pleasant to note that the audience seemed to appreciate its worth.

The prelude to Humperdinck's "Haensel and Gretel" was another concession to the Christmas season, for of course it was appropriate to listen to a fairy tale around the Christmas tree, and the story of the two children sleeping in the forest is told, prettily enough, in this charming number. Humperdinck combines Wagnerian strength of harmony with Mozartish beauty of melody, and the success of the combination might well set some of our modern composers, who are chasing the tuneless "Melos," earnestly thinking.

The Carillon of the end too was given with just the festive effect that Daudet and Bizet demanded; it is an organ-point of genius. The work causes one to apply the epitaph of Schubert to the almost equally brief career of Bizet,—

"Fate has buried here a rich possession—
But yet greater promise."

Louis C. Elson.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 26, 1897.

The program of the Symphony concert next Saturday will include Tschaikowsky's 5th symphony, entr'acte from Chabrier's "Gwendoline," and the overture to Auber's "Le Domino noir." Mr. Staudigl, a member of the Damrosch and Ellis Opera Company, will sing arias from "Acis and Galatea" and "Euryanthe."

Mr. Joseph Staudigl was born at Vienna, March 18, 1850. A son of the famous bass singer of the same name (1807-1861), he began his career as a pupil of Rokitansky at the Vienna Conservatory. For ten years he was a member of the Karlsruhe Opera Company and in that city he was made chamber singer to the Grand Duke. He first visited the United States in 1884-85 as a member of the New York Metropolitan Opera House Company, when he sang such parts as the Count in "The Prophet," the King in "Lohengrin," Wotan in "Die Walküre," Wolfram in "Tannhäuser," Pizarro in "Fidelio." He was here again in 1885-86. He sang Pogner in "Die Meistersinger," and he sang in "The Messiah," at New York, Dec. 19, 1885.

Boston Transcript

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 24, 1897

Music Hall; Boston Symphony Orchestra

The programme of the ninth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last evening, was as follows:

Beethoven: Symphony No. 2, in D major, opus 36.
J. S. Bach: Sinfonia (Shepherds' Music) from the "Christmas Oratorio."
Humperdinck: Prelude to "Hänsel und Gretel."
(First time at these concerts.)
Grieg: Two Northern Melodies for Strings, opus 63.
Bizet: "L'Arlésienne," Orchestral Suite No. 1.

This programme, in itself, was pretty cannily put together, considering the amount of ground it covered historically. Beethoven's "perfect" symphony could not be misplaced at the beginning of any programme! however much some of Beethoven's orchestral works may suffer in our over-large modern halls by contrast with the more brilliant and far-carrying instrumentation of some more recent compositions, the beginning of a concert offers them a tabula rasa, on which no rivalry is to be feared; for you cannot snuff out a work retroactively by what follows it. It would have been hard, too, to find a better preparation for Bach's Christmas Sinfonia than this very symphony; the quiet, pastoral character of the Bach movement was in just the right contrast to the brilliant dash and bustle of Beethoven's final Rondo; the connection of keys was, moreover, peculiarly felicitous and still further accentuated this contrast, the tranquil G major of the pastoral coming, as it did, immediately after the flashing D major of the symphony. These two works gave one enough, but not too much, of classisism in its earlier phases. The extreme modern sensuousness of Humperdinck's prelude came as a welcome change of atmosphere without, however, any too garish contrast; for, whatever this prelude of Humperdinck's may be, it is in no sense garish. Grieg's two Northern melodies kept up the vein of sensuous prettine[illegible] if in more modest coloring; and Bizet'[illegible] alternately brilliant and dreamy suite, full of poetry and Gallic cleverness, wound up the whole as brilliantly as possible. The only flaw to be detected was that the Humperdinck prelude and the Grieg melodies, between them, worked the folk-song vein perhaps a little too hard, and one began to tire a bit of that atmosphere of innocent niaiserie before Grieg had got to his last cadence; especially as folk-songs, worked up by people like Grieg and Humperdinck, are not quite so innocent as Adam and Eve before the Fall, though they manage to preserve their niaiserie bravely. But this may be hypercritical.

Beethoven's D major, heard as it was last evening, is a thing of pure joy; time has had only one effect upon it; to change its hierarchic status. We no longer look upon it, as people did when it was first brought out in Vienna, as too much of a "grand" symphony, as overstepping the true symphonic limit; the "Eroica," not to mention other later works, has well knocked that idea out of the public head. Indeed, we no longer look upon it as a "grand" symphony at all; but there is no need of everything's being "grand;" Liszt's motto, "Qu'il faut toujours faire grand," has found no very copious echo in the hearts of music-lovers in general, and, as "only the Ancients could be always classic," so was it probably Liszt alone who could feel quite at home in the saddle only when mounted on the highest of high horses. There is not a measure in the D major symphony that does not betray true genius and the most inexhaustible wealth of invention; it is as perfect in its way as anything in all music. And "first manner" though it be for the most part, what a wonderful vista it throws open upon Beethoven's latest and most individual style in portions of the Finale!

Bach's Pastoral is another bit of high inspiration, made the most of by genius and technique; perfect all over! It looks innocent enough, but we think few members of the orchestra will differ with us when we estimate it as one of the most difficult movements, if not the very most difficult, they have ever had to cope with; the Siciliano rhythm in that transparent counterpoint—not our friend, the Sage's "bargain-counterpoint"—offers technical difficulties to concerted playing of a quite different nature from those to be found in Richard Strauss's "Zarathustra" or Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade." Upon the whole, Sebastian Bach is perhaps the most difficult composer in the whole list to play or sing perfectly. Mozart runs him hard for second place.

There is little positive to be said against Humperdinck's prelude to his fairy opera, "Hänsel und Gretel;" he Wagnerizes a little slavishly in it, perhaps, but shows a fine sense for color and no mean poetic imagination. Only, as far as we are concerned, the time for this prelude has not yet come; it is all very well to say that the Wagnerian orchestra is now universal, the "standard orchestra" of contemporary composition, and that men like Richard Strauss and Maler have even gone far beyond it, when they want to "faire grand;" this may be all true enough. But we, especially we older ones, still instinctively and inevitably associate it only with the grandiose vein; it is still full of "Nibelungen" and "Tod und Verklärung" associations for us, and we cannot yet bring ourselves to feel its appositeness to subjects like a Grimm fairy story. We cannot help feeling that it unduly magnifies pretty little children and evil-minded old witches, people whose very gist is their baby proportions, their nursery atmosphere, and turns the Meissonier touch into panoramic hugeness. We feel like calling for some oboe or [illegible]ageolet Jack the Giant Killer to make a handsome end of those huge trombones and tubas. And it is not the ponderous orchestration merely, but the composer's whole point of view in treating his theme, that reminds us unpleasantly of Liszt's turning such things as "Kennst du das Land?" and "Ich weiss nicht was soll es bedeuten" into full-fledged opera scenas, and calling them "songs." Both style and vehicle are too big for the idea.

Grieg's Northern Melodies are pretty, but enormously sophisticated; the vehicle (the string orchestra) is not too big here, but it is too polished, too fragrant of salon odors, and the style too portentous. Of Bizet's first "Arlésienne" we can say nothing new; it is perfect as ever.

The playing last evening was for the most part admirable. The next programme is: Tchaikovsky, Symphony No. 5, in C minor, opus 64; Handel, air from "Acis and Galatea;" Chabrier, entr'acte from "Gwendoline;" Weber, aria from "Euryanthe;" Auber, overture to "Le Domino Noir." Mr. Staudigl (of the Damrosch & Ellis opera company) will be the singer.

Dec 14/97
Balto [illegible]

AMUSEMENTS.

MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. | JOSEFFY.

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

SECOND CONCERT,
Wednesday Evening, December 15th, at 8.15.

PROGRAMME.

Raff..............Symphony No. 3, "In the Woods."
Part I.—In the daytime. Impressions and sensations.
Part II.—At twilight. (a) Revery. (b) Dance of Dryads.
Part III.—At night. Silent rustling of the woods at night. Entrance and exit of the wild hunt, with Frau Holle (Hulda) and Wotan. Daybreak.

Schumann. Concerto for Pinaforte, in A minor, Op. 54.

Grieg..............Suite, "Peer Gynt."
Daybreak. The death of Aase. Anitra's dance. The hall of the mountain king. The imps are chasing "Peer Gyntt."

Auber..............Overture to "Carlo Broschl."

TICKETS AT ALBERT'S.

F. R. COMEE, Asst. Mgr. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

* * *

MUSIC HALL.

THE second concert in the series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Music Hall, is announced for Wednesday evening, December 15. The programme is an unusually attractive one, commencing with Raff's most beautiful symphony, "In the Woods."

The second orchestral number will be the famous "Peer Gynt" Suite of Grieg, comprising four movements, each in itself distinctive, and all equally beautiful.

It will be a most welcome announcement that Rafael Joseffy is to be the soloist, and will play in his own masterly fashion the Schumann Concerto for Piano-forte in A minor, Op. 54. The simple announcement of Mr. Joseffy's appearance should serve to attract one of the largest audiences of the season, and his recent appearances with the Orchestra elsewhere have called forth the most enthusiastic praises, a striking evidence that he is at the very zenith of his powers.

* * *

Balto American

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony series will take place at Music Hall this evening. The subscription sale for the performances by this orchestra, now acknowledged to be the finest and best-trained organization in the United States for the rendition of symphonic music, is large. The great capacity of the hall, however, leaves many choice seats at the disposal of purchasers of single tickets.

The program offered upon this occasion is one of unusual excellence, the management fully realizing that nothing short of the best will fully satisfy the critical taste of those who patronize concerts of this character in this city. The initial number, Raff's third symphony in F major, "In the Woods," ranks among the best pieces of symphonic writing by this renowned composer, and as rendered by the Boston Orchestra not only affords more pleasure to the cultured musician, but is a concord of sweet sounds which delights every listener. The same may be said also of Greig's musical synopsis of the Ibsen poem of "Peer Gynt," and Auber's familiar overture to "Carlo Broschi."

When to these gems the added announcement is made that Mr. Rafael Joseffy, the eminent pianist, will play Schumann's concerto in A minor, opus 54, a program is formed which cannot fail to meet the approval of the most exacting. The recent noteworthy success of grand opera in Baltimore gives assurance that liberal patronage may always be confidently expected here by organizations capable of a high order of musical entertainment.

Jewish Comment

MUSIC HALL, MT. ROYAL AVENUE.

SECOND CONCERT,
Wednesday Evening, Dec. 15, at 8.15.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA | JOSEFFY, JOSEFFY, JOSEFFY.

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

Tickets at Albert's 13 N. Charles Street.

F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Dec 15/97
Herald

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

This evening the second of this season's concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Music Hall.

The programme chosen for this concert is an exceptionally fine selection of symphonic writings, and when to this it is added that the soloist will be Mr. Rafael Joseffy the assurance is given without reservation of a very enjoyable evening. Mr. Joseffy's style has lost none of its clean crispness of touch, or its delicate shadings by reason of his comparatively lengthy retirement from the concert stage. On the contrary, it has gained immensely in breadth and authority. Where there was formerly only beauty there is now added strength. He will play, with orchestral accompaniment, Schumann's Concerto in A minor, opus 54. Of this composition, published in 1845, a leading musical critic said:

"It has often been commented on that, in spite of the enormous brilliancy of most of this concerto, the pianoforte part is written almost throughout in the medium of the instrument, thus gaining little strength from the heavy lower register and little brilliancy from the upper register thereof. This keeping the piano part so nearly constantly in the modest medium register of the instrument tends so to throw it into the shade that Liszt once said jokingly of the work, 'So now we have a concert sans piano, too!'—in allusion to Schumann's F minor sonata opus 14, which was originally published as a concerto without orchestra.'

Evng Sat. Review

Music Hall—Boston Symphony Orchestra

The second concert in the series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall is announced for Wednesday evening, December 15. The programme is an unusually attractive one, commencing with Raff's most beautiful symphony "In the Woods." Whenever this Symphony is mentioned it recalls a memorable night several years ago, which will be readily remembered by those who have been the patrons of these concerts from the very beginning. It was in Concordia Hall, and that famous but eccentric exponent of Chopin—De Pachmann—had aroused the audience to a tremendous enthusiasm by his wonderful interpretation of this favorite composer. It seemed as if the soloist was to appropriate to himself the glory of the concert, but there followed such a masterly production of Raff's exquisite symphony that a second time the audience gave way to even more emphatic applause than before, and the Orchestra had indeed held its own as against the soloist. The second orchestral number will be the famous "Peer Gynt" Suite of Greig, comprising four movements, each in itself distinctive and all equally beautiful. It was this selection which created a tremendous furore at the New York concert by the Orchestra in November. Of the closing orchestral number we quote from a recent issue of the Boston Advertiser:

Music Hall.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given on next Wednesday evening, December 15, at the Music Hall. The following programme, with Mr. Joseffy as soloist, will be rendered: Rafe, Symphony No. 3, "In the Woods." Part I—In the Daytime. Impressions and Sensations. Part II—At Twilight. (a) Revery, (b) Dance of Dryads. Part III—At Night. Silent rustling of the woods at night. Entrance and exit of the Wild Hunt, with Frau Holle (Hulda) and Wotan. Daybreak. Schumann—Concerto for Pianoforte, in A minor, Op. 54. Grieg, Suite, "Peer Gynt." Daybreak. The Death of Aase. Anitra's Dance. The Hall of the Mountain King. The Imps are chasing "Peer Gynt." Auber, overture to "Carlo Broschol." Tickets at Albert's.

Balto. American
Dec. 14/97

Amusements.

MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA | Joseffy

MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.
SECOND CONCERT,
WEDNESDAY EVENING, Dec. 15, at 8:15.

PROGRAM:

RAFF—Symphony No. 3, "In the Woods." Part I.—In the Daytime. Impressions and Sensations. Part II.—At Twilight. (a) Revery, (b) Dance of Dryads. Part III.—At Night. Silent rustling of the woods at night. Entrance and exit of the Wild Hunt with Frau Holle (Hulda) and Wotan. Daybreak.

SCHUMANN—Concerto for Pianoforte, in A minor, Op. 54. GRIEG—Suite, "Peer Gynt." Daybreak. The Death of Aase. Anitra's Dance. The Hall of the Mountain King. The Imps are chasing "Peer Gynt." AUBER—Overture to "Carlo Broschl."

TICKETS AT ALBERT'S.

F. R. COMEE, Asst. Mgr. C. A. ELLIS, Mgr.

[58]

(American)

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The second of the series of the seventeenth season of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Emil Paur, conductor, will be given at Music Hall next Wednesday evening, December 15. Coming so close after the highly-successful performances by the Damrosch Grand Opera Company, it may be necessary that special attention should be called to the program of this concert, since failure to hear it would be a great disappointment to all lovers of symphonic music.

The program comprises but four numbers, but each is a gem of musical composition, which, it may be taken as a fact, will be rendered by this high-class and thoroughly-trained corps of musicians in a highly acceptable manner. The initial number is Raff's Symphony No. 3, in F major, entitled "In the Woods," which, like Beethoven's "Pastoral," verges on the confines of pure symphonic writing. It is in three parts, and the final movement is regarded as one of the best pieces of descriptive writing known to the musical world.

Greig's Suite "Peer Gynt" and Auber's familiar overture to "Carlo Broschi" are the other two purely orchestral numbers.

The soloist will be Mr. Rafael Joseffy, who today easily stands in the front rank of living pianists. He will play on this occasion Schumann's "Concerto" in A minor. This is a work which, while intrinsically brilliant, is so written in the medium of the instrument that only a master can make it what it is intended to be.

The growing appreciation in social circles in this city of the work of the Boston Symphony Orchestra bears ample testimony to the increase of musical culture in Baltimore.

BALTIMORE SUN

MON. DEC. 13/97.

stranger.
Biological Laboratory, Johns Hopkins University.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Rafael Joseffy To Play Wednesday Night—Kneisel Quartette To-Morrow Evening.

On Wednesday night the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the second of its present series of concerts at Music Hall. The soloist will be Rafael Joseffy, the world-renowned pianist, whose recent resumption of concert work has attracted much attention.

Mr. Joseffy will play Schumann's Concerto for the pianoforte, in A minor, opus 54. The orchestra will render Joachim Raff's Symphony No. 3, in F major, "In the Woods;" Eduard Hagerup Grieg's suite, "Peer Gynt," the words of which are the work of Ibsen, and Auber's overture to "Carlo Broschi."

Tomorrow evening, in the assembly room of Music Hall, the Kneisel Quartette, which is composed of some of the Boston Symphony's best performers, will give, with the aid of Mr. Harold Randolph, as pianist, the second of their series of chamber-music concerts. Their programme will include Tschaikowsky's string quartette, in F major, Beethoven's variations from a string quartette, in A major, and Beethoven's piano trio, in B-flat major.

Saturday

MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. JOSEFFY.

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

Second Concert,

WEDNESDAY EVE., DEC. 15, at 8.15.

—PROGRAMME—

RAFF—Symphony No. 3, "In the Woods." Part I.—In the Daytime. Impressions and Sensations. Part II.—At Twilight. (a) Revery, (b) Dance of Dryads. Part III.—At Night. Silent rustling of the woods at night. Entrance and exit of the Wild Hunt with Frau Holle (Hulda) and Wotan. Daybreak. SCHUMANN—Concerto for Pianoforte, in A minor, Op 54. GRIEG—Suite, "Peer Gynt." Daybreak. The Death of Aase. Anitra's Dance. The Hall of the Mountain King. The Imps are chasing "Peer Gynt." AUBER—Overture to "Carlo Broschi."

Tickets at Albert's.

F. R. COMEE, Ass't. Mgr. C. A. ELLIS, Mgr.

Tues. Dec. 14.

News

Symphony Orchestra Coming.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will arrive in Baltimore this evening at 7.20 o'clock. The Kneisel concert will be given tonight at Music Hall, and tomorrow night the regular monthly symphony concert will be given at the same place. This afternoon the orchestra will give a matinee in Washington, going to that city from Philadelphia, where a concert was given last night.

Dec. 15.
Herald

Amusements.

MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. JOSEFFY.

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

SECOND CONCERT.

WEDNESDAY EVENING, DEC. 15, at 8.15.

—PROGRAMME:—

RAFF—Symphony No. 3, "In the Woods." Part I.—In the Daytime. Impressions and Sensations. Part II.—At Twilight. (a) Revery, (b) Dance of Dryads. Part III.—At Night. Silent rustling of the woods at night. Entrance and exit of the Wild Hunt with Frau Holle (Hulda) and Wotan. Daybreak.

SCHUMANN—Concerto for Pianoforte, in A minor, Op. 54.

GRIEG....................Suite, "Peer Gynt." Daybreak. The Death of Aase. Anitra's Dance. The Hall of the Mountain King. The Imps are chasing "Peer Gynt."

AUBER..........Overture to "Carlo Broschi."

Tickets at Albert's.

F. R. COMEE, Ass't Mgr. C. A. ELLIS, M

Sun.

Music Hall.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. JOSEFFY. JOSEFFY. JOSEFFY. JOSEFFY.

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

SECOND CONCERT.

WEDNESDAY EVG., DEC. 15, AT 8.15.

—PROGRAMME—

RAFF......Symphony No. 3, "In the Woods." Part I.—In the Daytime. Impressions and Sensations. Part II.—At Twilight. (a) Revery, (b) Dance of Dryads. Part III.—At Night. Silent rustling of the woods at night. Entrance and exit of the Wild Hunt, with Frau Holle (Hulda) and Wotan. Daybreak.

SCHUMANN—Concerto for Pianoforte, in A minor, Op. 54.

GRIEG....................Suite, "Peer Gynt." Daybreak. The Death of Aase. Anitra's Dance. The Hall of the Mountain King. The Imps are chasing "Peer Gynt."

AUBER.........Overture to "Carlo Broschi."

Tickets at Albert's.

F. R. COMEE, Asst. Mgr. C. A. ELLIS, Mgr.

News.

MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. JOSEFFY.

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

SECOND CONCERT,

Wednesday Evening, Dec. 15, at 8.15.

PROGRAMME.

RAFF—Symphony No. 3, "In the Woods." Part I.—In the Daytime. Impressions and Sensations.—Part II.—At Twilight. (a) Revery, (b) Dance of Dryads. Part III.—At Night. Silent rustling of the woods at night. Entrance and exit of the Wild Hunt with Frau Holle (Hulda) and Wotan. Daybreak.

SCHUMANN—Concerto for Pianoforte, in A minor, Op. 54.

GRIEG.................Suite, "Peer Gynt." Daybreak. The Death of Aase. Anitra's Dance. The Hall of the Mountain King. The Imps are chasing "Peer Gynt."

AUBER.....Overture to "Carlo Broschi."

Tickets at Albert's.

F. R. Comee, Ass't Mgr. C. A. Ellis, Mgr.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 26, 1897.

The mirth Symphony programme began with Beethoven's second symphony, in which the listener feels how the influence of the earlier masters was still impressive upon him and governed him in the turn of a phrase, the cast of a theme or some phase of color or atmosphere. The orchestra played it excellently and Mr. Paur seldom trifled with the tempi after the not too respectable fashion of the day. The remainder of the programme was alternately grave and gay in a not over-interesting combination. The little introduction from the elder Bach's "Christmas Oratorio," being what is often spoken of as the "Shepherd" music, brought a sufficient tranquillity with it, and then came the variegated prelude to Humperdinck's "Hansel and Gretel," which was heard when the opera was given at the Hollis Street Theatre, but has not been given before in these concerts. It is a mosaic of many moods and fragmentary melodies, but the vehement and bustling predominate in it, marching with lively foot. Another calm was ushered by Grieg's arrangement for the much subdivided strings of two Norwegian folk-songs, which are almost lost in the amplitude and elaboration of their setting-forth. Then the concert ended vivaciously with the first of Bizet's suites from his "Arlesienne" music.

The next programme Tscharkowsky's fifth symphony, the ente'-act from Chabrier's "Gwendoline," and Auber's overture to his "Domino Noir." Mr. Standlig is to sing from "Aris and Galatea" and "Euryanthe."

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 29, 1897.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has so far given three concerts, the number having this year been increased from five to eight. The list of subscribers has been larger than ever, and Herr Paur and his fellow artists are the most welcome guests in the city.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER [illegible] 1897.

Symphony Concert.

The third concert for this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last evening in Infantry Hall. That always welcome singer, Miss Gertrude May Stein, was the soloist. The usual large and cultivated audience was present to greet Mr. Paur and his players. An extremely interesting programme, made up entirely of the "moderns," was presented, the numbers being as follows:

Humperdinck..Prelude to "Hansel und Gretel."
(First time at these concerts.)
Saint-Saens..Aria from "Samson and Dalilah."
Grieg..............Suite, "Peer Gynt," op. 46.
Daybreak.
The Death of Aase.
Anitra's Dance.
The Hall of the Mountain King.
(The imps are chasing "Peer Gynt.")
Wagner..Scena, "Gerechter Gott!" and Aria, "In seiner Beuthe," from "Rienzi."
Raff..Symphony No. 3, in F major, "In the Woods," op. 153.
Part I. In the Daytime.
Impressions and Sensations: Allegro (F major).
Part II. At Twilight.
(a) Revery: Largo (A-flat major)
(b) Dance of Dryads: Allegro assai (D-minor); Poco meno mosso (A major).
Part III. At Night.
Silent rustling of the woods at night. Entrance and exit of the Wild Hunt with Frau Holle (Hulda) and Wotan. Daybreak: Allegro (F major).

Contrary to the usual custom at these concerts, the symphony—the piece de resistance of the musical feast—was reserved till the last. A most welcome novelty was offered in the opening number, the prelude to Humperdinck's "Hansel und Gretel." This fairy opera, which brought its composer at once into prominence, has been widely talked about, and the excerpt played last night was awaited with considerable curiosity. It proved to be very original and charming music and was greeted with unmistakable approval. Grieg's "Peer Gynt" suite has not been heard here in some time, though formerly it was a quite familiar number on the symphony programmes. It was cordially welcomed, though the severe simplicity of the first two movements rather suffered by proximity to the two brilliant pieces of modern orchestral coloring which preceded it. The element of contrast was well served by placing it in the middle of the programme, but the contrast was a severe trial for Grieg's music. Anitra's dance, however, with its catchy rhythm and quaint effects, gave pleasure as of old, and the spirited closing scene where the imps of the mountain king hustle Peer Gynt produced its usual effect upon the audience. There was a distinct desire manifested to hear the finale repeated, and Mr. Paur was kept bowing for some time.

Raff's fine symphony, "In the Woods," made a brilliant and satisfactory close to one of the most interesting concerts of the series. Of this work, Mr. Apthorp, in his excellent programme notes, speaks as follows: "This symphony, like Beethoven's 'Pastoral' verges on the confines of pure symphonic writing, closely approaching the domain of 'programme-music.' Yet, descriptive and picturesquely suggestive as much of it is, it never quite becomes pure 'programme music. Indeed, it adheres so closely to the form of the symphony that one of the earliest criticisms on it in Germany was to the effect that, in the last movement (where there is a famous suggestion of Daybreak), 'the composer, out of deference to the symphonic form, had made the sun rise twice on the same morning.'" The symphony is a brilliant specimen of the handiwork of one of the greatest of modern composers, for, in spite of the fact that Raff had some limitations, he is clearly entitled to be so designated. It was played with marvellous precision and finish, as, indeed, was all the rest of the programme.

Many would have been better pleased had Miss Stein selected something else than the well-worn aria from "Samson and Delilah," in which she has won so many triumphs. Not that the air is unwelcome in itself, but in the case of a singer of such versatility it is a pleasure to hear something less familiar. While Miss Stein sang the great love song of Delilah with authority and art, her performance was hardly equal to some of her past successes. Perhaps she, too, has tired of it a little. In the unfamiliar but striking aria from Wagner's "Rienzi" Miss Stein again showed herself the remarkably accomplished artist and scored a pronounced and well-deserved success.

A briefer time than usual intervenes between the dates of last night's concert and the next of the series. The fourth concert will be given on the evening of Wednesday, Jan. 12.

THE NEWS

DAILY AND WEEKLY.

Providence, Rhode Island.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 30, 1897.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Third in Series Given in Infantry Hall.

The Splendid Program Magnificently Rendered.

The third of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts of the season was given in Infantry hall last evening, and the patronage was very generous. The program was as follows:

Engelbert Humperdinck, prelude to "Hansel and Gretel," first time at these concerts; Camille Saint-Saens, aria from "Samson and Dalilah;" Edvard Hagerup Greig, suite "Peer Gynt," op. 46, daybreak, the death of Aase, Anitra's dance, the hall of the mountain king (the imps are chasing "Peer Gynt"); Richard Wagner, scena, "Gerechter Gott:" an aria "In Seiner Bluthe," from "Rienzi;" Joachim Raff, symphony No. 3, in F major, "In the Woods," op. 153, part 1, "In the Daytime," impressions and sensations, allegro (F major); part 2, "At Twilight," (a) Revery, Largo (A flat major, b) dance of Dryads, allegro assai (D minor); poco meno mosso (A major); part 3, "At Night," silent rustling of the woods at night; entrance and exit of the wild hunt with Frau Holle (Hulda and Wotan;) daybreak, allegro (F major).

This program was one with a noble variety, and one that interested from the first, for including as it did fairy opera, an aria from an oratorio, grand opera selections, and the poetic and exquisite symphony, "In the Woods," the patrons of these concerts had anticipated great pleasure from the first number which had created great enthusiasm in New York and whose course on the way to a gracious popularity had been unimpeded since its delightful measure first greeted the ears of an assemblage at the Court Theatre in Wirmar on Dec. 23, 1893. The soft music of the fairy story charmed the audience last evening, and many felt that the heralds of its beauty had this time not said too much, for it had a delightful dash of novelty in it and its graciousness was ever evident.

Miss Stein is one of the musical favorites of this city and her rich and beautiful voice won for her last night both in the aria from "Samson and Dalilah," and in the aria from Rienzi very warm sentiments of approval. She was obliged after each number to bow again and again her acknowledgments of the delight of the audience at her work.

All of the world is beautiful and the minds of men are attracted by some idea of its beauty and the natural environment has its great hold on men. The Norseman was inspired to his deeds of prowess by the legends of his land and this old story is brought again to our mind as we listen to the masterly work of Greig's "Peer Gynt." Not alone its beauty, but its hard problem has the artist worked into this history of a peasant lad of old Norway. The delightful synopsis of the story of the peasant in the four parts given, held the audience and the charming final reminiscent as it was of things that have lingered in the mind from its first freshness, the audience wanted to hear once again but Mr. Emil Paur, the conductor, only satisfied the audience by graceful bows.

The selections from Wagner gave the audience an idea of the wealthy mine that the master of energy in music had found in the incidents that fable as well as history has surrounded the life of the last of the tribunes of old Rome with Raff's noble symphony "In the Woods" had been awaited with that desire which even in the enjoyment of the keenest of pleasures one seems to be looking to something better. This delightful story of wood life transcends all that poets tell us of nature—that is, the poets who write verses. The delightful parts into which it is devided seem to prolong our delights. Few are there for whom the woods have not some unknown and indescribable attraction. There is something there that we feel and though sound sense has removed from our minds tales once believed and though we know the structure of and can paint the picture, yet it is there. Every bit of light seems to contain innumerable beauties, and in noble tones and with richest grace has this great musician interpreted these feelings and sensations for us. He does not analyze the light or any spot, but he takes one impression and one sensation, and he says here is a beauty you did not notice, and here is another and another.

Then there is the twilight with its revery and its unrest that is more delightful than sleep and the Dryads dance, for in this hour everything that is real fades away and the denizens of the woods that have laughed at us from behind the trees and out of the bells of flowers are dancing in their own ballroom. Last comes the night with its wild hunt and we hear the noise and joyous cries of men and women and the sounds of horses and there is a fading away of darkness and the gray of dawn, beautiful as if here were again that age when every ray of its morning and evening beamed from the throne of the Omnipotent. It is not so hard when one listens to the great poetic description of this dawn break to excuse the maker of it if he, like a child, retraced his steps after he had gone a little in advance and seems to say "That way is a delightful spot I just passed and I must go back and look at it again for it may be I shall not pass this way again." Few have passed the familiar though unknown place of morn break as Raff has done in this instance, and his two sunrises in the same day must be pardoned.

(American)

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The second of the series of the seventeenth season of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Emil Paur, conductor, will be given at Music Hall next Wednesday evening, December 15. Coming so close after the highly-successful performances by the Damrosch Grand Opera Company, it may be necessary that special attention should be called to the program of this concert, since failure to hear it would be a great disappointment to all lovers of symphonic music.

The program comprises but four numbers, but each is a gem of musical composition, which, it may be taken as a fact, will be rendered by this high-class and thoroughly-trained corps of musicians in a highly acceptable manner. The initial number is Raff's Symphony No. 3, in F major, entitled "In the Woods," which, like Beethoven's "Pastoral," verges on the confines of pure symphonic writing. It is in three parts, and the final movement is regarded as one of the best pieces of descriptive writing known to the musical world.

Greig's Suite "Peer Gynt" and Auber's familiar overture to "Carlo Broschi" are the other two purely orchestral numbers.

The soloist will be Mr. Rafael Joseffy, who today easily stands in the front rank of living pianists. He will play on this occasion Schumann's "Concerto" in A minor. This is a work which, while intrinsically brilliant, is so written in the medium of the instrument that only a master can make it what it is intended to be.

The growing appreciation in social circles in this city of the work of the Boston Symphony Orchestra bears ample testimony to the increase of musical culture in Baltimore.

BALTIMORE SUN

MON. DEC. 13/97.

stranger! Biological Laboratory, Johns Hopkins University.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Rafael Joseffy To Play Wednesday Night—Kneisel Quartette To-Morrow Evening.

On Wednesday night the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the second of its present series of concerts at Music Hall. The soloist will be Rafael Joseffy, the world-renowned pianist, whose recent resumption of concert work has attracted much attention.

Mr. Joseffy will play Schumann's Concerto for the pianoforte, in A minor, opus 54. The orchestra will render Joachim Raff's Symphony No. 3, in F major, "In the Woods;" Eduard Hagerup Grieg's suite, "Peer Gynt," the words of which are the work of Ibsen, and Auber's overture to "Carlo Broschi."

Tomorrow evening, in the assembly room of Music Hall, the Kneisel Quartette, which is composed of some of the Boston Symphony's best performers, will give, with the aid of Mr. Harold Randolph, as pianist, the second of their series of chamber-music concerts. Their programme will include Tschaikowsky's string quartette, in F major, Beethoven's variations from a string quartette, in A major, and Beethoven's piano trio, in B-flat major.

Saturday

MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. JOSEFFY.

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

Second Concert,

WEDNESDAY EVE., DEC. 15, at 8.15.

—PROGRAMME—

RAFF—Symphony No. 3, "In the Woods." Part I—In the Daytime. Impressions and Sensations. Part II—At Twilight. (a) Revery, (b) Dance of Dryads. Part III.—At Night. Silent rustling of the woods at night. Entrance and exit of the Wild Hunt with Frau Holle (Hulda) and Wotan. Daybreak. SCHUMANN—Concerto for Pianoforte, in A minor, Op 54. GRIEG—Suite, "Peer Gynt." Daybreak. The Death of Aase. Anitra's Dance. The Hall of the Mountain King. The Imps are chasing "Peer Gynt." AUBER—Overture to "Carlo Broschi."

Tickets at Albert's.

F. R. COMEE, Ass't. Mgr. C. A. ELLIS, Mgr

Tues, Dec. 14.

News

Symphony Orchestra Coming.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will arrive in Baltimore this evening at 7.20 o'clock. The Kneisel concert will be given tonight at Music Hall, and tomorrow night the regular monthly symphony concert will be given at the same place. This afternoon the orchestra will give a matinee in Washington, going to that city from Philadelphia, where a concert was given last night.

Dec. 15.
Herald

Amusements.

MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. JOSEFFY.

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

SECOND CONCERT,

WEDNESDAY EVENING, DEC. 15, at 8.15.

—PROGRAMME:—

RAFF—Symphony No. 3, "In the Woods." Part I.—In the Daytime. Impressions and Sensations. Part II.—At Twilight. (a) Revery, (b) Dance of Dryads. Part III.—At Night. Silent rustling of the woods at night. Entrance and exit of the Wild Hunt with Frau Holle (Hulda) and Wotan. Daybreak.

SCHUMANN—Concerto for Pianoforte, in A minor, Op. 54.

GRIEG....................Suite, "Peer Gynt." Daybreak. The Death of Aase. Anitra's Dance. The Hall of the Mountain King. The Imps are chasing "Peer Gynt."

AUBER..........Overture to "Carlo Broschi."

Tickets at Albert's.

F. R. COMEE, Ass't Mgr. C. A. ELLIS, M

Sun

Music Hall.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. JOSEFFY. JOSEFFY. JOSEFFY. JOSEFFY.

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

SECOND CONCERT.

WEDNESDAY EVG., DEC. 15, AT 8.15.

—PROGRAMME:—

RAFF......Symphony No. 3, "In the Woods." Part I.—In the Daytime. Impressions and Sensations. Part II.—At Twilight. (a) Revery, (b) Dance of Dryads. Part III.—At Night. Silent rustling of the woods at night. Entrance and exit of the Wild Hunt, with Frau Holle (Hulda) and Wotan. Daybreak.

SCHUMANN—Concerto for Pianoforte, in A minor, Op. 54.

GRIEG....................Suite. "Peer Gynt." Daybreak. The Death of Aase. Anitra's Dance. The Hall of the Mountain King. The Imps are chasing "Peer Gynt."

AUBER............Overture to "Carlo Broschi."

Tickets at Albert's.

F. R. COMEE, Asst. Mgr. C. A. ELLIS, Mgr.

News.

MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. JOSEFFY.

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

SECOND CONCERT,

Wednesday Evening, Dec. 15, at 8.15.

PROGRAMME.

RAFF—Symphony No. 3, "In the Woods." Part I.—In the Daytime. Impressions and Sensations.— Part II.—At Twilight. (a) Revery, (b) Dance of Dryads. Part III.—At Night. Silent rustling of the woods at night. Entrance and exit of the Wild Hunt with Frau Holle (Hulda) and Wotan. Daybreak.

SCHUMANN—Concerto for Pianoforte, in A minor, Op. 54.

GRIEG..................Suite, "Peer Gynt." Daybreak. The Death of Aase. Anitra's Dance. The Hall of the Mountain King. The Imps are chasing "Peer Gynt."

AUBER......Overture to "Carlo Broschi."

Tickets at Albert's.

F. R. Comee, Ass't Mgr. C. A. Ellis, Mgr.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 26, 1897.

The mirth Symphony programme began with Beethoven's second symphony, in which the listener feels how the influence of the earlier masters was still impressive upon him and governed him in the turn of a phrase, the cast of a theme or some phase of color or atmosphere. The orchestra played it excellently and Mr. Paur seldom trifled with the tempi after the not too respectable fashion of the day. The remainder of the programme was alternately grave and gay in a not over-interesting combination. The little introduction from the elder Bach's "Christmas Oratorio," being what is often spoken of as the "Shepherd" music, brought a sufficient tranquillity with it, and then came the variegated prelude to Humperdinck's "Hansel and Gretel," which was heard when the opera was given at the Hollis Street Theatre, but has not been given before in these concerts. It is a mosaic of many moods and fragmentary melodies, but the vehement and bustling predominate in it, marching with lively foot. Another calm was ushered by Grieg's arrangement for the much subdivided strings of two Norwegian folk-songs, which are almost lost in the amplitude and elaboration of their setting-forth. Then the concert ended vivaciously with the first of Bizet's suites from his "Arlesienne" music.

The next programme Tscharkowsky's fifth symphony, theente'-act from Chabrier's "Gwendoline," and Auber's overture to his "Domino Noir." Mr. Standlig is to sing from "Aris and Galatea" and "Euryanthe."

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 29, 1897.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has so far given three concerts, the number having this year been increased from five to eight. The list of subscribers has been larger than ever, and Herr Paur and his fellow artists are the most welcome guests in the city.

ROVIDENCE JO

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 30, 1897.

Symphony Concert.

The third concert for this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last evening in Infantry Hall. That always welcome singer, Miss Gertrude May Stein, was the soloist. The usual large and cultivated audience was present to greet Mr. Paur and his players. An extremely interesting programme, made up entirely of the "moderns," was presented, the numbers being as follows:

Humperdinck..Prelude to "Hansel und Gretel."
(First time at these concerts.)
Saint-Saens..Aria from "Samson and Dalilah."
Grieg............ Suite, "Peer Gynt," op. 46.
Daybreak.
The Death of Aase.
Anitra's Dance.
The Hall of the Mountain King.
(The imps are chasing "Peer Gynt.")
Wagner..Scena, "Gerechter Gott!" and Aria, "In seiner Beuthe," from "Rienzi."
Raff..Symphony No. 3, in F major, "In the Woods," op. 153.
Part I. In the Daytime.
Impressions and Sensations: Allegro (F major).
Part II. At Twilight.
(a) Revery: Largo (A-flat major)
(b) Dance of Dryads: Allegro assai (D minor); Poco meno mosso (A major).
Part III. At Night.
Silent rustling of the woods at night. Entrance and exit of the Wild Hunt with Frau Holle (Hulda) and Wotan. Daybreak: Allegro (F major).

Contrary to the usual custom at these concerts, the symphony—the piece de resistance of the musical feast—was reserved till the last. A most welcome novelty was offered in the opening number, the prelude to Humperdinck's "Hansel und Gretel." This fairy opera, which brought its composer at once into prominence, has been widely talked about, and the excerpt played last night was awaited with considerable curiosity. It proved to be very original and charming music and was greeted with unmistakable approval. Grieg's "Peer Gynt" suite has not been heard here in some time, though formerly it was a quite familiar number on the symphony programmes. It was cordially welcomed, though the severe simplicity of the first two movements rather suffered by proximity to the two brilliant pieces of modern orchestral coloring which preceded it. The element of contrast was well served by placing it in the middle of the programme, but the contrast was a severe trial for Grieg's music. Anitra's dance, however, with its catchy rhythm and quaint effects, gave pleasure as of old, and the spirited closing scene where the imps of the mountain king hustle Peer Gynt produced its usual effect upon the audience. There was a distinct desire manifested to hear the finale repeated, and Mr. Paur was kept bowing for some time.

Raff's fine symphony, "In the Woods," made a brilliant and satisfactory close to one of the most interesting concerts of the series. Of this work, Mr. Apthorp, in his excellent programme notes, speaks as follows: "This symphony, like Beethoven's 'Pastoral' verges on the confines of pure symphonic writing, closely approaching the domain of "programme-music.' Yet, descriptive and picturesquely suggestive as much of it is, it never quite becomes pure 'programme music. Indeed, it adheres so closely to the form of the symphony that one of the earliest criticisms on it in Germany was to the effect that, in the last movement (where there is a famous suggestion of Daybreak), 'the composer, out of deference to the symphonic form, had made the sun rise twice on the same morning.' " The symphony is a brilliant specimen of the handiwork of one of the greatest of modern composers, for, in spite of the fact that Raff had some limitations, he is clearly entitled to be so designated. It was played with marvellous precision and finish, as, indeed, was all the rest of the programme.

Many would have been better pleased had Miss Stein selected something else than the well-worn aria from "Samson and Delilah," in which she has won so many triumphs. Not that the air is unwelcome in itself, but in the case of a singer of such versatility it is a pleasure to hear something less familiar. While Miss Stein sang the great love song of Delilah with authority and art, her performance was hardly equal to some of her past successes. Perhaps she, too, has tired of it a little. In the unfamiliar but striking aria from Wagner's "Rienzi" Miss Stein again showed herself the remarkably accomplished artist and scored a pronounced and well-deserved success.

A briefer time than usual intervenes between the dates of last night's concert and the next of the series. The fourth concert will be given on the evening of Wednesday, Jan. 12.

THE NEWS.

DAILY AND WEEKLY.

Providence, Rhode Island.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 30, 1897.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Third in Series Given in Infantry Hall.

The Splendid Program Magnificently Rendered.

The third of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts of the season was given in Infantry hall last evening, and the patronage was very generous. The program was as follows:

Engelbert Humperdinck, prelude to "Hansel and Gretel," first time at these concerts; Camille Saint-Saens, aria from "Samson and Dalilah;" Edvard Hagerup Greig, suite "Peer Gynt," op. 46, daybreak, the death of Aase, Anitra's dance, the hall of the mountain king (the imps are chasing "Peer Gynt"); Richard Wagner, scena, "Gerechter Gott:" an aria "In Seiner Bluthe," from "Rienzi;" Joachim Raff, symphony No. 3, in F major, "In the Woods," op. 153, part 1, "In the Daytime," impressions and sensations, allegro (F major); part 2, "At Twilight," (a) Revery, Largo (A flat major, b) dance of Dryads, allegro assai (D minor), poco meno mosso (A major); part 3, "At Night," silent rustling of the woods at night; entrance and exit of the wild hunt with Frau Holle (Hulda and Wotan;) daybreak, allegro (F major).

This program was one with a noble variety, and one that interested from the first, for including as it did fairy opera, an aria from an oratorio, grand opera selections, and the poetic and exquisite symphony, "In the Woods," the patrons of these concerts had anticipated great pleasure from the first number which had created great enthusiasm in New York and whose course on the way to a gracious popularity had been unimpeded since its delightful measure first greeted the ears of an assemblage at the Court Theatre in Wirmar on Dec. 23, 1893. The soft music of the fairy story charmed the audience last evening, and many felt that the heralds of its beauty had this time not said too much, for it had a delightful dash of novelty in it and its graciousness was ever evident.

Miss Stein is one of the musical favorites of this city and her rich and beautiful voice won for her last night both in the aria from "Samson and Dalilah," and in the aria from Rienzi very warm sentiments of approval. She was obliged after each number to bow again and again her acknowledgments of the delight of the audience at her work.

All of the world is beautiful and the minds of men are attracted by some idea of its beauty and the natural environment has its great hold on men. The Norseman was inspired to his deeds of prowess by the legends of his land and this old story is brought again to our mind as we listen to the masterly work of Greig's "Peer Gynt." Not alone its beauty, but its hard problem has the artist worked into this history of a peasant lad of old Norway. The delightful synopsis of the story of the peasant in the four parts given, held the audience and the charming final reminiscent as it was of things that have lingured in the mind from its first freshness, the audience wanted to hear once again but Mr. Emil Paur, the conductor, only satisfied the audience by graceful bows.

The selections from Wagner gave the audience an idea of the wealthy mine that the master of energy in music had found in the incidents that fable as well as history has surrounded the life of the last of the tribunes of old Rome with Raff's noble symphony "In the Woods" had been awaited with that desire which even in the enjoyment of the keenest of pleasures one seems to be looking to something better. This delightful story of wood life transcends all that poets tell us of nature—that is, the poets who write verses. The delightful parts into which it is devided seem to prolong our delights. Few are there for whom the woods have not some unknown and indescribable attraction. There is something there that we feel and though sound sense has removed from our minds tales once believed and though we know the structure of and can paint the picture, yet it is there. Every bit of light seems to contain innumerable beauties, and in noble tones and with richest grace has this great musician interpreted these feelings and sensations for us. He does not analyze the light or any spot, but he takes one impression and one sensation, and he says here is a beauty you did not notice, and here is another and another.

Then there is the twilight with its revery and its unrest that is more delightful than sleep and the Dryads dance, for in this hour everything that is real fades away and the denizens of the woods that have laughed at us from behind the trees and out of the bells of flowers are dancing in their own ballroom. Last comes the night with its wild hunt and we hear the noise and joyous cries of men and women and the sounds of horses and there is a fading away of darkness and the gray of dawn, beautiful as if here were again that age when every ray of its morning and evening beamed from the throne of the Omnipotent. It is not so hard when one listens to the great poetic description of this dawn break to excuse the maker of it if he, like a child, retraced his steps after he had gone a little in advance and seems to say "That way is a delightful spot I just passed and I must go back and look at it again for it may be I shall not pass this way again." Few have passed the familiar though unknown place of morn break as Raff has done in this instance, and his two sunrises in the same day must be pardoned.

[59]

HARPER'S WEEKLY

Almost from music's outset the trick on its part to slip outside of its real demesne has been obvious. Recently such campaigning has been plaguily aggressive. From merely suggestion we are invited to pass to orchestral description, from description to rank realism, from realism to the dressing up of philosophy, religion, psychology, and goodness knows what not else that is intangible. There seem to be no limits to contemporary programme-music of the superintellectual sort; and those theories about the article in question which have been so brilliantly used, or so grotesquely abused, by Berlioz, Wagner, and their imitators, every now and then break forth into a wild illustration that makes one gasp and long to call a halt. In forms of musical art ordinarily lucid the attention of auditors has been asked toward "underlying ideas," profoundly essential "leading motives," deep "philosophical significances," in a score, to a degree that would have driven crazy with righteous indignation Bach and Mozart and Beethoven and Schubert—not to speak of other composers that on the whole we really must consider of equally decent abilities. The last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra presented a special example of this sort of composition—of the kind of music intended to be far more than good or bad music. "Thus Spake Zarathustra," a symphonic poem by Richard Strauss, the now well-known Munich composer and conductor, was presented for the first time in this city. Strauss's score is yet a novelty in Germany, as to many concert-centres; and many places are not likely to hear it at all.

This Richard [illegible] astonishing genius at orchestration. He early [illegible] his banner elaborate and unblushing musical [illegible]. He defined betimes, also, his aim at building up a musical work on an "intellectual" basis. He is young, a Decadent, and—unfortunately—his actual sanity is occasionally said to be doubted by his best friends. In an earlier symphonic poem, "Death and Glorification," Strauss "described" musically everything that may belong to a man's dissolution, from a flickering out soul to the harps of heaven. On the present occasion Strauss is inspired to commit to music the crazy mysteries of the crazy Frederick Nietzsche, conveyed in the latter's poem "Thus Spake Zarathustra." The poem has nothing to do with Zoroaster or with the lofty and simple religion called from the Sage One of Persia. With what, then, does it have to do instead? What has Strauss tried to paint musically? Let us indeed see. In twelve pages of solid philosophical analysis we read of, imprimis, The Over-man; item, "Transvaluation of Life"; item, of "The Dwellers in the Rear World"; item, of the "Yearning," of the "Convalescence" of the Soul, and in chaotic succession of at least a dozen more choice psychological dainties. They are all put into Mr. Strauss's dish, and supposed to sing together like the four-and-twenty blackbirds baked in the pie. It was absolute pain to see the awed intentness of the night's audience on Riemann's explanatory sermon to "Thus Spake Zarathustra," printed with the programme.

But the relief to all such tortured souls is not yet barred. For, after all, what have we to do with all this farrago of a composer's inspiration, forsooth? The indiscretion is in his letting us know of it at all. Injury comes in expecting our entrance into it. No wonder we are antagonized. To the winds with your psychologic or poetic analyses! Away with your Wolzogen catalogues of hidden "meanings," and all your fardel of solemn bosh or of semi-musical rhapsody! The question is not how a musical work comes to exist, but what it is when finished and extant. It would be really nothing necessarily worthy of more than remark from a spectator if he knew that the "Winged Victory" had been "inspired" by a Welsh rabbit, or that the "Aurora" of Guido was a conception originally evolved on the lines of a skirt-dance. We have merely to make up our minds whether one is a good piece of sculpture, the other a good picture.

Dismissing, then, any superfluous interest in Nietzsche's poem "inspiring" Strauss, and hearing the score simply as a new and up-to-date musical work, it is perceived to be a splendid piece of orchestration, built on certain musical motives (for the most part effective and clearly defined) interesting as we hear it, and reaching to gorgeous and very musical climaxes. The technical complications in it are so great that there is often the effect of noble simplicity. It is full of variety in subject and rhythm, full of amazing and beautiful orchestral color, and of bewildering effectiveness to the ear. Nobody need understand anything about its literary or intellectual source to find it so. It will bear inclusion in the repertory of any orchestra capable of playing it. It is a far more dignified and beautiful work as [illegible] anything its composer had previously written. [illegible], like so much of the music of the day, it is deficient in that inner musical eloquence which is not to be discounted. No matter how sumptuous the instrumental effects, it will not live. Its score will be catching dust when Mozart's "Don Giovanni" or the best pages of the composer of the Heroic Symphony (on whose birthday came this concert) are held in undiminished regard. The difficulties in it are appalling. Under Mr. Paur and by the Boston orchestra named, its performance was a triumph.

E. IRENÆUS STEVENSON.

BOSTON HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CIII., NO. 1.
SATURDAY, JAN. 1, 1898.

What is the use of one subway? Boston would like a dozen. Particularly one leading into Music Hall on Friday afternoons, when everybody is trying to get in to the rehearsals before Mr. Paur begins the first piece on the programme. The crush of carriages yesterday caused a block of cars such as hasn't been seen in Tremont street since that downstairs road was first opened.

BOSTON [illegible]
Established [illegible]
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 3, 1898.

The Symphony Concert a Triumph for Conductor and Orchestra.

The overture to "The Magic Flute" made a good beginning to a programme which was to be on a high musical plane almost throughout. Mr. Paur took a reasonable tempo in the body of this work, for which we are sincerely grateful; too often conductors dash through the fugal work of the chief theme of this overture in a manner that blurs the masterly counterpoint into a succession of dancing-dervish whirls. There is a temptation to exaggerate contrasts here, and of more than one conductor of this overture one can say, to paraphrase the well-known remark about the little girl,

"When he was slow he was very, very slow,
But when he was quick he was Presto."

This time, at least the latter part of the above criticism did not apply, and the violin figures which are so prominent both in the theme and its development were quite clear.

The resemblance between this theme and the subject of Bach's Fugue, No. 7, in the second book of "The Well-tempered Clavichord," is more than a coincidence; No. 7 is said to have been Mozart's favorite fugue, and here we find the same melodic thought, the same length of subject, and even the same key—E flat. But the treatment is so essentially different that it is a delight to compare the two works and see how the same thought may grow into different logical results in two dissimilar minds. Mozart makes the thought into a bright and chattering one, and leaves the fugal style directly after the exposition; Bach, on the contrary, presents his finest work after his exposition and works up his theme into three strict canons and one free one.

Mr. Staudigl, although giving plenty of evidence of his great artistic abilities, was not immediately successful with "Oh Ruddier than the Cherry." The number was not in the school which this vocalist has made his own; two or three German "lieder" would have far outweighted this Handelian number. The song has become so associated with the English words that it seemed a stranger in its German dress, nor did the artist use the words of the programme-book. Of course, all the German versions vary somewhat from the English original; in one the "Cherry" becomes a "Peach," and in another a "Rose." This was not a matter of any importance, but the lack of cyclopean power has a serious defect; a gentle Polyphemus would be as impossible as a Chesterfieldian Fitzsimmons.

Mr. Staudigl's foot was a little nearer his native heath in the Aria of Lysiart, from Weber's "Euryanthe." Here the great artist was expressive and dramatic, and held his own finely against the powerful accompaniment with which the composer has handicapped the singer. But one still longed for a small hall, a piano, a few groups of Schubert, Franz and Schumann, and Staudigl, the lied-singer.

The symphony was Tschaikowsky's fifth, E minor, Op. 64. Less wonderful than the "Symphonie Pathetique," it is not a less worthy work. The Eastern question began with the usual Muscovite melancholy, but no one in the whole list of composers expresses this mighty sadness so graphically as Tschaikowsky; to the present writer, he seems the giant of the Russian school, a man whose reputation will wax when that of some of Rubinstein's works wanes, a man who tells you his tale of woe with the imperative manner of the Ancient Mariner, (and by the way, he has a fondness for "the loud bassoon" too), and the spellbound auditor must "listen like a three-years child." The work wears well, and passages which one might suspect of being sensational, on a first hearing become fitting and artistic with repeated audition.

The second movement is a very moody but attractive picture, alternating between melodic pensiveness and fierce dissonances. Its climaxes are gloriously worked up, and they lost nothing in the interpretation. At times, there were intentional discords that went to the verge of cacophony; it was as if Russia, in seizing China, had also appropriated some of her music.

The third movement was a waltz. The waltz is the child of the Minuet; if one desires to note the transition from the old form to the new, it is only necessary to examine some of the Schubert Minuets, which are almost waltzes in disguise. It is singular, therefore, that while there are thousands of minuets in the various symphonies and other sonata forms, only a couple of waltzes have as yet appeared in Symphonic works. The finale of the symphony was full of semi-barbaric pageantry; at times, there was a frenzied rhythm and speed, as if the wild dance of the men—the Kamarinskaia—were being carried on, and then the almost omnipresent brooding would return, the whole finally culminating in an apotheosis of grandeur, a moment of absolute triumph.

If Tschaikowsky in his "Symphonie Pathetique" says "The paths of glory lead but to the grave," in this work he as clearly sings "Per Aspera ad Astra"!

The performance was a triumph for conductor and orchestra. It would be impossible to mention every point of excellence, but the clarinettes and bassoons, which Tschaikowsky uses unsparingly, were splendidly played, and the violins in the finale had some very difficult work to do, and conquered it with masterly ease. The enthusiasm of the audience at the end of the second movement and at the close of the work, was an evidence that our public has been educated beyond the merely "pleasing music" stage.

Such being the case, we were sorry to have the impression spoiled by Auber's rather superficial overture to "Le Domino Noir." There was a southern "Cakewalk" in Music Hall the night before; possibly the Black Domino was suggested by this. It was prettily and trippingly played, but its geniality came at the wrong moment, as an Irish jig might seem misplaced in the last act of "Oedipus Tyrannus."

Louis C. Elson.

[illegible]
SUNDAY, JANUARY 2, 1898.

TENTH SYMPHONY.

Program Presented by Mr. Paur Last Night.

Mr. Joseph Staudigl the Soloist of the Occasion.

The Orchestral Performance of Great Excellence.

The program of the 10th Symphony Concert, Mr. Emil Paur conductor, was as follows:

Overture to "The Magic Flute" .... Mozart
Recitative, "O Schmach," and Aria, "O rosigwie die Pfirsche," from "Acis und Galatea" .... Handel
Symphony No. 5, in E minor, Op. 64 ... Tchaikovsky
Scena, "Wo berg' ich mich?" and Aria, "Schweigt. glüh'nden Sehnens wilde Triebe," from "Euryanthe" ... Weber
Overture to "The Black Domino" ...... Auber

Mr. Joseph Staudigl visited Boston as an opera singer in the spring of 1885. I heard him last night for the first time, and I am now convinced that his chief claim to distinction is that he is the son of his father. He, therefore, is a singer of genealogical interest.

Why in the world should Mr. Staudigl have sung at a Symphony Concert when such players as Messrs. Ysaye, Pugno and Gérardy are in this country and are not to appear here—at least so I am informed—this season with the orchestra under Mr. Paur?

The answer may be made, "But they charge too high a price." And were not the premiums unusually high this season?

These men play with other orchestras. Have the managers of these orchestras more money at their disposal?

I state in another column of the Journal this morning that the names of both Mrs. Sembrich and Gérardy appeared on the program of the concert given in Chicago last night with Theodore Thomas as conductor. Both these artists were engaged, and their names are on the program that was sent to me. But I learned yesterday, too late for correction, that Mrs. Sembrich was indisposed and unable to go to Chicago.

Nevertheless, the manager of the Chicago orchestra was able to say to the Chicago public, "I have engaged these two artists for appearance in one concert." Is the Auditorium connected by a covered bridge with Golconda?

Mr. Rosenthal was announced before the first concert of this series was given. He will not visit the United States this season. Here is Mr. Raoul Pugno, a pianist of great reputation, now in New York. It is doubtful whether he will come to this country again. His repertory is of the highest, and his battle-horse is a remarkable piece for piano and orchestra, the symphonic Variations of César Franck. The Symphony audience might or might not agree with the enthusiastic opinion of Mr. Pugno entertained by music lovers of Paris, Brussels, London and New York; but should it not have an opportunity to form an opinion under the most favorable circumstances?

⁂

I can imagine Mr. Staudigl giving satisfaction in the opera house of Pumpernickel, for he seems like an honest, respectable person, who would probably keep his engagements and do his best. He would never surprise, he would never startle even a German audience. A faithful, routine man; ready to be the wicked Count in "The Prophet" or the bloodthirsty Pizarro; or the one-eyed Wotan. By this I do not mean to insinuate for a moment that he is a good singer.

We are not dwellers in Pumpernickel, and we have a right to expect at a Symphony concert better singing than that of Mr. Staudigl. It is true that German declaimers have been allowed before this to exhibit themselves on the stage of Music Hall. But Mrs. Steinbach-Jahns, an importation of Mr. Arthur Nikisch—Flos regum Arthurus!—was funny. Mr. Reichmann gave morbid pleasure by the atrocity of his intonation, and when you were tired of listening, you could admire the string of decorations that covered one lapel of his best coat. Mr. Staudigl not only sang as dozens of Germans sing, but he was also dull.

⁂

Aside from this, there was much to enjoy in the concert. The overture to "The Magic Flute" is still a marvel of spontaneity and skill, and the overture to "The Black Domino" is well worth hearing. There are few musicians who sneer at Auber; the people that complain of such overtures in a Symphony concert are persons that take music very seriously and talk pompously about its "educational value." No orchestral music that is good, whether it be a waltz or a fugue, a symphony or a rhapsody, is unfit for performance at a Symphony concert, unless that concert be devoted to some special, specific purpose to which the work would be impertinent.

The place of such an overture on the program is another matter.

Nor is Mr. Paur revolutionary in the introduction of such works. Mr. Henschel led at least three of Auber's overtures during his reign.

⁂

Many tell me that the fifth symphony of Tschaikowsky is superior to the sixth. I cannot agree to this proposition. It is in many ways a striking, fascinating work. First of all it sounds extremely well; and there is music that is really good which paradoxically does not sound well through its orchestral dress. The first movement of this symphony is the best. The introduction is wonderfully impressive, and the means employed are apparently of the simplest. The second movement seems to me at least too long drawn out, and no matter how ingeniously the themes are introduced you get a little tired of them before the close. I do not care much for the waltz. But the fury of the finale is overwhelming.

As a [illegible] of imagination in this symphony is not as high as that in the Pathetic. And yet what a wealth of melody! What ingenuity in preparing and distributing climaxes! What passion! You may say of one theme that it is sentimental, or of another that it is almost vulgar; but Tschaikowsky treated themes that would have been the destruction of another with a knowledge and a temperament that glorify them. The symphony was admirably read and, on the whole, superbly played. Where there are so many virtuosos, it may seem invidious to speak of any particular instrument; and yet it is impossible to pass unnoticed the solo playing last night of the first horn, and the first and second clarinets.

Philip Hale.

Joseph Staudigl.

Mr. Joseph Staudigl, who was the soloist at the Symphony concert yesterday, was born at Vienna, March 18, 1850. A son of the famous bass singer of the same name (1807-1861), he began his career as a pupil of Rokitansky at the Vienna Conservatory. For ten years he was a member of the Karlsruhe Opera Company, and in that city he was made chamber singer to the Grand Duke. He first visited the United States in 1884-85 as a member of the New York Metropolitan Opera House Company, when he sang such parts as the Count in "The Prophet," the King in "Lohengrin," Wotan in "Die Walküre," Wolfram in "Tannhäuser," Pizarro in "Fidelio." He was here again in 1885-86. He sang Pogner in "Die Meistersinger," and he sang in "The Messiah," at New York, Dec. 19, 1885.

JOSEPH STAUDIGL.
The soloist at the Symphony concert last evening.
(By courtesy of The Opera.)

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.
SUNDAY MORNING, JANUARY 2, 1898.
(Copyright, 1807, Post Publishing Company.)

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The tenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given in Music Hall last evening. The orchestral selections were the fifth symphony of Tschaikowsky, Mozart's overture to the "Magic Flute," and Auber's overture to the "Black Domino." Mr. Standigl of the Damrosch-Ellis opera company was the soloist. His selections were an aria from Handel's "Acis and Galatea," and an aria from Weber's "Euryanthe."

Tschaikowsky's fifth symphony, while not such an inspired work as is his No. 6, the "Pathetic," which is the one universally admired by every music lover, is, nevertheless, in many ways a work of genius. The first movement is the strongest, the last movement the weakest, while the two middle movements average well. The third movement, in waltz tempo, is unusual, but as the waltz is the product of the minuet of classic writers, there is no reason for not using the waltz movement in symphonic writing, if properly treated. This fifth symphony is well worth hearing, though it can never become a favorite like his "Pathetic" symphony, the last one.

Mr. Standigl sang the Handel aria with considerable fluency and correct intonation, but he was more successful in the aria from Euryanthe, which was sung with most excellent effect throughout. He is much better in the German than in the English school of composition, which is natural. He was much applauded in his second number. Next week Mr. Loeffler will produce a new work of his for orchestra and two Violas d'Amour obligato entitled a symphonic poem, "The Death of Tintagiles" (after the drama by Maeterlink). Besides this there will be given Mendelssohn's "Ruy Blas" overture and Brahms's fourth symphony.

HARPER'S WEEKLY

Almost from music's outset the trick on its part to slip outside of its real demesne has been obvious. Recently such campaigning has been [illegible] aggressive. From merely suggesting we are invited to pass to orchestral description, from description to rank realism, [illegible] realism to the dressing up of [illegible], religion, psychology, and good[illegible] what not else that is intangible. There seem to be no limits to contemporary programme-music of the super-intellectual sort; and those theories about [illegible] which have been so [illegible] grotesquely abused [illegible] Wagner and their imitators, [illegible] break forth into a wild [illegible] that makes one gasp and long to [illegible] forms of musical art ordinarily [illegible] the attention of auditors has been asked to [illegible] deriving ideas," profoundly essential "leading motives," deep "philosophical significances," in a score, to a degree that would have driven crazy with righteous indignation Bach and Mozart and Beethoven [illegible] art—[illegible] speak of other composers that on [illegible] we [illegible] must consider of equally decent abi[illegible] the la[illegible] concert of the Boston Symphony Orche[illegible] special example of this sort of compos[illegible] music intended to be far more than [illegible] "Thus Spake Zarathustra," a symp[illegible] Richard Strauss, the now well-known [illegible] and conductor, was presented for th[illegible] this city. Strauss's score is yet a novelty [illegible] to many concert-centres; and many places are not likely to hear it at all.

This Rich[illegible] astonishing genius at orchestration. He [illegible] banner elaborate and unblushing music [illegible] defined betimes, also, his aim at building up a [illegible] work on an "intellectual" basis. He is young. [illegible] and—unfortunately—his actual sanity is occasionally said to be doubted by his best friends. In an earlier symphonic poem, "Death and Glorification," Strauss "described" musically everything that may belong to a man's dissolution, from a flickering out soul to the harps of heaven. On the present occasion Strauss is inspired to commit to music the crazy mysteries of the crazy Frederick Nietzsche, conveyed in the latter's poem "Thus Spake Zarathustra." The poem has nothing to do with Zoroaster [illegible] with the lofty and simple religion called from the Sage One of Persia. With what, then, does it have to do instead? What has Strauss tried to paint musically? Let us indeed see. In twelve pages of solid philosophical analysis we read of, imprimis, The Over man; item, "[illegible]ansvaluation of Life"; item, of "The Dwellers in the Rear World"; item, of the "Yearning," of the "Convalescence" of the Soul, and in chaotic succession of at least a dozen more choice psychological dainties. They are all put into Mr. Strauss's dish, and supposed to sing together like the four-and-twenty blackbirds baked in the pie. It was absolute pain to see the awed intentness of the night's audience on Riemann's explanatory sermon to "Thus Spake Zarathustra," printed with the programme.

But the relief to [illegible] such tortured souls is not yet barred. For, after all, what have we to do with all this farrago of a composer's inspiration, forsooth? The indiscretion is in his letting us know of it at all. Injury comes in expecting our entra[illegible]. No wonder we are antagonized. To the winds [illegible] [illegible]ologic or poetic analyses! Away with your Wol[illegible] catalogues of hidden "meanings," and all your far[illegible] solemn bosh or of semi-musical rhapsody! The question is not how a musical work comes to exist, but what it is when finished and extant. It would be really nothing necessarily worthy of more than remark from a spectator if he knew that the "Winged Victory" had been "inspired" by a [illegible]ish rabbit, or that the "Aurora" of Guido was a conception originally evolved on the lines of a [illegible] dance. We have merely to make up our minds wh[illegible] is a good piece of sculpture, the other a good pi[illegible] [illegible] superfluous interest in Nietzsche's [illegible] hearing the score simply as a new and up-to-date musical work, it is perceived to be a splendid piece of orchestration, built on certain musical motives [illegible] the most part effective and clearly de[illegible] it, and reaching to gorgeous [illegible] climaxes. The technical complications in [illegible] the effect of noble sim[illegible] subject and rhythm, full [illegible] local color, and of bewilder[illegible] ness to [illegible]. Nobody need understand any[illegible] intellectual source to find it [illegible] in the repertory of any orches[illegible] a far more dignified and [illegible] work [illegible] anything its composer had [illegible] like so much of the music [illegible] inner musical eloquence [illegible]. No matter how sumptuous [illegible] not live. Its score will be [illegible] when Mozart's "Don Giovanni" or the best [illegible] of the composer of the Heroic Symphony (on [illegible] birthday came this concert) are held in undiminished regard. The [illegible] are appalling. Under Mr. Paur and by the orchestra named, its performance was triumph[illegible] [illegible]RENÆUS STEVENSON.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CIII., NO. 1.

SATURDAY, JAN. 1, 1898.

What is the use of one subway? Boston would like a dozen. Particularly one leading into Music Hall on Friday afternoons, when everybody is trying to get in to the rehearsals before Mr. Paur begins the first piece on the programme. The crush of carriages yesterday caused a block of cars such as hasn't been seen in Tremont street since that downstairs road was first opened.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.

MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 3, 1898.

The Symphony Concert a Triumph for Conductor and Orchestra.

The overture to "The Magic Flute" made a good beginning to a programme which was to be on a high musical plane almost throughout. Mr. Paur took a reasonable tempo in the body of this work, for which we are sincerely grateful; too often conductors dash through the fugal work of the chief theme of this overture in a manner that blurs the masterly counterpoint into a succession of dancing-dervish whirls. There is a temptation to exaggerate contrasts here, and of more than one conductor of this overture one can say, to paraphrase the well-known remark about the little girl,

"When he was slow he was very, very slow,
But when he was quick he was Presto."

This time, at least the latter part of the above criticism did not apply, and the violin figures which are so prominent both in the theme and its development were quite clear.

The resemblance between this theme and the subject of Bach's Fugue, No. 7, in the second book of "The Well-tempered Clavichord," is more than a coincidence; No. 7 is said to have been Mozart's favorite fugue, and here we find the same melodic thought, the same length of subject, and even the same key—E flat. But the treatment is so essentially different that it is a delight to compare the two works and see how the same thought may grow into different logical results in two dissimilar minds. Mozart makes the thought into a bright and chattering one, and leaves the fugal style directly after the exposition; Bach, on the contrary, presents his finest work after his exposition and works up his theme into three strict canons and one free one.

Mr. Staudigl, although giving plenty of evidence of his great artistic abilities, was not immediately successful with "Oh Ruddier than the Cherry." The number was not in the school which this vocalist has made his own; two or three German "lieder" would have far outweighted this Handelian number. The song has become so associated with the English words that it seemed a stranger in its German dress, nor did the artist use the words of the programme-book. Of course, all the German versions vary somewhat from the English original; in one the "Cherry" becomes a "Peach," and in another a "Rose." This was not a matter of any importance, but the lack of cyclopean power has a serious defect; a gentle Polyphemus would be as impossible as a Chesterfieldian Fitzsimmons.

Mr. Staudigl's foot was a little nearer his native heath in the Aria of Lysiart, from Weber's "Euryanthe." Here the great artist was expressive and dramatic, and held his own finely against the powerful accompaniment with which the composer has handicapped the singer. But one still longed for a small hall, a piano, a few groups of Schubert, Franz and Schumann, and Staudigl, the lied-singer.

The symphony was Tschaikowsky's fifth, E minor, Op. 64. Less wonderful than the "Symphonie Pathetique," it is not a less worthy work. The Eastern question began with the usual Muscovite melancholy, but no one in the whole list of composers expresses this mighty sadness so graphically as Tschaikowsky; to the present writer, he seems the giant of the Russian school, a man whose reputation will wax when that of some of Rubinstein's works wanes, a man who tells you his tale of woe with the imperative manner of the Ancient Mariner, (and by the way, he has a fondness for "the loud bassoon" too), and the spellbound auditor must "listen like a three-years child." The work wears well, and passages which one might suspect of being sensational, on a first hearing become fitting and artistic with repeated audition.

The second movement is a very moody but attractive picture, alternating between melodic pensiveness and fierce dissonances. Its climaxes are gloriously worked up, and they lost nothing in the interpretation. At times, there were intentional discords that went to the verge of cacophony; it was as if Russia, in seizing China, had also appropriated some of her music.

The third movement was a waltz. The waltz is the child of the Minuet; if one desires to note the transition from the old form to the new, it is only necessary to examine some of the Schubert Minuets, which are almost waltzes in disguise. It is singular, therefore, that while there are thousands of minuets in the various symphonies and other sonata forms, only a couple of waltzes have as yet appeared in Symphonic works. The finale of the symphony was full of semi-barbaric pageantry; at times, there was a frenzied rhythm and speed, as if the wild dance of the men—the Kamarinskaia—were being carried on, and then the almost omnipresent brooding would return, the whole finally culminating in an apotheosis of grandeur, a moment of absolute triumph.

If Tschaikowsky in his "Symphonie Pathetique" says "The paths of glory lead but to the grave," in this work he as clearly sings "Per Aspera ad Astra"!

The performance was a triumph for conductor and orchestra. It would be impossible to mention every point of excellence, but the clarinettes and bassoons, which Tschaikowsky uses unsparingly, were splendidly played, and the violins in the finale had some very difficult work to do, and conquered it with masterly ease. The enthusiasm of the audience at the end of the second movement and at the close of the work, was an evidence that our public has been educated beyond the merely "pleasing music" stage.

Such being the case, we were sorry to have the impression spoiled by Auber's rather superficial overture to "Le Domino Noir." There was a southern "Cakewalk" in Music Hall the night before; possibly the Black Domino was suggested by this. It was prettily and trippingly played, but its geniality came at the wrong moment, as an Irish jig might seem misplaced in the last act of "Oedipus Tyrannus."

Louis C. Elson.

Boston Journal.
SUNDAY, JANUARY 2, 1898.

TENTH SYMPHONY.

Program Presented by Mr. Paur Last Night.

Mr. Joseph Staudigl the Soloist of the Occasion.

The Orchestral Performance of Great Excellence.

The program of the 10th Symphony Concert, Mr. Emil Paur conductor, was as follows:

Overture to "The Magic Flute"	Mozart
Recitative, "O Schmach," and Aria, "O rosigwie die Pfirsche," from "Acis und Galatea"	Handel
Symphony No. 5, in E minor, Op. 64	Tchaikovsky
Scena, "Wo berg' ich mich?" and Aria, "Schweigt. glüh'nden Sehnens wilde Triebe," from "Euryanthe"	Weber
Overture to "The Black Domino"	Auber

Mr. Joseph Staudigl visited Boston as an opera singer in the spring of 1885. I heard him last night for the first time, and I am now convinced that his chief claim to distinction is that he is the son of his father. He, therefore, is a singer of genealogical interest.

Why in the world should Mr. Staudigl have sung at a Symphony Concert when such players as Messrs. Ysaye, Pugno and Gérardy are in this country and are not to appear here—at least so I am informed—this season with the orchestra under Mr. Paur?

The answer may be made, "But they charge too high a price." And were not the premiums unusually high this season?

These men play with other orchestras. Have the managers of these orchestras more money at their disposal?

I state in another column of the Journal this morning that the names of both Mrs. Sembrich and Gérardy appeared on the program of the concert given in Chicago last night with Theodore Thomas as conductor. Both these artists were engaged, and their names are on the program that was sent to me. But I learned yesterday, too late for correction, that Mrs. Sembrich was indisposed and unable to go to Chicago.

Nevertheless, the manager of the Chicago orchestra was able to say to the Chicago public, "I have engaged these two artists for appearance in one concert." Is the Auditorium connected by a covered bridge with Golconda?

Mr. Rosenthal was announced before the first concert of this series was given. He will not visit the United States this season. Here is Mr. Raoul Pugno, a pianist of great reputation, now in New York. It is doubtful whether he will come to this country again. His repertory is of the highest, and his battle-horse is a remarkable piece for piano and orchestra, the symphonic Variations of César Franck. The Symphony audience might or might not agree with the enthusiastic opinion of Mr. Pugno entertained by music lovers of Paris, Brussels, London and New York; but should it not have an opportunity to form an opinion under the most favorable circumstances?

⁂

I can imagine Mr. Staudigl giving satisfaction in the opera house of Pumpernickel, for he seems like an honest, respectable person, who would probably keep his engagements and do his best. He would never surprise, he would never startle even a German audience. A faithful, routine man; ready to be the wicked Count in "The Prophet" or the bloodthirsty Pizarro; or the one-eyed Wotan. By this I do not mean to insinuate for a moment that he is a good singer.

We are not dwellers in Pumpernickel, and we have a right to expect at a Symphony concert better singing than that of Mr. Staudigl. It is true that German declaimers have been allowed before this to exhibit themselves on the stage of Music Hall. But Mrs. Steinbach-Jahns, an importation of Mr. Arthur Nikisch—Flos regum Arthurus!—was funny. Mr. Reichmann gave morbid pleasure by the atrocity of his intonation, and when you were tired of listening, you could admire the string of decorations that covered one lapel of his best coat. Mr. Staudigl not only sang as dozens of Germans sing, but he was also dull.

⁂

Aside from this, there was much to enjoy in the concert. The overture to "The Magic Flute" is still a marvel of spontaneity and skill, and the overture to "The Black Domino" is well worth hearing. There are few musicians who sneer at Auber; the people that complain of such overtures in a Symphony concert are persons that take music very seriously and talk pompously about its "educational value." No orchestral music that is good, whether it be a waltz or a fugue, a symphony or a rhapsody, is unfit for performance at a Symphony concert, unless that concert be devoted to some special, specific purpose to which the work would be impertinent.

The place of such an overture on the program is another matter.

Nor is Mr. Paur revolutionary in the introduction of such works. Mr. Henschel led at least three of Auber's overtures during his reign.

⁂

Many tell me that the fifth symphony of Tschaikowsky is superior to the sixth. I cannot agree to this proposition. It is in many ways a striking, fascinating work. First of all it sounds extremely well; and there is music that is really good which paradoxically does not sound well through its orchestral dress. The first movement of this symphony is the best. The introduction is wonderfully impressive, and the means employed are apparently of the simplest. The second movement seems to me at least too long drawn out, and no matter how ingeniously the themes are introduced you get a little tired of them before the close. I do not care much for the waltz. But the fury of the finale is overwhelming.

As a whole the flight of imagination in this symphony is not as high as that in the Pathetic. And yet what a wealth of melody! What ingenuity in preparing and distributing climaxes! What passion! You may say of one theme that it is sentimental, or of another that it is almost vulgar; but Tschaikowsky treated themes that would have been the destruction of another with a knowledge and a temperament that glorify them. The symphony was admirably read and, on the whole, superbly played. Where there are so many virtuosos, it may seem invidious to speak of any particular instrument; and yet it is impossible to pass unnoticed the solo playing last night of the first horn, and the first and second clarinets

Philip Hale.

Joseph Staudigl.

Mr. Joseph Staudigl, who was the soloist at the Symphony concert yesterday, was born at Vienna, March 18, 1850. A son of the famous bass singer of the same name (1807-1861), he began his career as a pupil of Rokitansky at the Vienna Conservatory. For ten years he was a member of the Karlsruhe Opera Company, and in that city he was made chamber singer to the Grand Duke. He first visited the United States in 1884-85 as a member of the New York Metropolitan Opera House Company, when he sang such parts as the Count in "The Prophet," the King in "Lohengrin," Wotan in "Die Walküre," Wolfram in "Tannhäuser," Pizarro in "Fidelio." He was here again in 1885-86. He sang Pogner in "Die Meistersinger," and he sang in "The Messiah," at New York, Dec. 19, 1885.

JOSEPH STAUDIGL,
[illegible] at the Symphony concert last evening.
(By courtesy of The Opera.)

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, JANUARY 2, 1898.
(Copyright, 1897, Post Publishing Company.)

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The tenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given in Music Hall last evening. The orchestral selections were the fifth symphony of Tschaikowsky, Mozart's overture to the "Magic Flute," and Auber's overture to the "Black Domino." Mr. Standigl of the Damrosch-Ellis opera company was the soloist. His selections were an aria from Handel's "Acis and Galatea," and an aria from Weber's "Euryanthe."

Tschaikowsky's fifth symphony, while not such an inspired work as is his No. 6, the "Pathetic," which is the one universally admired by every music lover, is, nevertheless, in many ways a work of genius. The first movement is the strongest, the last movement the weakest, while the two middle movements average well. The third movement, in waltz tempo, is unusual, but as the waltz is the product of the minuet of classic writers, there is no reason for not using the waltz movement in symphonic writing, if properly treated. This fifth symphony is well worth hearing, though it can never become a favorite like his "Pathetic" symphony, the last one.

Mr. Standigl sang the Handel aria with considerable fluency and correct intonation, but he was more successful in the aria from Euryanthe, which was sung with most excellent effect throughout. He is much better in the German than in the English school of composition, which is natural. He was much applauded in his second number. Next week Mr. Loeffler will produce a new work of his for orchestra and two Violas d'Amour obligato entitled a symphonic poem, "The Death of Tintagiles" (after the drama by Maeterlink). Besides this there will be given Mendelssohn's "Ruy Blas" overture and Brahms's fourth symphony.

[illegible]

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CIII. NO. 2.

SUNDAY, JANUARY 2, 1898.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Masterpieces of Music Well Interpreted, but the Soloist Lacked Force.

The 10th concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, in Music Hall, last evening, had for its programme:

Overture, "Die Zauberflote"............Mozart
Recitative and air, "I Rage," "O Ruddier Than the Cherry"....................Handel
Symphony, No. 5, E minor.......Tschaikowsky
Scena, "Wo berg ich mich?" "Schweigt, gluhnden Sehnens"........................Weber
Overture, "Le Domino Noir"............Auber

The soloist was Mr. Staudigl, whose first name was not given.

The symphony is a strong and interesting work, but it is overshadowed by the same composer's "Pathetique" symphony, especially by its closing movement, perhaps the noblest and most searchingly effective utterance of modern music. The No. 5 has many beautiful moments; the andante overflows with them, but the composer often nods, and in the first allegro falls into almost tiresome prolixity, and continues to speak long after he has exhausted his subject. The waltz overflows with graceful charm, both of melody and of orchestration, and there are splendid fire and stirring vigor in the finale, but there is also much of what seems labored in invention and of themes that are not impressive in themselves.

The instrumentation is always rich in color and remarkable in its individuality and variety in effect, particularly in the second and the third movements. In the other parts of the work it is frequently difficult to discover what the music means under the forced and often fantastic elaboration of treatment to which it is subjected. It was grandly played, the andante with exquisite warmth and finish and the finale with immense vigor and rhythmic accent.

The ever-fresh and delightful Mozart overture, that will remain a masterpiece and a model for works in its kind to the end of time, gave unalloyed pleasure through the perfect interpretation accorded it by Mr. Paur, and the precision and elegance of its performance by the orchestra. The tuneful and fascinatingly characteristic Auber overture, one of the most sparkling and daintily artistic of musical trifles, was given with a fine feeling for its peculiar color and accent, and with a brilliancy that could not be surpassed. It is one of the best of its composer's lighter overtures, and the grace of its orchestration and the polished musicianship that marks it fully entitled it to a place on these programmes. Auber has written more forcible overtures, such as "Le Lac de Fees," "Gustav III.," "Lestocq" and "La Muette de Portici," but none more piquant than "Le Domino Noir," unless, perhaps, "La Bayadere."

Mr. Staudigl's singing was scarcely of a quality to call for any extended notice. His performance of the Handel aria was weak, spineless and wholly lacking in appropriate force and color. His voice is not of the timbre to give due effect to the music, either in solidity or robustness; nor does he use it with any notable skill. He was more at home in the Weber aria, but at his best he never rose higher than painstaking commonplace. His success with his audience was emphasized by perfunctory applause and a mild recall after each effort.

The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Ruy Blas," Mendelssohn; Symphonic Poem for orchestra and two violas d'amour, "The Death of Tintagiles," C. M. Loeffler; and Symphony No. 4, Brahms.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, JAN. 2, 1898.

Tenth Symphony Concert.

Mr Staudigl, basso in the Damrosch-Ellis opera company, was the soloist at the symphony concerts last week. The orchestral numbers comprised the overture to Mozart's "Magic Flute," Tchaikovsky's fifth symphony, and the overture to "The Black Domino," by Auber. Mr Staudigl's numbers were taken from Handel's "Acis and Galatea" and Weber's "Euryanthe," the latter selection being quite a novelty here.

Mr Staudigl is an artist whose work is very enjoyable, and from the fine impression he made in concert one may confidently anticipate even better results when he appears in Boston later in the season in operatic roles. His voice is not specially ponderous for a basso, but it is rich in quality, very true in its tonality, and exceedingly flexible. Both selections were of a dramatic character, and they were given with a verve and spirit which did not detract from the purely musical portion of the compositions. Mr Staudigl combines expression and facile execution in an artistic manner, and at the same time his voice is musical and void of harshness. He was loudly applauded and recalled to the stage several times.

The famous Mozart overture was played in a brilliant manner, the many beautiful combinations being delicately brought forth by the orchestra. The Tchaikovsky symphony received a sympathetic interpretation. The fortissimo climaxes were vigorously presented, and the modulations, so intricate and varied, were given very smoothly. The fourth movement, the most interesting in the whole symphony, showed the wonderful team work of the orchestra to perfection and was really very pleasing, but the composition as a whole is so chaotic and puzzling that it cannot possess many charms for the general concert patron.

Auber's overture, with its dainty dancing phrases and piquant melodies, was delightfully performed. At this week's concerts the orchestra will perform from MS for the first time Mr Loeffler's new symphonic poem for orchestra and two violas d'Amour obligato, "The Death of Tintagiles," after the drama by M. Maeterlink. The other numbers will comprise Mendelssohn's "Ruy Blas" overture and Brahms' fourth symphony.

[illegible]

MONDAY, JANUARY 3, 1898.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The tenth symphony concert was given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, the programme being as follows:

Mozart: Overture to "Die Zauberflöte."
Handel: Recitative, "O Schmach," and Aria, "O rosig wie die Pfirsche," from "Acis und Galatea."
Tchaikovsky: Symphony No. 5, in E minor, opus 64.
Weber: Scena, "Wo berg' ich mich ?" and Aria, "Schweigt, glüh'nden Sehnens wilde Triebe," from "Euryanthe."
Auber: Overture to "Le Domino Noir."
Mr. Staudigl was the singer.

Mozart's inimitable overture was played with clearness, brilliancy and due delicacy; that ritenuto in the cadence of the first part, just before the Masonic E-flat major chords, is authorizable by the hold over the last B-flat, but somehow we do not like it; we should prefer to have this cadence played less pompously and more brilliantly, in strict time. But this is a detail.

Tchaikovsky's E minor symphony was first played here, under Mr. Arthur Nikisch, on Oct. 21 and 22, 1892, and has, we believe, not been heard here since. It was the first entire Tchaikovsky symphony ever given at the symphony concerts, and made a rather terrifying impression at the time, if we remember aright. Times have changed since then, and the work has quite lost its terror. It is a curious composition, containing more skilful development of its thematic material than any of the composer's earlier symphonies, and thus marking a decided advance in the technics of composition in extended forms. The working-out in the first movement is especially coherent, and the development of the finale as energetic and brilliant as may be, up to the beginning of the closing "apotheosis." The irremediable weakness of the work lies, however, in its thematic material itself. That gloomy tune in the introduction, which might be called the motto or leading motive of the whole symphony, has a certain characteristic Slavic flavor which is not without its zest; but it has not enough of intrinsic character for the role the composer has allotted to it, and its various fortissimo reappearances in the course of the work lack musical impressiveness; moreover, it ill bears the change to the major mode, in which it sounds singularly cheap and commonplace. The special themes of the first movement have the advantage of lending themselves readily to working-out, though they are rather flimsy in themselves; genius might have done great things with them, but the cleverness Tchaikovsky shows in this symphony is not genius. The two principal themes of the slow movement are poor beyond toleration; they sound like weak imitations of Raff. Tchaikovsky's undeniable skill has been quite thrown away upon them; weak sentimentalism could hardly go further. True, they have a certain emotional force of appeal; they are what one might call "haunting" melodies—haunting as the club bore, and button-holing you for hours after you have heard them. The waltz-theme of the third movement is not lacking in grace, but has little distinction and piquancy. From his repeated attempts, one might gather that one of Tchaikovsky's pet ambitions was to write a good waltz; if so, it seems rather like Mendelssohn's ambition to write an opera. Only in the finale does the composer seem to have a real melodic inspiration; genuine, if rough and not untainted with vulgarity; but when he gets to his "apotheosis," heaven help him! An apotheosis that makes you smile is worse than none at all; this one came just a week too late for Messrs. Houghton & Dutton's Christmas illumination. Another point in the symphony which recommends it but ill is its persistent gloominess; it is not "Asiatic melancholy," but sheer doleful dumps. This is made still worse by Tchaikovsky's seemingly taking a leaf out of Spontini's book in the matter of instrumentation; he harps too unmercifully upon the medium and lower registers of the instruments, one wonders where all his usual Russian strident brilliancy of color has gone! The symphony was splendidly read and played.

It was good to hear Auber's overture to "Le Domino Noir." Only what came before it on the programme was not the best preparation for it in the world. Handel's air was in G minor; Tchaikovsky's symphony, in E minor, and gloomy enough at that; Weber's air dwelt mostly in the Cimmerian night of C minor; and then came the F minor of the opening measures of Auber's overture! It seemed as if the gas never would be turned up! But the F minor truculency, though persistently recurring at first, was dispelled in time, and the bright, cheerful overture, so full of genius and melodic charm, sent one away in the best of moods.

Mr. Staudigl sang Handel's "O Ruddier than the Cherry" in German—not to the words set down in the programme books, taken from the German Händel-Gesellschaft edition, for which Gervinus made all the translations, but another, probably earlier, version. The matter is of no particular importance, but, unless our ears deceived us, the version sung by Mr. Staudigl contains one queer shot. As we understood the singer, Gay's "The feeble god has stabbed me to the heart" was rendered "Der Liebe Gott hat mir das Herz durchbohrt." Now, if this does not sound deceptively like "Der liebe Gott hat mir das Herz durchbohrt," what does it sound like? Mr. Staudigl sang recitative and air sturdily, and showed more smoothness and fluency in coloratura than most singers of his nation; but he sang rather dryly, and did not show forth much of the humor of the composition. In the G major cantilena of the Weber aria he showed some ideality of feeling and true tenderness of expression; but the stronger portions of Lysiart's great scene seemed too much for his calibre of voice, and his singing was not dramatically effective. We cannot think the orchestra played too loud; the score calls for just such playing, and anything more subdued would have been out of character. But, upon the whole, how can any singing even of this wonderful music ever hope to make such a text go down? We are no Wagnerian sticklers for immaculate poetic beauty in opera texts; we prefer [illegible] words to poor, but have heard so many great singers help composers of genius to atone for librettists' shortcomings that we are not inclined to be very fastidious in this matter. But there are times when the worm will turn! We know three texts that triumphantly succeed in blocking the best endeavors of both composer and singer: the text to Handel's "Esther" (said to have been written by Alexander Pope, but we doubt if anyone believes that), Thomas Morell's text to Handel's "Solomon," and Helmine von Chézy's text to Weber's "Euryanthe." Why, old Schikaneder's text to the "Zauberflöte" is a pure gem, compared to these!

The next programme is: Mendelssohn, overture to "Ruy Blas," opus 95; C. M. Loeffler, symphonic poem, "The Death of Tintagiles" (after Maeterlinck), for orchestra and two violas d'amour (MS., first time); Brahms, symphony No. 4, in E minor, opus 98.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 2, 1898.

THE SYMPHONY, ETC.

The tenth Symphony programme opened and closed with delightfully rendered overtures—Mozart's large, noble and high sounding "Magic Flute," and Auber's merry, various and yet sturdy "Black Domino." Each was welcome and each was just in the proper place. The symphony was Tschaikowsky's fifth—that in E minor, opus 64. It is a work which is good to hear; and, coming as it did now after several recent performances of his sixth, seems at least to give some indication that his spirit was preparing itself in it for that last great effort of his genius. It is completely Slavonic in its thoughts and themes. and breaks away at times with apparently limitless energy into mighty moods and measures which almost defy control. Yet the grand, the deep, the tender, the suavely expressive, the melancholy, and the foreboding predominate. Even the central theme of that incessantly urgent finale comes from the grave, sad prelude, and the waltz which occupies the place of a Scherzo, is never altogether gay and lightsome. The very instrumentation appeals to thoughtful sympathies and chastened emotions, for the clarinet, the bassoon and the horn bring the composer's longest messages to the hearer, while the trumpets and trombones deliver his most serious phrases. There is no monotony of color, no lack ot rich variety in scoring; but one still feels a quiet, significant impressiveness which the most vehement and sweeping passages, with stroke of heavy chord and beat of drnm, can only obscure while they last. The performance was admirable and enthusiastic, barring some cloudiness in the first part of the adante.

There was a soloist, whom the programme book had not the courtesy to introduce—Mr. Standigl, who is, we believe, a member of the Damrosch-Ellis Opera Company. He sung (in German) two large bass scenes—"O ruddier than the cherry," which belongs to Polyphemns in Handel's "Acis and Galatea," and the "Wo berg' ich mich" from Weber's "Euryanthe." From his singing of these, Mr. Standigl is a well-equpped, capable artist, but by no means a great one. The Handel air—a difficult one by reason of its irregularities of phrase and its awkward skips—was uninterestingly rendered and with little suggestion of the rough ardor of the enamored Cyclop, although the roulades and trills were clearly and freely delivered. The second scene had more dramatic spirit and its fluctuating passions were fairly sketched and emphasized. The orchestra, not quite escaped from the rush and force of the symphony finale, played somewhat too loudly near the end of the latter scene and hurt the singer's climax.

The next programme will be: Mendelssohn, overture, "Ruy Blas"; Loeffler, Symphonic Poem for orchestra and two violas d'Amour obligato. "The Death of Tintagiles" (after the drama by M. Maeterlink, Ms. First time.) Brahms, Symphouy No. 4.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CIII., NO. 2.

SUNDAY, JANUARY 2, 1898.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Masterpieces of Music Well Interpreted, but the Soloist Lacked Force.

The 10th concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, in Music Hall, last evening, had for its programme:

Overture, "Die Zauberflote"..........Mozart
Recitative and air, "I Rage," "O Ruddier
Than the Cherry"....................Handel
Symphony, No. 5, E minor......Tschaikowsky
Scena, "Wo berg ich mich?" "Schweigt, gluhnden Schnens"...................Weber
Overture, "Le Domino Noir"...........Auber

The soloist was Mr. Staudigl, whose first name was not given.

The symphony is a strong and interesting work, but it is overshadowed by the same composer's "Pathetique" symphony, especially by its closing movement, perhaps the noblest and most searchingly effective utterance of modern music. The No. 5 has many beautiful moments; the andante overflows with them, but the composer often nods, and in the first allegro falls into almost tiresome prolixity, and continues to speak long after he has exhausted his subject. The waltz overflows with graceful charm, both of melody and of orchestration, and there are splendid fire and stirring vigor in the finale, but there is also much of what seems labored in invention and of themes that are not impressive in themselves.

The instrumentation is always rich in color and remarkable in its individuality and variety in effect, particularly in the second and the third movements. In the other parts of the work it is frequently difficult to discover what the music means under the forced and often fantastic elaboration of treatment to which it is subjected. It was grandly played, the andante with exquisite warmth and finish and the finale with immense vigor and rhythmic accent.

The ever-fresh and delightful Mozart overture, that will remain a masterpiece and a model for works in its kind to the end of time, gave unalloyed pleasure through the perfect interpretation accorded it by Mr. Paur, and the precision and elegance of its performance by the orchestra. The tuneful and fascinatingly characteristic Auber overture, one of the most sparkling and daintily artistic of musical trifles, was given with a fine feeling for its peculiar color and accent, and with a brilliancy that could not be surpassed. It is one of the best of its composer's lighter overtures, and the grace of its orchestration and the polished musicianship that marks it fully entitled it to a place on these programmes. Auber has written more forcible overtures, such as "Le Lac de Fees," "Gustav III.," "Lestocq" and "La Muette de Portici," but none more piquant than "Le Domino Noir," unless, perhaps, "La Bayadere."

Mr. Staudigl's singing was scarcely of a quality to call for any extended notice. His performance of the Handel aria was weak, spineless and wholly lacking in appropriate force and color. His voice is not of the timbre to give due effect to the music, either in solidity or robustness; nor does he use it with any notable skill. He was more at home in the Weber aria, but at his best he never rose higher than painstaking commonplace. His success with his audience was emphasized by perfunctory applause and a mild recall after each effort.

The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Ruy Blas," Mendelssohn; Symphonic Poem for orchestra and two violas d'amour, "The Death of Tintagiles," C. M. Loeffler; and Symphony No. 4, Brahms.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, JAN. 2, 1898.

Tenth Symphony Concert.

Mr Staudigl, basso in the Damrosch-Ellis opera company, was the soloist at the symphony concerts last week. The orchestral numbers comprised the overture to Mozart's "Magic Flute," Tchaikovsky's fifth symphony, and the overture to "The Black Domino," by Auber. Mr Staudigl's numbers were taken from Handel's "Acis and Galatea" and Weber's "Euryanthe," the latter selection being quite a novelty here.

Mr Staudigl is an artist whose work is very enjoyable, and from the fine impression he made in concert one may confidently anticipate even better results when he appears in Boston later in the season in operatic roles. His voice is not specially ponderous for a basso, but it is rich in quality, very true in its tonality, and exceedingly flexible. Both selections were of a dramatic character, and they were given with a verve and spirit which did not detract from the purely musical portion of the compositions. Mr Staudigl combines expression and facile execution in an artistic manner, and at the same time his voice is musical and void of harshness. He was loudly applauded and recalled to the stage several times.

The famous Mozart overture was played in a brilliant manner, the many beautiful combinations being delicately brought forth by the orchestra. The Tchaikovsky symphony received a sympathetic interpretation. The fortissimo climaxes were vigorously presented, and the modulations, so intricate and varied, were given very smoothly. The fourth movement, the most interesting in the whole symphony, showed the wonderful team work of the orchestra to perfection and was really very pleasing, but the composition as a whole is so chaotic and puzzling that it cannot possess many charms for the general concert patron.

Auber's overture, with its dainty dancing phrases and piquant melodies, was delightfully performed. At this week's concerts the orchestra will perform from MS for the first time Mr Loeffler's new symphonic poem for orchestra and two violas d'Amour obligato, "The Death of Tintagiles," after the drama by M. Maeterlink. The other numbers will comprise Mendelssohn's "Ruy Blas" overture and Brahms' fourth symphony.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, JANUARY 3, 1898

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The tenth symphony concert was given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, the programme being as follows:

Mozart: Overture to "Die Zauberflöte."
Handel: Recitative, "O Schmach," and Aria, "O rosig wie die Pfirsche," from "Acis und Galatea."
Tchaikovsky: Symphony No. 5, in E minor, opus 64.
Weber: Scena, "Wo berg' ich mich ?" and Aria, "Schweigt, glüh'nden Sehnens wilde Triebe," from "Euryanthe."
Auber: Overture to "Le Domino Noir."
Mr. Staudigl was the singer.

Mozart's inimitable overture was played with clearness, brilliancy and due delicacy; that ritenuto in the cadence of the first part, just before the Masonic E-flat major chords, is authorizable by the hold over the last B-flat, but somehow we do not like it; we should prefer to have this cadence played less pompously and more brilliantly, in strict time. But this is a detail.

Tchaikovsky's E minor symphony was first played here, under Mr. Arthur Nikisch, on Oct. 21 and 22, 1892, and has, we believe, not been heard here since. It was the first entire Tchaikovsky symphony ever given at the symphony concerts, and made a rather terrifying impression at the time, if we remember aright. Times have changed since then, and the work has quite lost its terror. It is a curious composition, containing more skilful development of its thematic material than any of the composer's earlier symphonies, and thus marking a decided advance in the technics of composition in extended forms. The working-out in the first movement is especially coherent, and the development of the finale as energetic and brilliant as may be, up to the beginning of the closing "apotheosis." The irremediable weakness of the work lies, however, in its thematic material itself. That gloomy tune in the introduction, which might be called the motto or leading motive of the whole symphony, has a certain characteristic Slavic flavor which is not without its zest; but it has not enough of intrinsic character for the role the composer has allotted to it, and its various fortissimo reappearances in the course of the work lack musical impressiveness; moreover, it ill bears the change to the major mode, in which it sounds singularly cheap and commonplace. The special themes of the first movement have the advantage of lending themselves readily to working-out, though they are rather flimsy in themselves; genius might have done great things with them, but the cleverness Tchaikovsky shows in this symphony is not genius. The two principal themes of the slow movement are poor beyond toleration; they sound like weak imitations of Raff. Tchaikovsky's undeniable skill has been quite thrown away upon them; weak sentimentalism could hardly go further. True, they have a certain emotional force of appeal; they are what one might call "haunting" melodies—haunting as the club bore, and button-holing you for hours after you have heard them. The waltz-theme of the third movement is not lacking in grace, but has little distinction and piquancy. From his repeated attempts, one might gather that one of Tchaikovsky's pet ambitions was to write a good waltz; if so, it seems rather like Mendelssohn's ambition to write an opera. Only in the finale does the composer seem to have a real melodic inspiration; genuine, if rough and not untainted with vulgarity; but when he gets to his "apotheosis," heaven help him! An apotheosis that makes you smile is worse than none at all; this one came just a week too late for Messrs. Houghton & Dutton's Christmas illumination. Another point in the symphony which recommends it but ill is its persistent gloominess; it is not "Asiatic melancholy," but sheer doleful dumps. This is made still worse by Tchaikovsky's seemingly taking a leaf out of Spontini's book in the matter of instrumentation; he harps too unmercifully upon the medium and lower registers of the instruments, one wonders where all his usual Russian strident brilliancy of color has gone! The symphony was splendidly read and played.

It was good to hear Auber's overture to "Le Domino Noir." Only what came before it on the programme was not the best preparation for it in the world. Handel's air was in G minor; Tchaikovsky's symphony, in E minor, and gloomy enough at that; Weber's air dwelt mostly in the Cimmerian night of C minor; and then came the F minor of the opening measures of Auber's overture! It seemed as if the gas never would be turned up! But the F minor truculency, though persistently recurring at first, was dispelled in time, and the bright, cheerful overture, so full of genius and melodic charm, sent one away in the best of moods.

Mr. Staudigl sang Handel's "O Ruddier than the Cherry" in German—not to the words set down in the programme books, taken from the German Händel-Gesellschaft edition, for which Gervinus made all the translations, but another, probably earlier, version. The matter is of no particular importance, but, unless our ears deceived us, the version sung by Mr. Staudigl contains one queer shot. As we understood the singer, Gay's "The feeble god has stabbed me to the heart" was rendered "Der Liebe Gott hat mir das Herz durchbohrt." Now, if this does not sound deceptively like "Der liebe Gott hat mir das Herz durchbohrt," what does it sound like? Mr. Staudigl sang recitative and air sturdily, and showed more smoothness and fluency in coloratura than most singers of his nation; but he sang rather dryly, and did not show forth much of the humor of the composition. In the G major cantilena of the Weber aria he showed some ideality of feeling and true tenderness of expression; but the stronger portions of Lysiart's great scene seemed too much for his calibre of voice, and his singing was not dramatically effective. We cannot think the orchestra played too loud; the score calls for just such playing, and anything more subdued would have been out of character. But, upon the whole, how can any singing even of this wonderful music ever hope to make such a text go down? We are no Wagnerian sticklers for immaculate poetic beauty in opera texts; we prefer good words to poor, but have heard so many great singers help composers of genius to atone for librettists' shortcomings that we are not inclined to be very fastidious in this matter. But there are times when the worm will turn! We know three texts that triumphantly succeed in blocking the best endeavors of both composer and singer; the text to Handel's "Esther" (said to have been written by Alexander Pope, but we doubt if anyone believes that), Thomas Morell's text to Handel's "Solomon," and Helmine von Chézy's text to Weber's "Euryanthe." Why, old Schikaneder's text to the "Zauberflöte" is a pure gem, compared to these!

The next programme is: Mendelssohn, overture to "Ruy Blas," opus 95; C. M. Loeffler, symphonic poem, "The Death of Tintagiles" (after Maeterlinck), for orchestra and two violas d'amour (MS., first time); Brahms, symphony No. 4, in E minor, opus 98.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 2, 1898.

THE SYMPHONY, ETC.

The tenth Symphony programme opened and closed with delightfully rendered overtures—Mozart's large, noble and high sounding "Magic Flute," and Auber's merry, various and yet sturdy "Black Domino." Each was welcome and each was just in the proper place. The symphony was Tschaikowsky's fifth—that in E minor, opus 64. It is a work which is good to hear; and, coming as it did now after several recent performances of his sixth, seems at least to give some indication that his spirit was preparing itself in it for that last great effort of his genius. It is completely Slavonic in its thoughts and themes, and breaks away at times with apparently limitless energy into mighty moods and measures which almost defy control. Yet the grand, the deep, the tender, the suavely expressive, the melancholy, and the foreboding predominate. Even the central theme of that incessantly urgent finale comes from the grave, sad prelude, and the waltz which occupies the place of a Scherzo, is never altogether gay and lightsome. The very instrumentation appeals to thoughtful sympathies and chastened emotions, for the clarinet, the bassoon and the horn bring the composer's longest messages to the hearer, while the trumpets and trombones deliver his most serious phrases. There is no monotony of color, no lack of rich variety in scoring; but one still feels a quiet, significant impressiveness which the most vehement and sweeping passages, with stroke of heavy chord and beat of drum, can only obscure while they last. The performance was admirable and enthusiastic, barring some cloudiness in the first part of the adante.

There was a soloist, whom the programme book had not the courtesy to introduce—Mr. Standigl, who is, we believe, a member of the Damrosch-Ellis Opera Company. He sung (in German) two large bass scenes—"O ruddier than the cherry," which belongs to Polyphemus in Handel's "Acis and Galatea," and the "Wo berg' ich mich" from Weber's "Euryanthe." From his singing of these, Mr. Standigl is a well-equpped, capable artist, but by no means a great one. The Handel air—a difficult one by reason of its irregularities of phrase and its awkward skips—was uninterestingly rendered and with little suggestion of the rough ardor of the enamored Cyclop, although the roulades and trills were clearly and freely delivered. The second scene had more dramatic spirit and its fluctuating passions were fairly sketched and emphasized. The orchestra, not quite escaped from the rush and force of the symphony finale, played somewhat too loudly near the end of the latter scene and hurt the singer's climax.

The next programme will be: Mendelssohn, overture, "Ruy Blas"; Loeffler, Symphonic Poem for orchestra and two violas d'Amour obligato. "The Death of Tintagiles" (after the drama by M. Maeterlink, Ms. First time.) Brahms, Symphony No. 4.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 5, 1898.

I find I neglected in my last letter to say anything about the ninth Symphony Concert, which was given December 23. This shows you the impression made by the program, which I copy as a matter of record: Beethoven's Second Symphony; Bach's Shepherd's Music, from the "Christmas Oratorio;" Humperdinck's Prelude to "Hänsel und Gretel;" (first time at these concerts); Two Northern Melodies for strings, Grieg; L'Arlésienne, suite No. 1, Bizet. The prelude by Humperdinck was first played here—and imperfectly—at a concert given by the Boston Woman's Orchestra, under Mr. A. W. Thayer, April 30, 1895, "imperfectly" because the orchestra was not full enough to meet the demands of Humperdinck's score. The opera was performed here for the first time January 21, 1896, and again we gained no satisfactory idea of the overture. The satisfactory performance by the Symphony Orchestra was inure us to the reputation of the composer. What a pretty soap-bubble this prelude is, to be sure! It shines, glistens, the colors are admirable, but the moment you try to put your fingers on any real substance—whish! it bursts and vanishes. And yet in England some of the critics couple Humperdinck's name with that of Richard Strauss; "the two men to whom we look for orchestral music." Or is this an instance of splenetic humor?

* * *

Thank God, there was only one concert last week!

The program of the Tenth Symphony Concert, January 1, was as follows: Mozart's overture to "The Magic Flute;" recitative and aria "O, Ruddier than the Cherry," from "Acis and Galatea;" Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony, in E minor; scena and aria, "Schweigt, Glüh'nden Sehnes Wilde Treibe," from "Euryanthe;" and the overture to "Le Domino Noir," by Auber.

Joseph Staudigl was the singer. He first visited Boston in the spring of 1885, when I was, fortunately, on the other side of the Atlantic.

There were some in the audience last night who wondered whether he was the celebrated Staudigl whose "Elijah" is traditional. This was unjust to the gentleman, who is only about forty-eight years old. It was also an insult to the memory of his father.

My interest in him as a singer is historical and genealogical. If you should ask about his technical equipment, truth would wring from me these answers:

Q.	What kind of a voice has he?
A.	Bierbass.
Q.	How is his intonation?
A.	Quisby.
Q.	How is his tone production?
A.	Aggressively German.
Q.	How is his cantabile?
A.	Sawed off.
Q.	And the bravura?
A.	Go-as-you-please.
Q.	And his interpretation?
A.	Massive and concrete.

Now I am fond of the air of Polyphemus, nor am I wearied by hearing the recitative about the trusty pine and "the hundred reeds of decent growth," but I wish to hear this song in English: "Mächt'gen Hauch" does not console me for "capacious mouth" and "O Rosig Wie Die Pfirsche" may be an excellent translation, but somehow or other it does not bring Händel straight into the mind.

Mr. Apthorp in his program notes speaks of various performances of the piece as concert music at Cannon's and as opera at the Haymarket, May 17, 1732. But it was given in some sort of dramatic form at the Theatre-Royal in Lincoln's Inn Fields, March 26, 1731, and we know that additions were made to the original version. It is hard to reconcile this fact with the announcement on May 6, 1732. "A pastoral opera called 'Acis and Galatea,' with all the choruses, scenes, machines and other decorations, being the first time it ever was performed in a theatrical way," except by supposing that the performance at Lincoln's Inn Theatre was of the nature known as scrub. At this earlier performance the part of Polyphemus was sung by Richard Leveridge, who had then reached the age of sixty or sixty-one.

Mr. Apthorp also speaks of an operatic performance in London in 1842 as though it were the last. It is my impresion that the cantata has been sung there as an opera since that date. Why did he not mention the performances by the New York Oratorio Society April 28, 29, 1892, with costumes and scenery; Mrs. De Vere-Sapio, as Galatea; Mr. Rieger, as Acis; Miss Irene Pevny, as Damon, and Mr. Fischer, as Polyphemus?

When Mr. Staudigl has time, I wish he would look over Pauline Viardot's edition of "O, Ruddier Than the Cherry"—"J'enrage, je suis en feu;" and

"O, Nymphe plus vermeille
Qu'un rubis de groseille."

He might then gain some idea of the possibilities of phrasing lurking in this sturdy tune.

As for the aria from "Euryanthe," Mr. Staudigl did full justice to its inherent dullness. Lysiart is a desperate villain, the most atrocious villain on the operatic stage; for musically he is a miracle of stupidity. I know I am all wrong. "Euryanthe" is a masterpiece and "Die Freischütz" is a poor thing, but I prefer the poor thing. To me Weber is a man of one opera. "Oberon" is a deadly bore, in spite of Hector Berlioz and other enthusiasts.

* * *

Now, why was Mr. Staudigl, who is no better or worse than many singers heard in German gardens above the clashing of beer glasses and through clouds of tobacco smoke, invited to appear at a Boston Symphony concert?

And it is given out that neither Mr. Ysaye, nor Mr. Pugno, nor Mr. Gérardy will play with the orchestra in Music Hall this season.

We have been allowed to hear Mr. Staudigl; let us therewith be content.

* * *

The orchestra gave an unsurpassable performance of the symphony by Tschaikowsky. In ensemble and in solos the players outdid themselves. Especially noteworthy was the solo of Mr. Hackebarth, the first horn, and the work done by Messrs. Pourtau and Metzger, the clarinetists.

Men whose opinions are entitled to great weight say that the Fifth Symphony is a greater work of art than the "Pathetic." I cannot agree with them.

The Fifth Symphony abounds, it is true, with passages of rare beauty and strength. The introduction is singularly impressive, and the allegro is of a high and sustained nature. The andante with its Italian melody—Italian in its flowing breadth—is sensuously beautiful, but in spite of stirring, passionate climaxes, in spite of most ingenious contrasts, the movement is too long. The waltz does not interest me. Yet there is one moment that disturbs and haunts. Let me quote from Mr. Apthorp: "Toward the close of this waltz movement of Tschaikowsky's the theme of the slow introduction to the first movement of the symphony returns softly, and rather grimly, in the clarinets and bassoons, as much as to say: 'Aren't you ashamed to be dancing waltzes when there is more weighty business in hand?' "

But this return is still more sinister than Mr. Apthorp finds it. The hearer recalls the banquet of Lucrezia and the sound of the funeral chant and the sight of the coffins waiting to be filled. Or there is uneasiness among the dancers, for they smell the red death that smiles on the mask of the daring stranger.

In the finale you hear Tschaikowsky saying to Rimsky-Korsakoff, Balakireff, Glazounoff and the other radicals: "There, isn't this Russian enough for you? You call me a cosmopolite; but listen, how does this strike you for Russian music?" And there is fury that is epileptic.

An exceedingly interesting, in some respects extraordinary work. What wealth of melody, rhythm, color! What dramatic feeling for contrasts, preparations, crescendos! What skillful use of rests! Does this theme seem too sentimental? The treatment immediately justifies the theme. Or is this one vulgar? Again the treatment glorifies it.

But it does not seem to me that there is such a skyward flight of imagination as in the "Pathetic," or such glowing passion, or such wild regret, or such vivid reminders of churchyard mould and industrious worm.

Perhaps Mr. Paur was wrong in putting the overture by Auber on the program; not because the piece is unworthy, but because the finale of Tschaikowsky's symphony should end a concert. There are symphonies that may well begin; there are symphonies that should be in the middle of a program, but such a work as the fifth with its overpowering finale, kills anything that comes after it. Perhaps Mr. Paur reasoned that the very lightness of the overture might still keep the attention. But the experiment was not successful. After such a Cossack finale the "Huldigungsmarsch" of Wagner might not have been out of place.

* * *

The program for January 8 will include Mendelssohn's "Ruy Blas" overture, Loeffler's symphonic poem for orchestra and two violas d'amour obligatos, " The Death of Tintagiles" (after the drama by Maeterlink), manuscript, first time; and Brahms' fourth symphony. The violas d'amour will be played by Messrs. Loeffler and Kneisel. I understand that there will be a double-bass clarinet in the orchestra.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 9, 1898.

THE SYMPHONY, THE HENSCHELS, ETC.

A single hearing is certainly not enough to enable one to apprehend all the details of form, the differences of thematic material and the changes—of manner—still less all the spiritual significance of such a composition as Mr. C. M. Loeffler's manuscript symphonic poem, "The Death of Tintagiles," which held the central position in Mr. Paur's tenth programme. Indeed it is a work which one might reasonably wish to receive with some form of explanation from the composer. Not a synopsis or a programme; but an intimation of what feelings the poet's theme had aroused in the musician, and what episodes—of body, soul or scene—the latter had been moved to express through the vast symbolism of his art. Language is more valuable for what it hints and stirs than for what it tells, and music must evoke imaginations rather try to indicate facts, happenings and statements.

Maeterlinck's tragedy moves from two chief principles—first, the cold, slow, pursuant hatred of the old, mysterious, dreadful Queen for the little grandson Tintagiles, who in the course of nature must come to sit upon her throne, and, second, the clinging love between the little lad and his sister Ygraine, who fears ever the worst and ever endeavors to hide, protect and save him. As is Maeterlinck's wont, the outer world is moved to furnish a heightening background for his human drama and his overpowering fate. The boy has been brought—almost in custody—across seas to the Queen's remote and secure castle. Storm rages, darkness shuts down, gloom and terror are felt in the air, plots are breathed, the murderer lurks behind a massive door and doom unescapable only waits an unguarded and helpless moment. The tender love and delicate devotion of the sister and brother are portrayed as the sole bright and gentle elements in the awful combination of hate, determination and power, and they hold their gentle radiance through the gathering dark and dread, until light and life go out together in agonized despair.

It seems to be evident that Mr. Loeffler's plan was to present in his tempestuous prelude the fierce fury of the elements, blended with the harsh, stern, unyielding evil of the Queen and her compliant, cruel instruments, the handmaids who steal Tintagiles, sleeping in his drowsing sister's arms and bear him away to the assassin; the beautiful mutual affection, sweetness and peace between the hapless two; the return of the elemental strife and the rise toward its execution of the Queen's relentless mandate; the sounding of the midnight bell, and then the melting away into silence of the blended voices, which, but an instant before, were soft with love, plaintive with grieving and inseparable in their pathetic flow. Just how closely the listener has divined his purpose and shared his feeling cannot yet be known. But there can be no doubt as to the new and striking revelations which this score makes of his originality of fancy, his mastery of form, his bold, independent, masterful orchestration, his clear perception of the line which bounds the weird from the melodramatic, his distinction of the complex from the obscure, his potential directness of appeal and his equal command here of the ruder means which depict storm and madness and of those delicate touches which become the sad, the fond, the hopeless and the pitiful. When he begins his story the brazen instruments announce the dominance of an evil will, while all the others sweep with waves or shriek and flash and roll with lightning, thunder and the crash of waters upon rocks. At the end there is almost nothing but the failing tones of the martyrs and a whisper or a faint beat of string, or clarinet or drum. An enlarged orchestra is employed, requiring a second harp, a bass-clarinet, four kettle-drums, a tamtam and a bass drum. But though this band is often pushed to its full strength, there seems to be nothing overwrought or over-powerful in the score, and the occasional strange dissonances appear to be justified and well placed.

Tintagiles and his sister are represented by two violes d'amour, with their many strings, arranged in pairs, one set being made of wire and vibrating of themselves in accord with the bow-touched primary set. The instrument has been looked upon almost as a curiosity of the past, but Mr. Loeffler has recalled it to new life, and—with Mr. Kneisel's assistance—made it impressive, appealing and pathetic. The whole performance was wonderfully fine in intuition, sympathy and execution, Mr. Paur conducting with assiduous care and conspicuous advantage.

Mendelssohn's "Ruy Blas" overture preceded the poem and Brahms's third symphony followed it. The next programme is: Beethoven, Symphony No. 6 (Pastoral); (a) Beethoven, Romanza in F, (b) Paganini, Caprice in A minor; (First time;) Massenet, Suite, "Les Erinnyes," (First time); Smetana, Overture to "The Sold Bride." Soloist, Mr. T. Adamowski.

[62]

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, JANUARY 9, 1898.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Loeffler's "Death of Tintagiles" Performed for the First Time—A Singularly Fantastic Work.

The program of the 11th Symphony Concert was as follows:

Overture, "Ruy Blas" ....Mendelssohn
Symphonic Poem for Orchestra and two violes d'Armour obbligate. "The Death of Tintagiles" (after the drama by Maeterlinck) ....Loeffler
(MS. First time.)
Symphony No. 4.........................Brahms

Thinking of Maeterlinck's drama and speculating concerning the advisability of giving a prominent part to a viole d'amour in a modern orchestral composition might divert us from the chief question: What is the value of Mr. Loeffler's musical thought in this symphonic poem?

It is not necessary to discuss the drama. You may say this little play for marionettes is bosh. You may say—as I believe—that to find its equal in dramatic intensity and power of suggestion one must go as far back as Ford or Webster, or Tourneur. In either case we are no nearer Mr. Loeffler's music.

Nor do I propose to discourse learnedly concerning the viole d'armour or the double bass clarinet, which latter instrument was played last night for the first time in any public concert. I speak a few words about them in another column of the Journal today, and if you are interested in such matters you can read there about Mr. Kohl's invention.

Maeterlinck's drama is full of suspense, horror and death. There are the strange contending forces: The sisters of little Tintagiles, who endeavor to shield him against the Queen and her handmaids. Is the struggle symbolical of mankind's contention against inevitable Death? Let us not be too curious. On the one side are the child and his sisters; on the other the mysterious and cruel Queen. Here is the suggestion to the musician. Add, perhaps, the thought of old Aglovale, who, weak in mind and body, remembers vaguely heroic days.

Now, a musician has as much right to use these suggestions for a symphonic poem as Beethoven had to write "Coriolanus," with contrasted thoughts of stubborn pride and tender entreaty.

But in using such suggestions, he must first of all be musically interesting. The music must stand on its own legs. The composer must not hope to save himself when imagination fails and thought is dry by uttering the Macedonian cry, "Oh Maeterlinck."

* * *

The wild night, the memory of old heroic deeds—these are expressed with musical intensity and not merely through the association of literary ideas. Even he that knew nothing of the play might well be reminded of foul weather and the shock of battle. Sound and fury—signifying much. Expressive themes that are not allowed to become too familiar through the mistaken love of the composer amorous of his own work. Skillful orchestration, for the most part. Harmonic progressions that are sometimes jarring, almost disconcerting, but deliberately contrived, effective, eminently Loefflerian.

For a contrast the composer naturally thought at once of the child—a rather peevish little fellow—and is not humanity inclined toward peevishness?—and the loving, timorous sisters. He thought that the viole d'amour, with its voice of unearthly complaint, would be the best medium of expression, and he therefore introduced two—call them Tintagiles and Ygraine if you wish. They were played last night with care and affection by the composer and Mr. Kneisel. And what was the result of the experiment?

In the first place there was naturally the animal curiosity to see as well as hear something new. This is in a measure detrimental to the true success of a new composition. In the second place, to me, at least, the long continued sound of these instruments in cantabile became irritating. Complaining persons are irritating; and the viole d'amour in sustained cantabile is a voice of complaint. I was tempted at the last private rehearsal and at the concert last night to wish more than once that Mr. Loeffler had used two violins instead of the nearly obsolete instruments. And yet at this moment I hear the violes d'amour with their peculiar appeal. The monotony, at least, made an impression.

* * *

I find the musical thought in the passages assigned to these instruments less potent than that in the scenes of stormier passion.

* * *

It is needless to say that Mr. Loeffler is too sane and truly imaginative to fall into the error of panoramic detail. "The Death of Tintagiles"— there is the title; make of it what you please. You may find delight in the thought of the sounding of midnight; you may fancy you hear Ygraine's fingers scratching on the iron door; you may even hear her shriek, "I blaspheme and spit upon you." Another may think simply in a vague, rapt way of the mysterious story of shudder.

* * *

Whether Mr. Loeffler follows passionately or carelessly the sonata-form is a matter of indifference to me. I am not frightened by any of his daring experiments in orchestration. At the same time there is a passage for muted trumpet that is ineffective and incongruous. I am not shocked by exhibitions of restless tonality. Provided that whatever he may do, I may be deeply interested and moved.

Mr. Loeffler is a singular apparition in the world of music. His individuality is most pronounced. He thinks for himself in his own language. It would be easy to call him a decadent in a loose way, and then go cheerfully to supper. But after you have pronounced this crushing verdict, somehow or other the music comes back to you as you sit at meat; it will not out of your thoughts.

"The Death of Tintagiles" is another proof of the genuine orchestral talent of this man. And yet, unless I err seriously, the piece does not mark an unmistakable advance in his musical career.

Philip Hale.

First Appearance Here of Double-Bass Clarinet.

Gossip Concerning Some Queer Males and Females.

Notes and Comments on Pieces, Singers and Players.

Mr. Loeffler's symphonic poem, which was played last night in Music Hall for the first time, calls for two violes d'amour, an instrument that is now seldom heard.

There is also a part for the double-bass clarinet, a still rarer instrument. I think I am not mistaken in saying that it was the first appearance of this instrument in any concert.

There is a story that Sax made a double-bass clarinet (in E flat), and even a "clarinette bourdon," but they were never used, and I can find no description of them. A Prussian named Skorra is said to have exhibited in London, 1862, a double-bass clarinet made by him.

Then there is the double-bass clarinet made by Fontaine-Besson in B flat, which was supposed to give contra D. Albert, Brothers, also made a species of double-bass clarinet in F. But there was one trouble in using them. Nobody could play them. They were impracticable.

A Fontaine-Besson instrument was exhibited at Chicago. No one could play on it.

'Twas there that Mr. Kohl, a skillful clarinetist, formerly a member of Theodore Thomas's orchestra, met Mrs. Fontaine-Besson and showed her the designs of an instrument which he had contrived or was still contriving. She was delighted and at once assumed the expense of construction, which was by no means trifling.

Mr. Kohl, who played last night for the first time in public this instrument of beautiful and impressive tone, has brought the double-bass clarinet to such a point of perfection that it speaks as promptly as an ordinary clarinet. He told me that in addition to its musical qualities the instrument was of hygienic use; for practising had added four inches to the girth of his chest.

Musicians find that in modern works, especially in ultra-modern pieces, there is not enough true bass; that double basses are inadequate, and that the double bassoon is practically of little worth in adding to solidity of foundation. It seems to me that there is a future for Mr. Kohl's instrument.

* * *

The viole d'amour was much in fashion during the 18th century, and it was employed later in opera as well as in concert. Thus it appeared in Kreutzer's "Paradis de Mahomet," (Paris, 1822); at the Paris Opéra in "Zémire and Azor" (1824); and at the Opéra in Meyerbeer's "Huguenots," as an obbligato to Raoul's romance.

Krumlowski, who died in 1768, wrote quartets for two violes d'amour, violin and bass. Hoffman wrote pieces for two violes d'amour, two demi-bassoons and a 'cello. Wencel wrote a concerto for viole d'amour, lutes, flutes, two horns, violin and bass.

* * *

Mr. Loeffler is not the first that has sought musical inspiration in the works of Maeterlinck.

Miss Georgette Leblanc sang lately in Paris songs—if you are pleased to call them songs—of Gabriel Fabre, with text by Maeterlinck. Two, at least, of these strange pieces were published in the Mercure de France (December, 1896, March, 1897): "La voix de Sélysette" ("Quand l'amant sortit"); and "J'ai cherché trente ans, mes soeurs."

She must be a singular person, according to report. She gives "auditions lyriques mimées"; she varies her attitudes to suit the particular piece; the piano is concealed by a curtain; sometimes she sings, seated in a high and ancient chair; or she walks to and fro. Gustave Robert, reviewing her performance, warns young singers against trying to imitate her; for he fears that the result would be laughable disaster to composer as well as singer.

* * *

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CIII., NO. 9.

SUNDAY, JANUARY 9, 1898.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Old-Time Instrument Brought to the Front Again.

The Viole d'Amour Introduced in Mr. Loeffler's Symphonic Poem—Also the Contrabass Clarinet, an Entirely New Instrument—The Selections Well Received.

The programme for the 11th concert this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last evening, was:

Overture to "Ruy Blas," op. 95....Mendelssohn
Symphonic poem, "La Mort de Tintagiles," for orchestra and two violes d'amour obbligate (MS.)..............Loeffler
(First time.)
Symphony No. 4, in E minor, op 98....Brahms

Mr. Loeffler's work is founded on the leading motive of Maeterlinck's drama, a gloomy, saddening production, but not without a certain powerful interest, revolving about the death of the child Tintagiles, behind a massive iron door, while his frantic sister stands on the other side of it, unable to assist him. It is a grewsome theme, worked out in that disjointed and spasmodic style and the endless repetitions that are peculiar to the poet.

Maeterlinck is called the Dutch Shakespeare, which may be just enough; but he bears not the slightest resemblance to the English Shakespeare. It is understood that Mr. Loeffler intended no more than to tell in music the struggle between the Queen and her handmaids on the one hand, and the child and his sister on the other. In how far he has succeeded in doing this must be decided by those who have studied the drama, which is far from familiar to the many. To others it must appeal only as music, pure and simple.

The work is scored for a large orchestra, including two harps, two violes d'amour, and a contrabass clarinet. The viole d'armour is a tenor viol with seven strings, with sympathetic strings of fine steel or brass that pass through holes drilled in the lower part of the bridge, and under the fingerboard. Their number varies from seven to 14. The tone of the instrument is delicate and penetrating, but somewhat monotonous. The viole d'amour had fallen into disuse many years, when it was brought forward again by Meyerbeer in "The Huguenots," by way of providing a solo accompaniment to Raoul's aria in the first act. That was 62 years ago, and it has not been used in the orchestra again until Mr. Loeffler had resort to it in this work.

The contrabass clarinet is a wholly new instrument that was used for the first time in any orchestra by Mr. Loeffler. Its compass is an octave lower than the bass clarinet; or, in other words, exactly the same as that of the contrabass. It provides a solid bass for the wind instruments, and is really an invention of great value that is in no danger of being ignored by composers. Its tone is of tremendous sonority, and it is capable of being played with nearly the same fluency as is the ordinary clarinet.

It is difficult to know what to say of Mr. Loeffler's symphonic poem. Of the brilliancy and masterful skill of its orchestration there are only words of the highest commendation. To its fine musicianship, its strongly marked individuality, its originality and its dramatic intensity of expression the sincerest tribute of respect may be freely and justly paid. In all essentials of the most perfect technique, it lacks absolutely nothing. These things lie on the surface, and may be easily recognized and admired.

The work abounds in color and effect of surprising variety and impressiveness. Its workmanship throughout would do honor to any composer. For the rest it is more difficult to answer. In listening to music by modern composers—and Mr. Loeffler is an extremist in the modern school—much depends on the musical tastes of the hearer; on the difficulty of discovering the intention of the composer until one almost has the music by heart; on the far from simple overcoming firmly established beliefs regarding the true functions of musical art, its limitations and its mission; on reconciling educated prejudices in favor of this music with uneducated prejudices against that.

To the ear accustomed to decided tonality, an avoidance of tonality altogether is puzzling. One has to learn to be pleased with that with which one is not pleased at the outset. One has views regarding what is healthy in music and what is unhealthy. It is true that what may be incomprehensible today may become as clear as crystal tomorrow, and one is not to condemn on merely individual taste what one has the ill-fortune to fail of understanding, especially when it is the work of so earnest, thoughtful and wholly skilled a musician as is Mr. Loeffler. The fault, in all likelihood, lies with the critic rather than with the composer.

What seems to be most perplexing in this work is an apparent reaching out for something that constantly eludes the grasp; a certain restless vagueness of meaning; a succession of utterances, whether passionate or gentle, that do not interest in themselves as much as they do in their technical method of expression. The canvas is ablaze with colors skilfully combined and harmoniously contrasted; the touch is firm, the handling is masterly in its unrestraint, but the subject of the picture does not come out clearly; it is overimpressionistic.

There are unmistakable beauties, notably among them being the cantabile for the two violes d'amour; but even here one is almost inclined to wish there had been less of it, by reason of the monotonous sound of the instruments and absence of variety of effect in the theme itself. All this objecting, however, may be, probably is, the result of purely individual taste that has not fully succeeded in appreciating what is most iconoclastic in the music of the new school. The work, which is extremely difficult and taxed the virtuosity of the orchestra, was splendidly played; in fact, Mr. Paur repeated the brilliant success he achieved with Strauss' "Zarathustra."

The viole d'amour parts were played by Mr. Franz Kneisel and the composer with charming sentiment and grace of style. At the close there was a spontaneous outburst of applause, and Mr. Loeffler was frequently recalled with great enthusiasm, an honor that he wholly deserved, that he bore with characteristic modesty, and on which he is to be sincerely congratulated.

The "Ruy Blas" overture and the symphony were irreproachably given.

The programme for the next concert is: Symphony No. 6, Beethoven; Romanza in F, by Beethoven, and Caprice in A minor, by Paginini; Massenet's suite, "Les Erinnyes," first time, and Smetana's overture, "The Sold Bride." Mr. T. Adamowski is to be the soloist.

Replies to Some Questions by Mr. Finck of New York.

Certain Matters on Which He Is Not Fully Informed—Mr. Bullard's Paper on "Perfect Songs"—The Caesar Franck Trio—Recitals This Week—Musical Notes.

Mr. Finck of the New York Evening Post says that some of the Boston critics are "terribly irate" because he found fault with the last New York concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra. This is news, indeed. "Terribly irate" is a vigorous qualification to apply to the quoting from a rather spiteful article, a few of Mr. Finck's phrases, and to which were added some timely comments on the uncurbed wildness of his Wagner and Seidl worship. Mr. Finck charged that Bostonians, as a rule, are not educated up to expression in music, but like it mathematical and intellectual purely; and he returns to the subject with the inquiry:

"If this is not true will they please explain three things? (1) Why did Paderewski, the most emotional and poetic of living pianists, never draw such large audiences, proportionately, in Boston as he did, not only in New York and Chicago, but in many other cities not claiming to be musical centres? (2) Why did the first Boston appearance in 'Siegfried' of Jean and Edouard de Reszke, Bispham, and Seidl, the greatest living interpreters of their parts in Wagner's most poetic work, draw a palty 900 auditors—the same number that on the same evening attended a local quartet which can be heard all the year round? (3) Why was Arthur Nikisch, who is esteemed all over Europe as one of the most emotional and inspired of conductors, criticised, harassed, hounded, and finally driven out of Boston, while Mr. Paur, a schoolmasterly and purely intellectual conductor, is coddled at home and fiercely defended against criticism elsewhere?"

Now, if Mr. Finck were fully informed on the subjects whereof he writes he would know that not one of the queries he here puts has the remotest foundation on fact, except, perhaps, that about "Siegfried." But if all the inferences suggested were literally true, they would not in any wise prove that Bostonians are not educated up to expression in music. Why, however, in the "Siegfried" question does Mr. Finck mention the De Reszkes and Bispham? Was not Seidl enough? It is familiar to everybody here that Mr. Nickisch lost his position here through his own fault; in fact, because he came into conflict with Mr. Higginson on a point of discipline, and had to pay the penalty for it. He was criticised, it is true, but so is Mr. Seidl; but he was neither "harassed" nor "hounded." If he is esteemed all over Europe now, he must have improved greatly since he quitted Boston. Probably he has learned and pondered the lessons imparted to him here by the critics. As to the petty sneer at Mr. Paur, all who know him know also that he is the last man in the world to crave or to submit to being coddled. Go to, Finck! Thou art flushed! In the name of the prophet—Seidl!

The cream of Mr. Finck's response, however, rise to the surface of the milk and water in the following:

"There is a very mysterious conspiracy in certain quarters to magnify the merits of the Bostonians, and minify those of our own Philharmonic, which has no superior in the world. The public, fortunately, pays no attention to these curious manoeuvres, but crowds the Philharmonic concerts to the door, while the Bostonians usually have only half as many hearers. The Philharmonic audiences are acknowledged the most intelligent in America. When they are enthusiastic over a superb performance and afterward find it belittled or mercifully patted on the back in the newspapers, they do not change their mind in regard to the performance (the ever-increasing attendance shows that), but they do a lot of thinking in regard to the functions and mysteries of criticism."

There again Mr. Finck loses his head. Who except himself places the Philharmonic orchestra so high, and who except himself proclaims to audiences the most intelligent in America? The critics, after having heard the Boston orchestra, thought fit to commend the fine missionary work it was doing in New York. Its advent there showed New Yorkers what a perfectly trained and permanent orchestra could do, and comparisons were inevitable. Mr. Finck is in the unhappy condition of the recalcitrant juror who could not understand why the 11 other jurors did not agree with him. But hold! Isn't it Mr. Seidl who conducts the Philharmonic orchestra? Never mind, Mr. Finck. Comfort yourself with your great discovery that Boston likes its expression "mathematical and intellectual purely," and that Wagner's "Lohengrin" has been performed in Schlossenwolfenbuttl, and that the whole population of the town, men, women and children, nearly 1500 in number, according to the latest census, turned out in honor of the occasion.

[63]

[illegible] ADVERTIS[illegible]
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
[illegible]ONDAY MORNING, JAN. 10, 189[illegible]

Triumph of C. M. Loeffler's "La Mort de Tintagiles."

A Symphonic Rendition of the Pessimism of the Age.

It was a heavy programme, a concert that must have become monotonous even to the most musical. It began clearly and tunefully enough, with Mendelssohn's "Ruy Blas" overture. This is by no means the best of the composer's concert-overtures. Mendelssohn himself made light of this work; he scoffed at Victor Hugo's play, calling it "of no value, absolutely beneath contempt!" and he simply wanted to display his rapidity of work in the composition of the overture, which he created in a couple of days.

The fatal facility with which the work was written places it far below the "Hebrides," "Melusina," and other of Mendelssohn's overtures. Nevertheless the work is worth the hearing now and then, and its brilliant performance won great applause for it.

Now followed a very talented, but very repellant, composition by C. M. Loeffler, entitled "La Mort de Tintagiles." Mr. Loeffler has already proved that he is thoroughly imbued with the ultra-modern pessimism. He has given us a "Carnaval des Morts" and has revelled in the verjuice of Verlaine, and now he plunges into the still deeper gloom of Maeterlinck. It is but the tendency of the most modern art; music is no longer to be beautiful but is to become a hopeless wailing, a thrice-intensified "Welt-schmerz."

One may readily acknowledge that shadows are needed to give the best effect to lights in painting. that evil must contrast against good in literature, that dissonance must enhance consonance in music, but to present shadows only, to portray only crime and misery, to sound only dissonances and unrest, is bad art. In the Maeterlinck cult the religion is hysteria, the temple a morgue.

Maeterlinck is so steeped, soaked and sodden in horrors, that to a healthy mind, some of his ghoulish tricks become comical. His castles and palaces are always in very bad repair, built in a malarial district, with bad drainage and perfumed with blood. Heavy iron doors, dark passages filled with horror, mysterious presences, melancholy children, (especially "sisters,") abound. Everybody goes about in the deepest gloom and terror; the characters never speak, but always stammer their gruesome tales to each other; there is murder in the air, there is death at the end of every play.

Shakespeare's (?) "Titus Andronicus" is sunshine compared to these tragedies; and what would one have said of Shakespeare had he brought forth one "Titus Andronicus" after the other?

And now we are to have this pernicious art, with its only ambition, that of the Fat Boy in "Pickwick"—"I wants to make your flesh creep!"—exerting its funereal influence in Music.

Mr. Loeffler does not beat about the bush; he plunges bodily into the brambles of the modern path; he begins with a dissonance that makes the first chord of the finale of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony seem sweet by comparison, and once launched, there are no stopping-places, no cadences of repose, all is restless, agonized, sorrowing. In this composition he has passed on from that instrument of brooding, the viola, which he used so masterfully in his recent songs, to an obsolete instrument of plaintiveness, the Viola d'Amore.

This instrument with its 14 strings, (seven to play upon and seven to reverberate in sympathy), is almost useless in orchestral harmonies, but used as Mr. Loeffler employs it, in obbligato passages, it has some very beautiful effects; its tremulous tone and the celestial sweetness of its harmonics being especial characteristics.

It was in especially good taste to use a pair of these viols (most tenderly played by Messrs. Kneisel and Loeffler) to represent the two children, Tintagiles and Ygraine, although their wretchedness was pushed to such great length that it became monotonous at last.

The two viols d'amore were not the only instrumental novelty of the wonderful score, for a pedal-clarinette, the deepest of the single reed instruments, wsa also employed for the first time. This instrument is to the clarinettes what the contrabassoon is to the double-reed family, and it adds a most sonorous tone-color to the basses of the orchestra.

But there were still more striking novelties in the application of the older instruments in this remarkable score; from harps to cymbals the composer showed himself a master of orchestral combinations; setting all the lugubrious ideas aside, Mr. Loeffler has suddenly shown himself as ranking near to the famous masters of the modern orchestra. The odd effects produced on the cymbals (not unlike Wagner's rattling in "Tannhaeuser") the impressive tolling of midnight upon the harps (Berlioz and St. Saens may stand sponsors for this) the bold use of bass-drum and of percussion generally, the muted horns, the "ponticello" work of the strings, the short trumpet blasts, the mournful organ-point against the violes d'amour, and a host of other striking touches might be mentioned to show what a master of scoring we have in C. M. Loeffler; the more pity that he has taken the path of Richard Strauss, in which melody counts for little; scoring and "suggestion" for everything.

At the end of the work the composer, who is a favorite with everybody, was called again and again to receive the plaudits of the large audience which he modestly acknowledged from the corner of the stage.

After the audience had supped quite full of horrors, (one should feel grateful, too, for the Maeterlinck play condensed into the programme-book), a sudden excursion was made from modern mysticism to modern classicism.

Never did Brahms's Fourth Symphony seem so clear; in its first movement the first two notes led to more intelligible ideas than the entire preceding hurly-burly; it was tangible logic after gloomy incoherency. Nor was the dramatic ele-

The wonderful beau[illegible] first theme in the Andante came [illegible] cooling sedative to a fever patient, and the clarinettes and horn deserve praise for the manner in which they brought out their important themes. To the present writer, this second movement of the work seems one of the most delightful of Brahms's symphonic movements.

The jovial rondo which is made to do duty for a Scherzo is much weaker, in spite of its bold skips and sudden contrasts. It is a difficult movement to play, but our orchestra conquered it and gave the transformations of its chief theme with abundant spirit.

There is not much doubt but that Brahms took the idea of his final variations from Beethoven. It is interesting to note how the great old master strove to bring about a new ending to his symphonic forms. When he came upon the scene Haydn and Mozart ended their symphonies with a rollicking, jovial, finale, a bad heirloom from the Suite which concluded with a Gigue, (Jig), and led to the idea that every cycle form ought to be merry in its ending.

Already in his second symphony we find Beethoven departing from this idea, but he was hampered by the fact that the finest form of modern instrumental music was used in the first symphonic movement—the Sonata-allegro. In the Heroic and in the Ninth symphony, he hits upon the idea of using the variation form as an ending, thus making a contrast of styles, for the "Development," which is the fundamental principle of the Sonata-allegro, treats the figures of a theme, while variation would treat the theme as a whole.

But not Beethoven himself ever used such a direct, uncontrasted variation-form as we find in this Brahms finale. Some 24 times does the simple eight-barred melody appear in different guises, a pure example of ingenuity and intellectuality. Violins and flute deserve praise for good work in difficult passages in this finale, but one may confess that the ideal interpretation was not attained. It was the loudest, but not the best performance of this movement that we have ever had.

Louis C. Elson.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, JAN. 9, 1898.

Mr Charles M. Loeffler's New Symphonic Poem.

The interesting feature of last week's symphony concert was the performance of Mr Charles M. Loeffler's symphonic poem, "The Death of Tintagiles," which was played for the first time in public at the Friday afternoon rehearsal. The work is of exceptional merit, and entitles Mr Loeffler to recognition as one of the foremost of resident American composers. It is the largest and rather the most pretentious work that Mr Loeffler has yet undertaken, and fulfils the expectations awakened by the many brilliant compositions which have in the past come from the pen of this very talented musician.

There is probably no more popular member of the Boston symphony orchestra than Mr Loeffler, and the high regard in which he is held by the patrons of these concerts was manifested by the increased size of the audience and the warmth of the applause bestowed upon his composition. After the performance he was recalled half a dozen times or more with demonstrations of enthusiasm, most unusual at symphony concerts.

Mr Loeffler's composition is based on the drama by Maurice Maeterlinck and is scored for full modern orchestra with the addition of two violes d'amour. Originality characterizes the entire work, but the especially striking novelty is the introduction of solo parts for the violes d'amour, instruments that have been almost obsolete for many years. The viol is practically a modern viola, with the addition of six or seven fine steel strings under the fingerboard, which vibrate sympathetically with the strings touched by the bow or fingers. The tone is decidedly pleasing, suggestive in quality of something between the viola and the bow zither. There seems no good reason why these instruments should have been allowed to become so nearly extinct, and it is not unlikely that their resurrection in this composition will restore them to popularity. The violes d'amour were played by Mr Loeffler and Mr Franz Kneisel with the grace, expression and exactness of technique to be expected from these finished artists.

The score is remarkable for brilliancy and variety of coloring, abundance of delightful melody and rich, artistically developed harmonies. Many of the passages are intensely dramatic and a climax is worked up to with tremendous power. In the gentler movements poetic sentiment is no less effectively suggested by dainty, delicious instrumentation and, considered generally, the composition is one of the best examples of descriptive music that has been written in recent years.

There were only two other numbers on the program, the overture to "Ruy Blas," by Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, and Brahms' symphony in E minor. Both these works have been played several times in the past under Mr Paur's direction and comment upon the excellence of their interpretation is unnecessary at this time.

The soloist at the next symphony concert will be Mr T. Adamowski and the program will be as follows:

Symphony No. 6 (Pastoral) ....Beethoven
Romanza in F ....Beethoven
Caprice in A minor ....Paganini
Arrangement and the orchestral accompaniment by Ladislas Gorski. (First time.)
Suite, "Les Erinnyes" ....Massenet
(First time.)
Overture to "The Sold Bride" ....Smetana

[illegible]
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.
SUNDAY MORNING, JANUARY 9, 1898.
(Copyright, 1898, Post Publishing Company.)

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The eleventh concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last evening in Music Hall. There was no soloist. The orchestral selections were Mendelssohn's "Ruy Blas" overture; Brahms's symphony, No. 4, and C. M. Loeffler's new symphonic poem, "The Death of Tentagiles" (after the drama by Maeterlinck), for two violes d'amour obbligate and orchestra (MS.).

Mr. Loeffler's composition was heard for the first time. As will be seen, the striking peculiarity of the work is the introduction in the score of two solo parts for viole d'amour, an instrument considered as practically extinct.

The work is scored for nearly every instrument known to the modern grand orchestra, with an extra harp and pair of kettledrums.

Although any work of pretension cannot be judged intelligently at a first hearing, still most compositions have something for a "clue" to work upon, which is an aid to future understanding. But there is nothing of the sort in this work; it leaves you in the dark, all the time. The scoring is novel and at times interesting; some passages are very quiet and of a romantic character, others as noisy and coarse, suggesting Richard Strauss and his class of writers, and the whole work suggests a leaning somewhat to the Russian school of writing. The key tonality is also vague. In a word, but little can be said until a future hearing, in justice to Mr. Loeffler, who has done much that is meritorious and original in orchestral writing. Mr. Kneisel and the composer played the viole d'amour parts in an artistic manner, and the work was well received.

The "Ruy Blas" overture was superbly played, as was Brahms's great symphony. Mr. Adamowski will be the soloist at the next concert. The programme includes Beethoven's symphony, No. 6; Smetana's overture to "The Gold Bride" and a new suite by Massenet, entitled "Les Erennyes."

THE NEWS.
DAILY AND WEEKLY.
Providence, Rhode Island.
MONDAY, JANUARY 10, 1898.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The fourth concert in the series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is announced for next Wednesday evening, Jan. 12, at Infantry Hall. The program opens with Mendelssohn's Overture to "Ruy Blas." Victor Hugo's drama, "Ruy Blas," was to be given in Leipzig to benefit the theatricals pension fund and Mendelssohn was asked to write an overture and music to a romance to be performed with it. He wrote the romance, but at first declined the commission for an overture, for two reasons—a lack of time and the fact that he was not attracted by Hugo's work. However, being afterward "put upon his mettle," as he says in a letter to his mother, dated March 18, 1839, he wrote the overture which is accounted on of his best.

The second number on the program is a sonata for violoncello played by Alwin Schroeder, the first cello of the orchestra, and without the slightest exaggeration one of the greatest performers on his chosen instrument in this country today.

Of the two remaining orchestral selections, one must have the place of honor on the program—the exquisitely beautiful pastoral Symphony of Beethoven. This symphony was composed in the wooded meadows lying between Heiligenstadt and Grinzing, near Vienna, in the summer of 1808. It is rather interesting to note that the famous symphony in C minor was written in the same summer. No better idea of the general style of this famous composition can be given than to use Beethoven's own titles for the various movements. The first movement is described as "Awakening of cheerful feelings on arriving in the country"; the second movement is "A scene by the brookside"; the third movement is "A jovial meeting of the country folks;' the fourth movement is descriptive of a thunder storm, and the fifth and closing movement is called "Shepherds' song, and glad and thankful feelings after the storm." All the efforts of latter day composers in the direction of descriptive music have failed to eclipse the rugged simplicity and exquisite beauty of this marvelous symphony.

The concert closes with the overture to Smetana's opera, "The Sold Bride." which was the first of Smetana's works to bring him general renown as an opera composer. It was probably the one he himself least valued, as it is a comic opera of a generally light character. This work was given in Vienna in 1892, eight years after the composer's death, and had an enormous success; since then it has passed into the repertory of every important opera house in Germany.

The Independent N. Y. C.

Music. DEC 23 1897

"Thus Spake Zarathustra."

BY E. IRENÆUS STEVENSON.

AT the admirable concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was introduced to our public, on last Thursday evening, one of the season's few musical sensations. It was "Thus Spake Zarathustra," a "symphonic poem" by Richard Strauss, a score yet new to Germany.

The compositions of Richard Strauss—to be called at least remarkable ones—have been discussed more than once in this journal and by the present reviewer. The composer is still a young man. He is identified with Munich, as a composer and conductor. He has no family connection with the Viennese dance-music writers of like name. He is perhaps the finest musical decadent of this age of music's brilliant decadence. Powerfully under Wagnerian convictions, and, along with Bruckner, among the most masterly technical followers and imitators of Wagner, he has carried musical realism and musical intellectuality to the extreme in such scores as his "Death and Glorification," "Macbeth," and the like. He is the latest mark and boundary of orchestration as orchestration. No other brain seems able to see such perspectives in instrumental effects and can work out such complex and bewildering musical pages. As a realist, Strauss can be vulgar and crude. As an intellectualist in music he can be incoherent. He has been spoken of as insane or half-insane by his own family and familiars. There is no doubt that he is a great musical wit allied to madness. But he is not to be slighted off. In the present work he has seen fit to set to music the psychologic and religious poem of a madman, Friedrich Nietzsche.

Nietzche's poem does not have anything more to do with Zarathustra (Zoroaster) and with his life and religious work than by using the great Persian teacher's name. A reviewer would need two columns to set forth all that, instead, Nietzsche has hung to it. We have "The Man and the Over-Man"—the author's "own reckless and boundless Individualism"—the "Great Yearning"—the error of the "Dwellers in the Rear World,—the "Holiness of Laughter"—the "Culminating of Humanity"—the "Star of Promise"—the "World Riddle Unsolved"—all this, and much not according to Nietzche, but according to the variants of the Strauss imagination. Never did music-maker have a stranger inspiration to his fancy! Surely a composer who must needs put all these deep things into music has his work cut out for him! But Strauss attacks it with a Titanic good faith and resolution. His score is as bulky as a symphony. To explain its thematic bearings and its awe-ful inner meanings we have a mental and musical guide by Riemann as long as a route in Murray or Baedeker. Down sits the hearer and is expected to encourage the welter of a chaos of philosophy in his soul, while his ears are full of one of the richest—technically—and most complicated even of our latter-day orchestral works.

This seems a formidable predicament. But, after all, how easy and how just it is to look at Strauss's score and at many others built up on the same ridiculous and false principles! We need not read even Riemann to get an estimate of them with little trouble. Let us cast to the winds all the composer's philosophy, all his wish to be didactic in music, all such baggage—such rubbish. The simple question is—what sort of music does "Thus Spake Zarathustra" give us? Is it enjoyable, impressive, original, strong? Does it justify itself as mere music? We are not necessarily concerned a whit with Strauss's inspirations. Suppose we knew nothing of them?

So considered, in the light of musical art and common sense, "Thus Spake Zarathustra" is a vastly complex, very rich, interesting modern musical score. It is written with such a knowledge of orchestral color as relatively few composers ever have possessed and none have surpassed. It is written at times loftily and at times vulgarly and ad captandum. It has beautiful passages and lovely developments of a technical kind. It has dull and unlovely ones—tho not many. All the colors of the musician's pallet are a-rioting in it. By them we are held in our seats. Its melodic side is neither strong nor original. The consummate working-up of the thing as by a kind of maniacal genius, interests, fascinates and, in a way, impresses us. We are tolerant, as the dazzling color of a picture largely incoherent by a crazy painter, a Turner out-Turnered, might make us forgive wild drawing, an insane perspective. Strauss's new work is quite of a piece with his others—showing indisputable lordship over music's material, with no clear inspiration as an emotional musician, or as a melodist, or as a musician having an original and divine call. He is a clay-footed colossus. "Thus Spake Zarathustra" and its fellows will be forgotten when Beethoven's "Seventh Symphony" is as beloved as ever. But in the meantime "Thus Spake Zarathustra" is a work well worth the hearing and even the favor of contemporary andiences, on the strength of whatever in it is sensuously beautiful as mere musical sound.

"Thus Spake Zarathustra" received a magnificently careful, lucid and expressive performance from the Boston players. Mr. Paur's indefatigable labor was not ill-expended so far as concerned such a laudable result.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 10, 1898.

Triumph of C. M. Loeffler's "La Mort de Tintagiles."

A Symphonic Rendition of the Pessimism of the Age.

It was a heavy programme, a concert that must have become monotonous even to the most musical. It began clearly and tunefully enough, with Mendelssohn's "Ruy Blas" overture. This is by no means the best of the composer's concert-overtures. Mendelssohn himself made light of this work; he scoffed at Victor Hugo's play, calling it "of no value, absolutely beneath contempt!" and he simply wanted to display his rapidity of work in the composition of the overture, which he created in a couple of days.

The fatal facility with which the work was written places it far below the "Hebrides," "Melusina," and other of Mendelssohn's overtures. Nevertheless the work is worth the hearing now and then, and its brilliant performance won great applause for it.

Now followed a very talented, but very repellant, composition by C. M. Loeffler, entitled "La Mort de Tintagiles." Mr. Loeffler has already proved that he is thoroughly imbued with the ultra-modern pessimism. He has given us a "Carnaval des Morts" and has revelled in the verjuice of Verlaine, and now he plunges into the still deeper gloom of Maeterlinck. It is but the tendency of the most modern art; music is no longer to be beautiful but is to become a hopeless wailing, a thrice-intensified "Welt-schmerz."

One may readily acknowledge that shadows are needed to give the best effect to lights in painting. that evil must contrast against good in literature, that dissonance must enhance consonance in music, but to present shadows only, to portray only crime and misery, to sound only dissonances and unrest, is bad art. In the Maeterlinck cult the religion is hysteria, the temple a morgue.

Maeterlinck is so steeped, soaked and sodden in horrors, that to a healthy mind, some of his ghoulish tricks become comical. His castles and palaces are always in very bad repair, built in a malarial district, with bad drainage and perfumed with blood. Heavy iron doors, dark passages filled with horror, mysterious presences, melancholy children, (especially "sisters,") abound. Everybody goes about in the deepest gloom and terror; the characters never speak, but always stammer their gruesome tales to each other; there is murder in the air, there is death at the end of every play.

Shakespeare's (?) "Titus Andronicus" is sunshine compared to these tragedies; and what would one have said of Shakespeare had he brought forth one "Titus Andronicus" after the other?

And now we are to have this pernicious art, with its only ambition, that of the Fat Boy in "Pickwick"—"I wants to make your flesh creep!"—exerting its funereal influence in Music.

Mr. Loeffler does not beat about the bush; he plunges bodily into the brambles of the modern path; he begins with a dissonance that makes the first chord of the finale of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony seem sweet by comparison, and once launched, there are no stopping-places, no cadences of repose, all is restless, agonized, sorrowing. In this composition he has passed on from that instrument of brooding, the viola, which he used so masterfully in his recent songs, to an obsolete instrument of plaintiveness, the Viola d'Amore.

This instrument with its 14 strings, (seven to play upon and seven to reverberate in sympathy), is almost useless in orchestral harmonies, but used as Mr. Loeffler employs it, in obbligato passages, it has some very beautiful effects; its tremulous tone and the celestial sweetness of its harmonics being especial characteristics.

It was in especially good taste to use a pair of these viols (most tenderly played by Messrs. Kneisel and Loeffler) to represent the two children, Tintagiles and Ygraine, although their wretchedness was pushed to such great length that it became monotonous at last.

The two viols d'amore were not the only instrumental novelty of the wonderful score, for a pedal-clarinette, the deepest of the single reed instruments, wsa also employed for the first time. This instrument is to the clarinettes what the contrabassoon is to the double-reed family, and it adds a most sonorous tone-color to the basses of the orchestra.

But there were still more striking novelties in the application of the older instruments in this remarkable score; from harps to cymbals the composer showed himself a master of orchestral combinations; setting all the lugubrious ideas aside, Mr. Loeffler has suddenly shown himself as ranking near to the famous masters of the modern orchestra. The odd effects produced on the cymbals (not unlike Wagner's rattling in "Tannhaeuser") the impressive tolling of midnight upon the harps (Berlioz and St. Saens may stand sponsors for this) the bold use of bass-drum and of percussion generally, the muted horns, the "ponticello" work of the strings, the short trumpet blasts, the mournful organ-point against the violes d'amour, and a host of other striking touches might be mentioned to show what a master of scoring we have in C. M. Loeffler; the more pity that he has taken the path of Richard Strauss, in which melody counts for little; scoring and "suggestion" for everything.

At the end of the work the composer, who is a favorite with everybody, was called again and again to receive the plaudits of the large audience which he modestly acknowledged from the corner of the stage.

After the audience had supped quite full of horrors, (one should feel grateful, too, for the Maeterlinck play condensed into the programme-book), a sudden excursion was made from modern mysticism to modern classicism.

Never did Brahms's Fourth Symphony seem so clear; in its first movement the first two notes led to more intelligible ideas than the entire preceding hurly-burly; it was tangible logic after gloomy incoherency. Nor was the dramatic element lacking. The wonderful beauty of that first theme in the Andante came as a cooling sedative to a fever patient, and the clarinettes and horn deserve praise for the manner in which they brought out their important themes. To the present writer, this second movement of the work seems one of the most delightful of Brahms's symphonic movements.

The jovial rondo which is made to do duty for a Scherzo is much weaker, in spite of its bold skips and sudden contrasts. It is a difficult movement to play, but our orchestra conquered it and gave the transformations of its chief theme with abundant spirit.

There is not much doubt but that Brahms took the idea of his final variations from Beethoven. It is interesting to note how the great old master strove to bring about a new ending to his symphonic forms. When he came upon the scene Haydn and Mozart ended their symphonies with a rollicking, jovial, finale, a bad heirloom from the Suite which concluded with a Gigue, (Jig), and led to the idea that every cycle form ought to be merry in its ending.

Already in his second symphony we find Beethoven departing from this idea, but he was hampered by the fact that the finest form of modern instrumental music was used in the first symphonic movement—the Sonata-allegro. In the Heroic and in the Ninth symphony, he hits upon the idea of using the variation form as an ending, thus making a contrast of styles, for the "Development," which is the fundamental principle of the Sonata-allegro, treats the figures of a theme, while variation would treat the theme as a whole.

But not Beethoven himself ever used such a direct, uncontrasted variation-form as we find in this Brahms finale. Some 24 times does the simple eight-barred melody appear in different guises, a pure example of ingenuity and intellectuality. Violins and flute deserve praise for good work in difficult passages in this finale, but one may confess that the ideal interpretation was not attained. It was the loudest, but not the best performance of this movement that we have ever had.

Louis C. Elson.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, JAN. 9, 1898.

Mr Charles M. Loeffler's New Symphonic Poem.

The interesting feature of last week's symphony concert was the performance of Mr Charles M. Loeffler's symphonic poem, "The Death of Tintagiles," which was played for the first time in public at the Friday afternoon rehearsal. The work is of exceptional merit, and entitles Mr Loeffler to recognition as one of the foremost of resident American composers. It is the largest and rather the most pretentious work that Mr Loeffler has yet undertaken, and fulfils the expectations awakened by the many brilliant compositions which have in the past come from the pen of this very talented musician.

There is probably no more popular member of the Boston symphony orchestra than Mr Loeffler, and the high regard in which he is held by the patrons of these concerts was manifested by the increased size of the audience and the warmth of the applause bestowed upon his composition. After the performance he was recalled half a dozen times or more with demonstrations of enthusiasm, most unusual at symphony concerts.

Mr Loeffler's composition is based on the drama by Maurice Maeterlinck and is scored for full modern orchestra with the addition of two violes d'amour. Originality characterizes the entire work, but the especially striking novelty is the introduction of solo parts for the violes d'amour, instruments that have been almost obsolete for many years. The viol is practically a modern viola, with the addition of six or seven fine steel strings under the fingerboard, which vibrate sympathetically with the strings touched by the bow or fingers. The tone is decidedly pleasing, suggestive in quality of something between the viola and the bow zither. There seems no good reason why these instruments should have been allowed to become so nearly extinct, and it is not unlikely that their resurrection in this composition will restore them to popularity. The violes d'amour were played by Mr Loeffler and Mr Franz Kneisel with the grace, expression and exactness of technique to be expected from these finished artists.

The score is remarkable for brilliancy and variety of coloring, abundance of delightful melody and rich, artistically developed harmonies. Many of the passages are intensely dramatic and a climax is worked up to with tremendous power. In the gentler movements poetic sentiment is no less effectively suggested by dainty, delicious instrumentation and, considered generally, the composition is one of the best examples of descriptive music that has been written in recent years.

There were only two other numbers on the program, the overture to "Ruy Blas," by Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, and Brahms' symphony in E minor, both these works have been played several times in the past under Mr Paur's direction and comment upon the excellence of their interpretation is unnecessary at this time.

The soloist at the next symphony concert will be Mr T. Adamowski and the program will be as follows:

Symphony No. 6 (Pastoral)	Beethoven
Romanza in F	Beethoven
Caprice in A minor Arrangement and the orchestral accompaniment by Ladislas Gorski. (First time.)	Paganini
Suite, "Les Erinnyes" (First time.)	Massenet
Overture to "The Sold Bride"	Smetana

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.
SUNDAY MORNING, JANUARY 9, 1898.
(Copyright, 1898, Post Publishing Company.)

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The eleventh concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last evening in Music Hall. There was no soloist. The orchestral selections were Mendelssohn's "Ruy Blas" overture; Brahms's symphony, No. 4, and C. M. Loeffler's new symphonic poem, "The Death of Tentagiles" (after the drama by Maeterlinck), for two violes d'amour obbligate and orchestra (MS.).

Mr. Loeffler's composition was heard for the first time. As will be seen, the striking peculiarity of the work is the introduction in the score of two solo parts for viole d'amour, an instrument considered as practically extinct.

The work is scored for nearly every instrument known to the modern grand orchestra, with an extra harp and pair of kettledrums.

Although any work of pretension cannot be judged intelligently at a first hearing, still most compositions have something for a "clue" to work upon, which is an aid to future understanding. But there is nothing of the sort in this work; it leaves you in the dark, all the time. The scoring is novel and at times interesting; some passages are very quiet and of a romantic character, others as noisy and coarse, suggesting Richard Strauss and his class of writers, and the whole work suggests a leaning somewhat to the Russian school of writing. The key tonality is also vague. In a word, but little can be said until a future hearing, in justice to Mr. Loeffler, who has done much that is meritorious and original in orchestral writing. Mr. Kneisel and the composer played the viole d'amour parts in an artistic manner, and the work was well received.

The "Ruy Blas" overture was superbly played, as was Brahms's great symphony. Mr. Adamowski will be the soloist at the next concert. The programme includes Beethoven's symphony. No. 6; Smetana's overture to "The Gold Bride" and a new suite by Massenet, entitled "Les Erennyes."

THE NEWS.
DAILY AND WEEKLY.
Providence, Rhode Island.
MONDAY, JANUARY 10, 1898.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The fourth concert in the series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is announced for next Wednesday evening, Jan. 12, at Infantry Hall. The program opens with Mendelssohn's Overture to "Ruy Blas." Victor Hugo's drama, "Ruy Blas," was to be given in Leipzig to benefit the theatricals pension fund and Mendelssohn was asked to write an overture and music to a romance to be performed with it. He wrote the romance, but at first declined the commission for an overture, for two reasons—a lack of time and the fact that he was not attracted by Hugo's work. However, being afterward "put upon his mettle," as he says in a letter to his mother, dated March 18, 1839, he wrote the overture which is accounted on of his best.

The second number on the program is a sonata for violoncello played by Alwin Schroeder, the first cello of the orchestra, and without the slightest exaggeration one of the greatest performers on his chosen instrument in this country today.

Of the two remaining orchestral selections, one must have the place of honor on the program—the exquisitely beautiful pastoral Symphony of Beethoven. This symphony was composed in the wooded meadows lying between Heiligenstadt and Grinzing, near Vienna, in the summer of 1808. It is rather interesting to note that the famous symphony in C minor was written in the same summer. No better idea of the general style of this famous composition can be given than to use Beethoven's own titles for the various movements. The first movement is described as "Awakening of cheerful feelings on arriving in the country"; the second movement is "A scene by the brookside"; the third movement is "A jovial meeting of the country folks;' the fourth movement is descriptive of a thunder storm, and the fifth and closing movement is called "Shepherds' song, and glad and thankful feelings after the storm." All the efforts of latter day composers in the direction of descriptive music have failed to eclipse the rugged simplicity and exquisite beauty of this marvelous symphony.

The concert closes with the overture to Smetana's opera, "The Sold Bride." which was the first of Smetana's works to bring him general renown as an opera composer. It was probably the one he himself least valued, as it is a comic opera of a generally light character. This work was given in Vienna in 1892, eight years after the composer's death, and had an enormous success; since then it has passed into the repertory of every important opera house in Germany.

The Independent N. Y. C.

Music. DEC 23 1897

"Thus Spake Zarathustra."

BY E. IRENÆUS STEVENSON.

At the admirable concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was introduced to our public, on last Thursday evening, one of the season's few musical sensations. It was "Thus Spake Zarathustra," a "symphonic poem" by Richard Strauss, a score yet new to Germany.

The compositions of Richard Strauss—to be called at least remarkable ones—have been discussed more than once in this journal and by the present reviewer. The composer is still a young man. He is identified with Munich, as a composer and conductor. He has no family connection with the Viennese dance-music writers of like name. He is perhaps the finest musical decadent of this age of music's brilliant decadence. Powerfully under Wagnerian convictions, and, along with Bruckner, among the most masterly technical followers and imitators of Wagner, he has carried musical realism and musical intellectuality to the extreme in such scores as his "Death and Glorification," "Macbeth," and the like. He is the latest mark and boundary of orchestration as orchestration. No other brain seems able to see such perspectives in instrumental effects and can work out such complex and bewildering musical pages. As a realist, Strauss can be vulgar and crude. As an intellectualist in music he can be incoherent. He has been spoken of as insane or half-insane by his own family and familiars. There is no doubt that he is a great musical wit allied to madness. But he is not to be slighted off. In the present work he has seen fit to set to music the psychologic and religious poem of a madman, Friedrich Nietzsche.

Nietzche's poem does not have anything more to do with Zarathustra (Zoroaster) and with his life and religious work than by using the great Persian teacher's name. A reviewer would need two columns to set forth all that, instead, Nietzsche has hung to it. We have "The Man and the Over-Man"—the author's "own reckless and boundless Individualism"—the "Great Yearning"—the error of the "Dwellers in the Rear World,—the "Holiness of Laughter"—the "Culminating of Humanity"—the "Star of Promise"—the "World Riddle Unsolved"—all this, and much not according to Nietzche, but according to the variants of the Strauss imagination. Never did music-maker have a stranger inspiration to his fancy! Surely a composer who must needs put all these deep things into music has his work cut out for him! But Strauss attacks it with a Titanic good faith and resolution. His score is as bulky as a symphony. To explain its thematic bearings and its awe-ful inner meanings we have a mental and musical guide by Riemann as long as a route in Murray or Baedeker. Down sits the hearer and is expected to encourage the welter of a chaos of philosophy in his soul, while his ears are full of one of the richest—technically—and most complicated even of our latter-day orchestral works.

This seems a formidable predicament. But, after all, how easy and how just it is to look at Strauss's score and at many others built up on the same ridiculous and false principles! We need not read even Riemann to get an estimate of them with little trouble. Let us cast to the winds all the composer's philosophy, all his wish to be didactic in music, all such baggage—such rubbish. The simple question is—what sort of music does "Thus Spake Zarathustra" give us? Is it enjoyable, impressive, original, strong? Does it justify itself as mere music? We are not necessarily concerned a whit with Strauss's inspirations. Suppose we knew nothing of them?

So considered, in the light of musical art and common sense, "Thus Spake Zarathustra" is a vastly complex, very rich, interesting modern musical score. It is written with such a knowledge of orchestral color as relatively few composers ever have possessed and none have surpassed. It is written at times loftily and at times vulgarly and ad captandum. It has beautiful passages and lovely developments of a technical kind. It has dull and unlovely ones—tho not many. All the colors of the musician's pallet are a-rioting in it. By them we are held in our seats. Its melodic side is neither strong nor original. The consummate working-up of the thing as by a kind of maniacal genius, interests, fascinates and, in a way, impresses us. We are tolerant, as the dazzling color of a picture largely incoherent by a crazy painter, a Turner out-Turnered, might make us forgive wild drawing, an insane perspective. Strauss's new work is quite of a piece with his others—showing indisputable lordship over music's material, with no clear inspiration as an emotional musician, or as a melodist, or as a musician having an original and divine call. He is a clay-footed colossus. "Thus Spake Zarathustra" and its fellows will be forgotten when Beethoven's "Seventh Symphony" is as beloved as ever. But in the meantime "Thus Spake Zarathustra" is a work well worth the hearing and even the favor of contemporary andiences, on the strength of whatever in it is sensuously beautiful as mere musical sound.

"Thus Spake Zarathustra" received a magnificently careful, lucid and expressive performance from the Boston players. Mr. Paur's indefatigable labor was not ill-expended so far as concerned such a laudable result.

THE BOSTON
SATURDAY EVENING
Gazette
ESTABLISHED 1813.

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 9.

The Symphony Concert.

The eleventh concert of the Symphony Orchestra was given last night in Music Hall. The programme was:

Overture "Ruy Blas"...........Mendelssohn
Symphonic Poem "Death of Tintagcles,"..
(First time) C. M. Loeffler
Symphony, No. 4, E minor, op. 98....Brahms

The novelty was Mr. Loeffler's symphonic poem, a work claiming sincere admiration for the musicianly qualities that it displays, and for its sound workmanship. It is said to be "after the drama by M. Maeterlinck," but the connection is not easily revealed. The drama does not suggest the music and the music does not suggest the drama. In the music, for example, there is no hint that "il y regnait un tel silence qui un fruit mur qui tombait dans le parc appelait les visages aux fenetres," and the Queen who does not visibly appear at all in the drama seems to be the dominant element in the music, that is, if she be pictured by the bassons, trombones, bass tuba, bass clarinet, trumpets, kettle-drums, cymbals, bass-drum and tam-tam.

On first hearing, the music is puzzling; one cannot reach to the heart of it and follow its evolution in a manner that is wholly satisfying. The coloring is wonderfully varied, rich to the point of brilliancy, and of rare ingenuity, but what it is intended to represent is not clear. It deserves to be added, however, that Mr. Loeffler has done what he deliberately intended to do, and it is therefore unjust to criticise him from the view-point of a theory that he rejects. In Maeterlinck's work the Queen does not appear, but she dominates the entire drama, she deals out tragedy while we remain ignorant of her motives, and the tragedy is acted out behind an iron door, against which Ygraine breaks her fingers and bruises her hands in her vain efforts to open it, and her final expression of agony is "I spit!"

In Mr. Loeffler's symphonic poem there is a similar deliberate vagueness; one feels that something tragic is happening, for although one is kept utterly in the dark, there are flashes as of lightning, dazzling to the eyes, and noises as of crashing thunder that peal ominously in the ears. One cannot see a tragedy in the blackness, but the shrieks, the groans and the wailings are suggestive, and if one has imagination he may ultimately guess at the outlines of a story that is not told.

It is probable that when one became more closely acquainted with the work its beauties will stand out in strong relief and one would better appreciate the climaxes that now seem ineffectual and better adjust his nerves to the perpetual strain on them. An immediate recognition and acceptance are an evidence of the conventional and not of the novel; one may readily understand Shakespeare, but one reaches to the heart of Maeterlinck's greatness only after much preparatory nibblings, cautious thought and careful weighings of opinions. The definite is easily recognized; the indefinite adapts itself to crystallization with great difficulty, and so it happens that a true impressionistic picture is a portrait, or landscape or a storm at sea, according to the point of view taken, and the mood of the spectator.

Mr. Loeffler is always interesting, and one acquainted with his talent feels sure that his work is of the best even when it is difficult of comprehension on first hearing. The symphonic poem, on its technical side, is of a very high quality, and, as has been already said, its tone coloring is brilliant and most fascinating. The program informs us that the work has "all the essential elements of the sonata form," and this demonstrates that Mr. Loeffler is still travelling along classic lines, and that his seeming defiance of the rules of tradition is an illusion rather than a reality. The work was interpreted in the most brilliant manner by Mr. Paur and his orchestra and won the enthusiastic approval of the critical audience.

The programme for the next concert is: Symphony, No. 6, Beethoven; Romanza in F, Beethoven; Caprice in A minor, Paginini; Suite, "Les Erinnyes," Massenet, first time; Overture, "The Sold Bride," Smetana.

THE NEWS.
DAILY AND WEEKLY.
Providence, Rhode Island.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 11, 1898.

The Symphony Orchestra.

The fourth concert in the series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Infantry Hall tomorrow evening under the direction of Mr. Emil Paur. The program arranged is one that cannot fail to attract lovers of music including as it does such works as the Locatelli Sonata and the Beethoven Symphony No. 6. The soloist of the concert will be Mr. Alwin Schroeder the violoncellist who will be heard to special advantage in the Locatelli sonata.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, JANUARY 10, 1898

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The programme of the eleventh Symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows.

Mendelssohn: Overture to "Ruy Blas," opus 95.
C. M. Loeffler: Symphonic Poem, "La Mort de Tintagiles" (after the drama by Maeter[illegible]ck), for orchestra and two violes d'amour obligate (MS.)
(First time.)
Brahms: Symphony No. 4, in E minor, opus [illegible]8.

Mendelssohn's "Ruy Blas" overture, which had not been heard at these concerts for years, was given what seemed to us a decidedly vulgar performance. Its Allegro molto began ponderously slow, was then whipped up to regulation speed with the crescendo of the conclusion-theme, and ended with a sauve-qui-peut rush. One seemed ever and anon to hear the crack of the ring-master's whip through it. The art of crescendo without accelerando seems well-nigh lost! The overture itself comes back wonderfully refreshed by its long sleep. How much genius, life and fertility of invention there is in this "occasional" composition, written in three days! The form is so simple and perspicuous, so desperately regular, that one would say that Mendelssohn had been writing an example of the sonata form for conservatory use; yet how natural, inspired and brilliant it all is! how every measure seems to fall into its place by the force of gravitation, as if no power, human or divine, could help its so falling!

Mr. Loeffler's new symphonic poem is a composition to give one pause. In the first place, it is in no true sense programme music; there is no part of it that recalls any particular scene or event in Maeterlinck's play; there is even one bit of realistic suggestion in it—the twelve strokes of midnight—of which there is no hint in the play at all. It is plainly nothing more than a piece of strongly emotional composition, inspired by reading an exciting and exceptionally powerful drama, and more traditionally regular in structure than might have been expected. If the two viole d'amour parts are taken as musical reflections of the characters of Tintagiles and Ygraine, they reflect these characters more by the fact of their being inseparable than by their specifically expressive quality. Still, from another point of view, the ideal connection between the symphonic poem and the drama may be said to be very strong indeed; instead of trying to describe, depict or suggest a given series of events or to paint living characters in tones, the music contents itself with vividly reflecting the psychical situation in the drama. We have on the one hand impetuous, cruel, ruthless violence; on the other, the most acute and unremitting nervous tension. Here is where Mr. Loeffler shows his fine poetic sense; he has found musical inspiration in Maeterlinck's play, and lets his music do just what, according to it own nature, as music, it can do best: reflect the psychical character of the emotional gist of the play.

Of the composition, considered simply as music, we have not very much to say yet; we have heard it but once, and its whole musical atmosphere is of a sort to which it takes some time to get acclimated. When a man who is naturally all nerves, who may be said to live habitually on the E-string of feeling, sets himself with malice prepense to paint a musical picture of high nervous tension, he may go to considerable lengths. In his previous compositions, notably in his later ones, Mr. Loeffler has shown plainly enough that the musical atmosphere his æsthetic lungs find most congenial is saturated with harmonic cross-relations; what Brahms has done in this field—and it was a curious coincidence, by the way, that Brahms's inveterately "querständig" E-minor symphony should have come on the same programme—what Brahms has done, we say, in this field sinks into insignificance beside Mr. Loeffler's deeds of daring. Francesca and Paolo, in Liszt's "Dante" symphony, do not quite get into that region of perpetual major thirds in which Mr. Loeffler's Tintagiles and Ygraine move and breathe. Of course, one may say that the old objection to the cross-relation of the tritone is now an "überwundener Standpunkt;" also, that no more vivid musical means of suggesting a mental state of high nervous tension exists than a succession of such cross-relations; all this may readily be admitted. Still the human ear remains the human ear; and, while it remains so, not even the sensuously beautiful tone of the viole d'amour can prevent such successions from acting upon it after a while like a sort of musical sandpaper. There is that in the intrinsic nature of music which makes it an unsafe art wherein to proceed to certain excesses. Not even the drama is so dangerous. You may paint a picture of some harrowing scene—say, of vivisection under aggravating nervous conditions—or show the vivid mimicry thereof on the stage; the spectator may be terrifically harrowed up mentally, but is physically safe. But, if you attempt anything of the sort in music, something very like and almost comparable to the physical operation is actually performed upon the listener; he suffers not merely from awakened sympathy, but actually participates in the torture. On the other hand, it can be said of music that what may be acoustically grating in it is often cured of its rasp by its specific musical coherency and meaning—not its expressive appositeness—becoming at length manifest; and this is why we are inclined to give Mr. Loeffler's harping on perpetual major thirds the benefit of the doubt. When, after repeated hearings of his symphonic poem, we shall have got to perceive clearly the true bearings of his unearthly modalities, to grasp the melodic essence of his "querständig" passages, and appreciate their harmonic logic, then may we feel very differently about them.

